other containing the opinions and conjectures of learned men about the author. In the former, the style, sentiments, method, and subject-matter of the book of Wisdom are so judicially treated of, that it is needless here to add to it; but, as the conclusion contains some bold assertions of the canonicalness and inspiration of the Apocryphal books, which are not warrantable, and which, unanswered, through the authority of so great a name, might have done harm,—I mean his appeal to these pretended councils, in whose decrees the Romanists take shelter, and this learned commentator so much triumphs in,—I thought it incumbent upon me, however unequal to the challenge, to examine and confute this pretence, which I have done in the clearest manner that the nature of such a controversy will admit of, and by authorities and reasons so full and cogent, that I trust an antidote is provided against any possible poison that can be conveyed. In the latter, he recounts the several supposed authors of this book mentioned by antiquity, and the arguments urged in their behalf, but at length he leaves the point undecided; so that from him we rather learn who is not, than who is, the real author of it. But the reasons which he produces in favour of Philo the Jew, it must be confessed, are very strong, and verily appear to be such as it seems not improbable he would have adjudged this book to him, if the canonicalness of it would not have been endangered thereby. The two principal arguments urged against Philo by him are, his not being inspired, and the difference of style. The former he himself acknowledges is of no force to such an argument; and the latter he would have judged by the context, the latter he has answered, when he observes, that this may be occasioned by the difference of the subject-matter, according to which, the same writer often varies his style, and seemingly differs from himself; which is particularly true of Philo, for sometimes his pieces are allegorical, sometimes literal, sometimes between both extremes, and yet, from some resemblance in the features, one may easily know that they belong to the same parent.

Such a variation of style, therefore, if there were no other arguments against him of more weight, no more concludes against Philo, than a change of dress, according to the exigency of a man's business and occasions, infers a real charge of his person. St. Jerome acquaints us that many of the ancients supposed this book to be written by Philo (Prol. in l. cap. 22), and some very considerable authorities are of the same opinion. Dr. Raynolds contends, that it was written by Philo in the time of the emperor Caius, who would have his statute set up and adored in the temple of Jerusalem (Sueton. in vit. Calig. 22), and that the Jews sent this very Philo, as their ambassador, to intercede with him not to profane their temple, which would have interfered with the orders about his statue complied with. This, he says, is perfectly agreeable to the argument and drift of the book of Wisdom; and from hence he accounts for those precepts in the first and sixth chapters, which contain the duty of princes, that they were inserted with a view to Caius, to admonish him how he ought to act or to instruct his successors. Hence, likewise, those fine observations upon the reward of virtue, the happy exit of good men, and the torment which awaits the wicked, especially those in power, in the second, third, fourth, and fifth chapters, designed, as he supposes, for the comfort of the distressed Jews, and as a warning and terror to evil and turbulent princes. Hence, likewise, those severe remarks upon the original progress, mischief, and downfall of images and idols, and those threatenings against them, their makers, and worshippers, which are to be found at large in the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters (Cens. Lib. Apost. tom. I. Prol. 22).

Jesus of Nazareth, which is concluded from several fragments of Solomon, and that it is an extract from his writings, which the seventh, eighth, and ninth chapters may seem to favour, and that Philo was the compiler; and so takes the way, between those who assign it to Solomon, and those who ascribe it to Philo. Bishop Cosin concurs in giving this book to Philo (Seholl. Hist. sect. 36), and refers in the margin to the following authorities, as confirming this opinion, S. Basil, Ep. ad Amphilo. S. Hier. Pref. in lib. S. Beleth De Div. Office. cap. 60. Jo. Sarsibaris. Epist. 172. Aquin. in Dionys. De Divin. Nom. cap. 4. Lect. 9. Bonavent. in lib. Sap. Lyran. in Cudern. These further authorities in favour of Philo, joined to Calmæt's arguments, though stronger than any hitherto alleged for any other person, must yet be allowed to amount only to a bare probability.

As there is not sufficient light for determining with any certainty the real author of the book of Wisdom, or the precise time in which he wrote, I shall set down our own observations on this point, as far as related to this book, viz. that it was not wrote by Solomon, though the title carries his name, nor originally in Hebrew; that it was wrote by a Hellenist Jew, for the style shows that it was a Greek that composed it, as St. Jerome observes, "Stylus ipse Graecum eloquentiam redeket?" (Prol. in lib. Sap). From some circumstances in the book itself, it seems most probable to be wrote by a Hellenist Jew of Alexandria in particular. That it was wrote long after Malachi, and the ceasing of prophecy, even a considerable time after the LXX. interpreters, and therefore not by one of them. We may, I think, suppose still nearer its true date, if we place it after the times of the Maccabees, and consequently that it is much later than the book of Ecclesiastes: for what Grotius urges from its being placed in all the copies before that of Ecclesiastes, is of little weight to determine its era, nor is the order of books, as it occurs in our Bibles, any rule for settling the precedence in point of time. For the order of books not only is unsettled after the Pentateuch, and other books confessedly later! and yet the learned suppose it to be wrote before any of the books of Moses, and probably the oldest book we have now remaining (see Origen. cont. Cels. lib. 1. Euseb. Demost. Evang. lib. i. cap. 6. Selden, De Jure Nat. &c. cap. 11. Bishop Sherlock, Dissert. i). In a word, allowing, to this the author, and of the exact time when this book was wrote, yet, as it certainly precedes the most primitive ecclesiastical writings in point of time, and cannot, without manifest injury, be supposed inferior to them in point of worth, it ought at least to be put upon the same level with them, and challenge as high a regard.

What a late learned metropolitan says of the authority of the writings of the apostolical fathers, belongs in an equal, if not higher, degree to the Apocryphal books, especially the didactical ones: "We cannot doubt but that what was universally approved of and allowed, not by a few learned men, but the whole church in those days, was permitted to be publicly read to the faithful for their comfort and instruction, must by this means have received the highest human approbation, and ought to be looked upon by us, though not of equal authority with those books, which the same church has delivered to us as strictly canonical, yet as comprising in the first rank of the right order" (Archbishop Wake's Prelim. Disc. to the Transl. of Apost. Epist. p. 119).
CALMET'S PREFACE

TO

THE BOOK OF WISDOM.

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH.

Custom and the language of the church have always given to the books attributed to Solomon, the title of Sapiential books. The fathers often cite them under the general name of The Wisdom of Solomon, and in ecclesiastical language, The Book of Wisdom comprehends not only all the undoubted works of that prince, but likewise Ecclesiasticus, and that which we are now going to explain, which by a peculiar privilege hath been called by way of eminence, The Book of Wisdom: or, as the Greek expresses it, The Wisdom of Solomon. Not that Solomon was the author of this book, scarce any learned men are of that opinion; but it has been looked upon as a summary of his sentiments, and as containing some of his most weighty and important maxims. Some of the ancients quote it also by the Greek name Panarctos, i.e., a treasury of all virtue, or a collection of useful instructions to bring us to it. And in this sense we must understand wisdom in this author, as synonymous to religion, piety, justice, and the fear of God; a sense widely different from that in which wisdom is understood in the writings of the heathen philosophers, where it has but little concern or connection with religion, and the practice of real virtue, aiming only to enlighten and improve the understanding, and to give it a sort of fruitless knowledge of general truths of a very imperfect morality founded wholly upon nature.

The principal end proposed by the author of this book is, the instruction of kings, nobles, and judges of the earth; he addresses his discourse to them, accommodates his rules to their circumstances and occasions, and exhorts them to a serious and diligent study of wisdom. And to incline them the more effectually to it, he assumes the name of Solomon, and speaks to them as in his person with an air of authority, but without harshness or affectation. He proposes this great prince to them as a pattern, and recounts by what means he arrived to that height of glory, riches, knowledge, and eloquence; he declares, that it is to wisdom alone he is indebted for all these blessings, and that whoever will imitate him, may arrive to the same happiness and perfection. And to engage them the more effectually to the pursuit, he assures them, that the means of attaining wisdom are not difficult, that to gain her is only asking her of God, that she even prevents those that seek her, and hastens to meet those who sincerely desire her.

He discovers to them, at the same time, the obstacles that they may meet with in the study and pursuit of wisdom, which he shows are chargeable on men themselves, rather than on God; that therefore they wrongfully accuse nature, and to no purpose urge their own weakness and infirmities. For death and sin made not their first entry into the world through the will of God, but by the fraud of the devil, and through the fault of men themselves. At first man was created pure, innocent, and immortal, and was himself the cause of forfeiting those great blessings and prerogatives. But notwithstanding his fall, wisdom is still possible to be attained by him, and, through the assistance of God, he may acquire it. But to engage God to be his friend, he must avoid, above all things, sin, debauchery, and deceit, for God will be served faithfully, and with an upright heart, nor will wisdom ever enter into or dwell in a deceitful and corrupt soul.

He expressly confines those who believe the soul to be mortal, and who place their sovereign happiness in the pleasures of sense, and says, they deservedly brought death upon themselves, by siding with the devil, and ranging themselves in his party who, through envy, brought men into this degenerate and unhappy state. He represents the righteous man as reviled, hated, persecuted, condemned unjustly, and at length put to death, and in such terms as suit admirably with the sufferings and passion of Jesus Christ. He threatens the wicked with the judgments of God, and extreme punishment in another life, and represents them in a state of despair at seeing the happiness of the just, which they shall be witnesses of. On the other side he describes the blessed condition of the saints in a future state, as a condition of joy, peace, and glory, and represents them as kings and judges, who shall shine in heaven, and exercise there a jurisdiction as glorious as their humiliation was on earth contemptible. He commends virginity, and opposes it to the many disorders of lust and incontinence, and in particular inveighs against the sin of adulterers, whose posterity he shows to be unfortunate, and of short continuance.

He speaks of wisdom in the most magnificent and pompous terms, in such a manner, that he often attributes to her what in strictness belongs only to the Divinity itself, of whom she is a ray and emanation. He gives her the name of the Spirit of God, the Holy Spirit, Creator, which fills and knows all things, and is almighty; one in essence, but manifold and diversified in her operations. He says, that wisdom is a sort of efflux or vapour which issues and proceeds from the sovereign virtue of God, an emanation of his splendour, the brightness of the everlasting light, the spotless mirror of the majesty of God, and the express image of his goodness; that being but one, she can do all things, and continuing the same, renovates, or makes all things new. That none are beloved of God who are not filled with wisdom; that she is always about his throne, and was present at, and assisted in, the first creation of man. He prays to the Lord to send her down from heaven, that she may instruct him, and be his guide and assistant.

He shows the advantages which wisdom procures to men by his own happy experience; that Adam, who fell at the beginning, recovered himself by wisdom; that through her Noah had the happiness to please God, and to preserve himself pure and un-spotted in the midst of a wicked and perverse generation; that it was wisdom which preserved Abraham from the general corruption of the world, and Lot in the destruction of Sodom. He relates the history of Jacob and Joseph; that of Moses and the Hebrews in Egypt; and the delineation of the moral and spiritual events, and the description of the miracles that God wrought in their favour, and always ascribes to wisdom the glory of them. He draws an elaborate and judicious parallel of the different manners in which God treated the Egyptians and the Hebrews, and compares the just severity of God towards the former, with the many signal instances of favour shown to the latter. He enlarges upon the original of idolatry, and shows its folly, progress, fatal consequences and effects, and foretells its ruin and downfall. That idolaters are the most senseless of all men, and their blindness absolutely inexusable, in not discovering and finding out the true God by the help and scale of the creatures. And in general it may be said, that in no other book of scripture, nobler and more grand conceptions of the Deity are to be met with than in this.

There are some particular sentiments in this book, which have made some doubt of the inspiration of the author, and of the canonicalness of the book itself. We shall examine, in a particular Discourse, whether what are called these sentiments are just and sound. There is some difficulty in what he asserts with respect to his own soul, that it, being naturally good, had the happiness to light into a body likewise pure and undefiled (vii. 20). We have examined the passage in the course of this work, and shown that he speaks there only of natural parts, and not of any incorruptible soul.

He says, in another place, that Joseph had the sceptre of Egypt, which is not mentioned in the books of Moses, and that the Hebrews, whilst they remained there under the bondage of Pharaoh, were a just and irreproachable people, which is contrary to what Ezekiel and other prophets say of them, who accuse them of idolatry in that very country. He approves of the Hebrews spoiling the Egyptians of their goods, as being only the just recompense of their labour, which before was so badly requited. He adds likewise many particulars to Moses's account; he seems to believe that Abraham lived at the time of the building the tower of Babel, and that wisdom prepared for the conversion of the French by the comoedians, who delivered the deep secrets of divine mysteries, to the greater advantage of the most ignobly design, and kept him free from idolatry, which, like an inundation, overspread the earth. He accuses the Canaanites of magic, eating human flesh, worshipping flies and insects, which the scripture does not charge them with. It is true, indeed, that the Philistines adored Beezебub, the god of flies; but these people were not of the race of Canaan, nor of his extraction.

He says, that the fire which fell with hail and rain upon Egypt, spared those animals which plagued the Egyptians, supposing that the frogs, flies, and locusts were still subsisting at that time, which is contrary to the account of Moses. He speaks of manna, as a food prepared in heaven, as the nourishment of angels, and in which the Hebrews found every thing agreeable to their palate that they could wish for; whereas Moses tells us, that the taste of manna was like that of wafers, or bread prepared with oil; that the Israelites were so satisfied with it, that they disliked the very sight of it. He makes appurtenances and spectacles to haunt the Egyptians during the three days' darkness in Egypt, supposing them to be visible by the light of some sudden and occasional flashes; and adds some circumstances about the Israelites' passage through the Red sea which seem fabulous, as what he says of grass and flowers appearing at the bottom of it, to make their journey more easy and delightful; and, in fine, seems to believe, that the quails which fell in the wilderness round about the camp of the Hebrews, was a miraculous production, like that of the flies and frogs which Moses brought upon the land of Egypt.

But to all this we may answer in general, 1. That it is a piece of natural justice due to an author, that is not living nor capable of explaining his own sentiments, to understand his expressions in the most favourable sense, and not to impute a bad meaning to him, as long as one is not forced to it by the plain evidence of his own words. We have shown in the comment, that there are none of these passages which have been excepted against, but what may be understood in a good and consistent sense. 2. With respect to the additions which are complained of, it is common, we know, both in sacred and profane history, for one writer to supply what hath been omitted by another.

This answer will hold (it may be replied) when two authors contemporary, or nearly so, record the same fact; but the case is quite otherwise here, as the author of this book lived many ages after Moses.

To this we rejoin, that there are two ways by which the memory of events may be transmitted to posterity, viz. by scripture, or by tradition. If the author could not come under the one or the other of these cases by the first of these ways, he might learn them by the second. But if this author was inspired, as we assert and shall hereafter show, there is no withstanding the force of his evidence, unless there could be found in his account of things some manifest contradiction to the sacred history, or sentiments contrary to truth and religion, which can never be shewn.

For, with regard to Joseph's having the sceptre of Egypt, it is not to be understood of a kingdom or sovereignty properly so called; it means only that he was the second person in the kingdom, and had a very extensive rule over all that country. And do not Joseph's own brethren say as much? "Joseph is yet alive, and is ruler over all the land of Egypt." As to the Hebrews, who lived under the cruel bondage of Pharaoh, loaded and overwhelmed with hardships, they were just and irreproachable with respect to that king and his subjects, who had cruelly enslaved them, though not so indeed in regard to God, who permitted their slavery to punish their idolatry. The spoil which the Israelites took from the Egyptians was not condemned anywhere in the scripture, and such as have written on that subject justify the action by many substantial reasons. What this author says of the Canaanites is but too true. The description which the scripture gives of their abominations, is much more shocking than any thing said of them in this book. We have already answered in general to the objection drawn from the addition to the sacred account, the rest will be discussed in the Commentary itself. Some have raised an argument from the author himself, "If he is not the real Solomon, why does he endeavour to pass for that prince? Can the Holy Spirit inspire a writer to personate what he is not?" We answer, that such an artificer in this writer, whoever he be, is neither fraudulent nor false. It is no more than a sort of prosopopeia, an ingenious fiction, whereby a writer, to give more weight and authority to the instructions delivered, assumes the name and person of another more ancient. The woman of Tekoa speaks in such a disguised manner when she pretends before the king to have lost one of her sons, 2 Sam. xiv. 4. By the same artifice, one of the sons of the prophets feigns himself wounded for having let a prisoner escape, 1 Kings xx. 35. Thus Nathan reproved David for his sin with Bathsheba, under the significant parallel of the ewe-lamb. And thus the prophets introduce God, Moses, Abraham, as occasionally talking, to render their discourses, by such a fiction, the more livedly and affecting.

The author of this book designed to give the history of the ancient and end of true wisdom. The Greeks were passionately fond of Philosophy; but they know not its true origin, ascribing it to their own industry and pains, which the wise man, in his treatise, shows to be the gift of God. They make it to consist in fruitless speculations, or in rules of a morality merely chimerical (as was that of the Stoics, which exceeded the power of human nature, or one purely natural, which went no farther than common honesty, and the doing such actions as were agreeable to right reason. But this writer proposes to them supernatural wisdom, having God for its end, and holiness for its object. He overthrows idolaety, by showing its ridiculous rise, sad consequences, and the horrors and abominations which accompanied it; that therefore men, and above all, philosophers, are inexcusable, in not knowing and acknowledging God, and transferring to creatures that honour which is due to the Creator only. In a word, he destroys the opinions of the Epicureans and Sadducees, who denied the immortality of the soul; but, on the other hand, he sets before them the rewards and punishments of another life. After this manner he opposes the principal mistakes of the philosophers, and gives here the plan of a true and sound philosophy. Original sin, the fall, repentance, and recovery of the first man, the rewards and punishments in a future state, are as well, or perhaps more clearly, described in this book than in any of the Old Testament, which is of great consequence, to establish the truth of these opinions, and to show the antiquity of such a belief among the Jews.

The first six chapters of this book are as a preface to the rest of the work; they are a sort of an abridgment of the first nine chapters of the book of Proverbs. In them kings and nobles are exhorted earnestly to the study of wisdom. In the seventh and eighth chapters, the author, assuming the name of Solomon, proposes himself as a pattern, and shows what means he employed to attain true wisdom. One sees there the description of his happy reign, and of his conversation, knowledge, and industry. What is said of him in the first book of Kings. The ninth chapter is a paraphrase on the prayer which Solomon made to God in the beginning of his reign, which is mentioned 1 Kings iii. 6—9. The tenth chapter, to the end of the book, is a continuation of the same prayer, where he enlarges upon the power of wisdom, and its effects, the usefulness of it, the respect and reverence of it, the siderate, and the rewards of the truly wise and righteous, which he confirms by various instances and examples. The work seems not to have been finished, or at least the conclusion of it has not reached us, for the author does not finish his prayer, as it is natural to suppose he should, according to his first design. We can therefore know nothing more of this book, nor the time in which it was written; we shall do that in a particular Dissertation. The original text is in Greek, which is yet preserved, and it does not appear that it was ever extant in Hebrew, notwithstanding what some authors have thought to the contrary. We find none of those Hebraisms, which are hardly to be avoided by those who translate from the Hebrew, nor any turns but what are usual in the Greek tongue. The author manifestly had read the heathen writers, and wrote Greek well; he even borrows some expressions which are peculiar to them—as, the giants being drowned in the waters of the deluge, the river of Forgetfulness, or Lethie, the kingdom of Plato or Hades, ambrosia, &c.; there are some passages in which he plainly appears to have imitated Plato, and one clearly perceives that he had studied that philosopher. His style is swelling, abounds with epithets, often obscure, and almost throughout poetical and allegorical. The Jewish writers had some knowledge of him, and have quoted him sometimes; Rabbis Moses ben Nachman cites particularly vv. 7, which he gives in Syriac, or such Hebrew as was spoken at Jerusalem in the time of our Saviour.

The author often quotes scripture, and always according to the Septuagint. Thus v. 10, 15, he compares the wise man to a shadow, to a vessel cutting the waves, to a bird which parts the air, and to an arrow shot at a mark, which is taken from Prov. xxx. 19, where the wise man says, according to the LXX. that "there are four things which are hard to be known; the way of an eagle in the air, the way of a serpent upon a rock, the way of a ship in the midst of the sea, and the way of a young man in his youth;" but in the Hebrew the last clause is, "and the way of a young man with a virgin." So that passage in v. 12, "Let us lie in wait for the righteous, because he is not for our turn," is taken from Isa. lit. 10, where the Septuagint read, "let us bind the righteous, because he is but a churlish reprobate, but an exalted man to the righteous that all shall be well with him. In his account of the plagues of Egypt, he follows the LXX. particularly in what he says of the flies and lice. And when he speaks of idols in the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters, he almost word for word copies what he have in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Baruch, and the Psalms on that subject.

The Latin translation which we have of this book is not St. Jerome's; it is the ancient Vulgate, used in the church before the time of that father, and made from the Greek in the first ages of the church, by an author unknown. The translator does not seem well acquainted with the purity of the Latin tongue, often making use of words that are not used by approved authors in that sense; as honestus for riches; honestus for a rich man; respectus or visitalio for the punishment which God inflicts upon the wicked; superstilis for vanity or vain-glory; animalita superbae for dangerous and noxious animals. The translation keeps very close to the text, and renders it particularly well, sometimes; but it is very coldly, neglecting all ornaments of speech, and the beauties of the Latin idiom. St. Jerome, in his preface to the books of Solomon, says, that he corrected Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, from the ancient version of the LXX. but did not meddle with the translation of this book, or Ecclesiastes. There are not many various readings in the Vulgate; there is only one of much greater number in the Latin ones. The Complut. edition, that of Antwerp, and of Sixtus V. in 1590, afford a great variety, which are corrected in the Bibles of Clement VIII. and in the Vulgate. We have marked them at the bottom of each page in the Commentary. The Book of Wisdom was not always received by the church as canonical, as not being admitted into the Jewish canon of scripture among those books which were written in their language, and passed through their hands to the Christian church without any doubt or exception. But such as were written in Greek, as Wisdom and Ecclesiastes, have been disputed and contested, and the church, always cautious and wary in her decisions, did not degree to admit them for canonical, till after mature judgment and long deliberation; which slowness in her proceedings and determination shows, that she did not admit them hastily or by chance. The scarcity of books in the beginning of Christianity, the great diversity of churches from one another, the difficulty of assembling general councils, made each church keep to its own tradition, to admit, or not to admit books, till the truth was at length discovered.

The principal reasons brought against the canonicalness of this book are, 1. That there is no appearance and no evidence of the authority by which it was written; the apostolic age, to which we ascribe it, was inspired; he lived and died a Jew without any knowledge of Jesus Christ, or receiving his gospel. 2. The doubts of some ancient fathers who have ranked it in the number of disputed writings: that several particular churches left it out of their canon, and even some late interpreters, as Lyra, and Cajetan, did not admit it as indisputably canonical.

3. The Jews not admitting it into their canon, for it does not appear to have been known among them before the time of Jesus Christ. 4. Internal evidence in the book itself to reject it, as plain imitations of the gospel, and writings of the apostles; the opposition of some passages to the undoubted scriptures, and the addition of others, which appears to have been made on purpose. All that can be objected on this head, we have mentioned before in the body of this preface; and will examine, in the Dissertation upon the author of this book, the objections with respect to Philo, and those passages in the gospel and writings of the apostles, which resemble some in this book. We have also answered, both in the Commentary and in this preface, the accusation of untruth, which has been urged against this writer. There remains only the difficulty which arises from the Jews not acknowledging it to be canonical, and some of the ancients not receiving it.

The authority of the church hath never been of any great weight in the church, particularly of the modern Jews, whose malicious and unfair dealing, in every thing relating to our faith and holy religion, is open and notorious. The apostles, whose authority is of infinitely more weight than theirs, have taken quotations and proofs from this book:* And it is begging the question to say, that this writer copied from them. They recommended it to the faithful, who have ever since preserved, read, and cited it as inspired scripture, so that we cannot now form any reasonable doubt about its canonicalness. To the testimony of those few among the ancients, who have disputed its authority, we oppose a crowd of inscribed witnesses in all ages of the church, who have acknowledged and quoted it as divine scripture. In short, to the scuples of those who, seeing antiquity wavering upon this point, have found some difficulty to persuade themselves to admit this book into the canon, we oppose the third council of Carthage, in 397; that of Sardica in 343; the council of Laodicea, in 321; the council of 392; the eleventh of Toledo, in 675; that of Florence, in 1438; and, lastly, the fourth session of the council of Trent; all which expressly admitted this book into the class of holy scripture. And there is scarce any ancient father who has not quoted and commendedit. Many of them attribute it to Solomon others to some prophet, and all are zealous writers.

We may therefore reasonably urge upon this occasion, the argument of prescription against our adversaries, and let them produce their title against

* See this objection discussed in note on K. 12. and Bishop Cosin's Scholast. Hist. p. 23.

† Some of the later fathers, as St. Jerome, St. Austin, &c. give indeed very honourable titles to the Book of Wisdom, and the other Apocryphal Books, calling them canonical, sacred, divine; but this is a technical, scholastic, not a real distinction. Of those books do, canones ficti, a perfect rule of faith; but canones morales, are instances such as are profitable only for instruction, and to inform men in the duties of life, and to be called morals by such, (Epist. ad Paul. Priv. in. Bib. Sac. Auth. De Doctr. Christ. lib. ii. cap. 19. Retract. lib. ii. cap. 10. De Civit. Dei, lib. xv. cap. 22. Cyril.)

(1) As the Romanists lay the stress of the cause upon these councils, and the authority of the pope, their inferences prove, work, it seems proper, and even necessary, to examine into the authority of the council of Trent, and see in what respect or point they are brought for. I shall take them in the order as they stand in this preface. With respect to the third council of Carthage, we have already said, in the Dissertation in this book, that the council was not oecumenical, but only a provincial one. 2. The councils of Carthage were forty-seven in number; and the length of time, we are not originally in the acts of this council, but added in the time of Pope Boniface. For if this council were held under the conduct of the apostle and bishop of Rome, St. Clement, it is plain that the authority and title of this council in all copies has it, there can be no such council in it. 3. With respect to this, to whom this canon refers, was not at that time Pope of Rome, but above twenty years after. 4. The great and general council of Chalcedon, consisting of six hundred and thirty bishops, was, we are told, in the church; in that code were contained the canons of the council of Laodicea, wherein we have the catalogue of the canonical books of scripture; but the canons of the council of Carthage were not confirmed by it, as not having yet any place in it. And therefore we are safe in conclusion, confirmed also the council of Carthage, which was thirty-seven years before that of Carthage, which they urge), which rereeks the canonical books of scripture on us, and excludes the rest, in canon fifty-nine, as not properly belonging to them. When therefore in the same second council they allow also the canons of Carthage, and they contradict themselves, and but that they are understood the Greek council to be the same, and that the authority, and that is, that Carthage is another: the latter extended, in a large and improper acceptation of scripture, to the ecclesiastical books, and the former, in a more strict and proper sense, only to the canon of the church, which is a true and authentic and divine. For in ones and the same sense they cannot both be taken, nor otherwise be confirmed. (See Cosin's Schol., for the last). Theol. lib. viii. cap. 7.

There is still less to be said in favour of the eleventh council of Toledo, which was held only by seven bishops, seven, and the sixteen bishops, two deacons, two bishops' deputies, and seven abbots. A number too small and contemptible to make a council of that of Florence in 1438, is of so modern a date, that it can have of no great weight. It was assembled by the authority of the pope, and under his influence and management. In the large former editions of the council, no such canon, as is pretended, is to be found; it is a decree added by some impostor, probably the deponent of the council, in order to strengthen the connexion and union to be a forgery, for nothing was mentioned at this council concerning that affair. Nor from the pope's seat, or oecumenical council, even in respect of the Latin church only; many of which neither acknowledge Eugenius, or his council, and the council itself not only at Rome, but also at other places, condemned the schismatical assembly. And the Greeks, as soon as they were restored, not only rejected this canon, but ordered their own fears and the pope's persuasion had before led them into, (see Cosin's Schol. Hist. sect. 100.)

PREFACE.

The prophecies which are to be met with in this book, and which have been acknowledged as such by the fathers, are still farther proofs of its canonicalness. All that is mentioned here of the future downfall of idolatry, and of the terrible judgments which God will inflict upon the wicked, may be considered as a true prophecy. But the place upon which the ancients have fixed with most attention is, where the author describes the punishments of the just man, in terms so resembling the sufferings of Jesus Christ, that Grotius imagines these passages to have been added to the book by some Christian interpolator, after the death of our Saviour; which is not at all probable, as they are so linked and interwoven with the context, that they are not to be separated without manifest violence. The fathers had quite a different opinion of them, and have made use of them against Jews and heathens, and shown the complete accomplishment of them in the person of Jesus Christ.

The Jews themselves do not absolutely reject this book; I have before observed, that a learned rabbi quotes a passage from it in his preface to the Pentateuch. John Pius of Mirandola asserts, that the Jews read a Book of Wisdom in Hebrew, composed, as they thought, by Solomon, as the narrow and quintessence of the law of Moses. But it is very different from this book. Isidore, Sixtus of Sienna, Christopher a Castro, Gonsalve a Cervantes, Lorin, in their prefaces to this book, maintain that it was written at first in Hebrew, and afterward translated into Greek; many affirm, that it was written by Solomon, and translated after into Greek by the LXX. But these last opinions go too far. If the Jews were acquainted with and read this book, it must have been translated into their language from the Greek, and we must indeed agree that they never received it as canonical.

score others, should make up a general council (or all Christendom) (see Cosin's Schol. Hist. sec. 104.) Wherein, as there was not any one greatly remarkable for learning, that voted the canonical authority of the Apocryphal books, which the eastern and western churches ever held as suspected and uncertain; so some of them (as Father Paul observes, whose testimony upon this occasion must be allowed of great weight, and less exceptionable) were lawyers, eminent, perhaps, in their own profession, but of little skill and understanding in controverted points of religion; and such divines as were among them, were of low parts, and less than ordinary sufficiency; the greater number were counsellors, and bishops of such small places, or dignities only titular, that supposing every one to represent the clergy and people from whence he came, it could not be said that one in a thousand in Christendom was represented in this pretended council (see Brent's Transl. of the Hist. of the Council of Trent, b. iv. p. 153). I mentioned just above, that the eastern and western churches looked upon the Apocryphal books as suspected and uncertain. Those that are curious may see this matter very minutely discussed by a particular detail of the sentiments of the several churches, extracted chiefly from the writings of the bishops that presided over the respective sees, which Episcopius has largely executed, Inst. Theol. lib. iii. cap. 7, in such a clear manner, and so exact a method as to time, place, and persons, that we see the judgment of these two great ecclesiastical bodies, as it were, in one view, and without any confusion or perplexity.

* This may be disproved by almost an infinity of testimonies in Bp. Cosin's Scholastical History, wherein by an historical disquisition of the universal tradition of the church of God unanimously delivered in all ages from the apostles' time and (before) to ours, and by a very particular enumeration of the testimonies of the ancient ecclesiastical writers through the several centuries, it appears, that neither the ancient fathers, bishops, nor ecclesiastical writers, taught or believed otherwise than we now hold. So that it seems strange, that so learned a writer as Calistus, should either be so greatly deceived in a point of such consequence, or one in other respects so fair and candid, should knowingly triumph in false evidence and unsupported authorities; nor is it less strange, that he should not give the incorruptible book of this prelate a place in his Bibliotheca Sacra, as the nature of that work required; but we may suppose that he either did not know it, being wrote in English, or did not care to have it known and read, the answer of it being so cogent against the Romanists, and the book itself the strongest bulwark of the protestant cause in this controverted point between us.
In the dispute which hath been raised about the author of the Book of Wisdom was only among catholic writers, and all parties were agreed upon its canonicalness, and the inspiration of the author, we should have given ourselves no more trouble about this, than some others of the sacred books, whose canonicalness is acknowledged by all the churches, even those which are separated from our communion, though the writers of them are doubtful and unknown. When once it is agreed that the Holy Spirit is the original author of a book, one need not be so solicitous who the person employed as the instrument is. But in the question before us, many of those who dispute about the writer of this work, attempt to destroy its authority; and, by diminishing the credit of its author, would take the liberty to reject it as apocryphal. To oppose this is the design of the present Dissertation, wherein we shall endeavour to show, that though the author of the Book of Wisdom be not certainly known, the book itself does not cease on that account to be authentic, inspired, canonical.

Many catholic writers suppose the author of this book to be Solomon himself. He wrote it (say they) in Hebrew, from whence it was translated in Greek by the LXX. interpreters, together with the other works of that prince; the ancient fathers quote it often under his name, and it has generally that title in the Greek copies. The author plainly assumes this character throughout, and the true Solomon stands confessed in as clear a manner as in any other of his books. Everybody agrees that it is not unworthy of his consummate wisdom, and high reputation, and that his sentiments and maxims are such as a prince would speak, though this piece is not now to be met with in the Hebrew, it cannot be concluded from thence, that it was never wrote in that language: for how many works have we in the versions and translations only, the originals of which are not now to be found! and how many are ascribed to particular authors, as indisputably theirs, which have less marks to ascertain them to belong to such writers, than this has of being the genuine work of Solomon? This is what they plausibly urge in behalf of this opinion.

But to these reasons it may be replied, that if this work was really Solomon's and was in Hebrew in the time of the LXX. interpreters, the Jews would not have forgot or neglected it as they have done, nor excluded it their canon. It is entirely unknown in that language to Josephus, Philo, St. Jerome, and Origen; so that in all appearance it never was in that language. Add to this, that the turn of the phrase and expressions are in the manner of the Greeks, and very different from the genius of the Hebrew tongue. The author quotes the scripture in it according to the LXX. and borrows passages from books, which were not wrote till a long time after Solomon. To pretend that the Jews have suppressed the original, out of hatred to the Christians, who make use of its authority to convince them, that they have accomplished, in the murder of our Saviour, what was foretold of him in this book, is to advance what is incredible, and raising an objection which has been a hundred times confuted, and more difficult to maintain, than what they would avoid by this plea. For, could the Jews have suppressed it, if they would? and if they could, what service would they have done them, since they have left it us in Greek, with so many other books, as strong at least as this, to establish the truth of our religion?

The authority of the fathers is decisive, to prove a point of faith, and the authenticalness of any text; but then their testimony must be constant and uniform; but in a matter of criticism, and where their judgments are divided, their opinion does not always determine the case. Now here the ancients do not speak in a uniform manner; some absolutely deny Solomon to be the author, others speak doubtfully, and none affirm it in express words. They cite indeed this work according to the usage of the church, which comprehends under the name of the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon, not only Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, but also this book and that of Ecclesiastes. The title of the book in the Greek copies is no stronger an argument than the name of king, which this author assumes in the body of the work, or the pert and appearance of Solomon, with which he would set himself off. The ancients often call their books by the names of persons whom they introduce speaking, as Plato gives to his Dialogues the names of Socrates, Timæus, Protagoras; and Cicero, to his Book of the Great Orators, that of Hortensius. Xenophon too calls the history, in which he gives the model of a complete prince, by the name of Cyrus, who is the principal character drawn in it. But nobody will say, that these pieces were wrote by those whose names they bear, for it is known and confessed on all hands, that it was Plato, Cicero, Xenophon, who wrote them under such fictitious names. St. Jerome says expressly, that the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon carries a false and borrowed title.

The resemblance that is to be found in the thoughts and expressions of this book with those of Solomon, is so far from proving him to be the writer of it, that it furnishes a strong argument to the contrary. This prince would never have copied from himself, nor have repeated here, what he had already said in some other work; nor would he have cited passages from Isaiah and Jeremiah, who lived so long after him. We do not design or endeavour to decry the book, or to diminish its real worth and value; we readily own, that it is not unworthy of the wisdom of Solomon himself, and we have given it an author more great and noble than that prince—it is the Holy Spirit, which inspired this writer, as he did Solomon. I shall not repeat here, what I have said elsewhere, with respect. to some terms used in this book, which are borrowed from the heathens, such as ambrosia, the river of Forgetfulness, or Lethe, the kingdom of Pluto or Hades, &c. These fables are apparently of later date than Solomon, as well as the chaplets and crowns of roses, mentioned ii. 8.

St. Austin was once of opinion, that Jesus the son of Sirach was the author of the books of Wisdom and Ecclesiasticus; but he did not long continue under this opinion. He recounts as to the book of Wisdom, Retract. lib. ii. cap. 1, and without explicitly saying who is the author, owns that it is more probable that Jesus the son of Sirach did not write it: he says in another place, that it was by no means likely to be written by Solomon; but he does not doubt but that it and Ecclesiasticus were both written by inspiration.* And he elsewhere observes, that the primitive writers of the church, nearest the times of the apostles, fetched proofs from this book, as being of divine authority; that there can be no pretence for not receiving it, and placing it in the rank with the other scriptures.

St. Jerome informs us, that some ancient writers ascribed the Book of Wisdom to Paul the Jew; which was a sentiment much more of dispute to authors that came after. Some have looked upon it as a dangerous opinion, which tends to destroy the whole authority of the book, by ascribing it to a Jewish writer, and one who was never reckoned inspired. Others have adopted him without any limitation, but the greater part add the name of St. Jerome mentions, is not that Philo whose writings we have, who is commonly known by the name of Philo the Jew, but some other more ancient. For they pretend that there were several authors of this name: the first, as they say, lived under Ptolemy Philadelphus, and was one of the LXX. interpreters; the second is Eusebius; the third is Philo the Jew; the fourth is one who lived under the second temple, and wrote a book about the soul.

The first Philo is unknown to antiquity, nor is there any reason to place him in the time of Ptolemy and the Seventy interpreters. In all appearance there never was such an author, neither is he any where accredited by any ancient writer. The second was a Pagan, a native of Biblos, who translated the history of Phenicia into Greek. Josephus places him in the same rank with Demetrius and Eupolemus, who, not being of the Jewish religion, could not have acquired a sufficient knowledge of their books to give any true and just idea of their history, and can with less reason be supposed to be the author of sacred and prophetic books. The next then is the famous Philo, the Jew of Alexandria, who lived in the first age of the church, and was reputed by the Jews of that place to the emperor Caius, about the year 40 of the common era. He wrote many books in his youth, but in the latter part of his time was employed in public and national affairs, and was of great service to his countrymen. Eusebius and St. Jerome write, that in a second embassy which he was sent upon to the emperor Claudius, he contracted an acquaintance and friendship with St. Peter. Photius says, that he even embraced Christianity, but quitted it again out of discontent or disgust. Josephus mentions him as a very considerable person. His works are in a style admirable for its beauty and plainness, but his method of expounding scripture is allegorical. Photius thinks, that it was from him the custom was first introduced into the church of explaining the scriptures allegorically, and it is certain that some of the fathers have followed his method. As to Philo's being a Christian, that opinion is now exploded by all learned men, as well as his pretended intimacy with St. Peter.

There are four ways to judge whether Philo, to whom many of the ancients have ascribed this book, be really the author of it. 1. A conformity of sentiments and methods. 2. An agreement with the person and character of Philo, and the times wherein he lived. 4. The authority of those writers who have ascribed this book to him. We shall examine these particulars in their order.

The author of the Book of Wisdom represents God as the creator and preserver of all things, of infinite wisdom and justice, and whose providence watches over and extends itself to all his works. A God who aims only at the good of his creatures, who created them originally pure and innocent, and does not proceed to punish them till their wickedness is incorrigible, and at its full height: who is the author of true wisdom, and all other blessings, and communicates them freely to such as sincerely ask for them. Philo agrees in all these sentiments; but as this is nothing extraordinary in a Jewish writer, I shall not stop to draw the parallel, which would be of no service here.

The soul of man, according to the Book of Wisdom, is immortal, and linked to a corporeal body, the weight of which draws it to the earth and presses it downwards; it is capable of immortal happiness, but when it gets itself up to the pursuit of sin and wickedness, it brings upon itself punishments and misery without end; it is inexusable, when it continues ignorant of its Creator, who is so loudly proclaimed by his works. Philo says much the same. "That the soul of man is clearest in the body, as with a garment, but that of a wise man with his virtues." And in another place, "That while we continue in this world, we are in a state of pilgrimage; but a wise man looks upon himself, when in the body and upon the earth, as in some strange place, considering heaven as his only true country, and his proper native place." Philo supposes two sorts of souls, some of which descend into and inhabit bodies, and others are at a great distance and very remote; of those that enter into bodies, and continue there, some apply themselves to, and are trained up in, a philosophy wholly sublime, which, after the death of the body, they continue to pursue, to purchase a life eternally and incorruptible; the other sort,ohl named with the weight of the flesh, neglect the study of wisdom, and giving themselves up to the caprice of fortune, are attached to things sensible and corporeal, to the pursuit of vanity, glory, riches, &c. which very much resembles what the author of the Book of Wisdom, speaking in the person of Solomon, says, viii. 19, 20, "that he had a good spirit," or rather, "that being good, he came into a body undefined;" wherein he supposes a pre-existence of souls, some good, others wicked, not by nature, or through any fate or necessity, but voluntarily and by inclination, which is certainly the opinion of Philo in many places.

The high encomiums this author gives of wisdom are likewise to be met with in Philo, who says, "That she is a pure gift from the bounty of God, who communicates her to souls well disposed, which love contemplation; that she existed before all ages, and by her the world itself was created; that she is as the mother and God the father of it; that the wise alone are truly worthy to reign, to have command and sovereignty;" and only these are truly rich; that wisdom is all divine, and nothing more easily to be acquired, being always ready to communicate herself; that she never shuns her school, but is willing and disposed to receive those who desire instruction. These she en-<1223>chants, and as it were, invisibly imbues them with secret and agreeable draughts of her doctrines; she invites them to come and improve themselves by her lessons, and promises them infinite advantages and blessings." According to Philo, kings should distinguish themselves by their wisdom, and their ambition, happiness, and glory, should centre in this; that a prince should be well versed and instructed not only in human and secular affairs, but likewise in spiritual and divine, and should appear to his subjects as an animated oracle, and a living law; which agrees admirably with the idea which the wise man here gives of a perfect and consummate prince.

The author of this book speaks of the Word, or the Word of the Lord, as a distinct person from him that generated and sent him. He ascribes to him divine attributes, particularly omnipotence. It was this Word which led the Israelites in the wilderness, cured the bitings of the serpents, slew the first-born of the Egyptians, and, in fine, created the world. Philo resembles our author more on this head than in any other particular. He has not a word which is not measured by the number of years; but wisdom is gray hair unto men, and an unspotted life is old age. That God took his beloved [Enoch] from the world in the flower of his age, lest wickedness should alter his understanding; or deceit beguile his soul; and that being made perfect in a short time, he fulfilled a long time, or had all the real advantages of old age. Ch. iv. 7—9, 11, 13.

What the writer of the Book of Wisdom says of idolatry and idolaters in the thirteenth chapter, is so like what we find in Philo in the beginning of his treatise, De Monarch., that one perceives plainly that they have that in common which they derived from the same source, and that they are not mere coincidence.

Let us now examine the facts mentioned by the author of the Book of Wisdom, which seem to differ from the account of Moses. Philo, speaking of Joseph, says, that he was made vicerey, or, to speak more properly, king, of Egypt. And in the description of the plagues of that country, he says, that in the party of Memphis there are not even ten who know what winter is. But at the command of Moses, nature changed her appearance, and the air assumed new qualities, and thunder, lightnings, hail, and rain, were as dreadfully and sensibly felt there as in other regions. And what was very particular, the water did not extinguish the fire in the lightning, nor the fire melt and dissolve the hail; a reflection, which the author of the Book of Wisdom likewise makes in several parts of that work.

Philo remarks, that, during the darkness in Egypt, which lasted three days, no fire could be kindled there, the thickness of the fog extinguishing it immediately; which is agreeable to our author's account. With respect to manna, the expressions of both are very much alike.

Calmét here translates Philo literally; the passage referred to is in his treatise, De Prophétis. Ὁ μὲν ἅγιος Χαϊλ καὶ Αλφαὶ, ἐκ τοῦ ἀλλοτρίου τοῦ Θεοῦ πάντοτε ὁμοίως, ἔστιν ἡ κοινεῖς λόγια, καὶ ἀνὰ τοὺς γενοίμας παρὰ τῆς ἀληθείας ἄνθρωπον, τοῦτον τὸν πλούσιον Μωυσείν, τοῦτον Ἐλπίδαν Ἀλφαὶν, τοῦτον Προφήτην Χαϊλ. It is surprising, that Philo should produce these two persons as an instance of rewarded piety, who died by the punishment of God. They lived long, in order to exhibit the extent of divinity, and to be a model for their contemporaries.

alike. According to Philo, it is a nourishment produced without the labour of man, sent purposely from heaven, and, in a figurative sense, is the wisdom of God, his word, or commandment; which is very like what Moses says on this occasion, "That man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord." (Deut. viii. 3). Hence, in an allegorical manner the vestments of the high-priest, and, like our author, suppose them to be symbolical of the universe; that the habit in general represents the whole world, and each particular answers to, and expresses, the several principal parts of it. The long robe of an azure colour is an emblem of the air; the pomegranates at the bottom represent life, to denote the earth; and the bells the harmony which is in the several parts of it, from whence the union of the system proceeds. The Hebrew text speaks only of the pomegranates and bells, but Philo follows the LXX. who seem, Exod. xxvii. 33, to mention flowers.

This is all agreeable to the explanation of what our author says in fewer words, "That in the long garment was the whole world" (xviii. 21).

One thing is very observable, that Philo doth not copy the very words of the Book of Wisdom, as he would have done, if he had designed to quote or use it, as the work of another writer. He follows in general the same method, in the same order of thoughts, but in different terms; as when one and the same author expresses himself upon particular points in different works. From this very great likeness and conformity of opinions, many of the ancients have concluded Philo to be the author of the Book of Wisdom.

The difference of the style of Philo, and that of the Book of Wisdom, is one of the strongest arguments against his being the real author; but the ancients, who were as good judges as the moderns upon this head, it is manifest, laid no great stress upon the difference of style, since it did not hinder them from ascribing this book notwithstanding to Philo. And in spite of the diversity of style, one may observe in several parts of this book the pompous turns of Philo, his exuberance in epithets, and his rich vein displayed by many lively and pathetic descriptions. But as he wrote it under the borrowed name of Solomon, he might disguise his style a little, and appear more sententious in this book, than in his other works; this point has been sufficiently observed, his other arguments to the contrary, it proceeds from the matter and subject itself. For let the same person write an oration, lessons of morality, an epitome, or a poem, will not a great variety of style necessarily arise from these different characters, though they are all penned, and proceed from one and the same author!

Though the book we are speaking of affords but few hints whereby to form a judgment of the time and place in which it was wrote; yet, as glimmering as the light is, it may be sufficient to give us some idea of both. The author lived in an idolatrous country, and most probably in Egypt, since upon all occasions he yields against the ridiculous idolatry of the Egyptians, which consisted in paying adoration to water, fire-serpents, and other beasts the most frightful and mischievous. He lived at a time when the Jews had a great aversion to idolatry; he speaks of its origin, and that one cause of it was the grief of a tender parent for a deceased child, which at length terminated in paying divine honours to it. This remark is more applicable to Egypt than any other country, upon account of that great respect which the Egyptians are remarkable for paying to their dead; and because it is certain that Isis and Osiris, the first deities of this country, had the sovereignty of Egypt, and the former appointed divine honours to the body of her deceased husband. He speaks likewise of the Jews being held in subjection, and persecuted under some idolatrous princes; which agrees very well with the times of Philo, when the Jews suffered greatly, both in Judea and in Egypt, from the Roman emperors, their deputies, and even the people themselves.

If he wrote it after the death of Jesus Christ, who could not make it probable that he had him in view, when he describes the just men, as reviled, persecuted, and at length put to death; and that seeing the beginning and first essays of Christianity, and the miracles which accompanied the first preaching of the gospel, he foretold the approaching ruin of idolatry. It is certain, living among the savages, and unused to so much elegance and pandered by the temptations of the system, it is probable he might direct his instructions to them under the person of Solomon, and the more effectually to execute his design, purposely disguised his style to give his work a greater air of antiquity, and to add the more weight to it. And it may be questioned, whether it would have been even safe for him at that time, in the very heart of Alexandria, to have addressed a book in Greek to princes, wherein idolatry is condemned in such a bold and open manner; but by concealing himself and writings under the fictitious name of Solomon, he avoided all danger.

When St. Jerome tells us that some of the ancients ascribed this book to Philo the Jew, he meant, no doubt, Philo of Alexandria, for that was the only author of the name was known. And as the ancients, whom he cites, are the first that acquaint us whom the church attributed this work to, their judgment ought to be of great weight; and so much the more, as, since that time, no one has been assigned in particular as the undoubtedly author of it. Truths of this nature are generally the more certain, the nearer they approach to the fountain head; now in the time of those ancients whom St. Jerome mentions, this tradition must have been very fresh, and it might have been a received notion in the church, even from the times of the apostles; the great commendations which the ancients give of Philo, show the high idea they had of his merit. We have before mentioned, that Eusebius, St. Jerome, and others believed him to have been a Christian; the former asserts that he was perfectly acquainted with all that related to the doctrine and the laws of his ancestors; he extols his eloquence, the loftiness of his thoughts and sentiments, the purity of his life, the harmony of his conceptions, his exuberance in epithets, and his rich vein displayed by many lively and pathetic descriptions. But as he wrote it under the borrowed name of Solomon, he might disguise his style a little, and appear more sententious in this book, than in his other works; this point has been sufficiently observed, his other arguments to the contrary, it proceeds from the matter and subject itself. For let the same person write an oration, lessons of morality, an epitome, or a poem, will not a great variety of style necessarily arise from these different characters, though they are all penned, and proceed from one and the same author!

This is what may be plausibly urged in favour of Philo, but this alone will not be sufficient to induce us to ascribe this work to him; there will always be an invincible argument to the contrary, viz. his religion. Philo died in Judaism many years after the death of Christ; and if he was acquainted with the truths of the gospel, he has not done that justice, or given that honour to it, which he ought. It is not therefore probable that the Holy Spirit should speak by the mouth of such a person, nor that the church should adopt, or receive, as an inspired book; the work of an unconverted man, who had not that artless simplicity, is of no force against those who do not look upon the Book of Wisdom as canonical. But there are other reasons which hinder us from ascribing this book to Philo: 1. The difference of style. 2. The silence of the ancients, as Eusebius, St. Jerome himself, Phoebus, Suidas, and others, who have not placed this book among those of Philo. 3. The passages of this book quoted in the gospels, and the epitaphs written either before Philo could write this work, or a very little time after. There remains, then, only in his favourite tradition, and that but indifferently supported, and a conformity of sentiments, which is not so peculiar to Philo, but the like might have been formed in Job, Proverbs, Plato, Eclesiastes, and in the books of Maccabees. In these we meet with, likewise, the punishments of the wicked after this life, and the future rewards and happiness of the righteous: one finds wisdom represented there as co-eternal with God, and the Word, as Almighty, Omniscient, Creator, Preserver; as instructing, punishing, rewarding. These notions were common at that time among the Jews, and who can be certain that Philo himself did not take these from the books we have just quoted?

Origen has nothing certain about the author of this book, no more than the other fathers which follow him. All that can be concluded from what we have said is, that Philo was manifestly of the same principles with the author of this book, had the same method, and most of his sentiments; that he wrote in Egypt, and is not very ancient, since it is indisputable that he lived after the version of the Seventy. If we should attempt to reckon up the differences between the Book of Wisdom and Philo, it is very considerable. Number, perhaps, might be produced; the former sets down ten months as the ordinary time for the birth of children, the latter only seven, asserting that children born after that time, suppose in the eighth month, are not commonly long-lived, or born to be happy. Philo also differs from the author of the Book of Wisdom in what he says of the creation of man, and his likeness and resemblance of God. According to the latter, man was created in the similitude and image of God, immortal and innocent, his body formed out of the earth, and will return to earth again, as his soul will likewise to God after death, from whom it originally proceeded; Philo makes the resemblance between God and man to consist in the soul, which God himself created in the beginning, and filled with inclinations for its welfare and happiness, but adds, at the same time, that he called evil angels to assist at the formation of man, who were the authors of those bad dispositions observable in him; which includes that dangerous opinion of two different classes of beings, which the Maccabees afterward abused in so strange a manner.

Grotius is of opinion, that the Book of Wisdom is the work of a Jew, who wrote it in Hebrew after the time of Esdras, and before the pontificate of the high-priest Simon, and that for this reason it is placed before the book of Eclesiastes. It was translated, as he says, into Greek by some Christian author, who understood that language well enough, but took great liberties in his translation, without confining himself to the words of his original, and even added some strokes and sentiments taken from Christianity. Hence, he says, it proceeds that the universal judgment is taken notice of there, the happiness of the righteous, and the punishment of the wicked, in a manner more distinct and clear than we observe generally in the books of the ancient Hebrews.

These are the sentiments of Grotius, but there is scarce any part of this hypothesis but wants proof. It is mere guess-work to pretend that this book was originally written in Hebrew, neither Jews, nor ancient Christian writers, have either seen or known it in that language. If it was really written in it, would the Jews ever have suffered it to be lost? or are there any footsteps of Hebrisms, and a foreign construction, discoverable in the Greek translation? Those Christian sentiments which Grotius thought to be foisted into it by the translator, are to be found in the books of Maccabees, and in Philo, and some of them even in Plato. The two former, as likewise Eclesiastes, speak very clearly of the everlasting happiness of the just, and the eternal punishments appointed for the wicked. Are we therefore permitted to say, that these books likewise have been corrupted by Christians, who have artfully conveyed their maxims and sentiments into them? That admirable description of the just man, ch. ii. afflicted and tortured with a variety of wretchedness, do we not meet with it in the writings of Plato, lib. ii. de Rep.? from whence Cicero and Seneca both manifestly took it. It is well known how the ancient Greeks, and even the Jewish writers, were attached to the doctrine of that philosopher, and why might not this writer think it proper to preserve, and even concordate, such a fine thought, and put it in its full light and beauty in this divine work, and hereby set truth at liberty, and give its freer circulation, which before was, as it were, a prisoner, and confined to the heathen writings? Does not St. Paul himself sometimes borrow the thoughts, and even the words of profane authors?

Cordenus a Lapide believes, that the Book of Wisdom was wrote in Greek by a Jewish author, after the return from the Babylonish captivity, and about the time of Ptolemy Philadeph. He even suspects that it might be one of the Seventy interpreters that wrote it for the use of that king, the book being calculated, as has been before observed, for the instruction of princes: for Aristens relates, that Ptolemy proposed to every one of these interpreters, some question concerning the good government of his dominions. He adds, that the opinion which ascribes this book to Philo, might easily have obtained by the following equivocal terms: Solomon had two names, Solomon and Jedidiah, the last of which signifies the friend of God, and in Greek Philo or Philos signifies a friend; and.b. the rabbins, when they quote Philo, give him the name of Jedidiah; and so people have been led into a mistake to imagine Philo the Jew was meant, when Solomon only was intended under his other name.

But these are conjectures without any certain proof. Cicero, by the unanimous acknowledge that this matter is dubious, and that the author of the Book of Wisdom is uncertain and unknown, but it is nevertheless canonical and divine, since it contains in it all that is necessary to deserve that title: it abounds with useful and solid instructions, and points Jesus Christ and his sufferings in a heavenly manner; and the truths recorded in it are as comfortable to the good and righteous as they are dreadful to the wicked and the sinner: and besides, the church has received and acknowledged it as sacred and canonical.

It is certain that the author lived after the Seventy, since he cites their text even when they depart from the Hebrew. He wrote at a time when allegories were much in vogue, and appears to have read the writings of the philosophers and Greek poets. From these circumstances we are of opinion, that this author cannot be very ancient. He seems to be later than the writer of Eclesiastes, whom we have fixed to the times of Ptolemy Epiphanes in Egypt and Antiochus Epiphanes in Syria: and, if this be so, our author should have lived under the government of the Maccabees.
ARGUMENT.—As the title of this book is Wisdom, the author was not only openly to recommend his own righteousness, which is a principal part of it; a virtue necessary to be observed by all, but more particularly by the rulers and judges of the earth, this being the chief end of their appointment, and a part of that great duty, and the attainment of it their true glory. He then proceeds to show in general the necessity of right sentiments of God, and the folly of mistrusting, and mistrusting against, his providence; that as he is the searcher of all hearts, no disguise or hypocrisy can impose upon him, nor be concealed from him; that wickedness first brought death into the world, which God unwillingly inflicts upon men, who were originally designed for a blessed state of immortality.

Ver. 1. Love righteousness, ye that be judges of the earth: We find the like command given to Joshua, when God appointed him to succeed Moses in the government of his people: The book of the law shall not depart out of thy mouth: thou shalt meditate therein day and night, that thou mayest observe to do according to all that is written therein: for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous, and thou shalt have good success (Josh. i, 8); where the marginal reading, "thou shalt do wisely," taken from the Hebrew, and confirmed by the LXX, seems far preferable. The same direction is given, Ps. ii. 10, 11, "Be wise now therefore, ye kings; be instructed, ye judges of the earth: serve the Lord with fear," &c. The philosopher assigns two reasons why magistrates should be particularly careful to give public testimony of their goodness—"because the people be learned of suffering the evil of his hand from such whom they believe to be righteous, and will be dispossessed to attempt an injury against such of whom they entertain the highest opinion" (Politic. lib. v. cap. 11). And it is no improbation against that one reason as rulers are called gods in scripture (Ps. lxxxii. 6), that they ought to imitate the Deity in the perfection of goodness. But besides this, we find the same counsel given to the same persons; and that counsel is the more necessary, because it is not only irreligion, but an indigence of wisdom; but it is most natural, there is another sense suggested by Messieurs du Port-Royal, "Les saints expliquent ces paroles comme estant dites a tous les fidèles," who, according to some of the fathers, will be appointed judges of the earth: and indeed St. Austin thus interprets the very words of this author, οί ἀπειλοῦσα εἰς τὸν γίνοιτα (see Comment. on Ps. ii.), from the Christian doctrine, probably, I Cor. ii. 7. "Know ye not that we are the apostles of Christ, the ministers of God?" οἱ ἀπειλοῦσα εἰς τὸν γίνοιτα; hence, διὸς ἐν τῇ προσώπῳ, became the style of a great saint, and is yet used as the standing title of the patriarch of Alexandria, and perhaps of other eastern patriarchs. That this construction might be intended here seems probable, because the author of this book uses the same expression in the same sense, iv. 8, where, speaking professedly of the saints, or the best of men, he says, ἀπειλοῦσα ἐννα καὶ ἀρατροὶ λαῶν. Upon which words Grotius, and other commentators scruple not to refer to Matt. xix. 29, and Apoc. ii. 25, and other places where the judgment of the world by the saints is mentioned. Both these passages in this writer may easily be accounted for, if there was any foundation for Grotius’s observation in the introduction to his notes, viz., that the translators of this book was a Christian, "qui Christianam commend ob his sibi addidit." If that great man had given any proof of his remark, then indeed these passages might be more justly suspected, and esteemed instances of the truth of his observation.

Think of the Lord with a good heart. This is variously apprehended by the commentators. Clarke would have it, "that the approved virtue of good men renders them the fittest to preserve the ungodly." Endwall says Pronomen ejus adjuncti ut ad Deum referatur. So have our translators inserted it; though his should have been encouraged in italic letters, because not in italic letters, Castello, the same in sense; so also Grotius understands it, and expounds it, "That there is sufficient experience of the power of God to confute all those who deny his providence." But we shall have this suit, that Messieurs du Port-Royal preserve the connection much better. Et lors que les hommes veulent tenter sa puisance (tempit him by their hypocrisies, that is, as they express, sa evenc, en feignant le chercher au meme tems qu'on le deshonere) elles les convoque de folie;’i e. as they explain, it God punishes their folly by giving them up to folly, as it were. The sense of the whole verse seems to be this effect: Guileful thoughts set us at a distance from God and his truth; he is too great and powerful a being to be treated with art or trade; be it known to all that the consummation of such revelat unique tutos,” (as Horace said of Augustus), they are sure to suffer for their folly. This sense is confirmed by the words immediately following.

The whole is the soul wisdom shall not enter;’

Ei mevēnēs ψυχήν. Here again is meant the cracy, designing, evil-plotting, soul, and not merely the “malignous soul,” as our translators have it. The expression well understands anermne. Anima que malum molitur et machinater. St. Gregory has a just and apsosivation l Deus supermisum illorum mentes ruenas religiones visitantium illusionis, quasi known sin, sufer any affect sercut.” (De Cur. Pastor. p. 3). The Syriac and Arabic versions understand it, “of a soul polluted with many sins.”
And indeed it must be confessed, in favour of this interpretation, that all sin, especially long continued, in poses the soul for the reception of divine wisdom, and renders it an incapable subject of divine grace; whereas holiness composes our nature in such a regular and effectual manner, as no sin, however great, is capable of religious imposition, and to procure us the presence and aid of God’s grace. This sense has some countenance with what follows:

Nor dwell in the body that is subject unto sin. Not barely subject, or liable unto sin; that cannot be the meaning, for this all persons who live in the midst of temptations must be in danger of sin. Subject, a soul is, divine wisdom will not dwell in such as are bound, or subjected under the dominion of sin; and so the Vulgate renders; Nec habitatione in corpore subito poenitentia; and Cerverk-
1. development in the soul, for he is subdued unto sin,” or rather in bondage, as a debtor, unto sin; for so ἵππος, which is a forensic term, properly signifies.
What the Jews observe, of the spirit of prophecy, that it dwells in the body to prevent it from sin; and so spirit, wisdom, that it dwells not with wickedness, i.e. in a soul subject or slaved to vicious and irreligious passions. And as long as men allow themselves in any unlawfulness, they will viliy to remain in items unabused, so long they deprive themselves of the presence and inhabitation of this heavenly guest.

5. For the holy spirit of discipline will fire deceit.
The Jews apply the name of spirit to several habits of the soul; thus we meet with the spirit of meekness, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and minds. Now, the law of God is, whose spirit will not dwell in the soul, is, divided into two parts, no one spirit, Wisdom, and understanding. And because discipline is, thes of its qualities, and hence it is often termed according the mind, or spirit, discipline. But I think, with Calmet, it would be better rendered,

The holy spirit of instruction will fire deceit,” that being a more proper word than discipline, which our translators use. Discipline, when Latin, signifies a method of education; and discipline has a general and more lax sense in our language; some manuscripts accordingly read λογος ἀληθινος, which confirms this. Seneca has a very remarkable passage among his epistles to this purpose: Sane inest in nobilis spiritus, honorum malorumque custos et observator; and quernmodum nos illum tractamus, us et ille nos.
There is a holy spirit residing in him, who watches and observes both good and bad men, and will treat us after the same manner that we treat him.” Nor is the reason which is assigned for the residence and abode of a demon, or spirit, the same, as in the preceding verses. It is in a manner, less worthy of notice; “Do not wonder says Maximus Tyrian that such a spirit should dwell with Socrates, whose purity of body, goodness of heart, tenderness of affections, did render him worthy of such a friend.” (Dissert. 26).

And remove from thoughts that are without understanding in the heart, that is, not spiritual, nor religious, but common. Probably the true reading here of the original is καθαρός δοιεναι δειναι καθαρός, and not δοιεναι, as all the printed copies have it.
For the context plainly shows, and even the sense im-mits, that not only, but not only, while being without righteous intentions and deceitful practices, are to be unstood. What is here said of the spirit of instruction, with respect to artifice and dissimulation, is not to be understood of those of mankind, with respect to unrighteousness in general; for those who,
with much tender concern and affective hopes, minister to man’s salvation, are forced with regret to leave the cause, and habitually to dwell on the profligate and irreconcilable, and with sorrow cry out to another, as the angels did in the Jewish temple, when through many profligations it was no longer fit for their charge, avarclīd. (see the note, (Dei Judic. lib. vii.). And it is very observable, that when the wickedness of the old world was arrived to its height, God pronounces to the people of Sodom and Gomorrah, “And if one of them shall not always continue in such men,” the sense of which passage our version expresses imperfectly by “striving with men” (see John xiv. 23).

Ver. 6. And a heavenly wisdom entereth into a vessel such. i.e. a heavenly well-wisher, and promoter of the good of mankind, and in particular a lover of their souls. But how is the punishing a blasphemer, an instance of the great and powerful discipline of the dispensation of God’s grace, that is, the elevation of man’s nature to the possession of all the graces, than kindness and good nature. The answer and true sense is, that though wisdom be such a kind and merciful spirit, yet her regard to justice is such, that the holy spirit, which is confessed on all hands, and displayed everywhere, yet cannot she act so inconsistently and un-suitably to her holy nature, as to dispense with justice. And the same grace of God understands it, Amicus est quidem hominum spiritus sapientiae, at non justiciam impius, et non alium spiritum, sed Spiritum Sanctum habet
i. hominis blasphemi mali maledicta impune abire sitat (see Comment. in loc.).

And will not acquit a blasphemer of his words? Or, as the literal rendering of the Hebrew, “Hold him guiltless with respect to his lips.” Such whose “mouths are full of curiosity, deceit, and fraud, and under whose tongue is ungodliness and vanity,” who dare be outrageous and rude, for deceit, and impiety, is, therefore, to be censured, that is, not contemptible. He will then acquit him, or be answerable for what is not conformable to truth and sincerity.
All falsehood and deceit in general, either open or concealed, and whatsoever prevails under the name of the words and actions as he sees their heart, and knows their reins. But the observation in this place relates not so much to God’s infinite knowledge in general, as to his discerning and deciding in particulars. “Hold him guiltless with respect to his lips.” Which the Vulgar Latinum has called “a froward mouth,” which the

For God is witness of his reins, and a true beholder of his heart, and a hearer of his tongue.” The sentiment here is like that in king David’s fine charge to Solomon.
And king, etc. “And be not, therefore, a judge to thy father, and serve him with a perfect heart, and with a willing mind, for the Lord searcheth all hearts, and understandeth all the imaginations of the thought.

And the Lord is as infinite as to men’s real goodness and inward dispositions; for as men judge of their neighbour’s heart by his words or actions, which are often deceitful, God, on the contrary, looks on the words and actions as he sees their heart, and knows their reins. But the observation in this place relates not so much to God’s infinite knowledge in general, as to his discerning and deciding in particulars.

Ver. 7. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth the world, i.e. is infinite and immense, is not bounded by any place or space, but spreads himself to all place; see or imagine himself to be infinitely beyond; so that we cannot say, He is here, and not there; thus far he reaches, and no further. St. Gregory describes God, “intra omnia non in-clusions, extra omnia non exclusions, omnipotens, omnipreas, immanens” (lib. ii. Moral.); or, to speak paraphrase (the language in the old philosopher, he is a being whose centre is everywhere, and his circumference nowhere.” But nothing can exceed what God is, and God is God at hand, and not a God afar off? Can any hide himself in secret places that I shall not see him? Do not I fill heaven and earth! say the Lord” (Jer. xxxii. 23, 24, see also Ezek. xxxvi. 10. 17). And the

And that which containeth all things hath knowledge of the voice.” Some manuscripts read with an aspirate, which probably is the true reading, (see the note, (Dei Judic. Rom. cap. 9, lib. vii.). Thus the Syriac and Arabic versions expound it, the former rendering, Ille qui tenet omnia, scient habet vocem ipsius; and the latter, Et qui curaturs omnia amplexatur, possit notiam vocis. Coverdale's version is to the same purpose, "And the same that uphooled all things, hath knowledge to be the same, that here is very faulty, and even ungrammatical; as the former sentence reflected on God's omnipresence, this takes in his infinite knowledge, which extends itself to, and takes cogni-scence of; and therefore does not make such vile princices, that of the psalmist is most full, "Lo, there is not a word in my tongue, but thou, O Lord, knowest it altogether." (Ps. cxlviii. 3.) With respect to our actions, that of the public Samuel, "The Lord is a God of jealousy, and him by actions are weighed," I Sam. ii. 3, where the reading of the LXX. is very observable, οὐκ εὑρετήσων Κύριος, that which is frequent to the meaning of speaking and writing as Cicero, as "he is so, or rather infinite, that "of his understanding there is no number," viz. οὐκ εὑρεθέντα about the error subjunct, see the LXX. in Ps. cxlviii. 5.) Thus it is rated for their impregnable, since the sides, by the scandal and groundless suspicions which he impotently endeavours to fasten upon it.

Ver. 12. Seek not death in the error of your life; and pull not upon yourselves destruction by your own uncharitable hands.] The original words σπείρεις and ἐνεμάτωσαν, intimate, that wicked men labour to be miserable: that they offer a sort of violence to themselves when they commit sin; and thereby are it, and unsettling of all, but is the" unresiste-ble, to inflict death on them. Salian vinifies this in most remarkably strong terms; "God (saith he) is loath to punish men, but they themselves exhort, thereunto at peril, with their own words, to observe your reception to the divine providence, is not to be done; or to the extent in which it is equally necessary and proper in this, for much the same order of sentiments will be found in the cautions here given; " Seek not death;" i.e. court it not;
so in rasing δεινόν, which "error of life" is explained of the next chapter: and the following verses there, viz.: 10—12, that expresses a degree of wickedness which amounts to a "compendium or compact death," are here cautioned against, by "pull not upon yourselves destruction;" for ἐνεματώσατο δεινόν is as much above σπείρεις τάσαρον, an acts of viocence, cruelty, and injustice, are above voluptuoussness in the climax of sin.

Ver. 13. For God made not death:] i.e. He designed not originally the entrance of death into the world. Man, whom God at first made an image of his own eternity, in had the power of dead, and thereby the power of detha-ility; and if he had continued upright, his obedience would have been crowned with it. 'Bish Mcull hath a most excellent discourse upon the state of man before the fall; it is his opinion there, that "this never-ending life of happiness, promised to our first parents if they had continued obedient, and grown up to perfection under that economy wherein they were placed, would not have been continued in the earthly Paradise, but only have commented there, and been perpetuated in a higher state; and after such a trial of their obedience, as should seem sufficient to the divine wisdom, the sinful should have been tranlated from earth to heaven. (Bull's Opera Posth. vol. iv. disc. 5.)
Not her her he be pleasure in the destruction of the living:] God does not sport himself, like a merciless tyrant, with the lives of his creatures, but is tender of their welfare, ever disposed to do them good, and ready to communicate happiness to them. "I am thy destruction" is not meant, in vour do not obstruct it. And therefore if, notwithstanding these gracious intentions of God in their favour, men do finally perish, their misfortune must be ascribed to their own perversity and disobedience; and you do not destroy, and thus God declares expressly in Is. xxxii. 9, "I, O Israel, your destruction is from thyself;" i.e. God is not the cause of even of evil, either of sin or punishment, but is by the tion of the wicked, and thus misery, which is the consequence of it, are both of thy own procuring (see Lowlth in loc. and Ezek. xxxii. 11.) Some of the fathers, viz. 4 B

Vol. III.—106
Ofiigen, Chrysostom, Theophylact, &c., have a pretty observation, and which is very pertinent to the passage before us, upon Matt. xxv. 41, "Depart from me, ye cursed, in everlasting fire, preparation made for the devil and his messengers." They observe, 1. That the punishment of the wicked is not said here to be "prepared from the beginning of the world," as the blessing is, lest it should be thought that God designs evil for evil: This punishment is not designed originally not for men, but "for the devil and his angels" (see Dr. Whiby in loc.).
2. That all things, that they might have their being; i.e. God created the world and all things in it for perpetual duration; and that, under the direction of his overruling providence, they might always continue in being; and particularly he designed this favour for man, kind, whom at first he created to be immortal (v. 23).
This is the sense of the Syriac version, which reads, Fiit in ipso mundi origine vigint epirnptor nian cenevoener.
And the generations of the world were heathful; All things which God made in their several kinds were very good, and designed for the use and benefit of man, and were suited to be serviceable to him: They were not naturally so hurtful or noxious qualities in the elements till sin altered the constitution of things; but sin, having made a breach in the world, a sad tram of evils entered, and thence followed the overflowings of God's dreadful displeasure to increase his punishment. And since the curse consequent upon the fall, famine, pestilence, and war, have been written into the heavens in their turns his scourges and destroyers, as if universal nature was armed against him. Or the meaning may be in particular, that all men (Nathan, or terraram, as the Vulgate reads and Coverdale's translation follow) were created originally pure and heathful, both as to soul and body, in the person of Adam, the common root from whence they sprung; and that all men then were naturally good; that evil was not in the heart, but draw him to disobedience, and, in consequence of that, to destruction; exteriorium, as the Vulgate expresses it, alllowing probably to Adam's banishment out of Paradise.
Had Adam indeed continued innocent, he then, among many other great privileges, had transmitted downwards, by way of natural generation or descent, a heathful and blessed temper of body; but our great prototype and testimony falling, besides the rectitude of his mind, he lost also that blessed constitution of body, which would have so greatly a privilege to his offspring.
[The next passage is taken from the Greek and Latin version.]
And therefore dids also is very properly here added; as in Vigilii's Georgics we meet with malum virus, where malum is not to be looked upon as a superfluous epithet, because virus is used in a good as well as a bad sense; as well, as thus particularly. And that venena itself does not always signify anything destructive to life, see Vigilii's eighth Eclogue, and Mariya on ib. Georg. p. 59, St. Austin observes, that birds and thorns were not of the original product of the earth, much less poisonous plants and herbs; and that none of these had grown upon the face of it but for man's disobedience (De geneis. cont. Manich. ib. cap. 1. and 3. LXX. render, "Curse be the ground for thy sake," by κακαίας γῆν εἰς τῶν ἀρχῶν σου, i. e. in or by thy works of sin. And Aquila and Theodotion render in like manner. But here it may be asked, How can this observation of our author be true, if in the natural world there are confessedly poisonous plants and drugs; and if what some good writers maintain be just, with respect to the more famous viz. that the fruit of the unripe knowledge of good and evil was for its specific quality of a poisonous nature both to the soul and body; and that the first man's nature was tainted by the entry of the knowledge of good and evil; which will evidence God did create death, since he did create that poisonous fruit, by which the human nature was so deadly poisoned.
For the solution of this difficulty, see the learned D. Jackson's Treatise on the subject.
Nor the kingdom of death upon the earth; Nor would death have had any power, much less sovereignty over the earth, who now reigns absolute in it, hath made it her place of residence, and even fixed her palace in it. For in the original it is not βασιλεία, but βασίλεια, which means not kingdom as derived from a word signifying to rule, but that which renders more of dominion and power and so include it; the meaning seems to be, that obedience would not only have made man immortal, and translated even the human race from the dominion of death; that was the verb in the present tense, it may intimate farther, that righteousness continued in, would have raised man to an unchangeable state of goodness, and his innocence have been crowned with everlasting perseverance; as the angels, who continued in their duty when the rest revolted, are finally established in their integrity and felicity.
Ver. 15. But righteousness is immortal; If this verse was included in a parenthesis, the sense of the context would be better connected and more perfect: and I have the pleasure to say, that by the observation of some before, who so include it; the meaning seems to be, that obedience would not only have made man immortal, and translated the human race from the dominion of death; that was the verb in the present tense, it may intimate farther, that righteousness continued in, would have raised man to an unchangeable state of goodness, and his innocence have been crowned with everlasting perseverance; as the angels, who continued in their duty when the rest revolted, are
finally established in their integrity and felicity.
Ver. 16. But ungodly men with their works and words called it to them: for when they, "Thou didst call death to their friend, they consumed to nought, and made a covenant with it, because they would take with part it." We meet with the like phrase, "of making a covenant with death," (Lsc. xxv. 15), but the Vulgate translates it, "et in perpetuo profecerunt" or "they made a perpetual agnus donum," which is very properly here added; as in Vigilii's Georgics we meet with malum virus, where malum is not to be looked upon as a superfluous epithet, because virus is used in a good as well as a bad sense; as well, as
thus particularly. And that venena itself does not always signify anything destructive to life, see Vigilii's eighth Eclogue, and Mariya on ib. Georg. p. 59, St. Austin

CHAPTER II.

ARGUMENT.—The author having represented in the former chapter the original of sin and death, as too sadly exemplified in our first parents, proceeds to show the continuance of that original corruption in their posterity. For this purpose he introduces some libertines’ reasoning (if it be so called) in their loose way, in favour of their darling opinions, “That life is short and fickle, and therefore it is but a piece of prudence, and pursu’d with eagerness, and without delay; that there is no real distinction between good and evil, and therefore all acts of oppression and injustice, such as may best suit an individual’s expeience and interest, are allowable and commendable; that the soul is naturally mortal, and is annihilated with the body; that there is no future state, nor any thing else but a little fire about the heart, the smoke of which was perceivable by our respiration, and the sparks of it by our words; that when this fire was extinguished, as they imagined, by death, they supposed, the embers or ashes, and the soul vanished into air. In like manner the atheistical philosophers, who made atoms the principles of all things, thought the soul to consist of some minute and weak breakable particles. As it is kept in a certain vessel, or afterward extinguished by death. Hence we find them using the similes of air, fire, or smoke, with respect to the soul.” The author therefore, to the Hebrews, thus mentions these philosophical arguments, and expresses both spirit and wind by the same word; and from this agreement only in name, some, for want of better arguments, have been so weak as to infer, that they agree likewise in nature, and at last mix together. The true reading of the original, and which includes all in the copies, and is followed by the oriental and most old English translations, is δια νεκρου αιωνιος, the Vulgate also, with Junius, agrees to it in the Greek, and in the Latin. It is certain, made use of a corrupted copy, which read ρημαν σευ καθαρας κρατοι, and have given the sense accordingly. If there was any authority for this reading respecting the word of the Holy Ghost, which was the form of most of the copies, and kept a hold of this interpretation in the next generation, much less in future ages; so that as to the shame or infamy arising from them, we are quite unconcerned and indifferent as to what posterity may think or say of them. We are taught, by the experience of good men to be remembered with honour hereafter, which is a spur to virtuous and laudable actions; so a carelessness as to the present or future opinion of mankind is an encouragement to wreckedness, and a certain sign of a profligate and abandoned mind.

Our life shall be dispersed as a mist, that is driven away with the heat of the sun, and overcome with the heat thereof; for the Lord knoweth the thoughts of man. (Job xxvii. 6.)

Ver. 1. Our life is short and tedious.] I think the word tedious, which is used by the old English translations, importation, and consumption, refers more generally to time, and rather implies a long duration of it; so that short and tedious seem wrong coupled together; it would have been better rendered, and with less ambiguity, short and tedious. The word short, reads, ρημαν ει δια και δια το λόγον, and is confirmed by the Syriac and Arabic versions. The expression here is like that of Jacob’s, “Few and evil have the days of the years of thy life been fulfilled, and the best thereof.” (Gen. xxxviii. 13.)

Ver. 2. In the death of a man there is no remedy; there is no prevention of, or remedy against, mortality. Death is the portion of every man, though the particular time is uncertain, according to that of Job, “His days are determined; the number of his months are with thee; thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass.” (xxvii. 14.) But neither does our author, nor this passage of Job, countenance that notion of the predestinarians,—that every particular man’s time of life is so absolutely circumscribed, and so strictly and peremptorily assigned him by God, that nothing can shorten or lengthen it beyond such predetermined bounds; for though all things, even the number of our months, are allowed to be determined by a sovereign and absolutely just authority, nor from any passage of scripture, appear, that he has predetermined the precise and particular time of any person’s death by any absolute decree; for if every man’s time of life is limited, it may be a reason why some persons enjoy long life to the confusion of others, and the disappointment of many good and pious persons, where God sees it best for them; or the many threats of a short one to the ungodly and the wicked? Or why does the wise son of Sirach say, that “there is a time when there is success in the hands of the physician,” or that “they should pray unto the Lord, that he would prosper which they give for ease and remedy to prolong life”? (Ecclus. xxxviii. 13, 14.)

Ver. 3. For vain is the help of art, and even prayer itself must be supposed fruitsless, where the case is unalterable, and the doom is irrevocable. The Vulgate renders. In fine houmi sunt, which is not a word in the Latin, but a phrase which read in, from immutab, refriger, habitus perfundar, instead of turn, the true reading. Coverdale’s translation, the translation into English, is worse than the Latin.

Ver. 4. There was neither any man known to have returned from the grave.] Both the observation and inference of these vain reasons are false; for that persons have returned from the dead for several centuries, is evident from the Old Testament; 1 Kings xvii. 22, 2 Kings iv. 35, 33. Nor does it follow, if there were no instances of persons returning from thence, that the dead altogether cease to be, or that the body and soul become after this, so much more as the mind, which would gladly infer (see Amareon, Od. 59, who has many thoughts and expressions like the loose and jovial ones in these verses.)

Ver. 5. We were born at all adventure; i. e. we came into the world by chance, without any appointment or dishe looks up the place commonly called Hades, and from thence no man returns;" lib. v. cap. 20 (see apoc. i. 18). Holy Job has the like sentiment upon death (vi. 9, 10), "As the cloud is consumed and vanishes away, so he goes down to the grave and returns no more; he shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more." Where it is very observable, that the LXX. express this impossibility of returning by three strong negatives: ου τις επιστρέφειν, τοις παρασκευασίσΙ των, τοις παρασκευασίσΙ των, repeated twice in the same verse.

Ver. 6. Let us speedily use the creatures as in youth, i.e. While the good things or creatures are in their prime or, rather, Whilst we ourselves are vigorous and young, and in the revellings of debauchees they were usually crowded with people and the revelers would indulge in all kinds of licentious activity and rejoicing, that they are looked upon as incompatibl e with mourning. The spring seems more particularly to be mentioned, because it is the chief season of flowers. But ancient words, and most of them, are prefixed, if I may so say with Barzillai, "Can I discern between good and evil? Can I taste what I eat or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women?" (2 Sam. xix. 30). There is also a third sense of these words, viz. Let us live as if we were young again; which Grotius prefers, and seems countenanced by the reading of the Alexandrian manuscript.

Ver. 7. Let no flower of the spring pass by us: i.e. Flowers have always been esteemed symbols or emblems of joy, and in the revellings of debauchees they were usually crowded with people and the revelers would indulge in all kinds of licentious activity and rejoicing, that they are looked upon as incompatible with mourning. The spring seems more particularly to be mentioned, because it is the chief season of flowers. But ancient words, and most of them, are prefixed, if I may so say with Barzillai, "Can I discern between good and evil? Can I taste what I eat or what I drink? Can I hear any more the voice of singing men and singing women?" (2 Sam. xix. 30). There is also a third sense of these words, viz. Let us live as if we were young again; which Grotius prefers, and seems countenanced by the reading of the Alexandrian manuscript.

Ver. 8. Let us crown ourselves with rose-buds before they be hid in the thorns: The rose bud, as we have seen, signifies to the ancients the greatest honors which men can enjoy in life. Our poet gives it a moral sense also, as the rose is the flower excellent for beauty, for fragrance, for abundance, because the rose is reckoned to be ἐπάγον αἰών, "the plant of love," and was accordingly consecrated to Venus; and rose-buds are symbols of youth, and of the spring, and from their soon withering, the proper emblem of the shortness of life, and the fleeting nature of its pleasures (see Anacreon, Od. 5. de Rosa, and Od. 53).

Ver. 9. This is our portion, and our lot is this: The covering of your heads with rose-buds before they become withered and lost among the thorns is not only the favorite and accepted image of beauty, but it is a word of great importance in the sacred language, as it expresses the union of the two persons in marriage. "Our lot is that;"--our common possession; our common enjoyment--is that which Eusebius, in his history, was not unusual in such meetings.

Ver. 10. Let our version be more explicit. "For in that portion, else we get nothing." This is the language of Epicurus' scholars, the sum of whose ethics was, "Dux vitae dom voluptatis." Life, in the opinion of such libertines, is bare existence without all the care, all the service, all the anxiety, all the toil, all the toil of a virtuous man, Carneus, and Marinus, and such writers, littere is generally taken for a merry life, as τυπωθα sometimes among the Greeks, is the meaning of the word, and it was given to the house of Madame du Barry by her husband. In a later translation, "Amici, dum vivamus, vivamus." Those that are persuaded that the soul is absolutely mortal, their conclusion must be that of these sensualists; such persons act against the sentiments of the ancient philosophers, though it is true their appetites are inclined to be, it pleasure or profit. Such maxims, and a conduct suitable to them, may be expected from persons who have no views beyond the grave. And therefore the Epicureans endeavored to efface the belief of another life out of men's minds, as well knowing that men could never arrive to an undisturbed sensuality, whilst all divisions of fatuity checked them in the commission of their errors. One anomalous passage of the latter has preferred Acheronis agendus." (Laurent. lib. iii.)

Ver. 11. Let our strength be the love of justice: The ascension to the grave shall seem only the wearing out of the body, as it is an opinion, as old probably as Nin Murdor, but long since confuted by the wisest men and soberest philosophers: "Falsum est (says St. Austin) quod a quodam non recte sectante peritus dixit, qui, quod frequentem Aristotelis, quod est (De Civit. Dei, lib. xix.). Upon which, Ludov. Vives remarks, that this false and dangerous opinion is confuted by Plato, lib. i. De Repub. Hobbes in vain endeavored to vindicate his father in this point, to vindicate his way of thinking in all points, is a very good, and probably of the property, and destructive of the peace and comfort, of mankind.

Ver. 12. Let us lie in wait for the righteous: because he is not for our turn, i.e. "Let us lurk privy for the innocent without a cause," as it is expressed, Prov. i. 11, where there is the like description of the wicked. It is no wonder that atheists and unbelievers, and persons of such vile and libertine principles, should encourage another in wickedness, and in attempting the most outrageous acts of violence and injustice, in the manner here represented, especially against such as are most likely to cross or contradict their wishes; their passions are so strong, and their passion is so more; he shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more.

Ver. 13. Such a kind monitor is not for the turn of the wicked, he is rather δικαίωμα, as the original has it, i.e. offi cious, troublesome, and disagreeable to them. St. Cyprian, who quotes this passage to expressive of the habits of a heretic, is in a letter to his bishop, isinusin, lib. ii. cont. Judaeos; and so does St. Austin, lib. xvii. cap. 20. De Civit. Dei. There is exactly the same expression, and upon the same occasion, in Isaias ii. 10, according to the versions of the LXX. "δικαίωμα ἀπὸ τοῦ δικαίου, δικαίος, from which this seems to be taken; and it is the more probable, because, in the Greek text of the Septuagint, of the LXX. translation of the Book of Wisdom in cited, the reading is δικαίωμα του δικαίου, and not ἀναπαύσις, as in the common editions.

Ver. 14. He was made to reprove our thoughts. Eusebius ἔστη οἱ δικαίωμα ἦσαν εὐφορίας. Our version seems here more just nor proper; the meaning is, He is a reprover of our schemes and designs. The Arabic renders it, Consilia nostra and the Syriac, Est nobis obscurator cognitionum nostro, who was of so ununderstand syevo, and not in the sense of our translation.

Ver. 15. He is grievous unto us even to behold; for his life is not like other men's. The very sight of him is uneasy and displeasing to the eye. As to the present passage, it is a check to the proceedings of the wicked; and his virtuous example, and singular goodness, is a living reproof which they do in vain endeavor to turn aside the wise and good, and combinations of ungodly men against the life of the righteous, so frequent to be met with in sacred and profane history. Thus Joseph's virtue was an eye-sore to his brethren, and the life of Moses was an utter contempt and ridicule of David, for his superior excellence and uncommon merit, was persecuted by Saul. Hence St. Peter observes of the wicked, that it is their custom to speak evil of, and abuse, "just men as such as run with them to the same excess of riot!" (1 Pet. iv. 4.) And St. John asks this question, "Wherefore did Cain, who was of that wicked one, slay his brother?" and returns for an answer, "Descendants of Cain were even as the offspring of a righteous man." (1 John iv. 12.) The like may be observed of the primitive martyrs and confessors, who were persecuted, afflicted, tormented, because, instead of encomiastics from fashionable and popular vices, they chose rather to reprove and rebuke them. Tacitus assigns this as the cause of the death of Thraseas Par tus, "That Nero could not bear even the sight of that seducer, who was of so ununderstood a character, that his life was as it were animated virtue itself!" (Annal. lib. xvi.)

Ver. 16. We are esteemed of him as counterfeiters: Our version seems here faulty, for such abandoned persons as are here described are not such as are here described. It is not the case to disguise of piety, or assume the mask of religion; the meaning is, that he esteem us like drones, or as an impure and filthy mixture; whilst we are justly accused of having a wrong meaning in the original word means, and the Syriac and Arabic versions understand it. The Vulgate reads na ges, i.e. we are looked upon by him as persons that pursue trivial advantages at the expense of the public, to which our predecessors, as well as our contemporaries, have been reduced, to a truly humble and good spirit; but this term seems too soft and favourable for persons of such bad morals and wicked principles.

Ver. 17. For if the man be the son of God, he will help him, and deliver him from the hand of his enemies. Thus the primitive martyrs were insulted and treated in the like opprobrious manner.

Ver. 18. He shall be in the midst of the congregation; and among the chief of the children of light. He shall be in the midst of the congregation; and among the chief of the children of light. The man that is truly a child of light is not carried off by death in the full strength of his powers, but is preserved, at least, to a time when he can be more useful, and to be a more effective witness. The Lord will let him deliver him now, εἰ δὲν αἰώνο, ἐφ' ὑμῖν, if he love him.

Compare likewise Matt. xxvii. 43, where the taunt and irony used by the Jews, by way of insult, to our Saviour, then ex pected to be crucified; and they were exactly what the Jews have in the present passage before us. The same judgment shall be let him deliver him now, εἰ δὲν αἰώνο, if he love him. There is a passage in the平行 Prophecy of Christ's passion, and his death used by the Jews, which expresseth, that Christ shall be murdered in Jerusalem, and the Gentiles shall say that he was murdered by the Jews; (De Civit. Dei, lib. xviii. cap. 20. St. Ambrose, St. Cyprian, and many other fathers of the church, assert that this prophecy is fulfilled in the death of Jesus; and their testimony, which they says is "so full and particular in describing the wicked counsels against him, that this author may seem almost to have been present." (lib. iv.) But I am not so sage as to imagine or assert, that there is any direct prophecy of our blessed Saviour, much honour to this author, and the times in which he wrote; yet I think, by way of accommodation, they are applicable to our Saviour, who in scripture is called "the just one," and who has been crucified upon him, God will have respect unto him, I say in the midst of the plains of the multitude of the just men, not unlike that of the heathens upon the ashes of the primitive Christians, who gloried in the hopes of a resurrection; their persecutors pleased themselves with reducing the dead bodies of the several martyrs into atoms, with scattering them in the air, or throwing them into rivers, and so subsequently, said, "Let us now see whether they can rise again, or whether their God can help them, and deliver them out of our hands" (Euseb. Eccl. Hist. lib. v. cap. 1).

Ver. 21. For their own wickedness both blinded them.]—as the like sentiment, v. 12. St. Chrysostom. says, "There are the sense and the sinners, that seeing not the ways of falsehood and error, they run headlong into them; nor could any errors ever have prevailed over man, if they had not, by means of their own sins, and then drawn away and seduced; for error (sith he) begoteth not sin, but sins begot and bring forth error" (Homil. 19. in Matt. viii.). But still it is no less true, or more so, they are seduced by their own sinnish purposes, principles, produced generally wicked practices. St. Austin accordingly observes, that the different degrees, and, as it were, gradations of licentiousness, are very justly described in this chapter: "That men first of all imitate the Devil, then deny the immortality of the soul, and a future state; that immorality is the certain consequence of such impiety and licentiousness; that, next, for these principles, produces generally wicked practices." St. Austin observes, in particular, as being the most effectual remedy to drawn thought; and that when men are once heated, they easily proceed, through excess, to oppression, cruelty, and murder (To Ps. lix.).

Ver. 22. For God created man to be immortal, and made him to be an image of his own eternity.]—God not only created man in his image, free from corruption, but made him accordingly, our Evangelists, which is a very strong expression, to denote a peculiar resemblance of the Deity; and accordingly the Arabic interpreters render, Fecitque illum imaginem suam Dei, and the Syriac, Ad imaginem suam Dei tractavit. There is no such expression, in particular, which properly signifies eternity; and this Dr. Grabe has inserted in the text, extenuating it probably the best reading.

Ver. 23. For the devil, jealous at the future happiness designed for man, resolved to tempts him to disbelieve, that he might deprive him of the blessing of immortality, and reduce him to the same forlorn condition with himself and his apostate brethren. St. Chrysostom makes the same observation upon the devil, ón ανθρώπου πιστεύσεις, ón τον απώλευτα, ω κρατείται από της δολαιας, ὁ Πατέρας ἔχει τον πνεύμονα (Homil. 23. de Diabolo, Tentat.). "That though man had given the devil no occasion of offence, yet when he saw the honour designed for him, immediately envied him the favour" (see also Chrys. Iren. Evang. li. vi.). St. Augustine observes, "That death began at the same time with the transgression; and that neither age nor pain could have touched our first parents, so long as they held the privilege of eating of the tree of life, but when God, moved by his own natural way, contracted the seeds of disease and death" (De Genes. lib. ii.). And thus the Apostolical Constitutions, the book of Enoch, the Apocalypse, the apocrypha, the visions of aortinas, aliae suntiam fulminant inter se conversionem. Nunc quidem est vitae iter, desideratum autem iter mortis, quod non ex voluntate Dei exitur, verum ex insidiis adversariorum (CSEL, 25. p. 231.).

And they that do hold of his side do find it.]—The Vulgate translates, Immitatur autem illum qui sunt ex parvi ipsis; and Coverdale's translation renders it in like manner. "And then the hope of heaven and the terror of hell, taking their seat in the heart of the genius, De Prædestin. ad Monimiam, lib. i, but the construction before given would be more consistent and agreeable, and the relation between the two chapters more apposite, if the rendering here was, they found it, i.e., they saw, that they did draw death upon themselves, as many as are partakers of it; for the si τον τον κυράν λεγειν, and the οτι ευδοκηται τον κυράν λεγειν, i. 16, are the same sense of perdition or overthrowing, which is not of God's appointing, but their own seeking and procuring. The present rendering of this place is little less than tautology, for to be partakers of death, is certainly to find it; I shall therefore, in the following pages, as they are the drift of these chapters, that the death which wicked men call, correspond, covenant with, and at last partake of, is all along to be understood of death eternal.

CHAP. III.

ARGUMENT.—In order to confute the false and dangerous principles maintained by the arian and profane schoolers in the foregoing chapter; in this is displayed the great happiness of the righteous, and the miserable state of the wicked against them. For though God, for wise ends of his providence, permits the righteous sometimes to be afflicted, and even to die under the severity of their persecutions, yet do they not totally cease to be; but as they die in the Lord, so they still live unto, and with, God, in whose hands their souls are. But the wicked, on the contrary, though they promise themselves great happiness in their sinful courses, are miserable both here and hereafter. The chapter concludes with the praise of chastity, and the sad state and condition of adulterers and their children.

Ver. 1. The souls of the righteous are in the hand of God.]—i. e., In the hand of the Redeemer, the souls of the righteous that are departed, shall after death find great refreshment and comfort of their labours; and being in God's keeping, enjoy a state of the greatest happiness, and a constant enjoyment of the blessedness of God's presence, the ancient Jews, according to Grothius, called Paradise, or the Garden of Pleasure; where, though they enjoyed not the immediate happiness which they were so long pining for, or their states hereafter, yet even at present, and in their intermediate state, they had some foretaste and anticipation of their future happiness; but they held none to have this pleasing sense, but the scripture because terrifyed, as it were, by the idea of death, was made before they departed from their bodies. From this expression, "the soul is in God's hand," we may infer, that the human soul is not only a substance distinct from the body, but that it lives after it in a separate state from it, and such a state as is susceptible of happiness or misery; for why are the souls of the righteous here said to be deposited in the hand of God, but because it denotes a place of this happiness, that is, in particular, they have pleasing anticipations of their reward, and wait for it with a holy impatience; and in the mean time are in paradise, or in Abraham's bosom, or some place of rest and refreshment appointed for them by God; but with respect to the martyrs in particular, who had suffered gloriously in God's cause, it was a notion very early entertained in the primitive church, that these entered immediately upon the presence of God, and glory. Or we may understand this passage, of the reflections which the righteous may undergo in this life, that, though their torments may be the more decisive by reason of the promise of the future; yet, as to their present salvation, even in the strength of their faith, and a sure dependence upon God, they shall overcome the reluctance of nature, and not only suffer with patience, but with joy and delight, that the righteous is the effect of any stanch apology, or that they have not flesh and blood, like other folks, to feel the force of sufferings; but it is the power of a strong faith that makes these their own conquerors. If the souls of the martyrs were indeed in their bodies when they had trial of such a variety of sufferings, they could never say, as St. Bernard, they have been able to have gone through them; not in their bodies, but in their hands of their persecutors, and mingled by them, their souls were in the hand of God; and the Holy Spirit, with which they were filled, kept them above all sense of pain, and rendered them quite invulnerable.
able." And whoever reads the letter from the churches of Lyons and Vienna to those of Asia, Phrygia, wherein the death and resurrection of the martyrs, and the constancy in the most severe trials, are described (see Ecceh. Hist. lib. i. cap. 1), will acknowledge the truth of the proverbial expression, "In the North and the South, what is the meaning of this place is, that the righteous shall shine as the sun, be brighter for their afflictions, and that God will glorify their saints in and by them. Thus God promises to such as set their love and reliance on such pure and ever bright, yet in trouble, but that he will deliver them from it, and bring them to honour by it," Ps. xci. 15. We cannot have a more remarkable instance of the presence of God with his saints, than the one found in the letter of St. John to the church at Ephesus; where the text acquaints us, that one in the form of the Son of God, probably an angel, conspicuous and distinguishable by his brightness, walked with them, and accompanied them in the very flames; and that this accident, and their miraculous deliverance from it, was the occasion of their being promoted in the province of Babylon (Dan. iii). The sentiments of the primitive writers, upon occasion of the martyrs' sufferings, are most noble and magnificent: "A Christian (says Tertullian) never thinks himself so fine, never so illustrious, as at the stake; he is then the most singular, going to heaven in state" (Apol. pro Christianis. Nor is what Eusebius writes less observable: "That it was a most charming sight to behold the martyrs in prison, to see how their misery in earthly life became them a toy of Divine love; magnificent; captivating in their chains, as a bride in all her glory upon the day of marriage") (Ecceh. Hist. lib. v. cap. 1). Or we may understand this passage in another sense, viz. "That the righteous shall shine as the sun, and the moon and all the stars of heaven." (ver. 13.) For the Jews have a tradition, that the bodies of the righteous shall be clothed at the resurrection with a clothing of light, as of a pure flame. Thus able to the description made in the Old Testament, of the just rising from their graves, "That they shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and as the stars, for ever and ever" (Dan. xi. 23). This expression is applicable to the Hebrews, as well as to the Gentiles, and is evident from the history of their , and their advent among the nations, (see also Matt. xvii. 2.) Acts ix. 3; Rev. ii. 14, 15.

And run and fear like sparrows among the stubble. By the stubble it is certain the wicked are meant, called also chabg, by a metaphor, Ps. i. 5. The expression here is proverbial; and if it be understood of the righteous in this life, and of their conduct, as distinguished from the wicked, it is then the same as that of St. Paul, Phil. ii. 15. "That the sons of God," i.e. the righteous, "shine as lights in the world, in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation." But if it is applied to the future state of the righteous, it seems to mean that they shall be conspicuous in their goodness among the world, and just, after this manner, "They (the saints) shall run or pass through the ranks of the wicked (discreant, says the Syriac version, just inter impios) as fire spreads through the stubble every where uncontrolled and irresistible." Hereby probably is intimated their power over them; a further description of which follows in the next verse.

Ver. 8. Ye shall judge the nations, and have dominion over the people, and your Lord shall reign for ever."

Though the righteous may be said even in this life to judge the nations, i.e. to commend the wicked, by the conspicuousness of their good works, and to condemn the wicked, by the illiberum, i.e. that God will in due time have a respect to, and reward, such saints and martyrs who fell a sacrifice in his service, who, like the victim in the burnt offering, were completely consumed in the fire, and so made ready to be translated to himself, to live with him, and with the blessed society of just men made perfect, of whom the world in their several ages was not worthy, to enjoy his bosom in heaven; yet, the general term here used, the word shakhen, as well as the expression, do not properly regard the whole of the soul and the whole state of the body, as they are here described, as possessed of a power and authority in the world, and to be the assessors of God in that kingdom and judgment of the world, the saints shall be assessors with God in judging the wicked; for it is piously thought by many learned men, that the saints, when crowned with glory and immortality by God, shall be the proper body and dignity of pronouncing sentence even against evil angels and wicked spirits. And it was an opinion that prevailed generally in the early times of the Church, and was at least the opinion of the Catholic Church (see those who shall reign, Acts xvi. 10; 1 Cor. vi. 2, 3; Rev. ii. 26; see note on i. of this book).

Ver. 9. They that put their trust in him shall understand. the truth; and such as be faithful in love shall abide with him. And he concludes, as truly as has himself experienced this truth in particular; or the meaning may be, that they are the fittest and most likely to attain the knowledge of divine truths in general, which is the首饰 of knowledge. The first is, trust in God, or rather a distrust of a man's self, and of his own perfections and abilities, in thebern- and therefore, as it is called, the wisdom of the sere knowledge; the second is, a sincere and unfeigned love of God, which displays itself in obedience and a readiness to do God's will; for an honest and well-disposed heart, free from pride or affectation, should most naturally receive spiritual illuminations, and the knowledge of saving truths, according to that observation of our blessed Saviour, 'That if any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God or not' (John xiv. 27).

And according to the different pointing of the Greek text, the last clause of this passage of our author may be differently understood; either we may render with the margin, and the author of this faithful shall remain with him in love; and thus the oriental versions point the place; or, as our translations take it, 'Such as be faithful in love shall abide with him;' i.e. cleave, them with so firm and unshaken a resolution, that neither tribulation nor distress, nor death shall separate them from him; and in this sense τρισσιομεν το κλοιον is taken, Act. xx. 23. The Syriac interpreters render the present participle perfect, and not falling out. Quis sunt fideles, per charitatem permanentia ipsiis; quam gravior et misericordia conclusa est usque per vitam.

Ver. 13. (Blessed is the barren that is unfeiled, which hath not known the sinful bed.) This is to be understood of the barren wife, that is chaste and free from adulterers; such persons to be esteemed of great commendation in scripture in, ευρης ἑπαρκαι, Heb. xiii. 4. And though she may be reproached by some upon account of her barrenness, as was the sentiment of the Jews respecting the barrenness of the holy temple, the建造 of Messiah, yet shall her virtue be recompensed by God, as far preferable to the most fruitful adultery. In vain have some popular writers endeavoured to ground upon this place, which unanswerably reveals the sense implied, the judgment against petulant virgins; as if that was established and approved of in the age of this writer, and known to the ancient Jews, which is certainly the invention of more modern times. In this passage no reflection is intended against marriage, nor any preference given to a continued celibacy; the compariso

Ver. 15. And the root of wisdom shall never fail away.) (e. Or, the sap of wisdom, which is the subject of this great passage, and so the Syriac version understands it, Radice causatat non evanescit. The sense of the whole verse is, that every good work will be attended with a reward; and thus the nine and half verses of the parable concerning the sower, and the different classes of ears, and the several fruits which spring therefrom; and that chastity in particular, which is a glorious victory over ourselves, hath this pleasing prospect and comfort in revenge, that many of the branches of a chaste and holy stock; and that the virtue and goodness of parents is a security and treasure to their posterity. We may observe, that as in the book of Proverbs, the adulterer is described to be a man void of understanding (vi. 32), so this writer makes chastity to proceed from wisdom; and this possibly St. Paul might intend, Rom. xii. 3, when he advises ἄφιξης ἐς μακαρίας, which is St. Jerome renders, Sapere ad pudicitiam (Cont. Jov.).

Ver. 16. As for the children of adulterers, they shall not come to perfection, and the seed of them shall be removed out of the congregation of Israel, which we may understand in two senses; either that a bastard shall not be partaker of holy things, i.e. shall not be admitted to partake of the sacraments, nor hold any public religious office, according to the marginal reading, and the Geneva version; and so the sense will be the same with that in Dent. xxii. 2. "A bastard shall not enter into the congregation of the Lord, even to the generation of Israel." For the ancient Jewish lawyers anciently fixed such a mark of infamy upon bastards, as to forbid their coming to the sacred offices; even the heathens themselves excluded them from all public acts of justice and the participation of their mysteries; and according to the civil ecclesiastical laws, bastards were not capable to be ordained without a dispensation (see Watson's Compl. Incom. p. 102)." voice; and it is sometimes understood by the ancient Greek fathers. Or we may understand the place, with our true fathers, as a declaration, and obtain the meaning of such a spurious offspring upon whom God may visit the indignity of their fathers. And indeed we meet with in the scripture a type, a representation, of the divine vengeance in this particular, viz. that the darkest spot in Solomon's kingdom was smote by God, and perished quickly from before his eyes; and God gives this very reason for it, “Because their father had done wickedness in their child that is born unto thee surely die!” (2 Sam. xii. 14).

Ver. 18. If they die quickly, they have no hope, neither comfort in the day of trial. Some learned men have thought (see Father's Book of Discipline, p. 113, and in the context, is a hard and uncharitable sentence upon bastards, whose very birth and entrance into the world, though it be indeed by a crime of their parents, yet themselves are innocent and upright and blameless; and such, unnurtured and unpunished: but the observation of this writer will be less liable to exception, if we consider, that there is often a natural and hereditary taint in wicked and debased families, and that some particular sin as it were, is the seed of future wickedness. Hence holy Job, speaking of such wicked parents, says in very strong and significant terms, “Such happen upon the companions and children of men.” (xxi. 19), which natural propensity and vicious turn of temper God foresighting, sometimes has recourse to extremities to stop the infection, and hinder the spreading guilt. This is the explanation of the observation of this writer, that they have their own death by irregularity and loose living; or if by chance they live long, like the wanton elders that tempted Susanna, being grown old in wickedness, they lose all the respect of their fellow creatures. And when they come to die, their case, like that of other wicked men, is most desperate; nor will they have any thing to allege in their favour in the great day of retribution. Thus the psalmist, describing the end of the wicked, says, “The ungodly shall not be able to stand in the judgment.” Ps. i. 6, where the LXX. read, τοιαύτα διασώσταλα από της δύναμεως της τελωνευσεως "to be delivered out of the power of the strong." and the sense is, that there shall be only a resurrection of the just. But that passage of the son of Sirach, Ecclus. xii. 9, comes nearest the sense of this writer, “Woe unto you, ungodly persons, ye shall perish to a curse; and ye die, a curse shall be upon your portion.”

Ver. 19. Horrible is the end of the unwise generation. Can children by any means observe (see Comment. in loc.) that what is said in this and the following chapter, is of the seed and prospective misery and frightful fate of the children of adulteries, ought not to be understood as spoken absolutely by this writer, but only of such as, being abandoned and heathendizd, were sufficiently answerable to hock triumphat; i.e. that virtue, through a consciousness of having done its duty, through hope anticipates, even in this life, its future reward, and by faith triumphs, as already observed. And thus we find that the reverse of the sentiments here expressed do not conduce, both of which render, in the esculp, there is a manifest allusion in this verse to the Olympic games, and the crowning of the conquerors therein; and in the same sense, the following verse not worth noting, viz. προανακτονηται, προπατεω, αλλ' ξυστα τυχείν. From whence the learned, among other reasons, infer, that this whole body of scripture was first composed perhaps about two hundred years before the first Olympic (see Usher's Annals). Having gotten the victory, striving for undeserved rewards. The sense is, that the mind of God, in this instance, the sense is, that the mind of God, in this instance, is now become so common a thing that it seems obvious enough, and is not much unlike that of Horace; “Virtus repulsae nesia soror, intannius fulget honoribus” (Carm. lib. iii. od. 5); but it does not agree with any of the ancient versions. The expression in each of these passages is very unusual and singular; with respect to the first, a conqueror that receives the reward of his services, is not less deserving properly and truly, of a crown, before he can apply for his tribunal, for it is very possible that children thus born in sin, and from a criminal and forbidden commerce, may yet prove virtuous and regular in themselves; and that the children of even good parents are not exempt from such shameless the case of old Eli's children in particular, who made the Lord's people to transgress through their scandalous uncleanness (1 Sam. ii. 22).

ARGUMENT.—In this chapter the author pursues the same subject with which he concluded the former, and shows how much happier it is to be a begotten and virtuous person, than to be a bastard and heathenish child. And this is made evident, and the absurdity of the former is impeached, by the example of what is commonly known with God, and with men. The Vulgate reads, "Omne pulchrum est cinctus generato cum claritate! which is not a just translation of the original words, σεῖκας ἀκριβως ἔτι δὲ κατοίκος τοῦ κρίτου; καθώς ἐν ὑμιᾷ; καὶ τότε ἐν ψωποι σεῖκας; where by ςεῖκας, I would understand the reward of the contest, and not the contest itself; and by ἐκσκεπτα, those that had merited this crown or reward by being undid. And I have the pleasure to find this conjecture confirmed by the Syrian version, which renders, "προσηπείται, and the word προσηπείται seems to apply manifestly to the persons, to the agonist himself, and not to contests, or the nature of their rewards. Calmet's note is to the same effect, and that of Messeurs de Port Royal still more conclusive. "of Messeurs de Port Royal still more conclusive. "Et après ce, elle est en rapport comme victorieuse, apres avoir rompement le prix des combats pour la chasse.

Ver. 3. earth to earth (of the earth the dust shalt not thrive, nor take deep root from bastard slips.) "εἰ μὴ ἀκακία περιελεωσαται: probably: the true reading may be περιελεωσαται, slips from sporious trees, i. e. without a metaphor, children begotten of adulteresses. For the word ἄκακος is always used for the moral guilt or as an euphemism for the sin of fornication, as well as ἐκσκεπτα. It seems to require this. And this reading is confirmed by Coverdale's version, which renders: And the begotten of whoredom, shall take no deep root, nor lay any fast foundation." And this reading has been observed in the vegetable world, that slips from such irregular productions do not thrive to any purpose. The... book of Job describes the generation of the wicked in like terms: "This is the portion of a wicked man with God, and the heritage of oppressors which they receive of the Almighty: if his children be multiplied, it is not because of his multitude; if his children be dispersed abroad, though he see not them from the dead, yet shall not be satisfied with bread; those that remain of him shall be buried in death, and his widow shall not weep." (xxvii. 18-19). The description in this verse is almost a perfect parallelist, where mankind in general is often represented under the metaphor of trees, or a plantation (see Ps. i. 3; xcv. 12, &c.). According to the Hebrew style, a branch or branchlet here should be translated a tree. Thus the word manah, with benanah, which signifies the root; see Gen. xlix. 22, where the Hebrew word manah, which we translate branches, is translated in the marginal reading a branch. Yet the wicked in particular compared to unpromising plants, or withered and decayed trees; thus St. Jude, speaking of such libertines as delite the flesh, emphatically describes them as "twice dead, being plucked by the root." (ver. 12). The sense of this passage is briefly this, That God will visit the posterity of such loose and debauched persons, and that even their children shall not continue for any long time, but "as plants which God hath not planted, shall be rooted up." Besides the instance before given of David's child struck with death, St. Jude makes another, and that of a very prominent character; he acknowledges that he had a son "a carnisiter ex se natum de pecanto suo," but that God quickly deprived him of the child, though one of very promising hopes; "Annum erexit et annum consummavit; in factum mortis, sic malum graviter et doctos viros!" (Confess. lib. ix. cap. 6). Ver. 4. Though they flourish in branches for a time; yet shall they be cut down and cast into the fire. I. E. Though they equal or even overtop, the prosperity of the good and virtuous, yet having laid their foundation in wickedness, they shall be overthrown by calamities; like a tree that has taken no deep root in the earth, and is violently shaken with storms and tempests; to which agrees that observation of the psalmist: "When all the workers of wickedness do flourish, then shall they be destroyed for ever!" I. E. as they are then hastening the increase of their excretion, their flourishing being in order to their destruction, ὡς οἱ πλουσίωτασιαν, says the LXX. Ps. xxxii. 7. But the Hebrew word which we render flourish, has the same signification as is used in the Grecian and Hebrew languages, to signify that a thing is increased or multiplied, as in the LXX. xviii. 12, according to that of Solomon, "A man shall not be established by wickedness, but the root of the righteous shall not be moved," Prov. xlii. 13. See also Eccles. xi. 15, where the children of the ungodly are called, "ancient roots upon a hard rock." Ver. 5. Their fruit unprofitable. ὅποιας ἀνηρωμένας ἀνάρτους. This adjective, though it has indeed this signification here means rather here insipientes; i. e. that the fruit is unpleasant, not of a kindly sort, and has not the right taste or flavour, as fruit will always be that comes not from the root of the tree. Thus the word manah, in the opinion of some, signifies the soil that is not proper for it, or where it wants its natural sun, or when the ground is too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry, too sour or too stabborn. Hence the expression of unfallen of unlawful beds are witnesses of wickedness against their parents in their trial._Ex ἀνηρωμένως ἀνάρτους γενεσίαν. _I. E. they here does neither mean the tree, nor the fruit, nor the root, nor the progenitor, but Vulgate have it; it rather means conculcitus, in which sense it occurs, vii. 2, and accordingly the Syriac interpreters render, Liberti ex illegetimo conculcati procreati; who, being monuments of their parents' guilt, are a perpetual brand while they live, of infamy upon them. Agreeably to the sentiments in this and the foregoing verses is that description of the adulteress, set forth in the last verse of her prophecy, Joel iii. 14, 15. "Her children shall not take root, and her branches shall bring forth no fruit; she shall leave her memory to be cursed, and her reproach shall be rooted out;" but the reproach does not terminate in the parent only; the children likewise, according to the sense and opinion of the world, are partakers of the shame, according to that farther observation of the same wise writer: "He that is infected to his children shall perish, and their posterity shall have a perpetual reproach: for the children will complain of an ungodly father, and an ignominious mother." (Eccles. xlii. 6, 7): but such illegitimate children here mentioned, as witnesses of wickedness against their parents in their trial, which Calvin understands to be the natural child of a woman, who has by adultery the natural child of a man, I am of opinion there is this farther meaning in the words, viz. that such children will be accusers of, and witnesses against, their guilty parents in the other world. And thus the Geneva Bible expressly reads, which is confirmed by the Aramaic version, which renders in the future, "Testaments unciique parentum suorum, cum explorabuntur." Ver. 7. Those that are reprobated shall be consumed with death; shall he be in peace. That the righteous are often smitten away before they arrive at any maturity of age, is evident from observation. This is frequently the effect of God's anger against sinners, which is represented to us as a withdrawal from the favour of those woes as well as troubles and impatience of life, waiting with a holy impatience for further degrees of happiness. The prophet Isaiah has the same reflection, "The righteous are taken away from the evil to come, and shall enter into peace." (lvi. 1). And one of the ancients has made the like observation, "That he that is a favourite of the gods dies young," &c. de salute sancti etsi. By the righteous being "prevented with death," we are not to understand his being surprised by death when he least thought of it; for the good man to be suddenly taken away, he is always on the watch, prepared and ready to leave the world and appear before God; his death may be indeed sudden or hasty, but not careless or unguarded. Ver. 9. But wisdom is the gray hair unto men, and an unsalted life is old age. Ἡθελα γεώργα. Our translators seem not to have expressed himself at all in their version, which yet has a strong and significant meaning; saepeque, &c. Thus an unsalted life is old age, as it is, the standard of old age. Fulgentius quotes this and the preceding verse, and adds most excellently by way of comment, "Ad mea morte, et in tanta parte, quanta sedis in vivis, tanta in mortuis, sed potius anima, prout movetur melius aut deterrimae;" (De Resinæ. Noe, et de Vita Contempl.). Agreeably to this the Romans styled their chief council Senaturs, and the Lacedemonians called their spostra, not so much upon account of their age, as their wisdom and prudence of those that composed it; in like manner philosophers, in ecclesiastical history, had their name assigned them on the same account. There is hardly any subject on which the sages have moralized more finely than on this; honeste acta atque sapientissimae præterrupta mens, saepe etiam de omnibus ordine percolata, mensae, qui ad nostræ vitæ, et fraudiæ, and frustration of mortality. Cicero has many beautiful sentiments upon this occasion; particularly in his book on the nature of friendship; "There is that thought which is very like what is contained in this and the foregoing verse; ‘Non cani, non rågæ repente auctoritatem arripiere possunt, sed honeste acta atque sapientissima praebantur nostri." (De Amicitia. iii. 46). But no reflection of the ancients is more judicious, than that of a learned modern: "Gray hairs (says he) consist not in the multitude of years, but in the number and variety of useful observations that are made; nor would there be any reason why they should be particularly ascribed to the aged, except such persons, by having lived longer in the world, and having had the opportunity of many and various occurrences to open their judgment, have accordingly improved it; for it matters not much, whether a man makes his observations in a longer or a less time, provided he makes them well." (Boyle's Occasional Reflections. Ver. 10. So that, living amongst sinners, he was translated. This passage is undoubtedly to be understood of Jesus, who was the first instance of the overflow of God's grace, he being pleased to translate, as he had condemned the first instance of transgression, to show his great detestation of sin. The great question is, whether these words signify a natural death, or a miraculous translation, as that of Elijah was; from some expressions in the context many learned men have been inclined to conjecture that the author of this book thought Enoch died a natural death, and — that his translation here mentioned, was only such a translation: one reason in particular, that has induced them to think an ordinary death is here spoken of, is, that the holy scripture often uses the like expressions to signify death. See Gen. xvii. 15; Job xiv. 12; xvii. 16, where the Vulgate renders, qui sublati sunt ante tempus, though the writer is speaking of such as die a sudden death. And it must be confessed, that the Hebrew phrase in all those instances, in which there is the least difficulty in the use of to express the translation of Enoch; and from hence some have inferred, that even Moses' words, Gen. v. 24, may be interpreted to mean, that Enoch died not by the ordinary death, but by an extraordinary one, and thereby imply a miraculous translation. But the reasons and arguments for a miraculous translation seem to carry with them much greater weight; for, first, though the text of Moses is obscure, and the writer does not make use of any arguments to show, that the translation of a man yet living to heaven or another world; nevertheless, when we compare what he says of Enoch with what he relates of the other patriarchs, it is plain he intended to distinguish the one from the other. And Enoch went out of the world from that in which the other patriarchs left it; for of all the rest mentioned in that chapter it is said, they died, but of Enoch this is not said, but only that, "he was not, the interpreters, was not found on earth," because God had translated him from it. Further, Moses takes note of the eminent probity of Enoch's life, which made him worthily inherit the translation; and then does not immediately add, according to the Vulgate, Et non apparoni, quasi tulli eum Deus; implying, that though he was no more seen upon earth, yet he was still alive. This is the sense which literalists give to the verse, and renders it expressly, Subactus est, et ascendit in colum coram Domino. Again, it is said of Noah and of Abraham, that "they died," but of Enoch it is said, "he was not." This phrase therefore must import something that happened peculiarly to him. Secondly, The holy psalmist, 2 Kings ii. 5, giving an account of Elijah's translation, which was a confusiously miraculous, uses the very same word, viz. taken away, several times to express it by. Thirdly, The son of Sirach seems most favourable to Enoch's being translated alive. Ecclus. 21. 25. to this effect, to avoid any equivocation the Vulgate reads, Translatius est in paradiso, a term not commonly made use of to express the ordinary death of a man. But, fourthly, The writer of the apostle to the Hebrews, xi. 5, puts this matter beyond all dispute, and understands it clearly of a miraculous translation; "By faith Enoch was translated, that he should not see death." Lastly, Many of the fathers expressly assert a miraculous translation; the author of the Recognitions, bearing the name of St. Clement, says, "Enoch having pleased God, was translated into immortality." And St. Cyril, "That by faith Enoch was translated from the midst of this world by a singular favour" (De Mortal.). St. Jerome yet more fully, "That he was translated into heaven, and left us" (Epist. 38, ad Pannach. See Calmet's Dissertation more). Ver. 12. For the bewitching of naughtiness doth obscure things that are honest; and the wondering of concepience doth consume spirit, and make it weak. The corruption is here referred to the corruptions introduced by Cain and his descendants, by which the holy seed by degrees fell off, and became infected. Calmet observes that there is a particular beauty in the word diluixere, here rendered baffle; and that it is with the greatest propriety applied to sinful pleasures; for as there is a sort of magic or fascination which imposes upon men's eyes and makes them see false appearances, and obscures what is real; so a like fatal mistake, arising from the blindness of men's understandings, or the perverseness of their wills, makes them fancy there is truth and reality in things which are deceitful and deceiver; that is, it overthrows the real danger that attends them. Nor is this true only of pleasures in general, but applicable in a more particular manner to the sweets of love and amorous delights. If you consider honest pleasures in their true light, and the manner in which the tempter plants them in the minds of men, you will see it is easy to be deceived. This verse, considered not the true reason for which God took him, that it was an act of mercy, rather than severity, to remove a saint, "whose righteous soul was vexed with the filthy contention of the wicked, and was not commingled with the ungodly multitude," but the reason was, his life was not prolonged in this world in such a manner as to remove any occasion of sinning. And what a happy change was wrought in the affections and the heart of Jacob. If we follow this reading, the passage may relate to any righteous person speedily taken away, whose good life condemns or leaves without excuse the wicked that outlive him, and grow old in their wickedness; or it may relate to Enoch in particular, who may be said to condemn his contemporaries, either virtually by his word and doctrine, or judicially, by denouncing God's judgments against the ungodly of his time (see the same expression applied to Noah upon a like occasion, Hebr. xi. 7.) A youth that is soon perfected the many years and old age of the ungodly: for he is as a tree planted by rivers of water, and brought to perfection, and whom the riper years of age and the fulness of the decrees, which makes it shorter.

CHAPTER V.

ARGUMENT.—To show the great difference in point of happiness, between the virtuous and the wicked, the latter are introduced as groaning under inexpressible misery, and lamenting before the tribunal of God their former ill courses, and for their present unrepentance. Hence the writer takes occasion to show, that the vengeance of God always pursues sinners, either immediately from himself, or by the agency of his ministers, their servants, or instruments and executioners. Calmet thinks the first six chapters may be considered as a sort of preface to the rest of this work.

Ver. 17. Then shall the righteous man stand in great boldness before God's tribunal. God shall be reconciled to him.

At the end of the former chapter, the wicked are represented as trembling under a sense of their guilt and the apprehension of punishment due to them: here, by the way of antithesis, is shown the holy confidence and sweet security which will arise in the breast of every good man in the day of trial, from the justice of his cause and the testimony and approbation of his conscience. This expression is used in manly places in the New Testament: see particularly 1 John ii. 28, and iv. 17, where the righteous man is said "to have boldness in the day of judgment." And made no accusation of others. We may understand this of such as laughed at the good man's doings as fruitless, or endeavoured to make them so by their opposition: but St. Austin, and others of the fathers, understand this passage as referring to the magnanimity of the righteous man's goods, which he had acquired by his honest labours. Thus St. Cyprian, disiprator laborum corum (Testim. Elucid. c. 16), and upon the same passage, says, ascendamque abulatoribus labororum eorum, which Coverdale and the Geneva bible follow. Calmet explains the passage in both these senses.

Ver. 2. He shall not be ashamed in the day of judgment. And the term evermore, does not here mean eternity, strictly so called, seems the more probable from the order of the description, because the judgment, or destruction, mentioned after. Ver. 19. For he shall rend them, and cast them down headlong, that they shall be speechless, &c. Calmet observes, that the author here has expressed in three words three different punishments: first implies, that God shall beat or dash them against the ground; and the other two probably allude to a more infamous kind of death, viz., that they shall be strangled, and suffocated, more; and by the Syriac version. Earn posthum in turpis putrimento. Junius also is to the same purpose; and to these agrees the Geneva bible, which renders, "They shall be strangled, and suffocated, and by the Syriac version, Earn posthum in turpis putrimento. Junius also is to the same purpose; and to these agrees the Geneva bible, which renders, "They shall be strangled, and suffocated, and burnt asunder."

And a reproach among the dead for evermore. Thus the Syriac and Arabic versions read, kim. The sense is, the wicked shall be confounded at the sight of him whom they have so much abused, and shall behold with amazement the sudden and wonderful turn of things. We have an instance of such a thing in the case of Pharaoh, of whom the apostle speaks, 1 Cor. xi. 31, for he was highly admired in honour by God, and rewarded by him as his faithful servants; envy at others' happiness, and despair of their own, will render them completely miserable. This is finely represented in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. Ver. 3. And they repeating and groaning for anguish of spirit shall say within themselves. This was he, whom we had sometime in decision, and a proverch of reproach. The prosporosa here is very natural, and may be considered either as a soliloquy in each repeating sinner's breast, or as a joint reflection made by them all, and a set discourse which they had one to another. The Greek will admit of either sense, but Calmet thinks the latter most agreeable to the context. It is very observable, that there are three words in this verse expressing the same thing, viz., repent, sorrow, and woe, which are intended to denote an excess of abuse and rudeness; but that in Ps. xlv. 13, is still more remarkable, where David uses five synonymous terms upon the same occasion: "O Lord, be not long angry, neither deal with me after thy anger; neither count my sins in thy anger, nor number my transgressions in thy displeasure." The confession of these scoffers may be applied to all others of the like turn and denomination; for it has been the unhappy fate of good men in all ages, to be thus ridiculed by librines. It was the observation of Job long since, that "the just uprightness is laughed to scorn." (Prov. xiv. 29.) And with respect to himself, he complains particularly, that "he was made a by-word of the people;" and "before them," as the margin reads, "he was as a tabernacle" (ver. 6), i.e., for he was made the object of the sport and merriment of others, by no improbable interpretation of the place, the LXX. rendering it by γιλος. Ver. 4. We fools accounted his life madness.
men, and such as retire from the world for the opportunity of a greater piety, are often represented by delinquents as melancholy and disorderd; but in the end, such libertines as he includes among the wicked, and religion acknowledged to be the true wisdom. The like reflection was thrown upon such of the primitive Christians as were dead to the world; they were looked upon as seeking the pleasures that contemned, and foolishly credulous, for trusting to invisible rewards; "Let fools and idiots (says Celsius in his sneering way) superstitious and idolatrous, as the most agreeable discipled to the God they worship" (Origen cont. Cels. lib. iii.). Nor did our Saviour himself escape the censure of "having a devil, and being mad" (John x. 20). So certainly the same had been written to the obloquy and reproach. There is, seemingly, the like reflection on him, Mark iii. 31, and even uttered by his own friends, as our translation hath faithfully rendered it; for, as a man learned in the law, he was praecipuous in his reading. There does not relate to our blessed Saviour, but to the clamorous multitude, whose behaviour often gives just occasion for such a suspicion.

Ver. 6. How is he numbered among the children of God, and his lot in among the saints? How different are the cool reflections of an ungodly spirit, from the wild sailes of a heated fancy? how cannot help observing, at first sight, how some parents vary, considered in this different light! The very same scribes, who railed the just man upon his glorious title of "the Son of God," ii. 18, at length confess the truth of the fact, without the least suspicion of the principle; and that the same relation in the next life: and the true inheritance of the sons of God is among his glorified saints: τοις θείοις ἐστιν ἀδελφοί. See Dan. xii. 13, where the angel tells him: they shall be like a weary man, who can do no work in his lot at the end of the days; i.e. in the resurrection of the just; which the LXX. render, ἀναπνέων τοὺς ἁγίους. The plagues which were in the time of the last Canaan (a type of heaven) among the twelve tribes by lot.

Ver. 6. And the sun of righteousness rose not upon vs.] Coverdale's and the other English versions read in like manner; but the Vulgate; but all those Greek copies omit the words of "righteousness," and so likewise do se- veral of the fathers, when they quote this passage (see particularly St. Gregory, lib. xxxiv. Moral. cap. 6. Cyprian, Serm. 12. and in interpreting the pl). The Syriac and Arabic versions likewise omit them. They seem either to have been put in the margin in way of explanation, and to have crept from thence into the text, or else to have been added from the former sentence, for they are neither in the Alexandrian, nor any other copy.

Ver. 7. We wearied ourselves in the way of wickedness and vanity; and considered that we were, after all, but gall and wormwood. That we might come to the words of "righteousness," and so likewise do several of the fathers, when they quote this passage (see particularly St. Gregory, lib. xxxiv. Moral. cap. 6. Cyprian, Serm. 12. and in interpreting the pl). The Syriac and Arabic versions likewise omit them. They seem either to have been put in the margin in way of explanation, and to have crept from thence into the text, or else to have been added from the former sentence, for they are neither in the Alexandrian, nor any other copy.

Ver. 11. We wandered up and down in the paths of wickedness and destruction.

Ver. 12. Not that pride profiteth us: or what good have riches with our vanquishing brought us? i.e. What good have all our proud and haughty conceits, our admiration of worldly state and riches, our pursuit of vain curiosities and trifles? It is of great utility to the world, and not all vanished into nothing? It is obvious to observe, from this self-reflection of a wicked man, very naturally here represented, that the way of wickedness will be for his own interest, in the first place, that, by pursuing with eagerness the uncertain pleasures of this world, he has forfeited his title to more durable and lasting dignities. Secondly, that he is for ever lost in happiness; and the sad prospect or reflection upon that happiness, which he might have enjoyed, but lost through his own folly, will greatly increase his misery.

Thirdly, that there will be a part of his future punishment; and all his favourite pleasures and enjoyments being past and gone, they will, by a miserable exchange, be ascended with, and they are each of them particularly proper to express what it will be an addition to the torments of the wicked, that they shall not be able to for- get all those sins and follies which they have ever been guilty of, but must now, always in their remembrance bear, for ever to haunt and disturb them, all those once dear delights, which they would now willingly, at any rate, purchase the oblivion of.

Ver. 13. He shall be in some way, with several of these similies and comparisons, with respect to the shortness of his life, and its insignificance; in the sale of Job, ix. 26, 27, "My days are swifter than a post horse, they fleer away, the morning is as the grass of the meadows that vanish to the prey." And among the memorable sayings of Agur (Prov. xxx. 19), "The way of an eagle in the air, and the way of a ship in the midst of the sea are so other and uncertain, as to leave no trace behind them. The comparisions made use of in the course of these verses, to represent the insignificance of life and its enjoy- ments, may be briefly pointed out. First, the chicken appenn in this chapter, took pains and were concerned to impress upon others that lively sense of the vanity of worldly pleasures, which, by a sad experience, they had themselves had. They are contiguous in many places and placed in different lights, to be more affecting; they seem com- passionately designed as notices to warn others, "lest they also come into that place of torment, as we have without direction, and uncertainly, as to leave no trace behind them. observation is upon the Greek text, ver. 12, § ἐνφαίνειν τῆς λειτουργίας, where I would read with Grotius, ἀνάληθῳ, which seems more proper.

Ver. 13. Even so we in like manner, as soon as we were brought to this power of discerning the expressions of it, which was wasting ever since it was first given us, and we are continually dying by degrees; like that of the poet, Navecentis moritur, which Scenius seems to explain, Quotidie moritur, omnibus dies modi usque mortuus, i.e..--daily, for our life is daily decreasing." But that of St. Austin is still closer, Protean ex quo esse incipit in hoc confessione, and, concerning the expression of it not unlike that moving one in our burial-service: "In the midst of life we are in death;" for life is continually exposed to so many perils, that what David says of his house, that it is in his clearer propositions, "It is always in my hand," i. e. it is always in danger to be taken from me. The Hebrew word signifies the palm of the hand, out of which any thing will easily slip; and intimates, that he esteemed his life always in danger, and always was ready to resign it.

And had no sign of virtue to show;] Coverdale's translation is much better, "And have showed no token of virtue.

The Greek reads in the present tense, "We have no sign of virtue to show;" i. e. We have nothing to urge in our defence, no good action to produce in our favour, no virtue to help observing us. No one thing there is significant, even in his own confession, a wicked man is; he is born and dies, and can say no good of himself, nor any but what is manifestly false.

But were consumed in our own wickedness.] i. e. We spent our whole life in wickedness; and as we died in our sins, we yearly suffer the reward of our evil deeds.--These and the like, we have showed already, are the torments of their torments. Thus for the wicked are introduced speaking; accordingly the Vulgate here inserts, Tali dixit in inferno, qui pecuniae peraverat. And indeed such a solitary from a great sinner, or such repenting strifes from a company of them in despair, seem very natural; for such is the power of a guilty conscience, that the wicked shall be self-condemned, even before the books are opened; they shall anticipate their doom, and acknowledge the justice of their sentence, before it be passed upon them. The making the scene of this long prosopopoeia, which reaches from the beginning of ver. 3, to the end of this, to be in hell, as the Vulgate does; and the representing them, by an ingenious fiction, as really speaking and lamenting there, in the way they would have done if they had power, can never be enough admired in this writer. We have a remarkable and beautiful instance of this in Luke xvi. 24, where an imaginary discourse is carried on between Abraham and the rich man.

Ver. 15. But the righteous live for evermore:] The author, having shown the dreadful consequences of sin, adds the great recompense of the righteous. And he describes them, and acknowledgment of the power of the wicked themselves, their sad prospect, and the final ruin of all their hopes; and illustrated, by several just comparisons, the shortness of life, especially of one spent in a continual hurry, a manner of death, and its effects, in the next verses, to set down, by way of contrast, the glory of the righteous, and their exceeding great reward; that it is not only with, but in the Lord, for so it is in the original; and the Syriac and Arabic translations render accordingly, in Domino. It is also observable, that their reward, and even their future life, is expressed in the present tense, to denote probably the certainty of their reward, and their instantaneous entrance upon it.

And the care of them is with the most High:] The true and common acceptance of these words is, that God careth for his own, and doth continually look after their welfare; care them as with a shield, and will provide for them a reward, great even beyond imagination or expression. Stella undatur, &c. St. Jerome, and many other interpreters, have endeavoured to please the Lord in all instances of duty, ] Tut a sollicitando diligentia justorum circiter id veritatis, ut Deo placamus; illi enim were justi positum, qui Deo curant placere (Stell. Eunlrrat. cap. 1, Lucem). This sense would indeed have been very proper, if the original reading was, ἀγαθὸν, ἀγαθὸν συμβαίνειν, as it seems to be the next word, τινες to the head; his, ἀγαθὸν, τινες, οἱ ἀγαθοί, τινες, Curta eorum poneat eis, as the Arabic renders. That of the Syriac, Cura eorum illorum in etiolo, may seem to favour either sense.

Ver. 16. Therefore shall they receive a glorious kingdom and a beautiful crown from the Lord's hand;) The Arabic reads, Diadema pulchritudinis, and the Syriac version more explicitly, Diadema honorosum operum. The Greek, τὸ διαδέματὸν τῆς εἰρηνῆς καὶ τὸ διαδέματον τῶν ἀθλητῶν' which manner of expression by the substantive is very beautiful. Instances of it are in scripture; as, Hab. ii. 4, 5, "the good man is a

Thus, i. 10, we have ἄγαθον γινεται for the "jealous car;" and ἀγαθον ὑποδεικνυομαι, a "mighty wind," v. 23. And in Luke xvii. 6, the "unrighteous servant, a beautiful Baxter," ὑποδεικνύομαι, James i. 23 (see more instances, John xvii. 12; James v. 15; 2 Thess. ii. 8.) This must be allowed to be a fine description of future happiness, of the times of the Lord's appearing, and of the judgments, and distinct. The New Testament, indeed, speaks of the righteous in heaven, under the idea and character of mighty kings and princes; and no wonder it is so expressed, when in the Old Testament, at least under the particular economy of Moses, we meet with no such explicit discovery of the happy and glorious state after death.

For with his right hand shall he cover them.] As by the organs of sense attributed to God, the knowledge of God is set forth; so by the organs or instruments of action is his power deepened, and most eminently by the hand: so that the hand of God, in scripture, means ordinarily the power of God; but the right hand being more active than the left, and its usual instrument to express the power of God; hence it is taken to indicate the exceeding abundance of the power of God. The sense of this passage is much the same with that of the psalmist; 'The righteous shall dwell under the shadow of the Almighty; he will cover them with his wings, and they shall be safe under his feathers; his faithfulness and truth shall be their shield and buckler' (Ps. xxiii.).

Ver. 17. He shall take to him his jealousy for complete armour;] I have before observed, that sin in scripture is often compared to spiritual adultery (see on ch. i. 10;) and so that the sense is, "That his jealousy, i. e. his enmity, justice, "will furnish him with complete armour." The Syriac version expresses this very fully. In gratiam isporum, in zelo sui arsbat omnia. The following description, which is made towards the end of the chapter, is full of the sublimest imagery: God is drawn in all that terrible glory with which the strongest imagination can paint him; his whole figure strikes us in the highest and most amazing manner: he is represented as completely armed with terror; we see his helmet, his breastplate, his invincible shield, his sharp sword, his thunderbolts, and in fine, his whole artillery of heaven. He is more dreadful than Mars moving to battle, while he commands the creation round him (for so I would render the κάθισμα in the following sentence, to execute his decreed vengeance on his enemies, and to determine the fate of guilty nations. In Moses' song, the Lord, or Jehovah, is represented, in like manner, as a fierce man of war (Exod. xv. 3); but the representation is more than a little less to be admired, where he says of God, "If a man will not turn, he will whet his sword; he hath bent his bow, and made it ready; he hath prepared for him the instruments of death, with his arrows against the persecutors" (Ps. vii. 12, 13).

Ver. 18. He shall put on righteousness as a breastplate.] The breastplate is known to cover the heart, which is the source of all the passions: hence this writer says, that God will arm himself with justice as with a breastplate, to imitate that he will do nothing out of mere passion, or by an absolute, uncontrolled power, without regard to the rules of equity; but that he will conduct all his proceedings and determinations, even against his enemies, according to the eternal rules of justice: and therefore it follows very properly, that he will put on a garment instead of a helmet; i. e. as a wise judge, whose infinite wisdom searches into the secrets of every crime and action, and who cannot be mistaken or imposed upon, he will give true and impartial judgment; and, as a just judge, he will observe a strict proportion between the crimes and the punishment. With great propriety therefore is true judgment here described as the breastplate of righteousness; for he can only be exceeded by that sublime description in the inspired writer upon the like occasion; 'He put on righteousness as a breastplate, and a helmet for salvation of vengeance for a cloth- ing, and was clad with zeal as with a cloak' (Isa. lix. 17). How much more amiable is the description of this writer, representing the garment of righteousness, than that of Jupiter in Homer, whose aegis, grimmcd terribly with the figures of horror, almight, and discord? 4 C

Ana true judgment instead of a helmet.] To which its place, or, to leads us to the next.

The learned editor of Philo Judaeus applies the epithet to εἰκόνα rather than εἰκών, and conjectures the true reading of this place to be, εἰκὼνες ἡμών ἔδωκεν τῷ Ἰσραήλ. The latter is the interpretation which he justifies by two parallel passages in Philo, where the same sentiment occurs. εἰκὼνες ἡμών δώκει τῷ Ἰσραήλ ἔχουσαν, and in another place, διδότως ἡμᾶς ἔκανεν ἐπὶ τῷ Ἰσραήλ. (Deut. v. 19.)

Ver. 19. He shall take holiness for an invincible shield.] St. Bernard observes upon this passage, that at the time when it was fulfilled, all such judgments as have been explained by our margin are not to be absolutely intolterable, that he will not suffer himself to be overcome by any arguments of pity that can be offered; nor can he possibly turn from the passage of the law. As the wicked have so long abused the riches of his goodness and long-suffering, his dignity calls upon him to do justice to his injured honour. And since this judgment or procedure is founded upon the supposition that, in all respects he is so irreproachable, that even the wicked themselves shall be convinced of the justice of their sentence; and while they experience the greatness of his power, shall acknowledge the justice of all his determinations, and that his equity is no less incomprehensible.

Ver. 20. His severe wrath shall be sharper for a wound.] The description in this and the following verses is agreeable to the language of scripture; for when God is mentioned as angry with the wicked, he is represented as standing consumed with hatred upon the earth, as ready to let fly; and with his sword not only drawn, but whetted, as if he was just about to strike (Ps. vi. 13).

And the world shall fight with him against the unrighteous. This is the same in effect with what is before expressed in the seventeenth verse, "He shall make the creature," i.e. the creation, "his weapon for the revenge of his enemies." Not that almighty God has any need of all, or any, of his creatures, to assist him in executing his vengeance; but he sometimes chooses to make use of them, as instruments of his wrath, to convince the unwise, i.e. the wicked, of their folly and danger, and therefore his wisdom purposely makes them by such creatures as they have abused, and makes the objects of their pleasures become the instruments of their punishment; "Your gods are become unprofitable unto you" (Hos. v. 11; Isa. i. 20, 21) or "The gods of your heart shall go abroad;" (Ps. cxli. 9.) "The arrows of the lightnings;" and so the Syriac version has it, ἡ ἀκούσματα τοῦ θυμοῦ, in every sense else. (Ver. 21.) Pittacus gives an agreeable explanation of this expression in every sense else. (Pitt.) This agrees with the word πτερνάα in Ps. cvi. 13; it is of the clouds in particular, that "they are made to do whatsoever he commandeth them upon the face of the whole earth, either for correction or for plenty." And of the treasures of snow and hail, the same writer observes, that they "are reserved by God against the time of trouble, against the day of war and battle." (Psa. xxxvi. 20.) In the song of Deborah it is said, that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." And indeed, God can make all the elements in their turns to conspire against the wicked: he can discomfit them with thirst and hunger, as the Lord did to the Israelites (Deut. xvi. 12), as Livy says to the Romans in the great battle at Cannae; or command the air to be his destroying angel: he can make the waters to rage and swell horribly (ver. 22), and to destroy the masts and rigging (ii. 23, 24), as the Deliverer can make them serve (ver. 21) with the purposes of his providence, and his flame shall burn up the ungodly; or, he can command the earth to open her mouth, and death shall come hastily upon them. (Ps. xxxi. 11.) But if such powerful instruments of destruction shall be so infallibly directed, as to execute his designed vengeance with an unerring certainty. An ingenious writer observes, "That compound epithets heighten the diction; and that even one of these is itself a short description" (Pope's Pref. to Homer, II. 16, 17). Thus St. Chrysostom is here the most judicious of all rightaiming; for can any thing convey a finer or more lively idea, than thunderbolts animated as it were, with sense, and discharging themselves with judgment and discretion, without any hand of man? And if so, the bolt not only grasped and levelled raphine ductern, but executing its fated compliment with such much certainty, as if the author were but the mere spectator; as his continuance justly commends Homer for having found out living words, "His hero's arrow is impotent to be on the wing, and his weapon thrusts to drink the blood of the enemy—σπόρας πιθάνουσας." And thus the Vulgate renders, A scene curvato aram seminat. To which the Syriac and Arabic are, מְעָבִיה, which is only a transposition. Coverdale's is more explicit than the rest, "Then shall the thunderbolts come out of the rainbow of the clouds to the place appointed by the Lord." (Psa. xxii. 20.) But the same word to guide us to the Vulgate, "a wound" above, is explained above. There is an expression in the Psalmist, with respect to God's vengeance, which, if rightly understood, is much to this purpose: "He (God) made a way to his indignation" (Psa. Ixxviii. 50, οὕτος εὐθέτησεν καὶ ἐγκατέστησεν, LXX. i.e. He directed his anger where, or to what quarter, it should fall: it does not mean in general only that God was angry, but that he had appointed a certain tract or path for his vengeance, which it must follow and pursue; the Latin version therefore expresses this with great judgment, Labravit seminat isae quae (see 2 Esdras xvi. 13). Isaiah describes the surprising massacre of the desolate army by the just vengeance of God in the like figurative way, and with a sublimity suitable to his grandeur, which the Vulgate thus expresses: Audiam faciem Domini gloriam vobis sem, et terrembrach sui ostendet in commutato foronis, et tiaman ignis deborannis; aliud in turbine et in lapide grandinis. A voco Domini pvehbit Assur, virgo persecuas; which the LXX. express very well by a holy and particular epithet: "The feet in view, he twanged his deadly bow. And missing fly the deaf'd fates below." (E. v. 55.)

Virgil has expressed the same sentiment:

"Ars centauro de sunt, cornua in unico nostro omnibus equitibus fama;" (Georg. iii. 15.)

"Arcum intendebat Apollo Deauna. Omnis ex terrae Egyipti et Indi.
Omnis Arabus, omnes vertebant sarga Sabei." (Ennius, v. 70.)

Ver. 23. And hailstones full of wrath shall be cast (it out of his hand) as the wrath of the Lord, a just vengeance of heaven, shall likewise come down upon the heads of his enemies, as in the days of Joshua, when God sent hailstones and lightnings from heaven in the faces of the enemies of his people, "and the earth was full of the confusion of Israel." And as in the preceding verse, the Senecan of this observation in such fury and vehemence, as if they were discharged by the force of some machine, which our version calls a stone bow, and among the Romans had the name of balista. The Vulgate, "the right hand of God;" or a petrifying arrow, "shall scatter the line of his great-grandnies: which is followed by Coverdale's, and Pagnine's intermediate version, and is indeed a close translation of the Greek. The Vulgate, 'that right hand' seems to me a conjecture, I think, by the help of a comma only, the sense might be rendered more complete in this manner, καὶ ο ἐκ θυμοῦ, ἔσθη τοι ἄγνωμον ᾠρίαν ἐκ παρελποῦντος, σκότος πυθήσεται ἐκ παρελπούντος ἀνθρώπων. Moreover, I am aware of an objection which may be urged, that the particle ὅς, or some such-like note of comparison, is here omitted; but, besides that he may, without any force, be fetched from the foregoing verse, instances of this ellipse are very frequent in scripture and profane writers. See Numb. ix. 3; Deut. xii. 6. Gen. xix. 9. Cant. iv. 15, in all which places this particle is omitted in the Hebrew, and supplied in the versions. Our translators, it is plain, understood this, and have inserted it, or have inserted it, with the translator, without having before, inserted any other, for in the original, the metaphor of inhabitants is frequently used to denote an enemy's falling on. Ezek. xxviii. 2. xxxi. 10. And the answer is, very grand, and terribly magnificent idea, and is but imperfectly compared with the volleys from the artillery of walls closely beset.

And the water of the sea shall rage against them, and the floods shall cruelly drown them; i. e. God shall take such vengeance of wicked nations, that their enemies shall come pouring upon them like a flood. Rain, showers, storms, floods, and seas, are all symbols of multitudes of men in motion and disorder; or else of armies ravaging and destroying countries: hence Servius has observed, that the sea in a storm, and people in confusion, are reciprocally compared to each other. Virginius tempertat populi mortu moumit comparat, Tullius populo tempestatem (Servius in Enoch, lib. 1.). In the inspired writings, many such metaphors are compared to the invasion of an army to the inundations of the sea, or a rapid river, which carries all before it. It is familiar with David particularly, to represent a flood, which is the image of his people, as coming in, to make their enemy's destruction, and to make the very instance of which is to be found in Ps. xlvii. (see also Isa. vii. 17. xvii. 22. Dan. ix. 26. xi. 22.) Ver. 23. A mighty wind shall stand up against them. This metaphor we may understand metaphorically denoted by winds; so here, by a most powerful blowing, vino, ενδειξη, is signified the storm of war, and the calamity attending it, which shall be brought upon them. The description of the fate of the wicked man, Job xxvi. 21, is so close and parallel to this, that I shall set it down at large: "Terries take hold of him as waters, a tempest scaleth his road: the whirlwind the east-wind, which uproots him, and he departeth and, as a storm, hurleth him out of his place:" The east-wind, which is mentioned particularly in this passage, being a very blasting wind, is most frequently used in scripture; and especially in the prophetical writings, to denote the calamities of war, and such-like wasting judgments. The prophet Jeremiah often applies this metaphor to those enemies and destroyers whom God makes use of as his instruments of vengeance; (see Jer. xi. 36. xiii. 1.) And in Ezekiel, the destruction of Jerusalem by the Chaldean army is foretold under the figures of storms and tempests. (Ezek. xxv. 1-7.) And so the east-wind is mentioned in the new Testament, when Paul, in his second voyage, desired that the ship were not driven to the leeward by this wind. (Acts xx. 15.) And he also plagued them with the locusts, which laid waste their whole land; and the waters of the Red sea at last cruelly drowned them. Calmat understands by ἡσαλέω, not "a mighty wind," as our version has it, but un vent envoyé par la puissance de Dieu. And the sense of a mighty wind may seem perhaps not so proper here, as it is compared immediately to κατωθῦναι, or a whirlwind. If we should understand this expression of the spirit of power, or the powerful breath or spirit of the Almighty, the vengeance of God expressed significantly, and displayed terribly, by the description of a whirlwind, the most simple and grasped idea as our imaginations are perhaps capable of. This seems confirmed by xli. 21, where there is the like expression.

And like a storm shall they blow them away! The translators do not seem here fully to have expressed the sense of the Greek word δακτοιον; it is a technical term, and means, the back of the wing, and so the back of the wind, by his floor," when the wicked, in the language of the psalmist, "shall be like the chaff which the wind scattereth away from the face of the earth." With a dreadful pomp is the wrath of God here displayed! How magnificently and nobly hath the writer of this book drawn the artillery of heaven, the rapidity of its motion, the terror of its effects, and the terrors of death and the eternal maw, in certain death attending it! What an assemblage of terrible ideas in a small compass! The earth, the sea, the rivers, the clouds, the winds, the heavens, like so many auxiliary forces, are all hasted, and conspire against the wicked. What a lively idea of God's infinite power over all his creatures does this! And this is the expression of the first part of the chapter most certainly be allowed to be a great instance of the hypotyposis, a figure well known to orators and poets.

This image shall be written the deep, and the earth shall stand "all the earth strictly," as the term universum, as the Arabic renders; and thus the old world, with its inhabitants, was destroyed by water for their iniquity; and thus, if I may express it, the Almighty's all-devouring wrath against sin, and against all ungodliness, and against all the works that are therein, shall at length be burnt up," for the same reason (Ps. ii. 6. 7. 10.) or we may understand this sentence, of judgments, to signify that it shall destroy all nations, and all their enemies. And thus the Syriac version explains it, Vastuubhiea toturn timorum impiorum; and Coverdale's translation takes it in the same sense: Thus the unrighteous dealings of the wicked shall bring all the land to a wilderness: it according to that observation of the psalmist, "A fruitful land maketh he barren, for the wickedness of those that dwell therein" (Ps. evii. 31.) And ill dealing shall overthrow the thrones of the mighty."

The truth of this observation cannot be better exemplified than in the fate of Nebuchadnezzar and Nebuchadreth. The latter prized himself in being called the great king, the ocean, by consequence, of the sea, the king of the land, and the lord of the earth, and the vanquisher of men and gods; this prince, so proud and naughty, God seems to despise as below an ox or an ass. He turns his face toward the west, he puts his hand in his nose, and a bridle in his mouth, and turns him back with disgrace and infamy, by the same way that he came triumphant and glorious (see Rollin on the Belles Lettres, vol. iii. p. 167.)

CHAPTER VI.

ARGUMENT. Having established the preference of wisdom or religion above vice and wickedness, the author proceeds upon princes and rulers, whom he addresses in the first chapter, the study and observance of it, as the means of ruling well; that, through a conceit and imagined privilege of their high station, they shall not be debarred of the advantage, or be able to live as the common Father of small and great, and will punish them proportionably to the great trust which they abuse. He concludes with a eulogium of wisdom, its general use to mankind, and the means of obtaining it.

Ver. 1. Hear therefore, ye kings. In Coverdale's translation, this chapter begins, "Wisdom is better than strength, and a man of understanding is more worth than one that is strong," which is copied almost word for word from the Hebrew. Calmat, which has been followed by all the learned, says, that Nahum meant by strong, powerful men, or else by iron, and then by the instrument, that is, the sword, which was used for those purposes, and the king, and the philosopher, and the people. Moller is saippiens quin viris, et vir prudens quin fortis: but it is not to be found in the Greek, nor in the Syriac or Arabic translations: it is so thought to be taken at Ps. lvii. 16, but more probably from the latter. However that be, or however true and useful the reflection may be, yet it is certainly quite out of place here; the context shows that the beginning of this chapter and the conclusion of the last, is really better without it; for if "all-dealing (or wickedness) shall overthrow the thrones of the mighty" (v. 29.) the advice here given to kings, to attend to good advice and to conduct themselves with religion and justice, is very serious and natural. From the great liberty here taken in giving advice and direction to persons in such high authority, some have inferred, that a king is the writer of this book: for who so proper to take this freedom with kings, as one of their own great rank, or who so able as the wise Solomon? But what foundation there is for this pretence, see in note to ch. ix. 7 of this book.

Ver. 3. For power is given you of the Lord. By the same original, says God, Prov. viii. 13. And to the same high original end, or concern, in that last clause, he very properly remarks, That the devil never more truly proved himself to be the father of lies, than when he said to our Saviour, concerning the kingdom of heaven, All mine authority is from above, and the glory of them, for that is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will, I give it. The hint here given to princes concerning the original of their power is a very important matter, and is for obedience to it, and for obedience only, that they may be able, not for their own pleasure or advantage, to gratify their pride, or to enable them to do acts of tyranny and oppression.
tion, but for the good of those who are under their charge;" (see Homily of Obedience to Magistrates). Cyrus has not only given in his own person a perfect model of the manner in which the kings were to conduct their offices; and he lays down excellent rules for the conduct of princes; Ura  με την αυτη την μορφη την ιεροτελειαν ευρεσεται, και τη συνελαβη διαταγην των επιπεδων ἄλλον, και τη συνελαβη διαταγην των κρατους των άλλων.* The king must be distinguished from his subjects by the splendour of riches, the pomp of equipage, or luxury of diet only, but by a superiority of merit of every kind, by an indesatable application to the welfare of his people, and this is a character, and the true use of their eminence and greatness, is being devoted to, and studious of, the public good (Cyr. lib. ii. c. 23.); "Si quippe suum vivendum hui omnis esse referenda ab ut qui praebat alii, ut ii, qui corum in imperio erant, sint quiaem beausiam" (Cic. epist. 1. lib. i. ad Quint. Fratr.). This has been assigned by critics as the reason why Herod calls his kings by such epithets as δαυετης, "born of the gods;" or δαυετης, "bred by the gods, v.z. to point out to themselves the offices they were ordained for; and to their reader, the reverence that should be paid them: expressions corresponding to those places of holy scripture where princes are called "gods, and the "sons of the most High" (Acts x. 36; xxi. 22). And the like reasoning will hold in proportion with the excellency of the ministers of state, generals of armies, governors of provinces, and ecclesiastical superiors, and all other persons in authority.

Ver. 4. Because, being ministers of his kingdom, you have not judged aright, nor kept the law. Both the Vulgate and St. Austin read, Nec custodes legem justitiae. The meaning is, that kings were sovereigns, in a much higher degree, as his ministers and vicegerents, you have acted as if you were absolute and uncontrollable, and accountable to none for your proceedings; ye have made your own will and passions the rule of your conduct; and have forgot that for this cause God raised you up to such an eminence above the rest of his creatures; that you might resemble the stars of their juster magnificence.

Tully's reproof of Verres upon this occasion, is very remarkable and fine, "Nuncup tibi venit in mentem, non tibi dicere fasces et secures, et tantum imperii vivi, tantumque eorum partes in urbe potestate, qui ministros rectitatem et reverentiam in se habuerunt tuorum reperietur. Tully's reproof of Verres upon this occasion, is very remarkable and fine, "Nuncup tibi venit in mentem, non tibi dicere fasces et secures, et tantum imperii vivi, tantumque eorum partes in urbe potestate, qui ministros rectitatem et reverentiam in se habuerunt tuorum reperietur. (Orat. 5). But nothing can exceed that charge of King Jehoshaphat to the judges which he set over the land, and ought to be considered as the urim and thummim of every public magistrate; "Take heed what you do, for ye judge not for men but for the Lord, who is with you in the judgment; wherefore, let the fear of the Lord be upon you, and take heed unto it, for there is no iniquity with the Lord our God, nor respect of persons, nor taking of gifts" (2 Chron. xix. 2). This is a command to be observed in every station and office of life.

Ver. 5. Horribly and speciously shall be come upon you: for a sharp judgment shall be to them that be in high places. Not that this sharp judgment shall come upon the mighty, and great, and illustrious, merely; but expression in this sense is too lax and rigorous, for there is no offence in the office, as such, nor would God raise any of his creatures to such an honour and dignity, as to be his vicegerents, and even to be called gods (Ps. lxxxiii. 6). In resemblance of him, if the office and elevated state itself was faulty or punishable: the meaning is, that, if kings and rulers pervert the order and original design of their in-situation, and act contrary to the established rules of justice, they will then not only be answerable for this abuse of power to him that entrusted them with it, but be punished in return to the inferior station and the weighty talents committed to them.

Ver. 6. *For mercy will soon pardon the meanest: i.e. God will sooner or more easily pardon a small fault or breach of duty in a private person, from whom so great a perfection is neither expected nor required, as having wanted perhaps opportunities of knowing his duty, and being less educated in religion, than in other persons of a transgression, being to himself, proceeding rather from ignorance than malice, and not attended with a train of bad consequences to others, will be less regarded: but the sins of kings and rulers will not with so much contempt be despised. *"Sed auctoritate, immensae et mortis, non in alio turpis exemplo; ut simile eorum exemplum, quod carissimae influentia, est fatalis through their eminence and authority, and the multitude of people led away by Moses to apprehend all the princes of the people, and the rulers of thousands and of hundreds, and other principal persons in their tribes, who had been guilty of foul idolatry, and "to hang them up before the Lord;" i.e. before the sanctuary, as men who had forsaken the worship of their God. And this was to be done openly, or again secretly, and all the people, when they saw persons of their distinction and authority made public examples of God's displeasure (Num. xxv. 5.): Th seriously the diapason of the symphonia mundi attinuit. The Vulgate and Symmachus understand it in like manner, and Selden De Synod. lib. ii. "Nor can we better (sayes Calmet) account for God's severity to David, Lord of his people, than according to the custom of the ancients, who, when they understood that they were to have a secret judgment, had a great opinion of the danger of their proceedings, much less to remind them of the danger of such steps. This writer therefore very artfully, as St. Bernard observes, assumes the borrowed character of Solomon, to give the greater weight to his reflections; as a king, superior to all others of the same rank in experience and wisdom, he assures them with the greater confidence, that he had lived in the midst of their trials, that they are out of the reach of danger, and have nothing to fear; their great eminence ought rather to possess them than affright them: it is much more difficult than to fill a huge post with sufficiency and credit, nor any thing so easy as to abuse it and miscarry. That God, though he has established them his vicegerents, and has not made them more perfect in righteousness than his own saints, he has still been to them as his creatures, and, from the nature of their trust, accountable in a greater degree. That if at any time they abuse their authority by notorious acts of violence and oppression, they must expect that God will display his own power by punishing them very remarkably, and make them as terrible instances of his vengeance, as many others of his creatures, whose sufferings are recorded both in sacred and profane history. This is finely illustrated in Is. x. 9, where all the ghosts of deceased tyrants, condemned to the infernal mansions, are represented as rising from their tombs to see and hear the king of Babylon, to meet the king of Babylon, and congratulating his arrival among them. Ver. 8, of this chapter, our author again adds, "A sore trial shall upon the mighty;" which is the very same sentiment, but is here to be considered as a tautology, but a repeated warning. It is observable, that all the ancient versions express this sore trial in stronger terms than our translation; the Vulgate reads, Potestatibus instat fortorum cruenta, which all the Old English versions follow; but the Arabic express it more terribly by the superlative, Potestate priditio rigidaordinum obtrectatum, and vos (or, yourselves) hanc adhuc multa in toto venerantur. And this sore trial or punishment will be more disagreeable and insupportable to princes, even upon account of their former delicate way of living, and their former absolute freedom from persecution. For the wants of ancient em-prising, are far more painful and vexatious to those that have been in high stations, and lived at ease, than those of an inferior rank, who have been insulted to hardships: hence we may imagine Lucifer, "the chief of the devils," as Mr. Mede calls him, to be more deeply affected with his sore punishment than any of the rest of his inferior accompany.

Ver. 7. For he which is Lord over all shall farewell no man's person, neither shall he stand in awe of any man's greatness: for he hath made the small and great, and also standeth for all, and either, and either, i.e. he is desirous that all should be saved, Lord over all. This verse is very much like the first verse of this chapter, and probability this was taken from it; "God accepteth not the person of persons, nor regardeth the rich more than the poor for they all are the works of his hands: he shall break in pieces mighty men without number, because they turned back from him, and would not consider any of his works." And the psalmist, "The Lord is loving unto every man, and his mercy is over all his works" (Ps. cxv. 9). As common Father of all, he is desirous that all should be saved, Lord over all.

Tu sic usus unumqueque nostrum, tantum solam eures, et sic omnes tantum anguiles: "God takes as much care of every particular person, as if each were all; and as much care of all, as if all were but one.' St. Cyprian has a sentiment upon this occasion so beautiful: 'Deus so omnibum, si quis periar, etiam omnium, ut sit omnia, a dominio sui, in anima sui, omnibus suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis suis sui translation seems to carry it still higher, understanding these words of wisdom, eternally existing with, or in God, before all creation, good creatures praiseth investigat: the author here endeavours to discover and set down the origin of wisdom, and its display in the productions and the pom- pence and boastings of the heathen sages, all whose phi- losophy is but of human invention, the work of a Socrates or a Pythagoras: but wisdom is not of so late a date, is more ancient than any of them, and too ant to be agitated with by all others observing the same method. The chapter concludes with a fine eulogium of wisdom, as essentially indispensable, as necessary and derivative to man, as a ray from his divinity. Calmet says, the first chapter of this book are as the preface to the work, which may be considered as an abridgment or paraphrase of the first nine chapters of the book of Proverbs (Psek. eur le Livre de la Sagesse). Ver. 5. I implore also am a mortal man, like to all.] As nothing is so great an enemy to instruction and improve- ment as pride, the author, intending to communicate the secrets of wisdom, and the method of obtaining it, begins with showing his own weakness, and what he is by nature and what by grace, whereby to deprecate his conceit and in- flame his gratitude: and to humble even kings, and take away all allucation of divinity, a notion which flattery is so easily excluded. But observe, the same word is used also to allude to the nature and majesty of the very beggars. Well, therefore, if we may cry out O demum- tion al tabius initius existiamntion ad superbian se- genios! The offspring of him that was first made of the earth.) Eusebius calls Adam ὁ πρῶτος γεννήτος (Præp. Evang. lib. xi.), and to this St. Paul may be thought to allude, when he says, that the first man is of the earth, earthy' (1 Cor. xv. 47): the derivation of homo, ab ἁμαρ, according to the etymo- logists, seems natural and proper, and the very name Adam denotes the same original. The Greek writers accordingly make use of the term γεννήτος, to denote the great anti- quity and unknown original of their first and earliest be- roes. But though all men thus resemble Adam in their origination, yet may his condition in this respect be consti- tuted down by various considerations. First, that in soul and body, quite different from the state here de- scribed of his posterity, who arrive slowly, progressively, and with difficulty, to the perfection of either. Philo has the same opinion respecting the same origin of mankind, as he expresses himself in this passage, 'Et nunc οἱ γεννήτοι, and says, that he far excelled all that came after him in the excellencies of soul and body; ἐπει δὴ τὸ γεννήτος ὁ πρῶτος πάθος τῆς ἀνθρώπου, ἐπαινεῖται ζωή, ψυκή τε καὶ σῶμα γεγενηθαυτοι ἀνετατο, καὶ ἐκείνο οὖν ἐνθολούμενον, κατὰ τὰ ἐξ ἐμφύος ἀντικείμενα (De Mundi Opificio). Ver. 2. Was fashioned to be flesh in the time of ten moons.) The Alexandrian MS. and all the other versions, make the comma after fœns, and join the rest to the next sentence. As to the precise time of "ten months," men- tions the exact time in which man was formed, and observes himself in like manner: Ovid, speaking of the year of Romulus, which consisted only of ten months, says, "Quod solis est utero matris durum proiectum esse. Et annus statutis temporalis esse satis." (Fast. lib. 1.). And Virgil is no less express: "Mali kinge dooculent fatisid sues males." (Begr. iv.) Upon which Servius makes this observation: "Mares de- cimo nono natae sunt mulieres, ut per centum men- tions the like time; he is particularly jealous in what follows: "Nam me illa in alvo mense gestavat deavum, At ego eam [Famesen] in alvo gesto plus annos deavem." (Plaut. in Siciis.) The like time is mentioned by Terence (Adelphi. act. ii. sc. 4), and Livy (ab urbe condita, lib. ii. cap. 120) calls the narration, or forty weeks, the ἐκ πλοίων ἀνάμια, ἐκ τῆς ἐνταγμένης ἀναμίας (De Mose. lib. ii). And Menander mention the same time as most usual, γὰρ ἐκ τῶν ἐν αὐτῇ ἄνθρωπος εἰσόδους. Hippocrates reckons this time in the tenth month, as most perfect and promising (lib. De Septentri. Parta). Theorices ac- cordingly believe in birth at this age (Hydai. 21). Being compared in blood,) Hyaios is σαμαριτην, St. Ber- nard expresses himself in the same manner, alluding, per- haps, to this very passage; Quod sum ego? Homo de humoribus vitiosis, quos terrae, qui sunt in corpore humano seminio concipitur: unde spuma illa coagulata, modo crescendo, caro facta est (Meditat. cap. 2). He occurs in the like sense, Job, x. 10, in the most correct editions of the LXX. and Pliny uses coagulum upon the like occasion. And the pleasure that came with sleep,) The modesty and reservedness of this writer are here too much admired; it is a resemblance of the great decree in the ancient world- days upon the like occasion. "Vos in the original, rendered sleep by our translators, here means conclusively: The Syrian version renders it: τό εἶναι τῆς ἐν αὐτῇ ἐσχάλτησεν (see note on that passage). And in this sense, I think, we may understand expression of Terence, "Inter- dum popiter dormias" (Eutych. act. ii. sc. 5.). We find-

from containing the true account of its creation; that the parallel is not a matter of style and language, but of respect likewise; that man, the lord of the creation, sprang from the dust, and is resolvable into it at God's pleasure; that his infinite wisdom is no less displayed to the beholder of the book than to Solomon in his wisdom or omnipotence in the act of creation; and in this latter sense I find the Vulgate understands this place, which renders dispositionem orbis terrarum, which seems rather to indicate the nature and condition of the world, its order and economy, the arrangement and union of its several parts, their wonderful correspondence, relation, harmony, and concordance to one another. But in either sense, divine wisdom is the best instructor; it shows us what this beauty and order first existed, who is the θεός κρίτης τού παρευρισκόντος (vii. 3), and the fountain of all perfection. Codd. read, "It is resolvable and not the subject of logism, to set forth the superiority of divine wisdom, and to advance it above the theology or philosophy of the heathen, else the vayre sagesse au dessus de la Philosophie des gentils" (Comment. in loc.).

Ver. 19. The beginning, ending, and midst of the times: the alterations of the turning of the sun, &c. Origen understands by times here, the most early, the future, and present times (Homil. 31. In Luc.): St. Ambrose reads root, instead of temporum, and explains the place, of things done in ancient times, of events to come to pass hereafter, and of things to be as they were done by God. About cap. 7: Groton understands it of the several seasons of the year, their beginning, concluding, and ending, and their successive and regular return, which is most agreeable to the Vulgate. Besides, the great parts of the world, that Solomon knew the greatest elongation or distance of the sun from the earth, and its nearest approach to it; the solstices, equinoctials, and other alterations which proceed from its course and motion through the celestial; as the change of the seasons, the vicissitudes of day and night, the succession of time, and the alteration of ages. As these phenomena succeed one another in the account of this writer, almost as regularly as they do in the heavens, it is surprising that the Vulgate here should translate vindem abbatia, morum mutationes, which is as if they were all in process of being. And translators have rightly judged in applying it to the sun, and, by attending to the sense of the context, have avoided the equivocality of the Greek.

Ver. 19. The circuits of years, and the positions of stars: Μνήμων εἴδωλος. By εἴδωλος in the plural number I would rather understand the cycles of years, the lunar and solar years, and the days of the week; that is, as it is agreeable to what is recorded of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 33), that he spoke of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes. And the account in the latter part of this verse, viz. his great skill in "the diversities of things living and creeping," answers to the former part of the place referred to, viz. that "he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall." It is obvious to observe that no language is so expressive to the understanding of the world, than the "reasonings of men." Origen reads, Spiritum violentiae, and understands the passage, of the power and violence of evil, as a general character of the world: for, in a sense there was no foundation for the tradition which he mentions of Solomon writing several books De Exorcismis (Homil. 21. In Luc.).

Ver. 20. The nature, lives of living creatures, and the furies of wild beasts: Calmet renders L'instant des bêtes, ou feared pender, "the temper, inclination, or instinct of beasts." This is agreeable to what is recorded of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 33), that he spake of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes. And the account in the latter part of this verse, viz. his great skill in "the diversities of things living and creeping," answers to the former part of the place referred to, viz. that "he spake of trees, from the cedar-tree that is in Lebanon, even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall." It is obvious to observe that no language is so expressive to the understanding of the world, than the "reasonings of men." Origen reads, Spiritum violentiae, and understands the passage, of the power and violence of evil, as a general character of the world: for, in a sense there was no foundation for the tradition which he mentions of Solomon writing several books De Exorcismis (Homil. 21. In Luc.).

Ver. 21. And all such things as are either secret or manifest, them I know: ὅσα σὲ ἑαυτῷ εἴρηκεν καὶ ἑαυτῷ λέειν, which is the reading in all the printed copies, and followed by the margin, οἵτινα δὲ οὐδὲν γεγράφη σὺν τῷ ἀναγράφῳ, is added by the editors; for where is the great wonder in Solomon's knowing things that are manifest; or what glory there is or excellency in any man to make such a discovery! the true reading undoubtedly is, ὅσα, which is confirmed by the Alexandrian MS., by Eusebius, Porphyr. Evang. lib. ii. Cap. 7, and by the Syriac, and is translated by the Septuagint. The Septuagint also translate, "They are manifest to me;" which means, says Calmet, en substance et en nature, but variously expressed, and in a more diversified manner. The thought is not very unlike that of St. Paul. "There are diversities of gifts, but the same spirit; and there are..."
diversities of administrations, but the same Lord; and there are diversifications of administration, and of the institution of the law, which are called spiritual and temporal. (2 Co. xii. 9.)

Ver. 24. The light of the world. And it is said, that 'the eye of the Lord is in every place, and he beholds all the sons of men.' (Ps. xl. 2.)

Ver. 25. "Assensio pedum cursuvert venos: Ilia vel irata secreci sumam volaret; Grumina, nec teneras currit, nec arte Aristas; Mundi secutae, sed catu suspenderem, Perret tur, celeres nec tingater equeplanta."

There is no bodily motion can be conceived to exceed this in quickness; but the spirit of wisdom being incorporeal, and, by reason of her purity not meeting with any sensible resistance or impediment, far surpasses it; nay, she is quicker than thought itself because she comprehends the infinite, and is not only present to man's thoughts, but prevents and influences them: "She meeteth them," as this writer elegantly expresses it. (Prov. iv. 23.) Elle went au devant d'eux dans tous les sens; elle éclaire, elle gouverne, et puissamment et powerfully acts upon the will to put such good thoughts and resolutions into practice. And this power she exerts in an instant, and carries her view through all things at the same time, which, perhaps is Fulgentius' meaning, when he translates this place, Attingat ubique proper suam mundum (De persona Christi, lib. ii.). In this sense wisdom may be said to be, Pernator universitatis; which short sentence of Seneca is more expressive than the many metaphysical circumlocutions of the schoolmen.

Ver. 25. "Vix et securam in carcerem inserat: Semperque siquidem vis, et in Tinas, si eleus tibi accipiantur, mentem, sed os aequare plantas." (Tertull., lib. vii.)

The like thought is to be met with in Philo, De Somnii, and Platon. "A pure influence flowing from the glory of the Almighty, a pure efflux or emanation issuing from God's glory; which is more agreeable to the Greek than to the influence, which our version uses. The Vulgate renders, Elsano duadrum claritatis, which the ancient English versions (see above) might have rendered. "A glorious emanation of the Deity." Some of the primitive writers express themselves in like manner concerning the Σάρων, whom they style ψυχή τοῦ κόσμου; we meet with the same idea in the Stoic, who renders it, ψυχή, 'the personating Shechinah of God.' (Tenison on Idol, p. 334.) And for the same reason he is called "the soul of the universe," and "the spiritual substance," by the ancient Jewish writers, because he truly reflected the glory of his person.

Ver. 26. "She is the brightness of the everlasting light;" i.e. Wisdom is an effulgence or ray streaming from the original, immediate, and immediate glory, and the reflection of its brightness. St. James accordingly styles God, from whom all wisdom and illuminating light proceeded, ἡ λόγος τοῦ φωτός (1. 17). It is observable that the word used by our author for brightness, is διαφανές, the very same that is made use of in the Epistle to the Hebrews (Heb. i. 3), and very properly rendered δεινολόγιον (see also Leigh's Critica Sacra in vocc διαφανές). This similitude of a ray from the sun, or light from light, must be allowed to be a fine illustration of a divine attribute, and properly represents the brightness of wisdom, God, considered as a divine attribute; and the same has been applied to illustrate the consubstantiality of the Σάρων. Thus Justin Martyr says, that he proceeds from the Father, as ψυχή φωτός, 'the light from the light,' and in another place, ὡς δὲ ἀληθής πυρ τῆς 'as fire from fire' ( Dial. cum Tryph.; and by the Nicene council he is considered as the intellectus of the Logos). And this similitude, though in all probability not such a fact, is here, or at least something of such a nature is here meant, or the Σάρων described by our author, shall be considered under the next words.

The unspotted mirror of the power of God, and the image of his glory. (2 Co. iii. 18.) The same things are said of the Logos according to Vatianus; i.e. she is the true and unsullied glass in which we may discern the beauty of God's works, which therefore reflects his power in the strongest and best light, and enables the perception of his goodness.

One cannot help observing, that, from ver. 21 to the end of the chapter, the epithets thicken, and that the character of wisdom, enfeebled in a very sublime style, a magnificence and grandeur of language, and in terms seemingly importing divinity itself. Hence some have taken occasion to imagine, that something more and higher is contained herein, than the highest notion of wisdom, or the highest denomination, as a divine attribute, and have applied therefore these passages to the person of the Σάρων, or to the Holy Spirit. And indeed it must be confessed, that however these things are contained, the Logos, as a proper accommodation, be so used and applied, and considered as expressive similis, to illustrate the eternal generation; nor is the Logos considered of Jesus Christ until ver. 3, which is very full and explicit on that occasion; and it must be further allowed, that these passages have been so understood and explained by most of the commentators, and even some of those who have disapproved of these considerations concerning the Σάρων, very much resembling these, and endeavour to explain that mystery by the very same similitudes and illustrations (see Justin Martyr, Dial. cum Tryph.; and the Nicene council. Tertull., Polyc. ad Martyr.; C. S. v. 67. 76.; Holstenius. Dissert. ii. 2, loc. quad. Concil. Nic., and Waterland's Sermon, passim). And some of the primitive writers, to confirm their point, have actually quoted and argued from these very passages (see particularly Fulgentius de Personae Christi, ad Trasmund. lib. ii.). Philo, who speaks the sentiments of the ancient Jews, and is by some thought the author of this book, from its great resemblance to many of his notions, has some expressions in relation to the Σάρων, very similar to these, De Contus. Lingus, and De Monarchia, which his other works, with much allowance, equally confirm.

But as this kind of reasoning, drawn from authorities, is precarious and inconclusive, and slender or suspicious proofs are only discernible to a cause; and as that great author, who is admitted to be very near the right way of the Σάρων, is sufficiently established by canonical and undoubted scripture, and wants not to be defended by any disputed text, let all those who make this objection to my former, I rather incline to the following sense, viz. That the writer of this book, who personates, and, as far as he can, imitates, Solomon, observing in the book of Proverbs, particularly ch. viii., how wisdom is praised under the character of a divine female, or celestial beauty, purveys the same figure or image in a more copious and encompassing way, using indifferently wisdom and the spirit of wisdom, as the same beautiful object, which he loved, and desired to make his spouse, &c. But though he speaks of her as an intelligent person, and personal acts are ascribed to her, yet this seems to be a figurative way of writing, taken, as I said, from Solomon's Proverbs. And if the well-known passages in the chapter above cited be severely allowed to be understood of the Σάρων (see Bishop Patrick's argument concerning the same, and nearly, though somewhat controversial), much less reason have we to assert these passages of the Book of Wisdom to belong to the Σάρων, or to the Holy Spirit, considered as persons in the midst of his people. For if this be supposed the case, then we are any (Hellenistic) Jew, or even from the pen of Solomon, such titles and attributes of the Divinity, if interpreted of the Σάρων, or the Holy Spirit, or both in close conjunction, whatever the nature of the objection, I am therefore more inclined to understand this high emanation of a divine attribute, the infinite wisdom of God, communicated sometimes, according to the exigence of the occasion, to his saints and prophets in different portions, as a drop from his fulness (ver. 27), and then there will be no occasion to suppose these passages to be an addition or interterpolation. Again, it must be remembered, that the words and expressions from the New Testament, which seems to be the sentiment of Grotius, with respect to many passages of this book; but how far his conjecture is right, and whether the prophecies contained in this book are to be determined. I shall only subjoin Calvin's remark upon this assertion, and answer in his words: "Grotius s'est impatienté dans le jugement qu'IL a precédemment donné sur les prophéties de l'Ancien Testament, et n'a pas eu le courage de prouver par une critique sévère et forte, que son opinion se justifie. En vérité, les passages objets de contestation sont si intermèdes dans le reste du sujet, et ont une telle nécessité relative à la contexte, que, sans pouvoir être séparés sans malentendre, on ne peut pas les enlever. « Les passages objets de contestation sont si intermèdes dans le reste du sujet, et ont une telle nécessité relative à la contexte, que, sans pouvoir être séparés sans malentendre, on ne peut pas les enlever. » E. e. S. is the author of all changes and spiritual renovations, though herself remains unchangeable; Toujour la même, c'est-à-dire toujours la même. See xxiv. 4, 14. St. Austin explains this renovation, and shows from whence it proceeds; De plenitudine ejus appacentis animas, ut bentis sint, et participaciones mancuis in se Sapientias te cernamur, etc. (Cic. De Fin.). Cap. XV. 2. The scripture furnishes us with many instances of her good offices and kindness to men in this particular; all graces are ministered to us by her, and she purifies the soul, to make it fit to receive them; she enlightens men's minds and enthusiastic spirit, and induces them to the knowledge of saving truths, dispenses and inclines their wills to virtuous and holy actions, and conforms them to the laws of righteousness and wisdom, to proceed under the greatest difficulties and discouragements. And though her communications are so various, and, with respect to all ages and nations, may be considered as in-nine, yet her nature continues unchangeable, What Plato says of God with a very remarkable emphasis, is very aplicable to her, o kion o phonos, o phylos a exhaleis ekeivos Ktistos (Plato in Phaed.).

And in all ages entering into holy souls, she maketh them friends of God, and prophets.) — Kara waw, which may be interpreted either of ages or nations; the Vulgar takes it in the latter sense. See Cic. De Fin. plains, xxii. 1. Philo de Mose, lib. x. ch. 30. De prophet. eorum, that he might feed Jacob his people and Israel his inheritance" (Ps. lxviii. 71, 72). The like may be said of Joseph, and the other instances of this truth, mentioned by this writer in the tenth and eleventh chapters; from whose history it appears, that divine wisdom, without any respect of persons, in every age and nation, makes choice of such as are well disposed, to confer their favours and blessings on, and sanctifies them, by her inhabitation and presence, for her own great purposes. True religion, indeed, seemed for some time as it were confined to Judea, and the Jews to have the highest advantage with saving truths in proportion to the greatness of his sufferings, he was favored with a greater degree of light, and larger communications of divine knowledge (see Lp. Sherlock, Diss. 24). The like may be observed of Balaam, who, according to scripture, " heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the Most High" (Num. xxiv. 10), which implies some disclosures, and the knowledge of divinity. He was an officer and foretold what should happen in the latter end; and particularly, he has left a very remarkable prophecy relating to the Messiah. We are sometimes surprised with uncommon events in the lives of extraordinary persons, and the several important truths therein scattered, seemingly above the reach of more unassisted reason, are enough to convince us, that divine wisdom has communicated itself in all ages, and conversed with her favourites in every generation. As to the gift of prophecy here mentioned, it must be certain, that the Hebrews did not consider it a part of the prophetic spiritual, which rendered him Habluc an ad prophete-ramundum, were inward piety, true wisdom, probity, and virt. ue. The realms universally agree in this, that the spirit of prophecy in his learned historian. To say nothing of other prophets, and no instance, says Maimonides (More Nevoe, par ii.), can be mentioned of its ever dwelling in a vicious person, unless he was rectified himself by the strictest and most se-paratory dispositions for obtaining it, he reckons the per-fecfion of virtuous qualities or manners, a heart purified and free from sinful affections and sensual passions. Hence he is said, "the souls of the wisest of men, are not master of the school-discipline, and fitted by religious nurture to become Candidi Prophetae (see Smith's Del. Disc. on Prophesy, chap. 5. 20). And the several schools of education at Nazish, with the currents of different sects, and colleges for disciplining and training up young scholars in those preparatory qualifications which might more dispose them for the gift of prophecy.

Ver. 29. For she is more beautiful than the sun—being compared with light, she is found before it.] This is true of wisdom, considered as a divine attribute, in many respects: By the sun is to be understood the system of inanimate bodies, are not fit to be opposed in value to the human mind or spirit; for the enlarged intellectual powers, and improved faculties of the mind, can arrive at the knowledge of Divine wisdom, and the perfection of virtue, without the light of the sun. But as the sun is greater in the sun, though a most glorious body, is utterly insensible, and has no consciousness of that light which he gives to other bodies; which is just the distinction between a created and a celestial nature. We have already observed the different names for the sun, and sun-gods in the East, but was considered, and exalted. How much more so, when she is still further purified and glorified, for a spiritual, and the sun's light is thus transformed, and all her charms, the whole world would be infinitely in love with her" (Cic. De Fin.).

Ver. 30. For after this cometh night.] That wisdom does no exceed the light, is manifest from this further argument, because night constantly succeeds the day, and there for the light is as constantly interrupted by darkness. But divine wisdom admits of no such privations or inequalities; it has no mixture of light and darkness, of good and evil, but is always the same, "yesterday, to-day, and for ever." St. Austin reasons in like manner upon the transitoriness of worldly things, and the imperfections of human knowledge, in opposition to the permanent and perfect system of God, that is more spacious and goodly, and more complete in all its parts, and in so many respects surpasseth the sun, even the sun of the universe, and can only be compared with him, and so the very words of our author: illum vero radium tenere non norn (Hornit. 21, ad Ep. Antonii). But see above, (Cic. De Fin., xxxv.), (Phil. iii. 19). If we attend only to what passes ordinarily in life, this observation may perhaps seem not to be altogether just or well grounded; for human wisdom, or the wisdom which God is pleased to manifest to men, is subject to many frailties; as “the bewitching of naughtiness” will obscure men’s reason, so the “wandering of concupiscence” will pervert and under-nerm it (iv. 10). Such as have been admired in all other
the book of wisdom

instances for their wisdom, have been hurried away by sin.
full possession of the understanding has been found a weak fence against a criminal passion. Solomon himself is a lamentable instance of this truth, who fell shamefully, notwithstanding his singular accomplishments; and his wisdom of which he was proud, his transgression and depravity.

We must understand this writer, therefore, of divine wisdom, which sin cannot approach, nor its contagion subduced. In Proverbs, chapter 8, Solomon, in a manner not intimately understood by the translators, thus speaks:
"Come, let us understand this place of adversity, and refer to Mat.
31, where ease, the term here used, is taken in that sense.
According to this acception the opposition is no less just and beautiful, for as prosperity in the sunshine of fortune, so adversity may be considered as its shade; in this view, the meaning is, that however dark the cloud may be, which hangs over a good man, yet still it is not overwhelming him; though it may deceive his immediate appearance, and beget a sense of inexpressible grief, yet shall it not get the better of him; : "We are troubled on every side (says St. Paul, speaking of himself and our fellow Christians), yet dispersed; we are persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down but not destroyed" (2 Cor. iv. 8).

And even in such a catastrophe, when vice is so triumphant and successful as to destroy good and virtue, we are not to take in the consideration of another life, the righteous, however afflicted or tormented, will be found to have come out conqueror.

argument.—The praise of wisdom is continued, which,
after a comparison of the most desirable things in life, is shown to be preferable to them, and, from an induction of several valuable and weighty particulars, she appears to take a pace above all others, and therefore is considered therefore, to be honoured and followed after by such as have the greatest regard to their own happiness. The chapter concludes with the proper dispositions to obtain wisdom.

ver. 1. Wisdom reacheth from one end to another mightily; ever her steps are enlarged, because her ways are divine; wisdom is infinite and immense, extends itself throughout the whole world, and does every thing in it mightily, that is, effectually, in respect of the end, and swifly, that is, with out any violence or difficulty, in the use of the means.
This is the sense of the Arabic version; Porrigit autem sese, ab terrae terrarum orbe ad extreumum usque integritate. St.
Bernard explains it in the same manner; Atingit a fine usque ad finem, i.e. a summa confluere ad inferiores pias termes; a maximo angelo usque ad minimum vernacularum, substantiali quidam et ubique presenti foritudine, quia utq ipse potest similem movet, ordinat, et administrat, suavitatis, i.e. sine necessitate aut difficultate (Bern. Lib.
De Grat. et lib. Arbitr. See also Fulgentius De Personae Christi, lib. ii.). But by swifly, we may further understand the spinning of the end, which is the end of the most minds; for she begins the great work of salvation in men's hearts, by overruling them through her motions and impressing, inclining them to their duty, and assisting them in the performance of it; then, when she has accomplished has so exactly perfected it, she conducts them to glory and a blessed end of their labours. But though she reaches from one end to the other of this important event, and acts powerfully upon the soul to bring it to pass; yet she does it swiftly, and without any violence or inconsistency with men's free agency; she encourages them by all the enabling methods, and in the most engaging manner, to their duty; and by this amiable mixture of sweetness, tempers and softens the yoke, which would otherwise be complained of as hard and rigorous. Some have understood these words of God's deference, or dignity, in respect of the effective rulers of the world, and by it he foresaw, from all eternity, all future events, even to the consummation of all things; so that, when the whole mystery of God's dispensations shall be finished and unravelled, it will appear, that nothing is contained in them but what God had formerly foretold and declared by his prophets (see Lowth's preface to his Commmentary on Isaiah and Jeremiah), so much of God's dore knowledge (xvi. 10), that " he declares the depth the from end the beginning;" an expression, it must be owned, is very unlike that of this writer. I shall only observe farther, that before it was first made, before the copies, is made the conclusion of the former chapter.

ver. 3. in that she is convertex with God, she magnified and increased [see note]. This is not in our version, but it appears, by a common confession, that in her original, en ce qu'elle est troistement anié à Dieu, says Cal-met. Vatablus very properly renders, Nobilitatem generis hujus quo illustrat, qui docuit mundi (Bouz.) which we have rendered in our version, " convertant with God," as that phrase is now commonly used, for it implies much more, viz., that wisdom, as a very young and virgin soul (as the word is, and the place principally), is intimately united with God, lives always in and with him, and is inseparable from him, as his spouse and partner; and thus sapientia is used ver. 9 see more in that note) than is possible in any other sense. De uter. however, takes it in this sense, "The unity of sentiments in the knowledge of God," "convertant with God," and accordingly interprets. l'union de ces sentiments et aussi l'union de la sagesse avec Dieu, "that agreement which is in the knowledge of God," as philosophers usually understand it. In this sense we may understand this passage of human or derivative wisdom, that this likewise shows her great worth, and singular excellence, in that God himself vouchsafes to communicate himself to, and conversate with, not in dreams, but with Joseph; not by an audible voice, as with St. Paul; but with the "still small voice," speaking to the soul, in breathings not to be uttered.

ver. 4. What is to be said of the knowledge of God.] The marginal reading is teacher, which agrees with the Vulgate, Doctrix enim est discipline Dei, and with Morsis εννοεις in the Greek; for Mors is a technical term, and, according to our的理解, has the meaning of cred mysteries. The sense here is, that divine wisdom can best teach the knowledge of God, reveal its mysteries, and initiate men into them, as knowing the deep things of God," and being in his bowels, cannot be taught by him, nor can he be taught by him.

And so the Syriac happily renders, ἡ ψευδὴς διδακτὴς, et à consilii eis.

ver. 5. What is in richer than wisdom, which worketh all things? Sapientia omnium rerum artifice, according to the Arabic; the Syriac and Arabic versions agree in this,
but the Greek word omnis means, from all origins.
But the meaning probably here is, that skill and wisdom make men successful and thriving in every business and calling, and are the most likely means to procure men reputation and respectability. "Riches and honour are with wisdom," says the true Solomon (Prov. xvii. 18), who could confirm this truth from his own plentiful experience of both, which God annexed to his gift of wisdom.
But we must observe at the same time of wisdom, that she teaches men rather the contempt, than an immediate and eager pursuit of riches; to be content with a little, and to esteem spiritual attainments, and the improvements of the soul, as their chiefest good, their truest riches.

ver. 6. And if prudence worketh. [Ec et sagesse travailli, see note. The idea is, that wisdom, or prudence, in the first instance of science, directs and perfects it. Instead of σιθος, which is the common reading, and followed by our translators, Dr. Grabe reads ἡσυχία, a more agreeable term to sagesse, from which we derive the word wisdom.
This is no matter of importance in this passage, as
in every instance of science, directs and perfects it.

ver. 7. Of prudence worketh. [Ec et sagesse travailli, see note. The idea is, that wisdom, the most accomplished, and, I may add, universal artist, and is therefore, with great propriety, called,
σιθος, which is the common reading, and followed by our translators, Dr. Grabe reads ἡσυχία, a more agreeable term to sagesse, from which we derive the word wisdom.
This is no matter of importance in this passage, as
in every instance of science, directs and perfects it.

ver. 8. To what end worketh, etc.] See Prolegom. cap. 4.
In the midst of the following passage, it is observed, "that prudence is admired and loved;
"the only objection with him is, that ἡσυχία is a poetical word, which will indeed have but little weight, if what that learned critic seems to mean be understood; this, or rather, the mean view of wisdom was originally written in metre. It is certain that has placed it among the metrical books, and in the Alexander MS. it preserves the appearance of verse, as well as the book of Proverbs in that MS. But, as Calmet also is of opinion, that it was written in metre (see his Dictionary in Vico Wisdom). However the learned may determine about this nicety, I still am of opinion, that Isaiah is not of the twelve, nor James, who is better known for his Specul., and that therefore without it is too general, and may be applied to any thing else as well as work, and for want of it the beauty of the next sentence is lost. The same is the case in in the Greek and Vulgate, where works of different sorts are mentioned;ποιμενις is the term used often upon the occasion.

"What is this" (οὐ δια τις κατωτροφιων; τις;) in the Vulgate, "Quis horum quae sunt magnis quibus illa est artifex?" which can neither relate to persons nor things, as different parts of a man's body do, like hands, arms, and feet; neither to the former, as our version takes it, for then the reading should be, Quis horum qui sunt, &c. not to the latter, as Coverdale's version and the Geneva bible have it, for then it should be. Ecuod horum quae sunt, &c. or something to that effect, and in the Greek. Τι των δερων; as in the verse foregoing it is, Τι ουλην ελευθερων. I think, therefore, the sense of this place has hitherto been mistaken, and that the true rendering of it, as it stands connected with the context in, "If wisdom is so good a worker as to work all things, who has a better claim, or is more likely to be the making of an infallible and perfect system of the very placing and structure of the Greek points out to us; it is likewise the meaning of the Vulgate quoted above, and probably the sense of the old translators. The same artifex quia est quis ipse? Messieurs du Port-Royal understand it of wisdom, as being the supreme directress and directress, by whom all things were made, Qui plus de part elle dost artet, avec lequel toutes choses ont ete faites! (see Rom. iv. 17.

Ver. 7. If a man love righteousness, her labour are virtues:"

This is obscurely expressed: the meaning is, that wisdom produces the several following virtues, or that they are her work; for the very end and scope of wisdom is, to make men just and virtuous, co-ordinate and resigned; and this so perfectly that no earthly work can be looked upon as curiosity, folly, or vanity. The pursuit therefore of wisdom, necessarily leads to the four cardinal virtues, as they are distinguished, which compose righteousness, considered in its largest sense; and the flowing virtues, or graces, are so many branches of it: for temperance teaches men moderation, and a restrained use of pleasures and the good things of the world; fortitude, how to bear and behave under the evils and afflictions of it; prudence is employed in finding out and making use of proper ways and means; and justice in a fair and impartial manner. Riches are essential, for they have a double connection in these terms, and are the means of wisdom, but it is not here."

Vet. 8. If a man desire much experience,"

The Vulgate renders more justly, Multitudinem scientiae, to which Coverdale's version agrees; "If a man desire much experience, knowledge:"

the Syriac is to the same effect, Si quis tempestadem uidentiam in uisum, which Vatablus also favours. The word experience, seems here improper and disagreeable to what follows; it is too abstract a term to express what is to come, nor foresee any future events; but wisdom can prognosticate what shall happen, can foresee the changes of weather, and foretell eclipses of the sun and moon. Wherefore this phrase is proper to the future, and by word of mouth, without committing their observations to writing".

"(In vit. Nicie."

Ver. 9. I purposed to take her to me to live with me;"

Εγενητο δε ουλην ελευθερων artifex, I purposed to take her to be my partner for life, to be my spouse," as is expressed ver. 2, for I understand ουλην ελευθερων in both places to express the bower or gallery of the bridegroom's house. What follows seems to confirm this acceptance, for she was to be to him his bosom counsellor, "beau daturam consilium," says Vatablus, one that would faithfully advise and direct him in all difficulties, comfort him tenderly in all afflictions, and kindly divide his cares and griefs with him; which is the description of a happy marriage. The marriage of Ruth, of which this seems to be a symbolic allusion, is a true marriage, but may also mean hearth and home, which is the true meaning of the word (pyilis-) and if so it is an eminently true of the real Solomon, as appears by that distinguishing judgment which he showed in the case of the two contending harlots, when by a nice decision he brought to light which was fair, and which was not.

"The firmament also found a way to come at even the bottom of the earth, and to unravel its most secret intentions; for, by an appearance of severity only, without any violence to the patient or the child, nature herself at once declared, by the motions and sentiments of either tenderness or indifference, which were then visible without disguise, which was the counterfeit, and which the real, mother; upon which the text adds, "That all Israel heard of the judgment, which the king had judged; and they feared the king, for they saw that the wisdom of God was in him, to do judgment" (1 Kings ii. 25.

Ver. 10. If I talk much, they shall lay their hand upon their mouth."

It is a proverbial expression, and implies silence in all occasions. It is well expressed, it dixit compescere legendum; accordingly Harpocrates, by the ancients feigned to be the god of silence, is pictured with his finger on his mouth, to recommend, by this expressive gesture, either a well-timed silence, or at least a discreet government of the tongue (see Stephan. Dict. Histor. in voce.

Ver. 15. I shall be found good among the multitude, and valiant in war."

We have here the two essential qualities to constitute a complete prince, goodness in the care and management of his own people, and valor to head them and protect them against their enemies. Great is said to have studied much, and repeated often, that fine maxim of Homer, which the expression of this writer very much resembles, and is worthy indeed of the true Solomon: "Αειριται βασιλεύς ὁ ὠδόμενος, καταφέρει τί σκεφτώς, Virgil has happily expressed the same thought in the following line:

Where both these celebrated poets agree with our author, by experience of a prince, a knowledge of his own people, and clemency to his own subjects, and in martial courage to reduce an insulting enemy; in being amiable to the one, and terrible to the other. That even an allusion to the distribution of wages, a prince is only so far great, as he is tender and careful of his subjects: nor should he think of his power but with a view to do good, and, in imitation of the title of the character, be "very great, to be optimus maximus, like Jupiter, from whom he derives his power. Seneca has an observation to the same purpose."

"Proximus Dia locum invenit, qui se Deorum naturam pretiis; hoc affectare, hoc inimici dete, maximum ista habere, ut optimus similis habearet" (Senec. lib. i. De Clem. cap. 19). But, upon the comparison, a prince would prefer the amiable name of Pater Patriae, or Paternus, of his country, to all the pompous titles and apppellations which victory and triumph can heap upon him, and not so much to aim at his own glory, or the enlargement of his dominions through foreign conquests, as to be found merciful, and labour to make them happy; for the trophies of even a successful war are not so much to be coveted, as the blessings of a settled peace; nor the conquest of foreign nations, as the love, preservation, and good order of his own people.

Δεδυναμως δεσποτης, i. e. Riches which are durable, and fade not like the raiment of the rich, but are derived from the earth, and the Vulgate is to the same effect. Calmet understands it of riches, qui ne manquet jamais. And that this is the true rendering, appears from the like expression upon the winepress of the vine, where we have the same subject, and the same words, carne animo, which our translators rightly there render, "A treasure that never faileth." The expression in our version seems rather to denote the quantity than the quality of the riches, and it is commonly understood to be senseless.
passage is, that true wisdom, which is from above, and makes the soul, as Plato says, a true soul, which fadeth not away, together with that glory, satisfaction, and pleasure, which preferment, honour, and wealth, the rewards of other studies, are only exist reminiscences of. For the wisest life, and of this access to God, that it will not only forward our admission into heaven, but accompany us thither: St Jerome therefore well advises, Discamundis in terris, quandam nosis scientia perseveretur in celo (Epist. in. 1, cap. 7).

Ver. 19. For I was a witty child, and had a good spirit.] Eius enim eschivo, Ψυχή σε διαμόρφωσε. Εἰσίν αὐτοῖς to be born. And this expression is applied to that which is by nature, i.e. I was naturally well disposed towards wisdom, and of a good capacity, had a quickness of parts and readiness of apprehension, and a soul more susceptible of instruction than the common, capable of not only natural talents and endowments. That all souls are not equal to their disposition, nor equally capable of, or inclined to, wisdom, is the sentiment of most writers; particularly St. Austin says, Alii habi, ali laudabili ingenii, or at intelligentissimo quodammodo plumbici, ali obliviosi, ali sciti memores nascuntur, ali utroque manere predict (Aug. lib. de Fin.). But I rather choose to understand this of moral dispositions, and of the inclination of the soul to goodness. But Philo's notion comes nearest our author, who acknowledges two sorts or species of souls, placed in the beginning of the world, antecedently to the antethese and into inhabitants; of the latter, some apply themselves to sublime and useful knowledge, which, even after the death of the body, they continue to pursue, to prepare themselves for the future state, i.e. to be confirmed by the weight of the flesh, neglect the care and study of wisdom, are intent upon riches and vanity, and attend what is vile and contemptible and incorruptible (De Gigantibus).

Our author also says, it is a great good fortune to have a soul well inclined, and of the better sort, with the addition of happiness of its being joined to a body properly adapted to it, our good fortune is further observed upon Diavou, which the Vulgate renders sortitus sum, that "it intimates that he received his good spirit or disposition as it were by accident, by the free disposal of God, the disposition of his body, prepared and guarded against the least surmise of any precedent merit, ad antecedentum suspicionem precedentium merito sortum non sit accedit (De Gen. ad Lat. lib. x. cap. 18)."

How just this remark is, is granted, and who, or at this time intended such a sense, the learned will determine.

Ver. 20. Yea, rather, being good, I came into a body unadorned. I pass over the opinion of the Pharselics particularly, who they are thought to have borrowed from the Platonic (Joseph, De Bell. Jud. lib. i. cap. 12). Philo, who, upon occasions, speaks the sentiments of the ancient Jews, favours this notion in many places (De Confus. Linguarum, De Gigantibus, De Abraham); but he is most express in the following passage: Τάκειον τόν ψυχήν, από μέν εκείνου δύναμαι εἰς ἄνθρωπον, διά τῆς ἀληθινῆς φύσεως ἀλλάδιαν ἀλλὰ διά τῆς φθέγγης. ἐστίν οὖν τὸν ἀληθινὸν αὐτοῦ τοῦ ἄνθρωπου τελευατήρα, τερίαντος κορμόν (De Somnii). To this notion that of our Savour's disciples is generally thought to refer (Mat. 13.17). Did this be the man sin, or his parents, that he was born blind? And some enter upon the same sense, the same, Phil. i. 23, and 4 καὶ τῆς ἄμεσως ἀληθείας, 2 Tim. iv. 6, but without, even though we should understand the word to stand for the sense of return, rather than departure, does not countenance the notion of a pre-existence, as it is commonly understood. It is further objected against this passage, that it is far more natural to suppose the Greek word ἀληθεία in its proper signification, to suppose the body of any descendant of Adam to be pure, untainted, or undefined, as is here asserted, nor any soul to enter into an earthly vehicle, that is entirely clean and perfect, and altogether free from any original leaven: Nemo de usu carnis eventus in Carolino modestius. The passage (Phil. 1.23) means, that the word alithia is used in a parenthesis, as indeed they ought to be; and then the true sense of this passage will be clearer, and the connexion more visible; for the meaning will then plainly be,—I went about he made God to be in the beginning of his reign, that some from hence have been induced to write this book to him. Calvin says this prayer is continued from the beginning of the prayer to the end of the chapter, that the book itself was never finished, or at least that the conclusion of it is lost; for the author does not conclude his prayer, as it is natural to conclude he should have finished the same. Ver. 1. O God of my fathers. It is very observable that Solomon, or rather this writer under that borrowed character, begins his prayer with great humility, and a religious spirit of meekness; he beseeches God to hear him, not for his own merit, but for the merits of his fathers; for he beseeches, for Abraham and David his fathers' sake. He builds all his hopes upon the pure goodness of God, as knowing that humility is an essential in prayer, and the most likely means of success.

Lord of mercy, who hast made all things with thy word.] γεγραπτόν το εἰκόνα. All the editions which retain this phrase, which may as well be rendered, have the ηλέθαντα corrupt reading; the true one probably, instead of ηλέθαντα, may be ἡγεμόνας το εἰκόνα, καὶ μεταφρασίαν, ὀν χριστόν, ἡ γαρ πτολέμαων, ἀλλά χριστόν λεγεται. The efficacy of prayer, was what the heathens themselves greatly depended upon in most of their religious transactions. It has been observed by critics, that Homer hardly ever makes his heroes succeed, unless they have first offered a prayer to heaven. The ancients, therefore, were not so careless as to undertake a voyage, or whatever they enterprise, they almost always supplicate some god; and whenever we find this omitted, we may expect some adversity to befall them in the course of the story. We must likewise mention it to their honour, that they prayed to, and thanked the gods, for the advantages of riches, honour, and health; but I cannot find, that the heathens ever acknowledged God for the advantage of life itself, in the state of the heathen world, of which it is said in the Gotta, In Tullii, Nam quis, quod vir bonus esset, gratias dis eget quum I Jove Nominet Optimum Maximum appellant, nuptias nos, filias, tanta est David, salus, incolae, opulentos, capillares. Nocte Hercule quasquam vetit quum unam, si sapiencs factus esset (De Natura Deorum, lib. in.). How much finer is this writer's description of God. When the ancients met together, they prayed; nor do I much more desirously be admired for referring wisdom so justly to its true original, and acquainting us with its divine extraction! Herein our author agrees with the scripture account of the original of wisdom, which assures us, that it is he who 'giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not, and commandeth the light to shine out of darkness,' that must, in this case more particularly, 'shine in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God.' I shall shut up this chapter, with an apposite and fine reflection of Messiahs de Port-Royal, in their commentary on this Psalm. Let us consider, that though we may have this knowledge, that wisdom and all perfection come from God, which may be called the knowledge of the truly human life, we make of all things, because they are sense of that they know nothing: they can do all things, because they are convinced, that, of themselves, they can do nothing. We ought, therefore, to put up often to God that excellent prayer of St. Austin, not very unlike the beginning of this, Da mibi, Domine, grantam tuam, qui potestem omnium immissus, qui sibi per illam consensu sit immortalis eum."
Ver. 7. Than hast chosen me to be a king of thy people. Melchior Canus and Sixtus Senensis lay great stress upon this passage, to prove Solomon the writer of this book; but their way of proving it will now be made to appear, for it is bare of reason, the more assuming the person of another, shall be thought sufficient to establish this point, then the Apostle Canus may for the same reason be pronounced canonic. Note, If men will feign instances of this kind, they dare worse and more blantly; and yet notwithstanding this assertion, and though the title itself seemingly bespeaks them to be the authors, they are now generally decried and disbelieved by some of the Romanists themselves (see Rainold's Cens. Libr. Apoc. Prol. 19). It is most probable this passage of our author is spoken προφήτης, i.e. by a feigned prophet, who should not be mistaken for any orator of the kind; from the speaker, and to give the greater weight to what is delivered. Upon this occasion, no character was so proper to be assumed as that of Solomon, who himself was a king and established the temple; but judgment was found necessary; because instruction offered and inculcated under such great a name, would be more regarded and attended to by persons of the same high rank and authority. Such a rhetorical artifice we often meet with in the books of oratory; thus Tully sometimes argues under the person of Cato the elder, "Omne sermonem tributum Catoni Sen., quo nullem probo, inepto magno responsum occurrat; he in the same place says: but in this passage it is more certain than plain, the point is the case, that Isocrates inscribes a whole oration. Nicocles, and speaks in the person of that king, as if he really was the author, to give the greater sanction, and procure much more attention for any other work he has inscribed from that name or title, supposes it to belong to Nicocles, or that it was anything else but an ingenuous fiction of Isocrates. The ancients (says Calmet) do often call their works by any other names than their own. It is observed in speaking of Plato: thus Plato has given to his dialogues the names of Socrates, Timæus, Protagoras, &c. And Cicero, in the same manner; for he has often put some of his own names under another to that of Horace. Xenophon styles the history in which he has drawn the model of a complete prince, Cyrus, as being the principal person or character in it; but now he is introduced as an orator, and speaks in the name of persons whose names bear him, for it is agreed on all hands, that Plato, Cicero, Xenophon, were the true authors who composed those pieces under figured names" (Dissert. sur l'auth. des logiques). And thus another place where the same learned writer gives the reason for this artifice and invention: "It may be considered as a prospoppeia, as a sort of device wherein a person, to give more weight to what is delivered, speaks in the same name, and assumes the person of some other more ancient. The scripture has some instances of this sort, as that artful fiction of the widow of Tekoa, 2 Sam. xiv., to incline David to thw house of Benjamin; and that of the prophet, 1 Kings xx, 35, to rebuke Ahia: and that of Nathan, reproving David by that significant and fine parable of the ewe-lamb, 2 Sam. xii. And thus this artifice is used in the New Testament, where it is said, Acts viii. 25, to speak, making their discourses more lively and more affecting" (Prat. sur le Livre de la Sagesse).

Ver. 8. For the holy place, which thou hast prepared from the beginning, i.e. Upon the model, says Calmet, of the tabernacle, which Moses, by God's direction, erected for the people in the wilderness; and the temple was a true resemblance of it in all respects; only what was small and as it were in miniature in the one, was inconceivably grand and magnificent in the other; but the disposition in both was nearly the same, and framed according to the pattern which God at first exhibited in the mount, Exod. xxv. 40. The Arabic version understands it in the same sense, Stilme tabernaculo sancto, cujus delineamentum ad mox promissit. But Græcia, and other writers, understand the whole temple to be meant, for the temple was a resemblance of heaven itself, prepared by God for the beginning of the righteous. And indeed the Jews understand it thus, in the same notion, for they fancied three heavens, and the third or highest heaven to be the habitation of God, and of the blessed angels; and to this distinction they imagine the altarum, sanctuarium, and sanctum sanctorum under the same signification, the temple corresponding to the encumbrance of the twelve tribes about the tabernacle, they fancied likewise to be a representation of the angels and blessed angels; the temple of God, Philip was the same sentiment in several places, and St. John the lib. iii. ver. 7. No wonder therefore that this writer, from the great analogy and agreement which the Jews supposed betwixt the temple of God and the blessed angels, in which the temple, in which the altarum, sanctuarium, the resemblance or image of heaven itself, prepared by God from everlasting. This is the language of an inspired pen, even the writer to the Hebrews, who, speaking (viii. 5), of the tabernacle, calls it the emblem and pattern of heavenly things; and (ix. 24), he calls "the holy place" the "tabernacle" of God; and whether we take it of the temple of Solomon, or of the tabernacle of Moses, as the case may be, we are here to understand, whether of the heavenly or earthly temple, which St. Paul found necessary after prophētēmenōn. I would therefore carry these words forward to the beginning of the next verse, and read δεῖ τις Βιβλία ἐν Ορθοδόξω και Βαπτιστικώς ὑποθέσεις: "As to that which was written before, and to the prophecy of Isaiah of the appearance of the Saviour, and to the great events, to the resurrection of the dead, and to the perpetual existence of the whole creation, it may not be amiss to observe upon the Greek reading of this passage, viz. ἡ γῆ ἀναπτύγχανεν, τινα ἐκ γεννημάτων, that however the passage itself be understood, whether of the heavenly or earthly temple, which St. Paul found necessary after prophētēmenōn, I would therefore carry these words forward to the beginning of the next verse, and read δεῖ τις Βιβλία ἐν Ορθοδόξω και Βαπτιστικώς ὑποθέσεις:

Ver. 13. For what man is he that can know the counsel of God? or who can think what the will of the Lord is? From this passage some confidently affirm St. Paul borrowed this doctrine of Anaxagoras; and that the soul does not originate Romans, and therefore they would infer this book to be canonical. But this is a groundless pretence: for, first, we do not perceive in any part of the New Testament, this, or any doctrine which would entitle this work to be canonical; secondly, it does not follow by any necessary consequence, that such sentences in scripture as are like and parallel to some others in apocryphal or ecclesiastical writings, were necessarily a part of the holy scripture; how frequent is it that scripture is in use, and common, than for different authors to hit upon and agree in the same moral maxims, without having read or ever seen the words of such authors. We have frequent passages in the Old Testament which are said to be taken out of the book of Wisdom; or Ecclesiastics, occur in some part of those books which are confessedly canonical; and particularly this passage of St. Paul is in the same terms, or to the same effect, Isa. xi. 13, 14, where the words are, "Who hath directed the Spirit of the Lord, or being his counsellor, hath taught him? With whom took he counsel, and who instructed him and taught him the knowledge of the ancient?" and then the place of the prophet in view is the opinion of many learned men (Tertull. cont. Marc. lib. v. Basil de Sp. Sacr. cap. 5. Du Pinæ Hist. Can.). Fourthly, supposing St. Paul does actually refer to this passage in the book of Wisdom, does not the same St. Paul confessly quote the heathen poets, and some ancient apocryphal book, for the story of James and Judas (see Acts xiii. 26). This is the same method that was used in the Old Testament, in the history of the Shechinah, or Jehovah, who was the same God of the Old Testament, and is called Jehovah, as the Jehovah of the New Testament, or Yahweh; and in the books of Macabees, where occur ancient ceremonies, and ideas of the Shechinah, or Jehovah, in the Old Testament. Thus in the book of Daniel, where we find the vision of the Shechinah, described in a most peculiar manner, Daniel x, 12, and the Jews, as we have already shown, are of opinion, that Daniel's vision is taken out of the Book of Enoch" (Prefat. sur le Livre de la Sagesse).
which was always drawing down the soul into terrestrial and material things, was not more properly the property of souls than of bodies. Dis. p. 44. 4. There is a thought not unlike this in Philo, which he seems to have taken from Plato, in Cratyl. est γὰρ εἶναι τὸν φύσιν ἀπετέλεσμα (ἐκ τῶν ἀναστατωμάτων τῆς καθολικῆς τιμής). The Pythagoreans looked upon the body as no better than the prison of the soul, τὴν κακὴν κατασκευὴν, as Philo expressly calls it (De Migrat. Abrab.). And to this agrees that of Socrates, as it appears in Book ii. of Xenophon's Vindicta: τὸν χάλκην ἄρα, ἢ τὸν χαλκικόν ἄρα, εἰς ἑαυτὸν τὸν πνεύματος, ἢ ἑαυτὸν τὸν κοινότατος τῆς καθολικῆς τιμῆς.

In the same contemplative manner the sages and martyrs speak of the flesh, calling it the chain and burden of the spirit; hence we find them praying and longings with St. Paul, to be dis- solved and set at liberty from it, as soon as God pleased (Theophil. in Luc. ii. Arnob. adv. Gent. lib. ii. Marc. Anton. lib. in Ambrosio de Bon. Martius.). This state of human imperfection is finely represented (says St. Austin) by that woman which had a spirit of infirmity eighteen years, Luke xiii. 11, 'and was bowed together, and could in no wise lift up her head, because she was deformed,' just as is expressed by Valerius, a corporis uania, tanquam e carceri, evolverunt: vere vasa dictur vitae, mortis est (Somm. Sup. cap. 3). Xenophon introduces Cyrus, speaking of his vices (H. vii. 22): 'and in his children, I could never think that the soul, while in a mortal body, lives, and when departed out of it, dies, or that its consciousness is lost, when it is discharges out of an uncleanse habitations, but that it then enters in, when it is freed from all corporeal alliance.' And this, we may consider, is of the same import with that of the Pythagoreans, that the art of life is to consist in that kind of contemplation, or rising above corporeal business, which the ancients esteemed a part of the exercise of the soul.

Ver. 1. She preserved the first formed father of the world, that was created alone.] Most probably it was created by a true and proper creation, and that all others, as being descended from him, were formed out of him, as from a pre-existing principle. Or does it mean that the first formed father was created from nothing? This cannot be the sense, as the works of the former days, and even the serpent among the rest, were consented before him; or are we to understand this of the creation of Adam before the existence of Eve, or any of the human species? But is not as much implied in his being called here πρωτοκλῆος, and τυχόν ὁμόσε, Or is it usual to express one and the same thing by two different words? (Aug. Against the Manichees.) We are to consider, that the true reading here is, μόνον ρησίστα, and not μόνον κρατείτω, as all the copies have it, which mistake might easily happen from the likeness of affinities of the sound: i. e. wisdom preserved Adam free from all harm and danger, when he was placed alone and by himself in Paradise; see Gen. ii. 8, where the LXX. read, ἐπήρεωσεν και ὤς ὁ πρωτοκλῆος, καὶ ὡς ἄνω ὁ ὁμόςε, Nor am I quite singular in this interpretation: Tiri- nus expounds the passage in the same manner, Quadrani solus fuit, nec id consortie solicitus ad matern (see Comm. in loc.).

And brought him out of his fall.] It was wisdom which preserved Adam in Paradise when alone, and, after his fall, by particular grace vouchsafed to him, produced in him humiliation and repentence, propriojetiis mortification, and, by his trans-gression: he was sensible upon his expulsion from Paradise, that all that and train of evils and miseries which he saw entering into the world, and now are natural and hereditary to the whole species, and were such punishments brought into it, and imposed upon his posterity, purely on his own account; he considered the growing wickedness of the world, as introduced and occasioned by him; and he considered the mortality of his descendants, their frequent, and often violent deaths, as the consequence of his sin. These reflections, arising from his ingratitude to God, and his afflic- tions concern for his unhappy race, sunk so deep into the mind of the first-formed father of the world, that during the nine hundred and thirty years which he lived upon earth after his fall, he continued under such a lively sense of sin, and God's just displeasure, as he became an humble and remarkable penitent. This penitence, or recovery of our first parents from their fall, which seems here referred to, has, by some of the fathers, been represented as the effect of the grace of the second Adam, to whom the glory of being the deliverer of the first was justly due, and been maintained by the church in the most early times as a catholic truth. Jeremiah also was lived at the end of the first century, by some, as an antichrist. It was reckons it accordingly (lib. i. cap. 31) among the heresies of Tainian, that he held, that Adam and Eve were not saved: "For, (says that father, as concerning the apostate spirit, who, by his subtily, had taken their..." out of God's hands." (Gen. iii. 19). How St. Paul have said, 28), 1st, And he 2. "So speak our father penitent, nor Eve 3. "He that eat or drink, or shall beget, is propagated curse. 4. "It voice once heard 5. "I do not, therefore, here and now multiply 6. "New death to hear: for what can I increase, or multiply; but curses on my head. 7. "What need, but feeling now the 8. "The evil on him brought by me, wilt curse My name be an ancient imperie, 9. For this we may thank Adam." (Book 2).

Which concludes with Adam's seeking peace and forgiveness of God, whom he had offended, by supplication and repentance.—

"So give him power to rule all things." Before his fall, God gave to Adam the dominion over the creation (Gen. i. 27). In the perfect state of things, or the continual state of perfection which Moses supposes is what is there wanting, and accustomed us with the opinion of those of his time, with respect to this very important in the following:

Ver. 2. And gave him power to rule all things. Before his fall, God gave to Adam the dominion over the creation (Gen. i. 27). In the perfect state of things, or the continual state of perfection which Moses supposes is what is there wanting, and accustomed us with the opinion of those of his time, with respect to this very important in the following:

Ver. 3. When the unrighteous went away from her. It is vain to expect more from human nature, than what is contained in the following:

"Then was Cain. Shall we suppose, then, that the deluge happened purely upon his account, or was occasioned by the sin of his father? No, it is quite the contrary; it would be absurd to suppose that God would make an exception to his own works, and punish only one among so many millions of people. This passage, then, and the whole of the following, must be understood as referring to the descendants of Cain: for in the antediluvian world there was no other account of the deluge. Of the number of persons, probably a whole fraternity or kindred that perished on that account. It remains then to inquire, what wicked and unhappy persons are here meant in particular. Of the numerous and various opinions, which have been given on this passage, I shall not enter into a detail, because they are as many as there are persons who meditate upon the subject. But I shall give a few hints, and the rest will be easy to see. The first, and most probable, is that the men of this first world, especially the descendants of Cain, had, in imitation of him, and by the evil influence of his example, taken great and unwarrantable liberties in oppressing the innocent and weak; and that the punishment, the deluge itself, was inflicted upon them. The second is, that these seem to be the persons whom this writer for their unnatural and bloody temper, styles abominem Spiritus, for whose sake, and upon account of whose violence and blood-shedding, the deluge really happened. Hence then I am induced to offer a conjecture, that the true reading of the next verse is not εκ ἄνδρος, but of ἄνδρος, and most probably the copy which Origen made, or read so, for the expression of which, Hance ob causam diluvium fit, ut debitum Cain semen, that God's purpose in bringing the deluge was, to extinguishe the posterity of Cain (Orig. in Evang. Joh. See also Basil, (Orat. 6. c. 29. p. 180.) In the commentary on Messiaues de Port-Royal, which understand it, De CAIN, et des autres meches qu'il aient aCelaeet, approving of this by the son of Sirach (Ecclus. xii. 10), who, enumerating the several instruments of God's vengeance against the wicked, as the sword, famine, &c. immediately adds, ἀνδρόν ἡ καταστροφή, that their sakes came the deluge, he of the wickedness of such ungodly and bloody-minded men, as went in the ways of Cain, as St. Jude expresses it. For the single fact of Cain, though very shocking, was not sufficient in itself, and by itself, to bring the universal deluge, nor of consequence enough to involve the whole earth in it: but when the earth was filled with violence through the wickedness of all the inhabitants of the world, then, or on that account, God destroyed the earth with a flood. We may lastly add the authority of the Arabic version, to establish this conjecture, which reads, as I before observed, "or his descendants," and adds, ob id obruitum diluvio terrae, &c. and Vahbous, I observe, renders in like manner. Such being then the fate of Cain's descendants, Cain himself may with propriety enough be said to have perished with them, inasmuch as his whole race thereby became extinct. The words, therefore, abominem Spiritus are not to be understood of Cain personally, but of his race or posterity, in order to put an end to their wickedness and impiety, in the destruction of his posterity. From this general calamity of the flood, we may make this useful reflection,—that it is no security to ungodly persons to number their numbers, and rely rather for that cause to be so much the more apprehensive of speedy and dreadful judgments. For because of the greatness of their number, because "all flesh," as the scripture expresses it, "had corrupted themselves," the inhabitants of the whole world were under the nearer destruction, and it involved them for that reason.

Ver. 4. Wisdom again preserved it. — i. c. By preserving Noah and his family, by which God's wisdom and grace were in an successive way, though it was replenished by degrees, and the several parts of the world at length inhabited: we may also, with Messieurs de Port-Royal, consider this preservation as a symbolically visible type of the church, as Noah and his family were of the members of it, whose preservation in the flood prefaged also our redemption by the power of regeneration or baptism, as P. P. Molitor, in his De Abrah. IV. ii. 21. Supposes: Noah and his Family, which are one and the same element, may be considered as the end or destruction of vice, and as the original and fountain of virtue.

And directed the course of the righteous in a piece of wood of small value. — Per contemptible lignum, according to the Vulgate (see note on xiv. 6). Our author intends here no reflection on the structure or usefulness of the ark, which was the design of infinite wisdom, and the work of a whole century, and so conveniently contrived, as to contain Noah (whose very name, according to Philo, signifies righteous), and his family, and all living creatures, according to the appointed number of them; he speaks only as to appearance, and as it was then judged; for while it was built, the ark was not yet complete, and, the sons were laughed at for their design, as being seemingly unable to endure such a confit of waters. And, indeed, there are no signs which are more striking, all the high hills were covered, and not be overtaken by winds or waves, or the many violent shocks it must necessarily meet with; that it should not be dashed to pieces against rocks which were spread upon the ocean, through the work of God, as it contained, — displays most illustriously the power and providence of God, who chooses to effect his purposes oftentimes by means the most unpromising and unlikely. Nor is the wisdom of God less to be admired in the contrivance of the ark, which may truly be said to be a world within itself, than his infinite power in directing it; for it has been demonstrated mathematically, that there was sufficient room in it to contain all the things, animate and inanimate, which it was designed for; and that the measure and capacity of the ark, which some scribes have made use of as an argument against the scripture, ought rather to be esteemed a most rational confirmation of the truth of it, and of the wisdom that designed it (see Bishop Wilkyns Essay on a real Character). Ver. 5. Moreover, the nations in their wicked conspiracy being confounded. — Our version here is faulty, the true rendering seems to be, "When the nations around conjured, and assembled together, and the nations conspired ensemble pour s'abandonner au mal," says Calmet, and with him agree Messieurs de Port-Royal; and this sense is more at least consonant to Philo, c. i. 35.

Inhabitants of nations consciens and indulgent; i. e. when they were overthrown with idolatry: for neither the creation of the world, nor the universal deluge, nor the confusion of languages, could prevent the fall of man. Or this repentance of the nations once so prosperous, whose cities are now deserted, that they were considered as the life and glory of the world as it was universally overthrown with polytheism and idolatry, as the old world was with violence, and the very dispersion of mankind probably contributed to it. Then, when all the nations around were sunk into idolatry, God, as it were, called Abraham from Chaldea, whom the context shows to be here meant. I take it to be a truer sense of the place, than with some to interpret it of the capacity to build the tower of Babel. The learned Usher, it must be confessed, seems to understand it in this latter sense, for in his account of that bold and presumptuous design, he refers to this very place, which is somewhat surprising; but this cannot be reconciled even with his own chronology, for the building of this tower was A. M. 1375, and A. D. 2083, which was a century and more after Abraham. I mention this, in his preface, as an objection against our author, G. S. S. 96. But in this sense the author seems to allude to the "apples of Sodom" in particular, which are said to have been beautiful in appearance, but not in the eye, but within were full of rottenness. Messieurs de Port-Royal understand it in like manner of trees, Qui portent des fruits bastard semblables aux autres en apparente, mais qui se reseduent en mauvais grole (Comment. in loc.). And this, the Tertullian confirms, Sodomam et Gomorrham igne immolar exsussit, et obit adnudo incendio terra, et si quia ilic arborum poura, oculis terem, fructibus verae beneficiae, sed ab integro se resedunt in malos lucernos. In the same sense the author seems to allude in this place, for "apples of Sodom," No. 7. S. 96. Philo describes the destruction of the cities where Lot dwelt in the same terms. Philo, lib. i. cap. 22. Ver. 6. 7. When the ungodly perished, she delivered the righteous man, who fled from the fire which fell down upon the five cities. — Of whose wickedness even to this day the "fruits of Sodom" are a terror to the ungodly; and "fruit that never came to ripeness:" Kamiyofgoron; for ilik ofl oun. Philo describes the destruction of the cities where Lot dwelt in the same terms. S. R. 53. And, as it is written, "Vain virgins," by St. John. It is not to be understood that God was able to raise Isaac out of the dead at God's command; his courage is displayed, in resisting the sentiments of nature on so trying an occasion; his justice, in returning to God that which he had dedicated to God, that he was dead to all the meaning that was in his nature, and that God could restore him from the dead, and bring him from the deep of the earth again" (Ambros. de Office, lib. i. can. 2).

happy region, says, anc., Gen. iv. 17. & c., Ps. lxxxvii. 1. Falsity ob incolorum impunctum fulminei conflagrassit. Adhuc ignis à Deo immissi reliquias, et aquidam quoniam illaque sidero locutam; insipr et fructus, quoniam irae naturae* et *saepe animalia desumpta, manum aderent decurrant, in favillam et cinerem resolventur (Lib. v. de Bello Jud. cap. 8). Nothing was more known or celebrated among authors, sacred and profane, than this fire, for it had been mentioned in the Sacred Writ, and on that spot, says, viz., That he never saw or heard of any such fruit hereabout; nor was there any tree to be seen, from whence one might expect such a fruit; and adds, that he believes its very being, as well as its beauty, is a fiction (Journey from Aleppo to Jerusalem, p. 85). The Vulgate renders, Incertò tempore fructus habentem arbore, intimating, that the fruit growing here was, on this account, unlike all other fruit, which has a certain and fixed season of being ripe, but this never came to perfection (see Tiran, in loc.). We find that Homer had a notion of this great tree, from which the ungodly could draw the water of life. There were in olden times very few nations, which might easily have reached and been in safety. 4. She had her husband and children with her, whom she ought to have accompanied; but she neglects these, and not believing the threatened destruction of Sodom, which would induce a criminal curiosity of looking back; her punishment, therefore, for these reasons, was just. Many persons were raised from the signal misfortune of this woman. Our Saviour, we may observe, to guard his disciples against any hardness of heart, bids them to remember Lot's wife (Luke x. 38), lest they also should perish through shallowness. St. Austin says, That God chose this public punishment for the sake of others, to proclaim to them to beware, by her example, not to look back to a wicked Sodom, i.e., not to return to the kingdoms of this world; and she, who fled away by some gracious means that God had afforded her; Quo pertinet quod prohibuit sunt, qui liberantur a bello angel, retro respicient, nisi quia non est animal reconditum ad veterem viam, quia per gratiam regimen exuitur. (De civit. Del. lib. vii. cap. 30). The like useful inference St. Cyprian draws from this accident (epist. 11.) But St. Clement mostly expresses the sense of this and the former verse, and how we should improve by the history of their misfortunes: By hospitality and godliness was Lot saved out of Sodom, when all the country round about was destroyed by fire and brimstone; and the Lord thereby making it manifest, that he will not forsake those that trust in him, but will bring the disobedient to punishment. For Christ and his latter day saints, and those that are the children of this world, being of a distrustful mind, and not continuing in the same obedience, was for that reason set forth as an example, being turned into a pillar of salt unto this day: that so all men may know, and that they who forsake the distrustful of the power of God, are prepared for condemnation;* (Clement. epist. 1. cap. 11. See also Cyp. Catech., Mystag. 1.)

Ver. 8. That in the things wherein they offended they could not so much as be hid.) This reflection refers not to Lot's wife only, but regards equally the Sodomites, Cain, and his descendants, and the several faulty instances before mentioned; all of whom, through their ignorance of or disregard for, true wisdom, fell into very grievous transgressions. They are all recorded, as so many standing monuments of the wickedness of God's children; and in the same practices, the shame whereof they inherit even at this day, Cabinet applies this even to Lot himself, who, stealing the direction of the angels, who ordered him to escape to the mountains, retired into a cave, was overtaken with drunkenness, and committed incest with his daughters; crimes which arose from his neglect of true wisdom, and are a lasting reproach to his posterity.

Ver. 10. When the righteous fled from his brother's wrath, she guided him in right paths, i. e. When Jacob fled from his brother, Esau, she guided him in right paths, and brought great dangers through wisdom that attended him upon, according to God's promise to him. Behold, I am with thee and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again to thy father's house and to thee until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of. (Gen. xxviii. 15.) Herein Jacob is an image of all the faithful, whom God separates from the rest of mankind, protects with his favourable kindness, and condits, as his chosen, in the right way to happiness; which the wicked, through a false mistake and irregular wandering, out of the true road, do not attain.

Showed him the kingdom of God, i. e. When he beheld in his dream a ladder, the foot whereof stood upon the earth, and the top reached to heaven, and all the children of God were ascending up and down upon it at the sight whereof, awaking from his sleep, and being amazed at the glory of the vision, he could not contain himself from crying out. Jacob awoke, and nothing; but he was sensible that I knew not: this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven' (Gen. xxviii. 12. 17). This mystical ladder, according to the sense of the fathers, represents the church, of which one of his descendants, Jacob, was the stock. All ages, ages, and all ages, takes of the righteous; that is God is present with them in the time of their affliction, and in the place of their exile and contempt, and that in their sad and solitary condition, in a state of desertion as to all outward appearance, they shall not want the assistance and comfort of the holy angels, who are God's ministering spirits, to attend and succour the saints in all their difficulties and necessities whatsoever.

And gave him knowledge of holy things. This contains something beyond the former sense of wisdom taught Jacob moreover things relating to the service of God, it is probable, that in this vision he received from God himself, who then appeared to him (Gen. xxviii. 19), inaccessible, not extraneous to any of his descendants, but that very stone upon which he had rested his weariness, and pouring oil upon the top of it, to consecrate it as a memorial stone of his great mercy to him; by his placing the place to the name of Bethel, or 'God's house,' the house of God; by his vowing a vow, the first probably of that nature, and promising to restore to God the tenth of all that he gave him.

Made him rich in his travels, and multiplied the (fruit of) his labours. καὶ εὐχάριστος οὖν ἰδοὺ αὐτὸν. The literal rendering of the place is, 'That wisdom multiplied his labours, and made him rich by them;' and so Joseph rendered it. It stands it, Locupletavit eum in arisum, quam multipli- cavit labores ejus. All the commentators and ancient versions take it as an explicative option to the single option in his labours; which is apparently the sense of our translators. This blessing Jacob happily experienced, as a reward of his hard and continual labour, for though Laban defrauded him of his wages ten times, when he had served him twenty years faithfully in his house, and through constant and painful watching was 'consumed by the drought in the day, and by the frost at the night,' yet God suffered him to see his way the same time, and gave him riches and riches equal to his labours; for it was he that gave that extraordinary blessing to the artificer of laying the rods before him, when he was in the desert of his journey (Gen. xxviii. 19). There is no other name of the ancient patricians that can be compared with it, and the whole idea of Jacob, is that he was rich in his travels, and multiplied the fruit of his labours, and therein he excelled in the exercise of his natural faculties. And in this sense one cannot help observing the propriety of the word εὐχάριστος, which seems to intimate the manner of Jacob's coming by his riches, viz. that it was by the multiplying, or surprising fruitfulness of the cattle. Ver. 11. In the careousness of such as oppressed him she stood by him, and made him rich. Εὐχάριστος, οὖν ἰδοὺ αὐτὸν. The true reading of the Greek is, εὐχάριστος ἰδοὺ αὐτὸν, and explained by Elie I'ndara contre l'avarice de ceux que vouloient user de violence, ou qui avoient l'avantage. In the book of Genesis we meet with the several ways and stratagems by which Laban, who had a greater regard to his own interest than to justice, endeavoured to surprise Jacob, and hinder him from receiving the fruits of his labours; for when Laban, to his surprise, found the contract very advantageous to Jacob, and had the mortification to see the cattle bring forth their young directly against his interest, he dissolved his own agree- ment, and was surprised upon it, and afterwards, therefore, very properly renders, 'In the deceitfulness of such as defrauded him, she stood by him,' which is more accurate to what Jacob himself says (Gen. xxvi. 7). 'Your father deceived me, and sent me away, and I came not to do evil; God suffered him not to hurt me.' For it was impossible but Jacob must have been greatly injured by a man of that profound subtlety, but not the extraordinary inter- position of God wonderfully prevented it, and disappointed the deceiver, which the patriarch very gratefully acknowledgments.

Ver. 12. She defended him from his enemies, and kept him safe from those that lay in wait. i. e. Either by turning away the wrath of his brother Esau, which, through his prudent conduct and humble submission, was at length not carried to the same extent as Jacob's threatening Laban in a dream from attempting any thing against Jacob, or acting upon any of his possessious, when he pursued after him. In Gen. xxxvi. we read, that Jacob fled for his own life from the hand of his brother, and comforted him no doubt, with the assurance that God was with him; and that he called the name of the place Mahanaim, i. e. two camps, or two armies; as if the angels might appear to him as distinguished into two armies, the better to defend him against his enemies on all sides (see Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. i. p. 260).

And in a sore conflict she gave him the victory; that he might know that godliness is stronger than all. This relates to that conflict or wrestling which Jacob had with the angel, over whom he was at last victorious; nor would be quit his hold till he had obtained a blessing. The struggling of an angel with a man may seem imperfect congress, and the victory, the conqueror is still more surprising; but many worthy ends were implied in this combat, and several useful reflections may be drawn from it. 1. Jacob having such power with God, as to be able to prevail over any thing, or any one, who was his brother, or brother of his brother, even Esau, nor any attempt that he should make against him. 2. God enabled Jacob to prevail over the angel whom he contended with, to show that he still retained a share in his whole trust and confidence in him. 3. We farther from hence learn, that when God suffers his saints to be exposed to great trials and severe temptations, it is with a design to teach them, by an experience of their own weakness and his might, that it is he alone that makes them victorious; and that he whom they have preferred to the world, is greater than the world, and things in the world; and that though he is more powerful than all things and persons in the world, yet the observation contained in the conclusion of the verse, viz. that godliness is stronger than all, though true in an temporary description of God's working among his saints, as having exceeded in him his implored in his victory, need not be confined to his single person; there are many other signal instances in the Old Testament to confirm this truth: it was by godliness that Jonathan, with his armour-bearer alone, put a whole garrison to flight; that David, unarmed, overthrew Goliath, and prevailed against the armies and violence of Saul; that Jehoshaphat, without drawing his sword, trium-

Rachel's monument, as he was going with the merchants into Egypt; his complaint there, and the deep and melting impression it made, even upon his Ishmaelite masters, is very striking. It is a beautiful instance of eloquence and invention less to be admired upon the other part of Joseph's sad history. The affliction of Joseph is a common allusion in scripture, and the standard, as it were, by which we are to measure the goodness of an author, as well as of the book. That he was but seventeen years old when his troubles first began: and though the patriarchs that were before him, unaccustomed to the second period of life. Scripture mentions none of their afflictions with the same emphases as that of Joseph, as if they were to be the badge and characteristic by which we are to be distinguished from the rest of the world. This is, in the highest degree, speaking of Joseph, that Pharaoh made him his viceregal, or, to speak more truly, says he, king; ἀπόθεσεν δὲ αὐτῷ καὶ θρόνον, βασιλεῖαν. But we are not to mistake the 9th of the word "scene" of the kingdom, but his truly royal power, a sovereignty strictly so called, un-regne em'perial absolu, says Calmet; but only, that he was the sovereign prince in his kingdom, possessing and wielding all power and authority. Some make him to be a partner in the throne with Pharaoh, and think he was invested with this power when Pharaoh took off his ring, which was the royal seal, and put it on his finger. But we can scarce believe they cried before him, Bow the knee. But notwithstanding these ceremonies, and the supreme honours paid him by his own subjects; by the chief or chief minister, governor over all the country; as his power came from Pharaoh, so it was subject to him. Grots says, it was usual with the Hebrews to give the name of king to such, as were raised to some very extraordinary honour, and were invested with great authority; and refers to ver. 16 of this chapter, which he understands in the like sense (Comment. in loc.). And thus governors of provinces, and persons of chief note and authority in countries of small extent, are called in scripture; see Judges i. 7, where the three score and ten kings, mentioned to have had their kingdom; and which man can say their kingdom, pass to us, are not to be understood as real kings and princes, but as so many rulers of cities, or small territories, called indeed kings, as having a resemblance of kingly power, by their jurisdiction, as if they were kings. There were many of them in the time of Joshua, when, the whole time, were so numerous: Tous les seigneurs qui gouvernent une ville, (say Calmet in loc.), s'appellent le nom de rois; talent at large the greater over came, and as it were despoiled the rest. This like manner is said of the thirty and two kings which went up with Benhadad the king of Syria to besiege Samaria (1 Kings xx. 1. 11. xix. 12.), even to Abraham, Moses, and Israel; see Justin, ib. xxxvi. cap. 2, and Nicol. Damascen. apud Joseph. Antiq. lib. i. cap. 7, and Calmet in loc.). This seems confirmed likewise by the name which Joshua gave to them, as an appellation of the agreement, and the parallel drawn by Rollin, vol. iii. on the Belles Lettres, p. 150. This is doing the greatest honour to Joseph, and strictly giving him perpetual glory. And great is the resemblance of their authority, the burden of this passage. But we may understand that Joseph's glory did not die with him, but was preserved and handed down to posterity, by some public monument in his favour, or by some symbol representing him. Dr. Spencer contends, that the ark and cherubins were honourable hieroglyphics of Joseph; both of which had a symbolical reference to him, and preserved his memory; Regnum est caeremoniæ, Sena cherubim et arcanum pro hishabon institutio, et quod Josephi piissimi et charissimi monumentum exstant. Nam una sunt tantum nomine, sed et figura cum Joseph area, et cherubinam cum lovo. Josephe enim in via vidit ut omnes uxoruerint ejus et uxoruerint utraque ejus vitam et mortem ab oblivione in aeternum vindicaret (tom. ii. De Orig. Arce et Cherub. 878, 9). But the learned Vossius has made it appear, with more probability, from the testimonies of Rollin and Suida, and other authorities and arguments, that the memory of Joseph was preserved under the Egyptian Isis; for he observes, in the first, that the ancient Egyptians were so far from regard a prophet and statesman, and so public a benefactor, as Joseph was, would have his memory consecrated to posterity; that the Egyptians were not wanting in some sort of representation of the kindness; and that no symbol was more proper for this than the Egyptian Isis; because the famine was prefigured by the queen, and the time of plenty by the Isis. But, in fact, Joseph's memory was, by some token, the fruitfulness and plenty, which Joseph was in a very great degree the happy occasion of. It is evident likewise from Pharaoh's rewarding Joseph, that the Egyptians were desious of showing their gratitude; and it is no less certain, that it was the common practice among them, to perpetuate the memory of benefactors by some symbols, which, though at first designed only for civil use, were after a time introduced into the sacred rites of the priests. From hence Apis and Serapis, give great light and probability to the conjecture: for Vossius conceives Apis to be the sacred name of an Egyptian king, to the like purpose of the Hebrews in 28: 9, i.e. father; and such, indeed, he was to Pharaoh and his people, and Joseph expressly calls himself, Gen. xiv. 8. The scripture likewise informs us, that by Pharaoh, he means Pharaoh and his son, or Pharaoh and Ded, which is a compound word, and means, according to the rabbins, both king and father. Serapis, it is well known, had a name among the Egyptians, the same as the Hebrew Job; and the very name of Serapis, is probably derived from "περιφεραξ," which signifies a bull, and Apis. So that we seem here to have the sacred history of Joseph visibly traced through all the Egyptian deities and superstitions (Vos- suis De Idololat. lib. i. Sulpic. Sever. lib. ii. cap. 21, in notis, Gregory's Observations, p. 65. Reeves' Apology, vol. ii. p. 29.

Ver. 15. She delivered the righteous people and blameless seed from the nation that oppressed them. It has been an objection against this writer, that he represents the Hebrews, who were delivered from Pharaoh, as a just and irreproachable people; which is not agreeable to what Ezekiel says of them, and some others of the prophets, who accuse them as given to idolatry, in that place and elsewhere; and that, as a Jew, he speaks of them in general, according to the notion they which had conceived of themselves; for they were full of spiritual presumption, looked upon all other nations with contempt, considered the Egyptians as the only righteous and accepted, and thought every thing their due; and, that as God had shown particular honour and remarkable favours to them above others, he would not reject them. In this latter sense the profoundly learned Dr. Jackson understands this place; for he observes of our author, "That though he was a man of an excellent contemporary spirit, as full as the Jews, and of a point of high speculation of God's general providence in governing the world; yet when he comes to discuss the different manners of God's dealing with the righteous (which in his language is the seed of Abraham) and the wicked (which he, as a Jew, betrays himself, in some measure, to be infected with a disease, common to his countrymen, the Jews,"

The radical disease which was common to the whole Jew- ish nation at that time, and to this author in particular, he says, was this, "That, because they were the seed of Abra- ham, they were the only righteous and blameless seed. And as their race, their custome, and their manners of faith- tise and correct them, yet all his corrections were filial (xi. 10. xii. 22), that he would not, or could not, at any time pretend that the Israelites were the seed of the Egypt of his time, so much as to the divisions of his day, whether in Jew or Gentile (Rom. xix. 18). Therefore hitherto he mercy on whom he will have mercy, and whom he will harden. The extract of which aphiorsism is this,—that the Lord was not so tied by oath or promise unto Abraham, but that he might or would harden the hearts, and blind the eyes of his seed, after the same manner he had done Pharaoh's and the Egyptians, if at any time they should become as obstinate as Pharaoh and his people had been. To harden the seed of Abraham, upon the like pride of heart, obstinacy, and contempt of God's forewarnings, could not be the design of God, or of his son, David, or of the person of David, or of the other person of David, in the other sense of the words: or it is no less true, that the heathen were punished with the like blindness of mind, or hardness of heart, as he had done the Egyptians. But St. Paul has given a receipt or medicine for curing this disease in his conversion, Acts x. 19-22. And to the Romans he says, "We all have sinned, and come short of the glory of God, and are reconciled to him, to whom we were reconciled, when Christ, even our Lord Jesus Christ, gave them the grace, Col. ii. 13-14.

"Ver. 16. She entered into the soul of the servant of the Lord, and with his consent to Pharaoh's command, and the firstborn was delivered. i.e. She entered into the soul of Moses, here called "the servant of the Lord," by way of eminence, as he is in many places of scripture. It is observable, that this writer speaks of the "dreadful" word of God, as having appeared before Pharaoh; nor is there any reason to imagine more kings than one in Egypt, except we should, with Dr. Muns, include some neighbouring kings, then captive or tributary to Egypt, (Dr. Wilkins, Comment. in loc.) as an instance of the instance of the instance. But even this, to be called a con- cession, Ps. cxv. 30, "Their land brought forth fowls, yea, even in their kings' chambers."

Σιχης τοιούτος της Βενεδίκτης αλήθειας, LXX Coverdale's translation refers it to Pharaoh and his cattle, but "She stooped by him in wonders and tokens against that wondrous King." The sense of the whole verse is, that wis- dom entered into the soul of Moses, and spoke by his mouth, and made him even a God unto Pharaoh, before whom, his laws, history, and his miracles; and so, as a humble and familiar author, as I have before observed (see note on ver. 14), gives the names of kings to great men and nobles. We have an instance of the same word, Acts vi. 23, "The Lord did not give rest unto Israel, even until they had destroyed the heathen, which dwelt in the land." In the same manner, this word,leans, is used in the Hebrew, "The land shall become the peculiar possession of our forebear, and in the wored of the Egyptian, "λαός κατά τῆς ἀγέων Μωυσῆς." To the words of the Roman emperor, "Σιχης τοιούτος της Βενεδίκτης αλήθειας," LXX Coverdale's translation refers it to Pharaoh and his cattle, but "She stooped by him in wonders and tokens against that wondrous King." The sense of the whole verse is, that wis- dom entered into the soul of Moses, and spoke by his mouth, and made him even a God unto Pharaoh, before whom, his laws, history, and his miracles; and so, as a humble and familiar author, as I have before observed (see note on ver. 14), gives the names of kings to great men and nobles. We have an instance of the same word, Acts vi. 23, "The Lord did not give rest unto Israel, even until they had destroyed the heathen, which dwelt in the land." In the same manner, this word, leans, is used in the Hebrew, "The land shall become the peculiar possession of our forebear, and in the wored of the Egyptian, "λαός κατά τῆς ἀγέων Μωυσῆς." Guided them in a marvellous way, and was unto them for a very day by day miracle to the divinity of the holy God revealed to the Israelites in their journey through the wilderness, when God led them by a pillar, which stood still when they were to rest, and moved forward when and which way they were to go. This pillar was a cloud by day, and a fire by night, and served for a covering over them, to defend them from the scorching heat of the sun; which the writer of Ecclesiastical express very strongly when he calls it, "a pillar of cloud by day, and a pillar of fire by night," (Ex. xvi. 2) "a cloud erected towards heaven, like a pillar upwards, but downwards flat and broad, spread over the body of the people, a covering that did continently and perfectly conceal and, and though but one pillar, had two different appearances, uses; of a cloud by day, to defend them from the heat, which, in those parts, was very excessive; and of a fire by night, for a signal and token that the Lord was with them. Geneva bids express the first very properly, "On the day she was a shadow unto them." This darkness of the cloud had also another use, viz., that it blinded and confounded their enemies, that they might not come near to assult them. Mr. Toland's account for one and the same thing giving both light and darkness to different parties, is very bold and singular, to say no worse. "Now a fire was made by order of the Hebrew general for a blind to the enemy, that they might be suspected to be where indeed they were not (see his Hodegos, and note on xix. 7). And the law says, according to the night season," (Gen. xiv. 10)." the Egyptians rise up like bubbles from the bottom of the sea. In the sense of our version the reading should be, "For wisdom opened the mouth of the dumb, and made the tongues of them that cannot speak eloquent." The ancient English versions read in this manner. "Ver. 91. For wisdom opened the mouth of the dumb, and made the tongues of the babies to speak," which is the rendering of Coverdale's and the Geneva bible, and may be considered as a judicious emendation, or useful reflection, wherewith the author concludes the chapter, to show the great power of God, that he "who removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged, wasteth away apostles' and judges fools" (Job xii. 27, 29, can, with equal ease, make the dumb eloquent, and the mouth of babies and sucklings to speak). The text here, in the original, relates rather to the foregoing, and concerns the same persons; the sense, according to the original, and the oriental versions, seems to be, that the Israelites, who before were silent through fear of the Egyptians, and were not, by the many former miracles wrought in their favour, induced to bless and praise God for them upon a sight of the sudden and universal destruction of their enemies, from a sense of the danger which themselves escaped, and out of gratitude for the unexpected spoils which they were possessed of, sang unto the Lord, upon the occasion, that hymn of triumph, which Doeg the Edomite commemorates as justly celebrated by all antiquity, which Archbishop Usher styles, Omnium, quorum aspersion memoria existat, primum et antiquissimum: "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath been my help;" and the horseman, and the archer, and the sword, and the javelin, have been thrown into the sea;" which was seconded by Miriam the prophetess, and all the Israelitish women, with timbrels and with dancest (Exod. xx. 11); and, according to Origen, the children joined in and completed the harmony (Comment. in loc.).

CHAP. XI.

ARGUMENT.—The account of what wisdom did for the Israelites after their departure out of Egypt is continued, God's different dispositions towards the Egyptians and the Israelites in the wilderness are recited, and a parallel or comparison drawn between the plagues with which God smote the former, and the great mercies which he vouchsafed to the latter, even in the same instances. That the Egyptians were deprived of water, by the river and all the springs being turned into blood, by which plague great numbers died through thirst; but the Israelites were supplied with the same element at the same time that they were afflicted, and afterward, in a more external and visible manner, to show their enemies how greatly they were strengthened; and the same rock, which flowed like a stream or river, and even followed them from place to place in their travels through the wilderness.

Ver. 3. They stood against their enemies, and were avenged of their adversaries. Such was the Amalcites, who fell upon those of the Israelites, who, through weakness and want of understanding, had pierced the rock (Deut. xvii. 18), and endeavoured to oppress their passage, and hinder their settlement in Canaan; the king of Arad, who attacked the Israelites as they passed that way, and took some of their prisoners, without any provocation (Num. xxiii. 1); or the king of Bashan, and Sihon king of the Amorites, who were likewise the aggressors, and opposed their march; for in this sense we are to understand the place, that the Israelites did not act offensively till they were assaulted; and thus the Arabic version takes it, Belum contra se germinantibus resistitur, and ἄφεπτος is supplied to show the difficulty.

Ver. 4. When they were thirsty they called upon thee. This happened twice in the wilderness; at Rephidim when they first murmured for water (Exod. xvii. 1), and then at Kadesh when they thirsted a second time. But the water seems mentioned twice in this verse, in which there is no necessity to suppose, that both these times are referred to. The word מְלוּaddGapת (Molech, Exod. xx. 5), which seems, according to the rendering of the LXX., to refer to the same miracle (see also Ps. cxxviii. 8). One may often observe in this book, and the like may be said of Ecclesiasticus, that a passage is frequently expressed in two periods or members of the same verse, with no other difference, but a variation of the phrase. This observation will be found not without its use; but there are some cases, where both the Nile and the rock are proper to mention, as being more material, and even necessary, for the right understanding this book, and may indeed be considered as the key to many, if not all, of the remaining parts of this discourse. "That by what things the Egyptians were punished, by the same the Israelites, in their need, were benefited;" which parallel is almost constantly expressed in Scripture, by way of contrast or opposition, to acquaint us, as it were in one view, with the joint history of those people, and God's respective dealing with each of them; the second is to the first as the third to the second; and the third shall also be punished;" which, although, well weighted and attended to, will be of great service for unravelling and explaining the design and ends of God in punitive or righteous punishment, why God chose to afflict that people with them, rather than with any other.

And water was given them out of the flinty rock. It is impossible to avow this as a miracle, it being not without good reason remarked of the ancients, that water was given the Israelites from the rock. That this miracle is mysterious, is evident from the circumstances related of it; for if there had been no other design but the relieving their necessity, that might have been supplied by rain from heaven; or, if only a visible effect of the divine power was intended to have been displayed, that had been as easily discovered, as causing new springs to rise from the earth, but that was not supplied with water from the clouds or the valleys, but from the rock. Hence therefore learned men have drawn a parallel, between the rock and Christ: 1. Because in both of them there was no visible thing, but the visible rock was represented by the visible form of Christ; 2. The rock is their spiritual name, and the Son of God is the special manner it resembles Christ (Ps. cxviii, 12; 1 Pet. ii. 7, 8). 2. It was the Son of God, "the angel of his presence," before the name of Christ, was given to Moses, and stood upon the rock, to signify the relation it had to himself (Exod. xvi. 6). 3. The apostle himself so explains it, "They drank of that spiritual rock which followed them, the rock which was Christ," 1 Cor. x. 4 (see Bates' Harmony, p. 458).

Ver. 6. For instead of a fountain of a perpetual running river. This word ἀποτρέπων is not a usual expression, and seems to relate, if it be the true reading here, to the source or fountain-head of the Nile, the river here intended; for this must much be allowed, that the ancients had no idea of the phenomenon, referred to, of the springs of the Nile (see Stephan. Dict. Histor. Geograph. in voce Nilus). And Strabo and other Greek writers constantly use the word ἡμέραν in speaking of them, and even whole treaties have been written concerning them; and when any streams are corrupted, it is natural to ascribe the fault to the corruption of the fountains whence they flow, though perhaps the accident proceeds from some other cause. There may also be, possibly, an allusion to this expression to the fountain and river in the wilderness; for the place where the water issued from the rock in Horeb, was, in the time of Joseph of Cyprus, 2 m. from the river, and the stream flowing thence is expressly called by the LXX. ὑπάρξις ἑλέος, Ps. cxxviii. 8 (see also Joseph. Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 1). And the stream that followed (see St. Paul words) the Israelites, was the same whereunder the Egyptians drank, but some conjecture the fact, they followed the river, which way soever God directed its course, whereby he ordered the journey, and provided for the want of water. In allusion, I say, to this stream in the wilderness, ἡμέραν may here perhaps be ascribed to the Nile. The Arabic version applies ἠμέραν to ἰηθος, and renders, Pro fom in dominus abunde manernte; i.e. instead of a clear and perpetual running spring, they were troubled with a river full of blood. But as all the other versions join this epithet to ἐναβαλλον, and as the opposition lies not between what the river was in its natural state, and after it was turned into blood, but between the Egyptians being deprived of water, and the Israelites supplied with it, in the same miraculous manner; and the river was thus made a monument of God's manifest and visible omnipotence, by the very self-same instrument,—I am more inclined to think, that the true reading of this passage is, ἦν ἐν ἐναβάλλον ἱππάγον πάσης ὑδάτας, see Exod. xvi. 20, where the text says, that "he (Moses) hewed the rod, and smote the waters that were in the river, and all the waters that were in the river were turned into blood." It is no less observable, that the same rod was the immediate instrument of the other effect, viz. the depletion of Egypt with water; for the scripture is very full and explicit in this point, "And the rod, whereby thou smotest the river, take it in thy hand, and do the same thing unto the Nile, and there shall come out water" (Exod. xvi. 5, 6). This conjecture is confirmed likewise by the context, particularly ver. 5, which manifestly alludes to the rod that struck the Nile, and to that stream of the river which both the Nile and the rock are avowed to be primary both to the cause and to the effect. To establish this farin opposition to brooks that often dry up, and have little or no water in them. Thus Calmet expounds this term. Commentators in general adopt this general sense, namely, the Nile itself; for, though the river Nile in particular be so called, 2dly, as being, in the opinion of many learned men, one of the four rivers of Egypt, and that the Nile, its origin is not correctly fixed in the Book of Genesis; yet much may be considered, in point of time, as a perpetual running river. 3dly, The Nile may be termed ἀξέρας, ςιλας; as a never-failing river, its fountain being never dry, but its streams continually fed, though in a country where it seldon or never rises: and though its source remained concealed, yet its supplies were constant, and as it were miraculous. Hence the Pharaohs, Canaanites, Syrians, Greeks, and other travellers into Egypt, had a notion that God himself supplied Egypt with these surprising and ne-ever-failing waters; and hence Homer probably calls the Nile ἀξέρας, ςιλας; and ὅτι η δόξα καὶ ἀλήθεια τοῦ θεοῦ μισεῖται. i. e. "a river sent and maintained by God;" Odys. 5. 351. Strabo gives it the same title, lib. xvii. And indeed the Egyptians represent this constant miracle by the symbol of a river, the fountain of the Nile. For the origin of this modern and universal symbol is concealed, not in the fixed image of God among them. 4thly, The Nile may be called ἀξέρας, as being, according to the Egyptian notion, perpetual & a fate, for they esteemed water to be the very origin and principle of all things, and markable as 60 count they worshipped it: the Nile in particular is sometimes termed ΖΩὴ Αἰλιννοις, and therefore God smote it in the first place. And thus Plato, Primum ab aqua Dei genus, et tuum, in loco, implies that water or inundation, modern and universal symbol of God, in Egypt, is the origin of the Nile. Hence we may conclude that the Nile is the most intelligent and interesting of all rivers on earth: May not this very ancient and celebrated river, by Juvenal called, the river, by way of eminence (Sat. xx.), be considered as ἀξέρας, in contradiction to the occasional water, storms of rain, which then first existed, and at length ceased to flow?

Ibid. and ver. 7. River troubled with foul blood, for a manifest refutation of that commandment, whereby the Egyptians were commanded to slay the first-born of their children if it were a clear running stream, into a discolored and foul water, or rather a sort of stagnating blood, wholly unfit for the use of any human creature. The true author seems to reconnote this river as turned into real blood, in order to execute that terrible and chastise the crime of drowning the Hebrew infants therein (see Origen and Theodoret in cap. vii. Exod.). The Egyptians, therefore, having plague, or, as it is called, puer-cer puerorum Judæorum in aquâ immersâ; flavius enim, mutatus in sangüinem, consecrâtur de carne puerorum per eos commissi: i. e. "This plague God brought upon them for the very reason that they esteemed and markable as that they withdrew, and so compelled into water blood of that slaughter." Covadalle's version is to the same purpose, "Unto the enemies they gave men's blood instead of living water," which is a literal translation of the Vulgate, pro homine spemtum humanae maternae sangüinis dederi injustiz. St. Austin (De Miraculis Scripturarum) and other ancient writers, mention what is equally surprising, that the springs and fountains there-selves were likewise so affected and changed, that if an Egyptian dog for fresh water, what issued forth from the earth was like actual blood from a wound. Philo's account is most proper. The Egyptians, says he, had the habit of taking stones, of a certain kind, full of fossae, alvii, rivi, putei, fontes, universa in Ægyp to aquâ vis, apertae humoris venæ velut in profundâ sangu inus, cruoris torrentes emitentem (De Mosis, lib. 1). But others infer, that the Nile itself was so affected to that part of the river, or those waters, that were nigh the court of Æolus; for if this plague were universal, the magicians could have nothing to do, whatever art or science they could exert or make use of (see Jackson's works). That such bloody and foul water should breed distempers in the Egyptians, and be even poisonous to them, is no wonder; but Josephus adds, that the Egyptians did not think it so the most abhorrent, which is the true construction. Among the ancients, the Nile was wholesome to the Israelites, and with respect to them retained its own nature and usual sweetness (Antiq. lib. ii. cap. x.).

Thou gavest them abundance of water by a means which they hoped not for: God gave the Israelites drink in a barren and uninhabited desert, in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is; and this he did from a solid and unpromising rock. The Israelites, according to Josephus (Antiq. lib. iii. cap. 1), "had connect with a rock from Mo-ses's mead, . ;" and as they went round the rock, that, dry and hard as it was, a way was to be cut by them through the rock for the water, which gave them more unpleasantness than the thirst itself, being a cooling rock, and the dryness a pleasure. But when, upon the striking of the rock with the rod of Moses only, a large stream of water forthwith followed, they praised God for giving them σκύρον ἄμφετον, to the rest (De Mirac. Script. iii. 18), as if to say, And to increase the miracle, this crystal stream not only refur-ished them for that time in their distress, but even followed them in their journey. For all that stream was in such a very fond of the cattle that the rock itself followed them: but others, to soften this prodigy, more wisely assert, that the water from the rock became a river, and flowed after the camp. The reasons for this opinion are, 1. That from the time of this flow of waters from the rock at Horeb, until they came to Kadesh, the Israelites are not said ever to have wanted water, which they must have continually stood in need of, and indeed persisted for want of, in their passage through the wilderness, if God had not thus miracu-lusously supplied them. 2. Some expressions in the Psalms seem to imply, that a river from the rock attended them, as they came from the wilderness (Ex. xxv. 16. 17. 21. cv. 40). 3. St. Paul says, that they drank of the rock which followed them (1 Cor. x. 4), which expresses the idea better, that a river flowed from it, and went along with them (see Poole, Whitby, Hammond, in loc, and Usher's Annals ad A. M.

2513). The rendering of the Syriac version of this passage of the 39th verse, is singular, and is not found in the Hebrew.

Ver. 8. Thy throat with that thirst then how hast punished their adversaries.) A contrast or comparison is car ried on here, and in the verse foregoing, between the thirst of the Egyptians, occasioned by their foul and distempered water, and that of the Israelites in the wilderness; the first was the just punishment of obstinacy and wickedness, the second was designed to prove and admonish God's chosen people. The sense of the whole verse is, that the Israelites were punished with water, and that the Egyptians with thirst, by the different manner of God's dealing with them and with the Egyptians; the former he treated with mer-tory supplies of water, and the latter with the most deserving thirst. And severity. St. Austin observes, that in that plague bi-bentius erat exitium, non bibentius panem ab animarum sanctitatem (De Mirac. Script. i, e. "unto them that thirst they sent a plague of blood, because they were not sufficient to bear them a sore punishment on account of their great thirst." Philo says yet more expressly, "πολέω και ώραμον καὶ ἀρνήσαται ἡ ἀπενεκτήσατο, κ.τ.λ., hominem sibi consecrato magnus nonus omnium, sed sternens ut sit in adversâ officiis (De Vita Mosis, lib. i). i. e. a great number of persons, dead with thirst, lay by heaps in the wilderness, their servants or friends not being able or sufficient to bury them. Ver. 9. They knew how the uncloedly were judged in wrath and tormented.) Συνενεχαι εἰς Ἰωάνναν συνεκτική ὑστερα, Παῦλος ἢ Ματθαῖος, which is the true construction. In the ancient English versions far preferable: "When they were nurtured with fatherly mercy, they knew how the ungodly were judged, and punished through the wrath of God." From the same metaphor, "They were chastised in mercy, they knew how the ungodly were judged, and punished in wrath," in ὁ ἄριτρος ἀνθρώπος, which is the true construction. In this version it seems, to carry a reflection on the equity of God's proceedings. The oriental versions understand it in like manner, and render accordingly. Thrice using the word water: judge, and judged, and judging in wrath.) The different effect of their thirst sufficiently appears from the description in ver. 8, that of the Israelites being only troublesome for a time, but the other was dangerous to life. In the ancient versions, entirely omit this sentence in this place. Our translators seem to have inserted it here, to illustrate this verse, and specify the term; it is fetched from ver. 14, in the Vatian copy (the 15th in Graft's edition), where it certainly is very improper. They might make it a term of affection or relation to the text. So that one cannot but wonder how all the copies and versions should contrive, as we were, in this mistake, and our translators alone be so magnanious as to find it, in a place, and its proper passage to the proper place. Though it would not come in amiss at the end of the eighth verse, reading only locusts, instead of locusts.

The comment of Mæster de Port-Royal has a judicious and useful reflection on this passage: "That we may hence learn with what patience and thankfulness the just ought to endure the cruel ordure of God's justice. They were therefore left to their miseries, and persons of low rank, and through their calamities were tormented to their punishment. For though calamities are common to them with the wicked, yet the reason of sending them is infinitely different: God sends afflictions to good men as a tender father, who chais-""".a god's children, because he loves them; but with respect to the wicked, they are to be considered as the just punish-"".ment of an abused master, or an enraged king."" (Comm. in loc.)

Ver. 11. Whether they were absent or present, they were vexed alike.] Some interpreters understand this, that whether the Egyptians were present, or at a distance from the place, they were equally tormented; but I am of another opinion, and think there was this very remarkable difference between the mi-"".acles wrought by Moses, and those of the magicians—that his were permanent, and extended over all the land of Egypt at the same time; Moses no sooner ordered frogs or locusts, but they appear at once, and cover the face of the whole country, so that the absent as well as present, are equally afflicted by them; but theirs were of shorter continuance, and disappeared almost as soon as produced; and their influence went no farther than the spot where the magicians themselves were. But the context seems rather to imply the contrary; they were not tormented equally, for they were tormented in the absence and presence of the Is-"".raels, both when they were in Egypt, and after they were delivered from it, for then when they were in Egypt, they were subject to different plagues, and their account; and after their departure thence, they were uneasy and uneasy at the prosperity of people whom they hated and despised.

Ver. 12. For a double grief came upon them, and a groan-"".ing for the remembrance of things past.] ἐυθὲς ἄλφαπεν Βαςλέως ἔσσεν καὶ עליה περιστάτων τῆς αἰσθησεως. The true rendering of this piece is, "Grief and groaning came upon them doubly (for ἐυθὺς seems here to be used adversely) upon the remembrance of things past." Our translation expresses this ambiguously; it needs more emphasis over the sentence, and less want of it; but the ancient English versions quite mistake the sense of the passage; for can any-"".thing be more foreign to it, than the rendering of Cover-"".dale's and the Geneva tables? "Their grief was doubled; namely, mourning and the remembrance of things past." Or ἐυθὺς may be understood, not numerically to a precise number, but as a Hebram, that great grief and concern might be suggested, and therefore the translation of the received versions is appro"". priate. Junius seems to have translated it not amiss, Duplex cos occupavit doer et geniturs, erum praeteriarum recordantur. Recantantur recordantur. In this they are more in"".structed. When you speak of grief, you should use the term "".peneis, et de larmes, et se souvenant du passé. ""Their first grief (says he) was their reflection upon their past plagues, their want of water, the death of their cattle, and that of their own people. The second grief, (he says) was a con-"".dence of grief and concern was the consideration of the happiness of the Israels, since their going out of Egypt, and God's merciul dealing with them in the wil-"".derness. The first arose from a shame of being seen in such distressed circumstances by a people whom they de-"".spised; and the second, through a discovery of mercies which that people, through God's favour, was pos-"".sesse of."" (Comment. in loc.)

Ver. 15. When they heard by their own punuments the other to be delivered, they said, they have found wisdom of the Lord.) Our version is somewhat obscure; the meaning is,—when they understood the Israelites to be refreshed and refreshed with a supply of such things as they were used to, the disdainful conduct of God to-"".wards his friends and enemies, they at length acknowled-"".ged his power, which before they disregarded, and were obliged to envious the happy lot of the Egyptians, and the avenging hand of God and the effect of his en-"".raged justice. For the reason of this different procedure, with respect to the same thing or element, was to exemplify to the world in this manner, that God had power over all his creatures to continue or alter them, to give or take away the use of them, from whom or in what manner he.

Ver. 14. For whom they rejected with scorn, when he was long before thrown out at the casting forth of the infant-"".s, him in the end, when they saw what came to pass, they ad-"".mired, i.e. That same Moses, who had been sentenced to the subject of their raiillery, whom they had treated with scorn and contempt in the execution of his ministry, who had been formerly exposed and thrown into the river by their fathers, and treated in that manner, received his name, in the end commanded their wonder and admiration by the power of his miracles, which declared him to be the favourite of heaven, the favourite of nature, and that it is the opinion of some wri-"".ters, that even among the Egyptians, Moses was honoured after death with religious veneration. Enæbus, from the authority of Flavius Josephus, says, that Moses was buried in a part of Egypt, and that there was a place dedicated among that people ἰερόν μνήμην (Praepar. Evang. lib. ix. Cyril, cont. Jul. lib. i. Tension on Idolatry. Our ver-"".sion of this place is obscure; it represents the Egyptians ridiculing Moses, when he was flung into the river, as scolding, though it may well be supposed true in general, yet is not particularly applicable to Moses at that time; it is therefore better, and more agreeable to truth, to under-"".stand this of a place dedicated to him by an Egyptian public character, and in his em-"".ployment as God's messenger to Pharaoh; ἀντικής ξένων, was often true. I think, therefore, the sense would be more determinate and clear, if part of the first sentence was included in a parenthesis, thus, ὡς ὁ γόνατι σὲ βλέπειν ἤδη ἐναυξάνεται, ἢ πόλεμον ἦσσε ξένων εἰς τῆς τῆς ἔντολας (Deut.) i.e. "him, whom they rejected with scorn (that same Mo-"".ses) who was long before thrown out with the rest of the children), they in the end admired," &c. For it was a remarkable instance of providence, as well as matter of great surprise to the Egyptians, that he whom they had thrown into the river should rise to such a place of turning that river into blood, and that the Israelites, seemingly an abandoned and forsaken people, should be so wonderfully succeeded and preserved.

Ver. 15. But for the foolish devices of their wickedness, wherewith being deceived, they worshipped serpents void of reason.] God, by way of punishment for the folly and im-"".piety of the Egyptians, permitted them to fall into the most ridiculous idolatries, to adore even crocodiles and veno-"".mous serpents. Jupiter in Lucian says, that the Egyptian gods were ἀποθητοὶ ζωομάκρον, "fifly and more ridicu-"".lous than the gods of other nations" (De Concl. Deorom). And it is observable, that their deities are called not only by the fathers, but by the poets, Ποταμώς instead of Νι-"".με. Thus Juvem: "Quis neque qua quia dement "".Εὐφρατείαν, atque Νιμίνς colet? (Sat. xvi.)

And Virgil pays them no greater compliment when he calls them "" Hermandique Deum homin."" (En. lib. vii. ver. 698.)

Origen has the like charge against the Egyptians, and ex-"".poses some of their favourite things with much pleasantry. ""They were the most clever in their devices (says he) having glorious groves and beautiful chapels, temples with magnificent gates and stately porticos, and many mysteri-"".ous and religious ceremonies; but when once you are en-"".tered, and discovered the interior, you find nothing else but a eat, an ape, or a crocodile, a gent or a dog, worshiped with the most solemn veneration"" (Orig. cont. Cels. lib. iii.). Allam says, that serpents among the Egyptian
THE BOOK OF WISDOM.

...the Egyptians esteemed Osiris, Jupiter, (see Elian. de Nat. Anim. lib. XII. cap. 8.) and the sacred animals among their children are innocent and innocuous. He describes their libation, diet, and the manner of feeding them, and shows in many instances the great care taken of the gods. (Elian. de Nat. Anim. lib. vii. cap. 5.)

And in the same manner the other pagan writers make themselves acquainted with the Egyptians, as their institutions are mentioned on xii. 24., xvi. 18. Nor can we, if more authorities were wanted, have a stronger instance of the very particular reverence shown to the animals, than what Pridemore mentions, viz.: "that Cambysis placed these in the very front of his army, when he took Peltaum, as knowing them to be sacred, and honoured by them." (Comelius, in loc. cit.)

"Thou deist send a multitude of unreasonable beasts upon them for vengeance;"—The author of this book mentions elsewhere (xiv. 23.) beasts being sent among the Egyptians as instruments of vengeance; though no express mention is made of this in Exodus, or any part of scripture. Indeed, in Exodus xiv. 21, where the text reads, "Recollect, I will, I will, devour thee, the margin has it, "a mixture of noisome beasts;" and the Chaldee paraphrase on Ps. xvi. 45 renders more explicitly "a mixed multitude of wild beasts of the field." The Jews have a similar custom of this kind of revenge in one of the stories of Moses, quoted by Bishop Patrick in loc. that God sent lions, wolves, bears, and leopards, and such-like furious beasts, which killed not only their cattle in the field, but devoured them in their beds, and destroyed the most of their children. But as this was usual in the Eastern parts of the account, and not necessary to understand these passages of scripture of swarms of flies only, so it is plain from what follows in our author, that wild beasts are not here to be understood, but rather frogs, toads, serpents, and similar noisome beasts. (See the Grenouilles, des monches, des sauterelles, des poux, (Conn. in loc.) I think therefore here, and in Rev. iv. 6, where there is the like mistake, the word would be better rendered "living creatures." (See the original, Gen. vii. 23, and translated, Ezek. i. 5.) The reflection of Messieurs du Port-Royal upon this occasion is very just, and too fine to be omitted; "L'homme abuse de la creature; i.e. "Man abuses the creature to provoke God, and God made use of the creature to punish man: he showed his equity at the same time in proportioning the punishment to the crime, and his power, in making it upon the smallest, and otherwise the most despicable creatures, become formidable to man, which he can do with the greatest ease, when he pleases to make use of them as the instruments of his vengeance." (Conn. in loc.)

Ver. 16. That they might know, that whereinat a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished." In God's providence there is a most general connexion between the nature of the sin and the punishment attending it have very remarkably answered to each other. It would be almost infinite to transcribe profane history upon this subject, and can be touched upon but not be thought of; the truth of this observation in general, from the principal facts of this nature recorded in scripture, nor improper to illustrate it from a survey of the plagues of Egypt in particular.

To begin with the first sin, which it is melancholy to observe, was almost as early as the very existence of man: Adam eats of the forbidden fruit of the earth, and the curse of the ground was the punishment to him and all his posterity. The overflowing of vice in the old world was miraculously punished with a deluge of waters; and Sodom, that had burned so long with unnatural lust, was at length destroyed with fire and brimstone. The Egyptians, being confounded into the shapes and forms of particular beasts, and great benefits were supposed to be received from their influence (Explain. Decal.) And it must be confessed, indeed, that the ancient Egyptians were not but passably careful, with the name, and to which, by a strong fancy, they were imagined to bear some resemblance, were honoured with a representation of the animal to which they belonged. The hawk, the ram, the goat, and the dog. The first of these animals, being their favourite Apis, the prophet Jeremiah takes notice of (xvii. 10), and, by a severe sarcasm according to the general usage of the Greek language, represents it as flying from the desolation of Egypt: and the question, Διὸς ἐυγέργεις ἄνδρα εἰς ἄνθρωπον, διὰ θυσίας τοίης αἰκατερίας, (which is the reading likewise of the Arabic version), shows inability to assist others in distress, though by the Egyptians esteemed Osiris, Euphrates; (see Elian. de Nat. Anim. lib. vii. cap. 5.)
...the punishing like with like," will be best and most apposely exemplified in the history of the Egyptians in particular, where the consequences of the punishment and the plagues are so clearly and visibly distinguishable in every one of them. 1. God turned the river into blood, and thereby rendered its water not only useless, but unwholesome, to produce any effect. 2. The Egyptians cast their cattle into the disgusting croaking of frogs throughout the land of Egypt, represents either the cries of the children, or the shrieks of the oppressed Israelites. 3. The nastiness of lice was the next, a torment of a similar nature to the first: the luxury of the Egyptians, but, according to the Jews, intended to punish them for employing the Israelites in durtion. 4. The slings of the divine thunder was tried again their oppression by cruel and painful tasks. 5. God destroyed their cattle by a murrain, because they had deprived the Israelites of their cattle, and had used them like beasts of burden. Or, we may suppose this plague to be inflicted for their worship of beasts. 6. The plagues on the Egyptians themselves, from head to foot, represented the marks of cruelty upon the flesh of the Israelites by their blows and screams. 7. The manner of God's vengeance was shown by disguising language, by lightnings, strange hail, and thunders, which the Hebrew and the LXX. style "the twenta, θυεω, and to which Platonists, Tontaretan melodictions. 8. As they robbed and deceived the Israelites of their wages, the locusts in return ate up all the fruit of their ground. 9. The Egyptians kept the Jewish plagues, to show the Egyptians how great the darkness which would not permit them to stir. 10. They crificed God's first-born, his chosen people, for a long time; and God destroyed all their first-born in Egypt, to give them a taste of vengeance.

There are many examples, in which the vengeance of God has discovered itself in a manner and way adapted and suited to the very crimes (see particularly, 2 Macc. ix. 5 and xxi. 24-26). Nor is the correctness of his reappearance in the history of the church and its persecutors seen more clearly than here.

Ver. 17. "For the Almighty hand, that made the world of matter with wisdom, and by his power, and in his expression, that God created the world out of pre-existent matter; and possibly he may speak this according to the opinion of the Platonists, who held not any temporal creaction of the world, in the strict and proper sense of that word, but the production of its form only from formless κύτλος, which they called σεπολία, or simplicity. Plato, speaking of the Almighty ἐκ της τέχνης σοφίας, σοφίας εἰς τὸν ἄνθρωπον ἐν ἀμφιτροπίαν παρατηρεῖται, or before they were formless, and without a form or sign. Deut. iv. 32.

Ver. 18. There is no mention of the destruction of Saul, which is given in xvi. 10, as the book of Maccabees.
Ver. 20. "I say, and without these they might have fallen
improve the consideration of it to their great advantage; for they have their eyes fully open to the sight of his justice, in the pleasing contemplation of his mercy, and thereby make it the occasion of sin, have great reason to fear, that his patience and forbearance, so often evidenced, will be again exhausted; and, therefore, the greater is the care we should take to avoid the neglect of so great a favor, and the more severe, according to the account of the true Solomon, Prov. i. 26, 27, &c.

Ver. 21. For be not ye prudent, though thou hast made any thing, if thou hast hated it.) God did not make the world, or any thing in it, for the mere exercise of his power, much less for the sport of his tyranny; but his goodness was the only cause of his creation, and was for which all things seemed desperate, and the enemies of Jerusalem thought themselves just masters of it, God sends his blast and instantly "a hundred farseare and five thousand beams."

Ver. 22. But thou hast ordered all things in measure, and number, and weight.) This aphorism is very just, when applied to the beauty and harmony of God's natural works; but the context necessarily confines it to the government of the moral world, viz. that God's wrath, in his dealings with the children of men, is neither rash nor hasty, inconsiderate or unwise, but just, merciful, and altogether right, as that of his creatures too generally is; but he exercises his justice with the strictest impartiality, "in measure, number, and weight." i. e. he considers the nature of the offence, and the heinousness of its aggravations, and proportions the duration and extent of his vengeance accordingly. And as he acts not through passion, resentment, or hatred, his chastisements are always just, suited to the greatness of men's faults, and the desert of sinners. It was not therefore without good reason that the heathens have painted Jupiter with a pair of scales, in which he weighs and determines men's respective destinies.

Ver. 23. But thou hast mercy upon all; for thou dost do all things, and winkest at the sins of men, because they should amend.) i. e. for they might amend, and so turn to their duty; as God does, when he will, give them again sight. Thus the Psalmist distinctly affirms, and the Prophet Isaiah speaks, that it is not God's pleasure that any should perish; but that all should turn to God, and live. And it is to be observed, that the word "winkest" here, as our version has it in that place.

Ver. 24. And yet thou keepest thy mercy toward them, and redorest them again; that thou mightest be feared.) God's mercy is such, that it is as one of the best arguments of his power, and therefore is the subject of the highest adoration. It must be remembered, that the Hebrew word for mercy, "rahat," is of the same root as that for to love, "rahat;" and therefore that mercy is nothing but a love of mercy, and may be said to be the love to that mercy which the creature has to him that has mercy on him. This is the same as God's love to the creatures, and in that love he is represented as the fountain of mercy, the repository of mercy, whose mercy is of the same nature with his love; and who is that very God, who understands the nature of the goodness, of mercy, and who understands the infinite goodness, of God, and the infinite goodness of mercy. And that is the great argument of the mercy of God, that it is so great, that in it he gives his creatures a sight of his justice, in the pleasing contemplation of his mercy, and thereby make it the occasion of sin, have great reason to fear, that his patience and forbearance, so often evidenced, will be again exhausted; and, therefore, the greater is the care we should take to avoid the neglect of so great a favor, and the more severe, according to the account of the true Solomon, Prov. i. 26, 27, &c.

Ver. 25. Or be preserved if not called by thee? i. e. How could any thing have continued, if thou didst not order it to continue? It is the most sublime version, and the most beautiful expression of the favourite Latin phrase, "modo conservaretur aliquid, nisi tu recuperes." And Calmet, Qui se put conserver sans votre ordre (Com. in loc.). To call, when applied to God, is the same as to create, to produce, to institute. And this is the true expression (Rom. iv. 17), "God, who quickeneth the dead, call eth those things which be not, as though they were;" i. e. he equally commands the dead and the living. And the psalmist (Esth. 4. 14), he "called them by their names;" i. e. he commands them into his presence.

Ver. 26. Thou speakest all: for they are thine. O Lord, then lover of souls! φίλομαρτύρ, or φίλοσοφος, "a lover of souls," in the highest character that can be given of God. To call him φίλομαρτύρ or φίλοσοφος, "a lover of souls," is in comparison a low and beastly definition, as it expresses his care for only part of the species (see Barrow's Works, tom. ii. p. 209). Nay, even φίλοσοφος itself, which is the most complex term, and takes in the genus of mankind, is not so sublime and perfect an appellation, as his love to the soul, which is the more valuable part of our nature. It is pretty observable, that God is no where in scripture called φίλοσοφος, though even this character, if it was predicated of God, would not, with respect to us at least, be so admirable. But as God is said here to sparc all, and to be a "lover of souls," without distinction, perhaps our author may allude to that command of God to Moses, Deut. v. 32, where it is said, that God had "loved the number of the people, every man so numbered, from twenty years old and upwards, should pay half a shekel to the sanctuary, as a ransom for his soul;" that is, the neglect of such a payment; which was a most easy and favourable capitulation, inasmuch as, when their lives were the forfeit of their sins to God, God gave them a way of payment for them; and he accepted an equal ransom for the lives of the lowest as well as the highest among them, as they were all of equal value in his sight, who careth for all alike.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 1. For thine incorruptible Spirit is in all things. This verse seems necessarily connected with the last of the foregoing chapter, though in all the editions it is separate and distinct from it. It contains the reason why God is good to the ungodly, as the psalm says, Every one that is dulleth with or in every man, ivori est evis: even with the wicked, till they, through their own fault, force it to depart (see note on i. 9). This is manifestly the sense of the Syriac, and the explanations given of the various versions, beginning this chapter, Amator es minamur quia Spiritus tuis bonus habitat in omnibus. And this it does not seem to be true of the Vulgate; and the Spirit contracts no deliement by its inhabitation for a time in a wicked breast; its purity, like that of the sun, remains unsullied, though it shines upon filthy and dirt. The Vulgate is particularly reading a passage with an emphatic, or note of admiration, at the goodness of God, O qua bonum et suavis est, Domine, Spiritus tuis omnibus! O how benigne and full of sweetness is thy Spirit, 0 Lord, towards thy servants! which measure of devotion may refer either to God's dealing with the Egyptians in the former chapter, or with the Canaanites mentioned in this, or respect his forbearance towards sinners in general. Grotes understands by Spirit here, the soul of man, that it is incorruptible and immortal, and an image of the divine eternity, and refers to it, 23, which is not so agreeable to the sense of the context.

Ver. 2. Therefore chastenest thou them by little and little that offend. God does not proceed with haste and eagerness to punish his enemies, as if he were jealous or afraid that they might escape from him, but for a time to suffer them all his wrath at once, or on so sudden, as if he could not command his temper or resentment: he punishes not usually with what he is in the habit of giving, as we were taught the destruction and utter extinction of his enemies, but, aiming at the amendment, welfare, and happiness, of those he corrects, he chastises rather as a master, a father, a God. St. Ambrose finely observes, that what is here mentioned of God's lenity in punishing by little and little, is an excellent maxim for the conduct of life, for that we ought equally to avoid the two contrary extremities, and to observe a medium between a faultily complaisance, or tenderness, that pardons every thing, and a rigid severity, that excuses nothing, which makes no favourable allowance for human frailty, and is not at all softened by any mitigating and alleviating circumstances.

Ver. 3. For it was thy will to destroy the hands of our fathers both those old inhabitants of thy holy land. The Israelites were raised up for a purpose to be a scourge upon every shocking vice and disorderly villainy of the nations around them. This people, eminently distinguished by the divine favour and protection, God made choice of to chastise the hands of our fathers both those old inhabitants of thy holy land. And they were every way profligate and utterly abandoned, as appears by the context, to drive them out of the holy land by their hands, and in order to make the hands of Abraham the more uplifted upon their own heads. As God had purposed utterly to destroy the nations of Canaan, so he did not dispose any of them to accept of peace from the Israelites, in order to their preservation by the hands of Abraham, as the means (see note on xi. 16) to harden their hearts, that they should come against Israel in battle, that he might destroy them utterly, and that they might have no favour, but be destroyed as the Lord commanded;" Jos. xii. 20, where the exaggeration of the expression is very observable, and is intended to denote the certainty and violence of their destruction (see also Deut. vii. 21. Thy holy land.) The Almighty at first represented himself to the Jews as a genial God—the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, as a father, the good, the pre-Redeemed Jews to all other countries, and chosen it for his peculiar residence, on which account it is generally characterized in the sacred writings by the name of his land (Lev. xx. 23. Deut. xxxii. 47. Ps. Ixxvi. 1.), but it is here written, that he thus wrote this writer more fully, "his holy land." It was called "the holy land," cæs. lœgue, either because it was promised to the patriarchs to be the habitation of their posterity; or because God's chosen people dwelt there; or, lastly, because the true worship of God, under the Old Testament, chiefly flourished there. Upon account of the singular temperature of the air, the climate, the fruitfulness of the soil, and the very great plenty of all kinds of things, it is said in scripture to flow with milk and honey, and Ezek. xx. 6, to be the glory of all lands, and frequently, upon account of the great blessings with which it abounded, it is made a type of heaven, from thence called the heavenly Canaan. No wonder therefore God should promise this good land to Abraham for his seed for an inheritance, and that he should at length give it to the most worthy colony of his children. See ver. 7, and Adrichomius' Pref. to Theat. Terræ Sanctæ, where he observes, that the expression of the word sanctus or holy is proper only for God himself, and by the writers of the Old Testament, and Josephus, the land of Canaan, from Canaan the son of Ham, who lived there with his children. By Ptolemy, and the ancient geographers, and by the ancient Egyptians, the name is, "the holy land;" and yet this does not occur in scripture, nor any where in the apocryphal writings, but here and 2 Sam. xxvi. 3.

Ver. 4. Whom thou hastest for doing most odious works of witchcrafts. Canaan, from whom the Canaanites were descended, was the son of Ham or Cham, and from him the learned divided the original of human procreation. It is thought by some to be the same with Zoroaster, the inventor of magic. Canaan acquires us from a very ancient tradition, that Ham, before he entered into the ark with his sons Noah and Japhet, in the manner of cattle, on which the waters of the deluge could not spoil, its art of magic and sorcery, that it might more effectually be preserved, which memorial he found when the deluge was over; and, communicating this to his children, propagated that art and wicked superstition among its posterity (Cassian. Collat. viii. cap. 21). He adds also, that, besides the elephants, the inhabitants of Canaan worshiped a idol of devils that presided over their νησον των δολοπων, or "wicked nies."

Ver. 5. And also these merciless murderers of children. What is mentioned in this and the following verse about the inhuman murder of children, most undoubtedly relates to the sacrificing to them of Moloch. Thus Selden, whose learning has been so universally admired, has no other opinion but that the sacrifices of a child were offered to Moloch, De Dies Syræ, Sentag. i. cap. 6, says, Hec sunt sacra, qua Sapiens volumina autor vocal recellatus, etc. (cap. 14. com. 23. et cap. 12. com. 5. 6). The sacrifices that were offered to Moloch were of seven sorts, six of them were the same as some of the Jewish sacrifices instituted by Moses; the seventh was the sacrifice of a son; and he that sacrificed this kissed the idol, which had the face of a calf, and to this the prophet Hosea is thought to allude. xiii. 2. The manner of offering the children to Moloch was this: the image was heated by fire put under it, till it was in a red hot, and was again, and then the priests took the little child or child, and placed it in the burning arms of Moloch, which were extended on purpose; and that the parent or relations might not hear the shrieks of the child, they danced before the image. The name of this place was called Tophet (see Fagius in Lev. xviii. 21. Selden De Dies Syræ, Syntag. i. cap. 6. and note on xiv. 22. That parents did sacrifice their own children is evident from the many instances of sacrifice recorded by the Greeks and Romans; and innumerable testimonies might be produced of it by prose writers, whether founded upon the mistaken instance of the image of Abraham burned up by his son Isaac, or by the image of Adam burned up by his son Abel, as mentioned by Philo De Abraham Macro. Saturn. Ovid. Fast. Sharrack de ἀφραδία, p. 496. 7. And that God's worshippers of Moloch, among whom may be reckoned the Canaanites, were far from free from this crime (see note on the same in Deut. xxvi.), Amorites, Moabites, Carthaginians, Canaanites, Ammonites, Syrians, too many and too sad instances of human degeneracy! it consisted, here! these children sacrificed to this monster of cruelty, in particular, appears from many passages of scripture (Lev. viii. 21. 22. 2 Kings vi. 13, 14. 2 Sam. xiv. 4.) that they seem to have followed a copy which read הֵלִי בֵּית יִשְׂרָאֵל. But this reading of the passage is absurd; for how can the Canaanites, who knew not the true God, be said to fear upon the blood of their enemies, which were destined to be destroyed by the people to whom they knew nothing of? Vatablus reads, וַתָּבֵאת שָׁמְנָה, and Grotius more fully, וַתָּבֵאת לְעֹלֶם תְאֹכָלָה. The Alexandrian MS. has, וַתָּבֵאת לְעֹלֶם שֶׁנָּאַת, join- ing in the copy just quoted, and which seems in good measure to remove the difficulty; but I think the whole would be more correct and better connected, if the reading was, וַתָּבֵאת לְעֹלֶם וַתָּבִיא לְעֹלֶם. We follow this reading, as best agreeing with the Vulgate, which is the sense of our version, in loc. citat.]

The Vulgate renders a medio sacramentum tau, seems to have followed a copy which read τριμυχία τοῦ αἵματος. But this reading of the passage is absurd; for how can the Canaanites, who knew not the true God, be said to fear upon the blood of their enemies, which were destined to be destroyed by the people to whom they knew nothing of? Vatablus reads, παρανείπον παρακατασκέπα, and Grotius more fully, παρανείποι παρακατασκέπα ἐκ τοῦ αἵματος. The Alexandrian MS. has, παρανείποι παρακατασκέπα εἰς τὸ μέσον, join- ing with the copy just quoted, and which seems in good measure to remove the difficulty; but I think the whole would be more correct and better connected, if the reading was, παρανείποι εἰς τὸ μέσον αἵματος. We follow this reading, as best agreeing with the Vulgate, which is the sense of our version.
CHAPTER XII.

them by little and little.] The meaning is not that God abolutely spared them; for this is not consistent either with the text or with the context. The sense must be, that to these men, and their creatures, though the greatest sinners, God would have done nothing but to spare them with all that rigour which they deserved. The peculiar has, thought which very much resembles this, Ps. lxxxvii.

39, 40, "Many a time turned he his wrath away, and would not suffer his whole displeasure to come upon them; for he considered that they were but flesh, and that they were even a wind that passed away, and cometh not again." By "wafts," forenuma in the LXX., is rendered by Bochart, God, before the Israelites came into these parts, sent hornets, a sort of wasps of all others the most deadly and pernicious, which so distressed the Canaanites, that many of them were forced to flee. They therefore, when the Israelites came to give battle, these hornets made such assaults upon them, as facilitated the victory. Some rabbis say they flew in the eyes of the Canaanites, and made them so blind that they could not see to fight; and such as fled away they pursued, and killed in their lurking-holes. Joshua confirms the sending of these hornets, xiv. 12, which God had before threatened to send, Deut. vii. 20, and says in general, (for we have no where in scripture any more particular account of them), that the Amorites were not driven out by the sword and bow of the Israelites, but by the tinct of God's power. The Canaanites, that they were unworthy, many of them, to be conquered by men, l'viv 'y ror kkalfrom 'ihevishayis; and therefore God sent troops of hornets to fight for his holy ones, and to destroy the Amorites and Canaanites (et Paani). To show the probability of this, Bochart instances in whole people who have been forced by them to forsake their own country, that before God had permitted Abimelech, the king of Philistia, Appian, Strabo, and Calmet, confirm the same. Many writers, it must be confessed, have understood the wasps or hornets mentioned here, and in the books of Moses and Joshua, metaphorically. St. Austin, in particular supposes their fear to have had the same effect upon them as being pursued by hornets. But 1. The literal sense, which our author favours, is maintained by Theodoret, Procopius, and Eusebius. The instance of the Canaanites, to send upon the enemies of his people, is mentioned as distin-gue from these hornets, Exod. xxvii. 25, 28. And, lastly, the scripture speaks of them as real animals, Deut. vii. 20.

Josh. xxiv. 13.

Ver. 9. Not that thou wast unable— to destroy them at once with ease, or with a rough word.] Of God's extraordinary manner of punishing by wild beasts, there are very many examples in holy scripture. As, the Samaritans, that were slain by them because they feared not the Lord (2 Kings xvii. 26, 27); the children that mocked the prophet, and were cast down by a sudden fall in their chariot (I Kings xii. 24). This was agreeable to what God threatened the wicked, Lev. xvi. 22, "that he would send wild beasts to make their destruction;" and he therefore sent them to destroy their cattle, to make them fewer in number, and their high ways desolate (see also Isa. x. 1. Jer. v. 6. vii. 7. vii. 3. Ezek. xiv. 15. 21). The instance which is next mentioned, Gen. iv. 15, 16, is a great instance, and may naturally serve to illustrate this. By one harsh word, finely displays his power. David, in his book of Psalms, seems to have had the same thought, that one word from the mouth of a man was sufficient to blast and con-} found his enemies. See particularly, Ps. lxxxii. 1, which some learned men have understood in this sense. Or if by a metaphor we explain this of thunder, which is often God's voice of vengeance (see Ps. xvii. 13. 14. xiv. 6), the thought strikes us more forcibly. But if we suppose this to be meant of the Word of the Lord, or the Nephi, personally, as Calmet seems to take it (Com. in loc.), energy would be imparted at the preceding of the wicked, and executing the Almighty's orders upon them, as he is represented xvii. 15. 16. and often under the Old Testament, the idea rises still higher, is more magnificent and terrible.

Ver. 10. But executing thy judgments upon them by little and little.] Though the history of the wars against the Ca-nanites was carried, as it were, on a long time, Ps. xi. 13. 14. xvii.

6), the thought strikes us more forcibly. But if we suppose this to be meant of the Word of the Lord, or the Nes-ways, personally, as Calmet seems to take it (Com. in loc.), energy would be imparted at the preceding of the wicked, and executing the Almighty's orders upon them, as he is represented xvii. 15. 16. and often under the Old Testament, the idea rises still higher, is more magnificent and

terrible.

Ver. 10. But executing thy judgments upon them by little and little.] Though the history of the wars against the Ca-nanites was carried, as it were, on a long time (Josh. xi. 18) seven years, according to the op-ion of many learned men: and such a length of time God was pleased the war should continue, partly in respect to the old inhabitants, who, being chosen little, and little, and little, had place of repentance given them, and also to exercise the faith and patience of his own people, and that the power of God might be more manifest, and more sensibly of God's power and goodness. To these may be added the following reasons, which are to be met with in scripture: first, God did not drive out these nations hastily by the victorious hand of Joshua, that he might thereby prove Israel, whether they would keep the way of the Lord, to walk therein; for if none of them had been left, there could not have been people to proceed in the truth, but these nations been destroyed all at once. And a third reason occurs in the same verse, that a great part being thus left without punishment, it would have been very dangerous to the Israelites in the other neighbouring parts where they were settled.

Not being ignorant that they were a worthy generation, and that their nation was bred in them, and their estimation would never be changed.] The expression here is not unlike that mentioned Gen. vi. 5, "(God) is displeased with man's heart in every generation, and their estimation would never be changed." The idea is, that a people being the seed of Noah, and of those whom God had delivered from the flood, and that they were only the seed of those who had patience in the days of Noah, must, if they attempted to resist the magistrates, have been dealt with accordingly; and it would have been dangerous to the Israelites, who were in the same land where they had been so long settled.

Neither dared.) Is Ussial for any man may give them pardon tament, to say of him, that the greatness of his majesty does not prompt him to cruelty, to sudden and immediate avenging of injuries, and the power of which is all-powerful as it is, that he is forbearing and merciful, even to such as do indeed deserve to be punished," either passing by their transgressions, or punishing them less than they deserve. There is no such power; for, if it did exist, I rather incline to understand δικαιος, which is a known significance of the word, and will furnish a sublimer and more agreeable sense. From hence then I am inclined to understand δικαιος in the same sense as the former words, and so attempt a small alteration in the reading of the Greek, which perhaps would be more perfect, if, instead of αὖνεν τὸν ἡδονόν, we read: οὐκ ἔδει τὸν ἡδονόν, δικαίως; but it should still like better, if it may be allowed: ἀν αὖνεν τὸν ἡδονόν καθαρόν καθαρόν ἡδονόν τὴς σε φυσικῆς, illum quidem (or illum ipsum quidem) qui debuit punire, morte et ignominia interdum puniendam poterat. "Thou thinkest thy power does not extend so far as instantly to condemn to death he that deserves to be punished. For the whole scope of the chapter seems to be to display the mercy of God; but there is no mercy shown, nor justice properly, in not punishing the innocent. Condensed version. In this place is very faulty: "Thou punishest even him that hath not deserved to be punished; and this is not possible to be done by the God of the true, in a literal sense of the words, which refers to St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, manifestly charging God with injustice, and reflecting in the strongest manner upon his goodness, the Vulgate has corrected to the sense of our version.

Ver. 16. For thy power is the beginning of righteousness, and through that art the Lord of all, it watcheth thee to be so perfect in equity and in justice, and that all the ways of thy power and thy justice, which is inseparable from it, is the law of justice.

The power of men is frequently the source and motive of their injustice; and tyrants often show their power by acts of oppression, and to the wickedness of the wicked ones, m. i, 11, "Let our strength be the law of justice." But God displays his omnipotence most chiefly in showing mercy and pity; and though he spares many good men, it is because he would act as the absolute sovereign of the world; as the power of a king is no less visible, and always more amiable in reproves and acts of mercy, than in his horrid punz and terrible executions; and, according to what follows in the next words, he is therefore graciously disposed towards all, because he is Lord of all; and though he may exhort his absolute power over all and when they please, yet it is the most favourable and indulgent to his creatures upon account of his dominion over them, and relation to them. We cannot inter a fitter or more lively instance of this, than that we meet with in a passage of the epistle to the Philippians 2:5, 8, 9, which shows an extraordinary tenderness in favour of Nymphes, devoted to ruin and destruction: "Shall I spare Nymphes, that great city, and forum, and temple of our Lord Jesus Christ, and show more compassion for the compassionate..." But as their ways of power and justice, which is inseparable from it, is the law of justice, and it shows the compassionate concern for the united ministry of so many of his creatures, which prevailed with him no less than their repentance at length avert the impending evil, we are to understand that is of God, and that love is his very essence as Creator.

Ver. 17. For when men will not believe that thou art a full power, thou shewst thy strength, and among them that know it thou makest their boldness manifest." That is, you gave yourselves up to sin and excess, and ye turn yourselves to oppression and violence, to rob and destroy, and in the other Greek copies, not indeed necessarily wanted.

Ver. 18. But thou, manifesting thy power, judged with equity, and ordereth us with great favour :) The sense of this place in our version is, that God, out of regard to mankind, might be sparingly inclined to exercise the work of mercy; and though the frequent instances of his goodness and loving-kindness are usually requited on man’s part with baseness and ingratitude, yet in the case of a few, in return for an instance of his mercy he may suddenly revive, and be disposed to give them repentance, and save their souls. But it is difficult to resist much of the argument of this passage of our author is so judicious, that it needs no other light. "To derogate from God’s power is dangerous; it is an inordinate enjoin, a confutation of the same, the same is despised, the same is not true," says Calmet, "and to suffer to be despised, as the Syriac versions have it more is odious; yet this comparison may safely be made, that God does not more infinitely exceed the most inconstant wretch on earth, in power and greatness, than he does the greatest monarch the world hath, or ever had, in mercy, justice, and loving-kindness. Nor is it his will the rule of goodness, because the designs thereof are backed by infinite power; but because his holiness and equity his power, and moderate his will, that the one cannot enjoin, or the other exact, any thing but what is most consonant to the strictest rules of equity. Bad therefore was the case of those who, as Dr. Arnaeus would have gathered from that hieroglyphical device of antiquity, wherein Justice was painted as Jupiter’s assessor. It did not mean, as that sophister interpreted it to the effect of the word, which is debarred to men to content themselves with any ways to be reputed oracles of justice, and that their practices are never unjust; nor that omnipotent sovereignty alone would justify the equity of all his decrees, who was subject to rage and passion; but that Justice was well ready to mitigate and temper his wrath with equity. The true Jehovah, as he needs no sweet tongue to moderate his anger, so hath no wish to increase his power, and bring equity to the equity of his decrees" (tom. ii. p. 66). It also adds, that ἀνθρώπων ἡμερῶν, in the original, which our translators and those of the Geneva bible render "mastering thy power," rather means the same as "lord of might," or "lord of power," as Co- verdale and all the other ancient versions understand it; and Calmet renders in like manner, O Dominateur Susement Suisnai, St. Austin’s sense is the more elevated. Dominus virtutum, as if it was the same with "Lord of hosts," or כהנים צדקה; or perhaps he may mean Dominus omnipotentissimus, as he elsewhere expresses himself (Confess. lib. i. cap. 4), a superlative which seems to carry its own confutation with it; but should rather be ascribed to his zeal than to his inaccuracy, as he could not here carry his thoughts or expression further in describing the infinity of God’s attributes.

For thou mayest use power when thou wilt. This expression falls vastly short of the majesty and majesty of all the other. The reading of Paul is, "shouldst thou use thy power for evil," and almost transcribes the Vulgate, is infinitely more magnificent, and worthy of God, Subest enim tibi, cum voles, peccatorum peccata; which is the same as "if thou choose," as the version, and perhaps more touching. Nor is the Syriac much inferior. Si velis, praesto est potentia. The expression is not uncommon like that of the pious, whatsoever the Lord pleaseth, that doeth he in heaven and in earth, in the sea and all deep places" (Ps. xxxvi. 6). Where the true reading, as well as the more sublime, is, "Whatsoever the Lord wills, that he does," noli Deus miferi poteat in Domini ira, LXX. The instantaneousness of the effect upon the act of his will is finely expressed by St. Matthew,ἐνδειξις, καθιστά, "I will, be thou clean" (viii. 3). Nor are the words of our author in the original without their beauty, περιποιήσει αὐτήν ἐν καθεστώτι, LXX. We have the very same thought, and even expression, Constut. Apost. lib. vi. cap. 35, εἴ γὰρ οὐ καθιστάντος τὸν πονηρὸν ζητῆται, εἴ γὰρ τὸν τέκνον σου, τρία, καθιστάντος. We understand the passage in the sense of our version, viz. "Thou hast not, having all times and seasons at thy command, to exact from me that act of vengeance which thou art in thy power to inflict upon the sinner, because thou knowest they cannot escape thee, and that thou hast it always in thy power to cive them before thee, and to deal with them according to their works. God doeth it, but if he doth not for the present, he doth it upon their requests, and the wicked are no gainers by the impunity of a few years. The sovereign judge will at length sufficiently compensate for the slowness of his proceeding by a heavier degree of punishment;"
and compassionate manner. This is the sense of the Arabic version, which reads, "Ut, cum judicio, de tua simus bonitate sollicitati." Therefore, as we ourselves are punished, we are taught and encouraged, by happy experience, to put our trust in thy mercy (see Ceverdale renders), and to expect a gracious deliverance from our bondage.

Ver. 23. Wherefore, whereas men have lived absolutely and unjustly, then hast tormented them with their own abominations. Such therefore of thy enemies as lived unjustly, and that they rendered unto thee, from which we ourselves arise: we have not have any "in a foolish, senseless way of life," εἰναι ἐπιθυμοπόντας ἀτρόμως (which our version expresses but indifferently by "dissolutely," and "vilely" in the margin), "and their foolish hearts darkened," as St. Paul, speaking of such idolaters (Rom. i. 21), expresses it, "they did, them with their own abominations." The word ἀπολύματα sometimes signifies a large number of impurities, or pollutions; and thus it is used to denote abominable sins and filthy practices which were notorious and customary in the mysteries of the idol-worship; so that these words may reiter, in a larger sense, to the enormities and detestable sins practised in the heathen world, and hidden mysteries (see xiv. 24—26, 2 Mac. vi. 4), and that God, as a just punishment for such wickedness, tormented them with their own abominations, i.e., that God reprobed mind and vile affections (see Bishop Fell on Rom. i. 26). But if abominations be taken in the first sense, as signifying false objects of worship, it will be proper to inquire whether there be any such worship. The worship referred to in this place, is that of vile beasts and senseless animals; and the guilty persons must be either the Canaanites mentioned in the foregoing part of the chapter, or the Egyptians (see ver. 3). The passage to the Canaanites, understand it of their being tormented by hornets (ver. 8), as a just punishment, and perhaps too εἰς ἀπολύματα, for their ridiculous worship. For the Philistines, and all in-appropriate, (say God's fruit,) to the Canaanites too, worshipped flies, the god Baal-zeph, particularly the people of Ekron, or Azecarion (see 2 Kings i. 2, who are called by the name of Asherah in the LXX.); and the same, or the same as the priest of Baal, his Barnabas, or Barnabas, according to Greg. Nazianzen confirm the same; see also Selden (De Difis Symus, Syntag. n. cap. 6), who says, the name of this god was Baal-zeph, ως Μήτα, Deus Mnest; and afterward called Sheba, from which name, and perhaps from the same Pecator and Drumans in Matt. x. 25, and Leigh's Critica Sacra, p. 60. That religious rites were paid to flies in the temple of Apollo Actus, see Elia, de Animalibus, lib. ii. Gregarius and Spencer think the other returns here to the Egyptians and their abominations, mentioned x. 15, 16. And indeed it must be confessed, that this and the following verses, to the end of the chapter, restore the argument there very much, and would come in better in that place, if that was any authority for such a transposition; for the mingling and confounding the Canaanites with the Egyptians, is contrary to the meaning of the words without that certain mark of discrimination, renders it obscure, and, without great care, scarce intelligible. As applied to the Egyptians, the sense is,—that as they worshipped beasts, God punished them with the eruption of hornets which daily with them, shall afterward feel a heavier and much sorer vengeance; and this is the sense of the Greek, and of the Syriac and Arabic versions; or it may respect the persons mentioned in the foregoing verses, that they, having slighted God's milder punishments, at length experienced a judgment worthy of God. Digna Dei (reg. Deo) judicium divinitatis et veritatis laudant, distinct from the express curses, which follows, even in this mistake, "they felt the worthy punishment of God." Grotius says, that εἰς ἁπειροῦν, which is the reading of some copies, is the true one, and that the present reading is used by the copyists for the previous.

In this latter sense, the observation holds true with respect to the Canaanites; for such of them as were not afflicted, nor brought to a right sense by the plague and inexpressible orng, suffered accordingly reads Conscnmum, and explains it by, omne genus muscarum, and so do the other Latin versions. Aquila, in both places, renders τοιοῦτον, so do the other versions. By the same means, the aliform insectorum colluvias, ad M. 2513 (see also De Muin on Ps. lixxv. 45), as if a particular species of tormenting flies was meant; but thus, in both places, is a corrupt sense by the phrase and inexpressible of hornets, recovered accordingly reads Conscnmum, and explains it by, omne genus muscarum, and so do the other Latin versions. Thus good, according to the copyists for the previous.

Ver. 24. And held them for gods, which even among the beasts of their enemies were despised.] οὐδὲν ὡς ἄχαραν ἐπιθυμοπόντας εἰς θεῶν ἐνίκεσαν, i.e., according to the common acceptance of this place, they worshipped such beasts as were despised and laughed at by their enemies, the Hebrews, who in their sacrifices offered some of those very beasts which they worshipped as gods; which, in the opinion of some learned men, was purposely ordered and appointed to guard the Israelites against this idolatry (see Spencer de Reg. Hebr. tom. i. p. 260). But probably our translation here is right, and ἐνίκεσαν ἐπιθυμοπόντας should not be rendered "such beasts of their enemies as were despised," nor "such beasts as were despised by their enemies," as Grotius, not without some violence, expounds the Greek; but, "they held for gods despicable and inexpressible beasts," such as dogs, cats, wolves, serpents, crocodiles, hippopotami, and other the most odious creatures, which they despised by their enemies (see xiv. 15), as fit only to inspire horror. There is the like general charge, xv. 18, and τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ Ἱσραήλ are mentioned as the objects of their worship. The manner of expression indeed by two adjectives, ἀτρόμως καὶ ἀπολύματα, is rather unusual in the Greek language, and is equivalent to ἀτρόμως καὶ ἀπολύματα. Nor are I singular in this interpretation; Calmet univocally; Bp. Spenerius, in loc.; and Bp. le Normant, les animaux les plus vils, les plus misérables, et les plus enemis de l'homme (Conn. in loc.).

Ver. 25. Therefore unto them, as to children without the use of reason, thou didst send a judgment to mock them] Calmat understands this of the Canaanites, that as they fell into idolatry, and were punished, it is that honour which is due to God only, to despicable animals, such as are described Ezek. viii. 10, which the Israelites are supposed to have taken from the Phoenicians or Canaanites, and to have retained in like manner seemingly as ridiculous, even an array of wasps, to attack, pustre, and destroy them. And the like may be observed of the Egyptians, that God treated them as children, whom he had made; and that they, with the hornets, flies and little insects, so these went about to destroy them; and were chastised with a suitable punishment. But first he sends them instead of these hornets and flies, a species of insects which he did not give them to see; and for this punishment, which seems, in the original words, διὰ τοῦτον μᾶς ὑπέκαθιν ἐμᾶς ἐν ὑπομονή, But Philo calls such idolaters by a more odious name than children, bestias omnibantias sub humana spe. This judgment is used by the LXX. styled εἰρήνη (Exod. viii. 21. Ps. lxxxv. 45), as if a particular species of tormenting flies was meant; but thus, in both places, is a corrupt sense by the phrase and inexpressible of hornets, recovered accordingly reads Conscnmum, and explains it by, omne genus muscarum, and so do the other Latin versions. Aquila, in both places, renders τοιοῦτον, so do the other versions. By the same means, the aliform insectorum colluvias, ad M. 2513 (see also De Muin on Ps. lixxv. 45).

Ver. 26. But they that would not be reformed by that correction, and punished with them, shall feel a judgment worthy of God.] This verse may be understood, either as a moral reflection with respect to sinners in general in the future tense,—that such as will not be reformed by the methods of punishment, shall afterward feel a heavier and much sorer vengeance; and this is the sense of the Greek, and of the Syriac and Arabic versions; or it may respect the persons mentioned in the foregoing verses, that they, having slighted God's milder punishments, at length experienced a judgment worthy of God. Digna Dei (reg. Deo) judicium divinitatis et veritatis laudant, distinct from the express curses, which follows, even in this mistake, "they felt the worthy punishment of God." Grotius says, that εἰς ἁπειροῦν, which is the reading of some copies, is the true one, and that the present reading is used by the copyists for the previous.
rentur munda, cum indignatione erant sollevati, de iis, inquam quaequam pestant Deum, quae semper inani mundi vererunt, verum agnovissent Deum, &c. Vatablum renders much more clearly, ita usus rebus, quae passi sunt indignabundi Chalamei, cum non tollerent longitudinem, proinde nullum agnovissent verum Deum esse, quem ante negabant se nosse; i.e., "The Cannaites being diseased and angry at what they suffered when they were punished, those among them who were thought to be the worse, being made sensible by their necessities, acknowledged there was a true God," &c.

This is very intelligible, and comes near the true sense of the passage, but I cannot heartily agree with Vatablum in translating "et Israelis," which immediately follow, and are the very words which occasion all the obscurity in the original and the other versions as they now stand. I have therefore ventured to make a mistake in them, and that the true reading probably is, εβρου, καθως εκαστικα ενοικων, και εις ερασμον των ζεληστων; and my reasons are as follows:—1. The Bishops' and Geneva bibles both render, "when they saw themselves punished by them." 2. Junius, who in the other part of the verse follows the Greek literally, renders, quin se usum mundi viderent. 3. Calmet, and the Port-Royal commentaries, explain it in this manner, se voyant aveugle tourmenter et exterminze, &c. The sense then of the first part of the verse I take to be this: 'For, whereas when corrected only they were diseased and angry at what they suffered when they were punished, those among them who were thought to be the worse, being made sensible by their necessities, acknowledged there was a true God, &c.

This divine vengeance, when it fell so severely upon them, made them open their eyes; when they saw and felt it, then, and not before, they acknowledged him to be the true God, whom before they denied to know; and therefore, for this end and purpose, that they might acknowledge him, were they thus severely visited; not only unanthemized and exterminated, but interdicted delect, as Genesis renders, and discovered the extremity of his power; who发现了 the extreme damnation of which they were subject. This is spoken in vindication of the justice of God, who does not punish particular persons or nations without warrant; and the extreme damnation which was pronounced upon them, was that their extreme damnation was pronounced upon themselves, for not discovering all the while the true God, when they had such awakening means afforded them for that purpose. And thus I think a pretty good and consistent sense may be fetched from this verse, which has no all at, or a very obscure one, according to our version. Culver understands this of the Cannaites; 'That, seeing themselves persecuted, afflicted, tormented by hordes, which they regarded as deities, and from whom they expected favour and protection, they were at length forced to acknowledge the God of the Hebrews for the only true God.' No mention is made in the passage of idolatry; but, notwithstanding the force of inimiquity prejudice, were obliged to own the superiority of the God of Israel, and acknowledge that the little nation they were so small were not only contemned, and their religion gross superstition. Junius, and many others, apply it to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who could insolently say, when the hand of God by not very heavy upon them, or that the Lord, that I should obey his voice? 'I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go' (Exod. v. 2). But when he and his people were visited by a succession of plagues and pestilences, and swarms of flies, he so remarkably relents, and gives them leave to go and offer sacrifice to the Lord their God (Exod. viii. 26-28), that "the Egyptians worshipped the very insects, or animals, that God plagued them with; and as this author particularly mentions their being "tormented with their own abominations," le l'elin eilethoz enret; I am inclined to think with Calmet, that the Cannaites are rather here meant, and that they are spoken of through this whole chapter.

ARGUMENT.—From the mention of the barbarous and idolatrous rites of the Cannaites, expressed in the former chapter, the author takes occasion to treat of idolatry in general, its introduction and prejudice, its power, influence, and corruption; and the various ways by which it is multiplied, how impotence, or rather nothingness, of idols, and the mischievous effects attending such a worship. He distinguishes idolatry into three sorts:—I. As to persons, to bodies; immersed princes, heroes, and benefactors; and living brute animals. The first sort he treats of in the beginning of this chapter to ver. 10; and from there he passes to an account of the first of the last, which he considers the other two. Nor is this a digression or deviation from his principal and main design, which is to exalt wisdom, piety, and true religion, and to excite a love and regard for them in all, especially princes and great men. And can this be done more effectually, than by showing the folly and illusion of superstition, exposing the false objects of worship, and pointing out the mischiefs and unhappy consequences, which a forgetting or ignorance of the true God leads men to?

Ver. 1. Surely are all men by nature, who are ignorant of God, the more to be condemned. Matth. vii. 22. "The more piteus, abominable obiectis, ut robuit, Dav. 35. 29." That idolaters are called vain persons in scripture is beyond debate (see 2 Kings ii. 22, Ps. iv. 15, Rom. i. 21); but how are we to understand vain by nature? I think, if this be the true reading, it either means, that such as are naturally and naturally and naturally have no regard, or no care, or no power, or power, to the worship of God, or that they are foolish who cannot by the light of nature make a discovery of him. But perhaps vaina may be a mistake here, for neither the Vulgate nor oriental versions, nor Coverdale, nor Tyndale, nor any of the other translators, have it. Possibly the original word was seii, which they all agree in, and retain. And the true reading of the whole sentence in the Greek may be, πανεπίστευτος (πανεπίστευτος, "insignificant, unprofitable," in the sense that vanity is used by Solomon in the book of Ecclesiastes. His reflection upon this place (Gen. com. loc.), is too just and useful to be omitted; "Without the knowledge of God, which is the first principle of wisdom, truth, and religion, all men, even the greatest, are vanity and nothing, all science is but darkness, all philosophy error and delusion. Hence St. Paul renounced all other knowledge, and determined to know nothing but Jesus and him crucified (1 Cor. i. 20). It was the superlative excellency of divine knowledge, which best induced Judas Martys, after having tried all the sects of philosophers, and entered into all sorts of human learning, to relinquish them as unprofitable."

And could we understand the good things that are seen know him that is?) Τως βλέψα, i.e., "The sovereign Being, the only Being," or "Being itself," in the first revelation which God makes of his own being, he entitles himself, "I am that I am," by which name the great Creator does in a manner exclude every thing else from a real existence, and distinguishes himself from his creatures, as the only existing Being, which truly and really exists. The sudden and sudden declaration of the Hebrews, and the not a little exclamation of the religious man, "The Lord only the Lord", that he should obey his voice: 'I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go' (Exod. v. 2). But when he and his people were visited by a succession of plagues and pestilences, and swarms of flies, he so remarkably relents, and gives them leave to go and offer sacrifice to the Lord their God (Exod. viii. 26-28), that "the Egyptians worshipped the very insects, or animals, that God plagued them with; and as this author particularly mentions their being 'tormented with their own abominations,' le l'elin eilethoz enret; I am inclined to think with Calmet, that the Cannaites are rather here meant, and that they are spoken of through this whole chapter.

The worship paid to the winds seems in general to have sprung from an ancient tradition, that the winds were governed by angels set over them, and ruling in them.
From what Virgil says of iEolus's presiding over the winds (yEneid, lib. i.), it appears that this notion is very ancient so that it is no wonder that in the symbolical learning and theology of the eastern nations intelligent beings or angels should be introduced as commanding and directing them.

And indeed swiftness is the known epithet of the wind hence we meet with *' the wings of the wind" in scripture, to denote their rapidity. Hence, probably, the Egyptians made birds the symbols of the winds, as esteeming them the most natural emblems, on account of the swiftness with which they cross the air.
But swiftness
does not seem always to belong to the air, as such, the state of which varies according to its qualities. If, indeed, we understand by the air the ether, or that fine, fluid, agitated, and most subtile part, which permeates the pores of all bodies, and is supposed to be the cause of all motion and fermentation, which anciently the heathens called Zcvt or Jupiter, Toxivdi', in this sense, will not be improper.
But it is generally taken here to signify the clouds ; and this Juno (for so the ancients called the grosser air) was not without her adorers and votaries. Even Socrates is accused in the poet for worshipping the clouds (Aristoph. in Nub.) ; and ancient worship of fire among the Chaldeans, he says, that

This he takes to be chariots consecrated to the sun by some of the kings of Judah (2 Kin"s .xxiii.), and of twenty-five apostates, " that worshipped the rising sun towards the east even in the temple of the Lord" (Ezek. viii. 16). The eastern nations ^yorshipped fire as the cattse of fight, and the sun in particular, as being, in their opinion, the most perfect fire, and causing the most perfect light. For this reason in all their temples, they had fire continually burning upon altars erected in them for that purpose, and before these sacred fires they offered up all their public devotions, as likewise they did their private ones before fires in their own houses (Prid. Connex. par. i. b. iii.).

As fire among these nations was a symbol of the sun, so the sun itself probably was a symbol of God, as being thought the most perfect emblem of his divinity, and to convey the most lively idea of the power, beauty, purity, and eternity of God; but at length this expressive and noble symbol was misunderstood and abused, and the worship transferred to the sign itself from the being represented by it.
Vulcan and Vesta, in the pagan theology, originally meant nothing but fire. Thus

CHAPTER XIII.

We have an intimation likewise of this notion in Virgil. (Ened. vi.)

"spiritus intus actit, totanque infusa perartus Deus agit nobis, et magis se corpore miscet."

From this notion they inferred, that it would be a thing pleasing to the God, to address them by the mediation of these glorious intelligences, which they thought so much nearer to him than themselves, and to have the greatest influence upon the world. In the same way, we see, in the second, with pretended revelations and miracles, said to be done by the evangelists, or "heavenly bodies," in time brought forth sacrifices to them, and images of them, by means whereof great blessings, they thought, might be obtained. And in another place, from the texts discernible in the creatures, he deduces the perfection of the Giver, "Tu, Dominus, locasti ea: quia pulchra es, pulchra sunt enim. At nec ita pulchra sunt, nec ita sunt bonae nec ita sunt et considunt eorum: cum comparata, nec pulchra sunt, nec bona sunt, nec sunt. Semina hce: et quia inter nostra, scientiam tunc comparata, ignorantia est." (Comm. iv. cap. 4.)

Ver. 5. For the greatness and beauty of the creatures proportionably the greatness of them is in the body. (1.) The Greek copies here very rare; in τρόποις, καὶ ἐν τούτοις, καὶ σπέρματι ἀναμυϊν, κ. τ. λ. which Junius follows, Nam ex magnitudine, et specie, nec creatas rebus, nec iis, nec ete, nec omnibus: et ignota, et prorsum, or by analogy, comparing with the creature, the Creator, the effect with the cause, as far as the difference is capable of being known, cognomissible, according to the Valgate, the absolute nature of the creatures, which probably is what Junius means by co- venienter, and as the ratio between finite and infinite, if such any could be, will allow. St. Chrys. comm. on Gen. liii. 22, has the following just reflection upon it: εἴ τις τὸ μέγα, τιμωρία τοῦ δύναμεως τοῦ κοσμου, εἴ τις κάκιος, ἐκθέσει τοῦ σαρκός τοῦ κοσμου."

Ver. 6. But yet that they should be blamed: for they perverture err, seeking God, and desires to find him. Coverdale's version is clearer: "Notwithstanding, they are the less to be blamed that they found God, and would find him yet: but yet the blame is less in those that seek God, and would find him, and yet pervertiture do err." A comparison is drawn between the worship of the gods being false, and that of statues and images. The former has most to be said in its defence, though far from excusable, because these luminaries are glorious and magnificent, have a visible and apparent beauty and sensible virtue, power, and benefit, issuing from them, and therefore are worshipped for their own sakes, and the advantages which the world receives from them. But in every case, whether in an image or otherwise, that pleasure or profit can be drawn from it which at best is a representation only, and, perhaps, of some thing or person in itself worthless or disgraceful. If the worship, therefore, were not led in the right way, when exchanged for or exchanged with, venerated the latter part of the image, or, in short, 8, the worship of the latter is much more to be condemned, because there is no greater, or better, for God, to suppose 8. Those are the heavenly bodies, which the creatures which they would be able to do. And thereby the representations of the most glorious attributes of the Deity: they worshipped the host of heaven, because they are visible representatives of that. But, in the old Testament, and in the Epistle to the Christian promise, viz., that their hope is vain, fruitless, desperate, without any prospect of help or remedy, like that of dead men, inter mortuos spec illorum est, according to the Vulgate. In short, however vast their errors, there is on earth, and some do the Syracusian version, and Calmet. I cannot spoil a statue by admiring it, as I may do and has added a value to base and blemish, confound divinity, nor excite the adoration paid to a piece of senseless matter, though beautified by art, dignified by a celebrated name, and ascribed to an antiquity of many ages. It may not be unacceptable, perhaps, nor foreign to the occasion, to transcribe part of an epitaph which Herodotus has written in the following words: "Let him who shall read this be aware that the author has kept all that understood its meaning from worshipping that luminary; and yet even some Jews seem to have fallen into this idolatry, from what Ezekiel says, than, who are aft here are due to the apostles, who used to say: 'The barbarous treatment which ye have offered to so many innocent persons, calls for vengeance from heaven and earth.' But as ye urge the affront and damage, which ye have received against the massacre we complain of, let us state, in a few words, the injuries on both sides. You object, that your god Hercules is taken away; we are willing to make you satisfaction; we have money, stones, and workmen ready to set about the work; they shall instantly eat you out another deity, and paint it too in like manner, and finish such a Hercules in its stead, as you shall have to show. Oftentimes have I seen, when we thus restore your idol, it is thus we repair your loss: give us now back, in return, the souls of those many innocents you have murdered, and only to revenge the innumerable cruelties and miseries of the world: 'From Epist. 367, ad Princip. Colm. Sinf.' This instance shows the great veneration paid by the heathen to their statues, and how little superstitious a blind devotion will burn men, even to sanctify murder.

Ver. 11—13.] The author in this and the following verses, exposes with great sharpness of argument the absurdity of the habit, or rather practice, of representing in images, or the sublimity of the materials of which they are made: 'That an ordinary carpenter (whom he purposely fixes upon, to show the clumsiness and inelegance of the imitation) when he knew what was best and most valuable, and fittest to be employed in some necessary piece of work; among the refuse, or rather the refuse of the refuse, for so the εἰς τίνα δόξαν εἴρηται signifies, fixes upon a knotty and coarse piece of stuff, such as he could otherwise make no use of at all. Horace, in like manner, makes himself merry with a workman, who deliberated whether he should make a bench or a god of an idol in the same block. 'Hiccups, etc.' (Ver. 19) 'Maluit esse Deum?' (Stern. lib. i. Sat. viii.). The chief part of this description is borrowed from Ian. xiv. Jer. x. Baruch vi. and Lowlith's paraphrase where it is thus expressed: 'Thus did our God and Maker order it here: "What an absurdity is it for a man to dress his meat and make his god with the same stick of wood, or to think that a piece of timber hath any more divinity in it, than it hath in the using?'

To give an account of the original of images, how and whence made, is alone sufficient to expose the folly of worshipping them. This argument of an ancient apologist for Christianity often insist upon, to show the absurdity of the heathen idolatry; but none of them more happily than Minucius Felix in the following words, and almost upon the like occasion, allowing only for the difference in the materials: Quoniam igni hic (dies) mascarit? Ece funis, fabricier, sculptor: nondum deus est. Ece plumbatur, constrictura: necaduc deus est. Ece peperi: forshould not the idol represent the same home illam voluit et dedicavit; which in Mr. Reeve's most excellent translation runs thus: "But when, pray, does it come divine? Behold, it is, is not, is not, is not a god yet. Behold, it is a work, put together, and put upon its legs: well, it is no god yet. Behold, it is beheaded, consecrated, prayed to; then, and at last, it is its proper worship. The whole of this is like me; mine alone to make and dedicate him." Thus Arnobius (lib. vi.), who was himself once a pagan idolater, and had, as he confesses, often asked blessings, "nihil sentiente de ligne," at length makes this just reflection upon such senseless conduct: At quaem dementia deum crederem quem tute ipse formarem, suppleacere tentandum factum habe aut tre? This sort of idolatry, besides its wickedness, hath something in it too many that are not ashamed to own: 'When the maker, than the maker the image, since, in some sort, he may be considered as the creator of it? Philo has, I think, shewn it was so, in his works; which may easily be found in the et statuarii magis necurbarat ut divinos homines acciparet: nunc ipsis contemptus, ac si nihil egregium præstissitenti, praebit habebatur corum opera.'

Ven. 13. Where this walking else to do. i.e. Postponing it to another work, as thinking of no great consequence, and then only taking it in hand when nothing better offered. Our version follows a copy which read (συνικομοίρων ιερωμόν τον θεόν), which some Latin translations render, diligenter oti sui: and others, acuratior oti: other editions have, to συνικομοίρων ιερωμόν τον θεόν, which is likewise the reading of the Alexay and justly placed to illustrate each other, that a person of taste cannot but immediately discern, and admire the justness and elegance of the poe. It is inferior only to some instances of the stand kind in the introduction to the next chapter, particularly that which followed upon the preceding, which we meet with in the following words of St. Paul: "As deceivers, and yet true; as unknown, and yet well-known; as dying, and behold we live; as chastened, and yet not killed; as sorrowful, yet always rejoicing; as poor, yet making many rich; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things." (2 Cor. vi. 8—10, see also iv. 8, 9.) I shall here conclude this chapter with observing that the sacred image upon another species of idolatry, which, though less perceived, is no less fatal: "Besides the senseless sort of idolatry which consists in worshipping brutes and images, there is that most dangerous way of worshipping the work of a man's own hands (continues he), by a secret and subtle idolatry, which consecrates our own favourite wife and passions, doth the desires of our own hearts, and gives them the preference before the will of God, and is, in other words, the adoration of our own selves; an idolatry, which is so much more dangerous, as it is within our own breasts, and we constantly carry the favouring image about with us."
that God not only displays his power at sea, but also his wisdom, so that he can guide, particularly in the make of a ship, and in the art of navigation; for God may very properly be said to have taught men these, as he first gave the model of a ship, when he instructed Noah to build the ark after such a design as he had previously communicated to them, or, be it more correct, attempted to build ships, and to sail in them on the surface of the waters. The heathens, indeed, have given the honor of this invention to different persons; some to Jason, and the Argonauts, that sailed to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece; some to Neptune: others to Atlas, or Minervas: some to the people of Crete, and others to the Thracians. And as the heathens of each nation have not been able to decide which of them was the first to build ships, so may we with most certainty derive it; and here we should fix the epoch, or first original of navigation. Or the meaning may be, that God would have a commerce and correspondence carried on among all the nations, by traffic and exchange of their several products and commodities; that the abundance of some might be a supply for the others' want, that so none of the good things which God has so liberally provided for the comfort and convenience of life might be idle, i.e. useless and superfluous; and therefore, for this purpose of a mutual intercourse, men under took long and dangerous voyages, encompassing both sea and land to establish commerce, and to circulate what might be necessary or wanting. We meet with the like observation among the fragments of Philo, Rimo-Sermo Scholion (Ps. cxv. 4, &c., &c.). And therefore, our heathen interpreters is not any where to be thought of. 'The heathens supposed, that the construction and conveyance of a ship was the work of Hercules, and of the Colchians; but this is not at all probable interpretation, because this sentence seems borrowed from Ps. lxvii, 19, where the words are almost the same, "Thy way is in the sea, and thy paths in the great waters!" which the best interpreters refer to the same occasion.'

Ver. 4. Showing that thou const save from all danger: yea, though a man went to sea without art. The Arabic interpreters translate, et quispiam sine utrae legunt, and the Coptic has, .organization enim, and this Calmet takes it, vous pouvez sauver de tout peril quand on s'engageoit miro meris, sans le soucier d'autre moyen, and this seems to be the most probable interpretation, because this sentence seems borrowed from Ps. lxvii, 19, where the words are almost the same, "Thy way is in the sea, and thy paths in the great waters!" which the best interpreters refer to the same occasion.

Ver. 5. Nevertheless thou wouldest not that the works of thy wisdom should be idle. These words may either mean, in the Hebrew and Vulgate; Prov. xxi. 16. See also Mr. Mede, 'Defences,' p. 166.

The hope of the world, governed by thy hand excepted in a weak vest.]= Coverdale's and the other ancient English versions apply these words to the ship, and not to the person. I agree with them, for I think by increase the world, went into the ship, which was governed through thy hand; and so the Vulgate understands it, and the Ambrosian version renders it, 'as it to all ages a seed of generation.' When the earth was purged of a deluge by sin by a deluge of water, —that there might be some saving witnesses of the world's being, which had been made with sin, and the ruin of that dispensation of God's justice, power, and hatred of sin might be preserved to succeeding ages.—Noah and his family, upon whose safety likewise the future increase and populating of the earth depended, were selected and called the hope of it, were preserved in the ark from perishing by the water, and by God's command he preserved some few individuals of every species, to repair the almost universal loss, and by a new progeny renew the face of the earth, which is the 'seed of generation' here meant. According to the ancient's, only Deucalio{[and]}Pyrrhoa survived the flood, and in these they placed the growing hopes of the world: thus Ovid.—

Plato and Lucian call those few persons who remained alive Zephyr, i.e. 'live coals,' who were to kindle the vital flame, and continue the human race. When Noah went out of the ark, the severe punishment was not yet abolished; he renewed the blessing bestowed before upon Adam, saying, as after a new creation, 'Increase and multiply;' nay, it is said (Gen. ix. 1, 7), 'the fear of God's name was so much the more readily in operation, may we were that by the secret seed, his most righteous and unrighteousness, is accursed. And the reason of its being accursed is, from the great, I should say infinite, disproportion that there is between an image and the divine nature; and the filthy associations and unholy uses to which the images of false gods are put are enough to excite the anger of God. If the insensible wood, or image, then, is cursed, no wonder that the maker of it should be so in an equal or greater degree, as it follows in the next passage, where it is said, 'As it was, so he made it.'

This is agreeable to scripture, which says, 'Cursed is the man which maketh any graven or molten image, and putteth it in a secret place; i.e. privately worships it; for it is upon account of its being worshipped, that it is there called an abomination unto the Lord' (Deut. xxv. 15). Nor is it particular to the scripture only, but is a general and eternal condemnation upon the idol-maker; even the poets, when they give us an account of Prometheus's vanity, tell us, at the same time, how their Jupiter vindicated his honour, by the swallowing up of this unholy image. Thus we cannot think this verse and the context would be more perfect, if the worshipper, who is the principal, if not the only offender, had been inserted. For the idol itself is senseless and inanimate, or, rather, that word, as we have been before, is used as a thing, and therefore, as such, cannot be the object of punishment; but the person who sins by it, which is Cephalus's objection against Plato's opinion, that theDegradation of the gods, and idolatry that makes the idols, how far he is faulty, the following lines of Martial will inform us:—

'Quiigit sacris aure vel marrome venimus, Non factis ille Deos; qui eum intra Sacri.'

So that as he alone turns images into pictures or idols or false gods who worship them, he should have been chiefly taken notice of as proclaimed to the divine disapprobation. As it is the worship therefore that makes properly the idol, possibly the idolator may be included in the maker, and it is the action that makes it, and such Calmet says it may be understood, le fauX Dieu, with cuiel qui lui rend un culte sacrilige (Com. in loc.).

Ver. 11. Therefore even upon the idols of the gentiles shall there be no name for them, nor any likeness thereof; for they are all vanity. This may be understood in three senses according as we understand the term idol, which may either mean the material image, or the false god represented by it; the idols are not by any means to be esteemed as useful; they are unlawful, and punishment or punishment can properly come upon the idol which is animate? The Chaldee paraphrase upon Exod. xii. 12, will explain this, where the judgments threatened upon the idolaters are expressed in the same sense as in the instances: Idolis testaæa fieri ministra frustra, idolis lignae fiant cinas. And that the images of their god Apas and their other deities, were thrown down by an earthquake when their first born were slain, St. Jerome asserts, ad Fabiol, from Jewish tradition, and Artapanus in Euseb. lib. ix. de Prapar. The like example was made of Dagon, by the virtue of the divine majesty appearing on the left; it fell before it, and laid on the ground a headless idol, and a senseless trunk. Or it may mean, that the demons and evil spirits which inhabited these idols, and from thence gave their delusive oracles should be detected and dispersed. St. Cyprian speaks of them in aftertimes as thus visited, Hi adjurat per deum verum a nobis, statum cedunt, et de omni corpori humani, sudum que est, et operatione majestatis occultae, flagris eand, raga torrei, incremento perna propagandi extendit, ejldare, geneere, despraeent (De Idol. variae, 35). The manner by which all these instances of their writings, foretell that there shall be a final period put to idolatry, Isa. ii. 11. Zech. xii. 2. Jer. x. 15, where the prophet, speaking of idols, says, according to the LXX 'to equal treachery he exposed images;': and one of them, who can conceive, therefore, that groves images should be supplied; 'Cursed is the green image which is made with hands.' But this likewise must be understood with some limitation, for the bare image is not that condemned, for, besides that Moses calls this art one of the gifts of God, that act of God in giving orders for the brazen serpent to be made and set up, and the cherubim to be placed above the ark, might be intended, else the image of images is not unlawful. Accordingly, the writers of the deacoglave do not understand the second commandment, as it is forbidden to make images in general, but the making them with a desire to represent God to the memory, or to worship and kneel before them. The sense therefore of this passage seems to be, that the image, which is to be made, is to be there the worship of it. If it be of images, in general, but the making them with a desire to represent the majesty, or to worship and kneel before them. The sense therefore of this passage seems to be, that the image, which is to be made, is to be there the worship of it. If it be might be better able to answer them in their own language.

Because in the creature of God they are become an abomination: The sense seems to be, that idols are an abomination by the abuse of some of God's creatures; for whatever be the matter of their idols, whether gold, silver, stone, or wood, in the hands of idolaters, which are represented by this misapplication of them to idolatrous purposes; and, on this account, God will show his displeasure and resis-tment even against such inessential things.

Ver. 12. For the deceiving of idols was the beginning of (spiritual) fornication. In the language of scripture, idol-ity is represented as a sort of fornication or adultery; and the thing is properly so called, because the persons which are deceived are like the heathen idolaters, who were likewise the most infamous fornicators, and their hidden mysteries were little else than acts of uncleanness, a melancholy 84 adultery, in which the spirits of men are changed into the likeness of the devils. Tertullian's words are very observable, who joins these vices as if they were inseparable. Quis immundius spiritubus operatus, nor computans, nor consumptus incedat (1 Pet. iv. 19), says he. Without naming customs of the gentiles, says, "that they walked in lasciviolosity and lusts, and abominable idolatries" (1 Pet. iv. 3). The word translated idolatries, in the Septuagint, has for its etymology the words, the texts of which are, a account of the lewd amours of their false gods; and when once men began to be as conscientious crimes by the authority of their gods, there was nothing which they did more earnestly to the souls who were deprived of the benefit of their example. Ego Homunculo non facerem (Eunuch. act. iii. sc. 5) was therefore but a natural conclusion, when the great thunderer was known to have committed fornication, to which the thunder is early the punishment

cleanness, it is very properly here called fornication. This is the corruption of life. That genos signifies corruption through lust, is evident from many places of scripture where it is so used, particularly in the epistle of St. Paul to the Ephesians, it is so taken by Ignatius, and other ancient ecclesiastical writers, and by Philo, who ranks it with fornication and adultery; and, as a branch of great uncleanness, ranks it amongst the fornication and incests, as a breach of the seventh commandment (Phil. de Spec. Leg.).

Ver. 13. For neither were they from the beginning, nor do they be for ever. The most ancient idolatry was undoubtedly the worship of the sons of Adam; and it seems, as ancient as this was, we read nothing of it certain, and which may be absolutely depended on, before the deluge; nor are learned men in general agreed, that it was one of those pollutions which defiled the old world. And indeed there were many causes which might prevent the sin of idolatry so early,—as, the infancy of the world from the creation, the memory of which must be still fresh (the longevity of the intendants, of Adam, Seth, and the rest of the holy line, who could, and did most probably, inculcate and deliver to their families, what themselves were so taught and accustomed to), and the efforts of God's grace and goodness. Add to this, likewise, the appearance of the Abyss, or Son of God, to Adam and others (see on Tensio on Idol. p. 29). The worship of images came in much longer after the earliest account we have of them is probably that of Laban's teraphim, Gen. xxxi. or his Penates, as they are called (see Selden, de cult. extran. primad. cap. 3). It apppears they were very ancient, and were possessed or ab-tained in the hands of the heathen nations, above a hundred and seventy years before they had any images, but they were idolaters long before that time. Tarquinius Priscus tells a story of how he was thought to have introduced them from the Greeks (see Auson. in ep. x. l. 55), But see the Laws of the Church, p. 289. Our author intimates, that the custom of worshipping dead men for gods contributed to it (ver. 14). But this is most probably a piece of the same what account; so that idolatry may be looked upon as of late date, compared to the most ancient and true religion, which had its roots down in the ground, and spread itself over the world. And as God hath already blotted out the very names of many of the heathen idols, it may be looked upon as an earnest of the utter destruction of the rest. And when they entered into the world, and therefore shall they come shortly to an end.] Vain and proud men, not content with common honours, aspired after divine, and, being detected to have partaken of a principle of vanity and self-love, would have their images erected and adored, proposing immortality to themselves from hence; but their expectations have been frustrated, and are not to be realized. Besides, the representations of translators render it in the future tense, as prophetic of what shall happen hereafter; but the original expresses it, by the time past,"

So this writer was not to set down all the sorts of idolatry, nor the original and order of each in point of time; he did not mean this as the actual order, in which all the other things were to be exclude, or deny, that there are others more ancient, which he himself mentions in some of the foregoing chapters. His design here is only to show the ridiculousness of idolatry.
and the folly of idolaters; and this he has sufficiently done, by showing the rise of some of them, in the common history of the world, along with the names and histories of notable Dieters (see Idolatry, and its Dissertation sur l'Origine De l'Idolatrie).

Ver. 16. And grooves were worshipped by the common people, to imagine Idols, and erect themselves, as myriads of vineyards, are by reason of their myriads; and thus Coverdale renders, "Tyrrants compelled men by violence to worship images;" which seems preteritable, as it suits better with the character of the latter; for a good image, or even a work which Nebuchadnezzar ordered, upon pain of death, to be paid to the golden image, which, in the province of Babylon, he had set up (Dan. iii.). Nor had Darius' decree of worshiping his image, which is his best image, a stamp more honourable than any upon the most valuable coin, or even art itself can reach. We cannot have a fuller picture of the worship of kings, than that of the jews of ancient times, who in their idolatry, should be counted of the rebuke and the reproof of the ancient world.

Ver. 17. They were not of one heart, as was the case of the grooves, but they might flatter him that was absent, as if he were present.] The author here considers the original of the worship and dedication of kings; that at first, and in a more religious instance, instance of civil respect to them, and fondness for them; who being far distant from many parts of their dominions, and often absent from them in foreign wars, their subjects by this device supplied the loss of their personal residence among them. But this afterwards was the occasion of great superstitious and idolatry; for in time, and especially after the deaths of their favourite kings, which gave occasion for reverence, and consequent preference of the most ancient, they proceeded even to adoration of them. The heatheans were induced probably to this worship of their kings, either out of a compliment to their vanities, or was often the case; or from an opinion that, being the representatives of God's power on earth, worship was really due to them; or upon account of their extraordinary virtues; or from a sense of gratitude for benefits received from them; but there was nothing of policy in the worship of their dead kings; for by thus paying homage to departed merit, they hoped hereby to be elevated to his presence, and to receive new favours, or at least to be vouchsafed a share in the regal honours that were his due.

Ver. 18. Also the singular diligence of the artistes helped to set forward the ignorant to more superstition.] i.e. To lead the ignorant into more superstition. Coverdale's version of the place is, more clearly, and better expressed (see Principes de La Sculpture, liv. ii. cap. 1). Clemens Alexandrinus observes, that before the art of carving was invented, the ancients erected pillars, and paid their worship to them, as to statues of their gods (Strom. lib. i.). Pan-saurus, in his excellent survey of Greece, says, that in early times men worshipped rude stones, sharpened only at the top, and which were called godstones by the ancient authors, and figures of the Phoenicians in particular (see Append. ad lib. de emend. Temp.). But when sculpture, and picture, and other ways of adorning images, were invented, they were either in proportion advanced; for images, as appears both from the Greek and Roman history, being the means to increase it, the more art and skill that were used to recommend and set the object in a meaner place; or, as it were, to make it appear pleasanter and seduced by them; for the unskilful mul-Ver. 20. Took him now for a god, which a little before was but honoured as a man.] ExPepa χαραγματος. ExPepa is more generally taken for worship; but sometimes it signifys the thing or being, that is worshipped. Thus we find it used, Acts xxvi. 23. άπειραινέω την ανοίγον τερης, which our translation renders, "beholding your devotions;" but the reading would be more suitable, as beholding his worship, or, as the margin has it, beholding the gods you worship. Theophylact accordingly expounds it by δεινον, which Athens was notorious for worshiping deluding cities, or colossus or genius, or, as we should now say, statue. Did arescribe unto stones and stocks, &c.] This is a short, but somewhat obscure rehearsal of the causes of idolatry, mentioned at large in the former seven foregoing verses. Accordingly with other reasons, it arose either from grief for the loss of some favourite person, whose memory, by an instance of mistaken tenderness, was endeavored to be preserved; or from the uncontrollable will and authority of tyrants appointing worship and adoration to be paid to insensible statues; which was complied with generally out of a servile fear; but to good princes they voluntarily erected them, not as mere compliments to their vanity, but as testimonials of love and respect. St. Chrysostom's observation on the beginning of idolatry is very just: ουτω τολμαωντων ου τινως νηχειν θεον, παντες χωροτεκανθλησθηκαν, και και νησιων ονομασθηκαν, ἡ παντοτητα ειρηνως, χορευτης ζωες χορευτης. Hom. 87. in Matt. where ουσια seems to be used in the sense of our author (ver. 15).

Did arescribe unto stones and stocks the incomunicable name.] i.e. Of God, as the margin rightly supplies; which title eminently, and by way of distinction from all other gods, belonged to the God of Israel, and he only true being in the Hebrew tongue accordingly called God Ha- shem, i.e. the name; and from hence, no doubt, Ashshon, an appellation of God, is derived. The critics likewise observe, that the name of God was not revealed to the Gentiles by itself or put absolutely, in the Mosaical writings, or elsewhere, it means God himself, or the "incomunicable name." And indeed the name of God cannot properly be communicated by the mouth of man, for though true, for though names proper are given, we know, to the indeviduals of the same species, to distinguish them from each other; yet, God being singular in his kind, his name is as incommunicable as his essence. And thus St. Cyprian; Ncc nomen Dei quasars; Deus nomen est igitur. The vocabulary and punctuation of the Tetragrammoniot, or other dimrinda est; Deo qui solus est, Deus vocabulum torum est (De Idol. vanit.). And therefore, when Moses earnestly inquired after his name, he took the name of 109; impious, wicked, and profane, and other such words, and pronounced the name is none but that God truly is, and that all others were false gods, pretending to what they were not, and assuming a name which did not belong to them. Hence therefore we see the reason and peculiar sanctity of the Tetragrammoniot; for other names of God being applicable to other things or persons, as Elohyn to princes, &c. the name Jehovah or Jerry, or Iah, was not communicated to, or participated by, any other person, or thing, therefore forbidden as the only name that Jehovah is his own peculiar name (Exod. ii. 14); and thus the ancient English translations, and the oriental versions, seem to understand it. But there is another sense likewise of the vocalname; viz. that great ineffable name which must not be communicated or mentioned. Josephus calls it, proropedyv miv o ameon ékoi éh Hgino, i.e. "a name which it is unlawful to speak of." Thus the Jewish rabbins, and paid such a religious regard to, that the name Jehovah was among them ἀνάνοιξα, never to be uttered, unless once in a year by the high priest, on the great day of expiation; and that name is to be called, "a God without a name;" and thus he is described by some early writers, particularly by Justin Martyr, who calls him θεός οὐ κατάρας (Apol. Secund.). And in this sense we may understand ἱερόν θεόν, as in the Orato-riums. Where in the latter part, we are not to understand words, as"our translation renders, as "words which ought not to be spoken;" and so ἱερόν is used by Philo, De Somniis, p. 3. It seems the same case with the following: "words which God alone can utter:" and thus a learned writer explains them: Verba tante majestatis, ut hominum Dei autem et probectorum argumentum (Witsch Mel. vol. i. p. 81). Ver. 32. Whereas they lived in the great war of ignorance, those so great plagues called they peace. Μεγάλης δέ εἰσιν κακίας. "Aylene here plainly refers to the words before, "a God without a name," and may be interpreted to be the same as here, the God and his worship," which being plainly referred to the slaughter of children, obscene rites, adultery, murder, and other manifest evils and mischiefs, of which there is an old and black catalogue in the following verses, may in some sense be called the mother of war as well as superstition; and yet, as shocking as these vices were, these they called peace; i.e. they were pleased with them, and thought their tendencies happy in the most miserable condition, and under the greatest evils: Its sort are insensible, pour regarder cet état comme un bouchon, says Calmet, Com. in loc. And the same idea is expressed by the Romans, which allude to those who should esteem the calamities of a war a blessing. The expression in this verse is very singular. But Tacitus has given such very much resembles it. Jul. Agric. cap. vii. 39, which will shew, that Tacitus, and therefore the Romans, allude to those who have destroyed all before them with fire and sword, they pretend to call all the injures they have done by the false name of peace, old soliditericorum, jucem appelvant. Ver. 29. For whilst they slew their children in sacrifices. Some of the vice mentioned in this and the following verses are the very sacred rites of the heathen worship itself, that infamous and impious custom of offering their children in sacrifice to Moloch. Groius says, that it was a custom among the Phoenicians for their kings, in times of great em- press, to sacrifice one of the only one of his species, that there among sacrificing their own children peculiar to barbarous na- tions; we likewise meet with instances of this cruelty among the Greeks and Romans, and even, by the psalmist's account (Ps. cvi. 10), and with the Vulgate (in loc. in xii. 5, 6, where the subject is handled more at large).

Or used secret ceremonies. Κιβοῦ μυστήριον. They were also called ἐν οὐανία ὅπως, ό ἐν οὐανία, όν τῆς κοιτί, which verses, the ω ἐν ω ἐστιν were acquainted with only, and were concealed from all others; hence, in such writers as make mention of these rites, as Herodotus, Diodorus, Apuleius, all is mystery and darkness; such were the sacrifices of Ceres, Isis, Cybele, Proserpina, Vesta, Priapus, and of all the other gods. These were usually celebrated in the night, in groves, caverns, and secret places; and to such mysteries of iniquity prais- ed among the heathen, St. Paul may be thought to allude, who, when he wrote to the Galatians, says, "that the things which are done of them in secret" (Eph. v. 12). It appears, also, that they were imitated into the service of their idol by learned and indented ceremonies; the LXX. therefore very properly, in Honour of their pretended gods or sacred, to call these idolaters by the sacrificial term, ἅμαρτολοι, which the Chaldee paraphrase upon the place thus renders, Phalaris, Ep. iv. 32. The word ἅμαρτολοι signifies sacrificial canons and poty. Nay, which is still more shocking, there are instances, both in profane and sacred writings, of prostitutes even in the very temples themselves: thus Josuva,

Or made revellings of strange rites. Εὔμενες [ἐνδόξων θεόπλη σεων] σαρών. The Geneva bible renders, "Or raging dis- solutions by strange rites." The passage seems to be none very obscure, and the meaning of it is, that there were secret ceremonies or mad revellings of strange rites, i.e. bacellularian rites, such as Theodoret calls τας ἀσυκοστικὰς ἱερας, and Lacantius, more closely, works of madness, Quod de ritu sacrilego dicebat, or the writers of the Roman Empire. There is certainly an excercit (Instit. lib. vi. cap. 23). Kőros here is used in an impure sense, and means amorous revels, or unlawful gra- tifications; by means of which, as it follows in the next verse, they grieved others with adultery: and so, where mention is made, 2 Mac. vi. 4, before quoted, that, by dallying with harlots. In the same sense σαρών is used, Rom. xii. 13. Gal. v. 21, 1 Pet. iv. 3, and by Theocritus, and the scholiasts on that poet, an impure person is styled σαρών; which is agreeable to the character of the god the Romans called Priapus. Which passage in Com. on the 6th. of Matt. is to be considered as the true meaning of the word, as a name, for it may not be supposed that in that name, the Roman priests, when they have destroyed all before them with fire and sword, they pretend to call all the injuries they have done by the false name of peace, old soliditericorum, jucem appellate.

Ver. 23. That they reigned in all men without excre- tion blood, manslaughter. Our translation manifestly fol- lows a copy which read σάρων, probably the Latin; but the expression must be confined, though a very general one, to the idolaters only; for to fix such black crimes on all men, without exception, is too extensive and un- just a charge; and, if it be considered thus universally, becomes with it a false and unarrantable imputation: it must, therefore, have the same limited sense as ἄτικας ἀθέην. Acts xiv. 16, which should not be rendered "all na- tions," as our translation has it; but the meaning is, as the renderers of the Septuagint, that in times past God suffered the heathen, as distinguished from others, to walk in their own ways; and so σαρών here must imply only the heathen idolators, who were the persons guilty of these deter- minate vices. This sense is the most literal and better reading, νίκαι καὶ φασιν, allia καὶ φασιν, "all things or rather crimes, are confounded," i.e. all sorts of actions and acts are confounded, and among the heathen idolaters, are the same actions; and so these are the sad consequences of idol-worship. This is the sense of Junius and Calmet, and is confirmed by the Vulgate and all the ancient versions, and is indeed to be preferred, as it stands in the best manuscripts. See these note on xii. 5, 6. And in a following satire there is the like charge, "Quo non proest feminas templi?" (Sat. ix.)

The like may be inferred from the history of Pauline, who was debauched by Deceus in the temple Isis, under the directions of the Roman Emperor; and a story is told that the god Amulis there (see Joseph. Antiq. lib. xvii. cap. 4. see also Amos ii. 8, which is by many understood in the like sense). But the account in 2 Macc. vi. 4, That the temple was held by a man named Philius, that he dallied with harlots, and had to do with women within the circuit of the holy places," is so full, that no further proof is necessary. is used Deut. xvi, 8, where mention is made of a matter in dispute between God, and blood, and blood, in which one of them must mean casual murder, and both, together answer to αἷμα καὶ φῶς; here, and to γυναικα, and γυναικα δακάνιν in the Hebrew, i. e. "blood and bloods," or "blooded and murdered:" that γυναικα in the singular number, takes in all manslaughter, in battle, tumults, casualties, &c. and γυναικα "treacherous, wilful, and insidious murders," and so implies the strongest expression of guilt (see Pagninus' Thesaurus, and Kircher's Concordance, in voc. γυναικα; and there is an example of this, where the prophet, who was undoubtedly a wilful murder, it is expressed in the plural, according to the Hebrew. We have in Ecclus. xl. 9, διακόνοια καὶ φῶς, "death and bloodshed;" where φῶς cannot mean murder, because it is a punishment inflicted by God, as the sword; so in Ezek. v. 17, xxxviii. 23, xxxviii. 22, διακόνοια καὶ φῶς is rendered "pestilence and blood;" where φῶς signifies any unusual sort of death rather than murder.

Dissimulation, i. e. This, I think, would be better rendered deceit or cheating, which is its more usual acceptation; and so it is taken in the description of such idolaters, Rom. i. 29. This sense likewise is more agreeable to the context. By deceit or cheating it is intended, fraudulently, and by Calmet, in tromperie.

Corruption, unfaithfulness, i. e. φρονήμα, φρονία. We are not to understand φρονήμα of corruption of manners in general, nor phil sepulchral, a word which comprehends all such practices, probably bribery, in some, as induced others to unfaithfulness, or breach of trust, which is the φρονία that follows. We are not to understand here the Syroec and Arabic versions, with Junius, agree, rendering the words by corrupta and perfidia; which latter is certainly a more proper word than infidelities, which the Vulgate render, Longinus. Ver. 36. Disguising of good men, i. e. φρονήμα φρονία. It may as well signify, according to the present pointing of the Greek, "concealing of good things," bonorum rerum confusio or dissimulation. But according to the sense of our version, and of almost all the commentators, these idolaters were not only φρονιμωτα, but despisers of those that were good (2 Tim. iii. 2), but their opposers and persecutors: but what the propriety of this rendering; for I do not well understand how φρονήμα φρονία can signify anything, but a crowd or tumult of good persons, or a multitude of people in general; or how it can be rendered with our translators, "disguising of good men." Would not the construction be better, if these three words φρονήμα φρονία καί γυναικα were put under the same stich in the Alex. MS, and φρονήμα be rendered by itself? It will be sufficiently distinguished from τίταν, which goes before, as it is of stronger signification and greater imputation: but φρονήμα and φρονία (Acts xii. 18), "no small stir among the soldiers;" but φρονία is properly "tumults, riots, insurrections." It is one of those signs of civil disorder, and it may be considered as the conclusion of that climax. And, indeed, the bible commonly called St. Jerome's actually so distinguishes, and renders φρονία by itself, τιτανό: bonorum Dei immemorato, i.e. "forgetfulness of God's benefits," or of the good things received from the grace and kindness of God; which is likewise Tiranus' interpretation of τίταν. But, according to our version, it means no more than iniquitatem: which is sense of consequence enough to be inserted in the midst of so black a catalogue.

Defilement of souls, τίταν ἐλαχυσίως. According to the rendering of all the English versions, no particular vice seems denoted hereby; it may be equally predicated of every crime here enumerated, that, as a sin, it is a defiling of the soul. I would therefore interpret it defection, defection in taking in the whole man, body as well as soul; in which sense it often occurs in scripture; and, as the expression is plural, it may be supposed to include the sin of more than one person. And so it may be rendered, that the bodies, as well as souls, were jointly concerned: and, according to the character of such idolaters, and as it stands connected with other like vices, it seems most probably to be understood, especially as γας καταστροφὴς καὶ δισεύσα, both which our version seems to understand of that particular vice, are capable of another and very consistent sense. For barbarous and ungodly idolatry, may not be then suppose εὐαρπαίον μακροδοκία to be the true reading, and to denote that particular species of uncleanness? St. Jude has the same expression, and, as it seems, upon the like occasion of filthiness. That εὐαρπαίον is often used plurally, see Job ii. 5. Wisdom xiii. 5. Apost. iv. 15. xxii. 21.

Ver. 19. Lastly, if I must be brief, what I have conjectured, may not εὐαρπαίον μακροδοκία be thought agreeable to this place? i. e. defiling of natures, or sexes, by bestial or unnatural mixtures; see Lev. xiv. where all these abominations and idolatrous Canaanites are forbidden to be brought into the land, and the idolatrous Canaanites, on that account, said to be to be done. I shall only add, that only persons of such uncleanness, as if it did utterly deprive them of that which was theirs, and which, therefore, called an abomination, are in scripture called by the name of dogs (Apostal. xxii. 15).

Changing of Kings, τιτανία κακαία. Our translators seem to have had in mind τιτανία κακαία; but Coverdale's and the other ancient versions understand by it, "changing of birth," i.e. uncertainty of legitimate issue; for, says Calmet, where marriages are defiled, and adulterated, there is great corruption in the birth of children, the uncertainty of the issue; and spurious and doubtful children will often be brought into families. The Vulgate reads, nativitas inanis, and the Arabic more clearly, parties communicant, and Badwolls, prolixus supposito et adulterato; expressions all denoting spurious or supposititious children. Grotes is singular in expounding it of sodomy. The learned Selden propounds it as a doubt, whether women of the same birth, or relation to some idolatrous rite, particularly the change of the sex (which is the marginal reading), by the woman assuming the habit and appearance of a male, and soymes professing, as they do in some things, the worship of the Assyrian Venus, or Astarte. According to Julius Firmicus, the priests of that goddess must not otherwise officiate: Nisi autem sexum simul tunc Quærum sepulsit, saecule servata adorat, De errore prot. Relig. cap. 4. And in this sense Selden explains Deut. xxii. 5, for the mere exchange of habit was not in itself so faulty; but being an idolatrous rite, as such, it was utterly to be prohibited, and is therefore called an abomination (De errore Prot. Relig. cap. 4). And in this sense Selden explains Deut. xxii. 5, for the mere exchange of habit was not in itself so faulty; but being an idolatrous rite, as such, it was utterly to be prohibited, and is therefore called an abomination; as well as Nisma vero serviatis, saeculo servata adorat; see Selden, Syntax. cap. 4, who quotes Maimonides, as explaining the precept in the same manner. "That the counterfeiting the sex was not so much forbidden, as the whole worship of Venus, which is called in the Concordance, and Our translators, inane and senseless marriage, which are dissolved at pleasure.

And shameless uncleanness, ἀπορνησία. Not any particular act or species of uncleanness is here meant, but this word includes all those kinds and sorts of uncleanness, as it explains, omne lascivum genus (Annot. ad Gal. cap. v. 19). For when men are come to such a pitch of wickedness and degeneracy as to worship such gross, indecent, and public idolatry, or worship in uncleanness, and whose rites are so infamous and shocking as to be even a reproach to human nature; such a religion must of course corrupt their lives, and produce those sensual lusts, and all manner of vileness and uncleanness, which are abhorred. We have the like melancholy account of the heathen before, Rom. i. 23, 24, which the apostle charges upon their idolatry, as the consequences and effects of it; for God abandoned them, who had displeased him so much by idol-worship, to those unnatural lusts, called there ἐνεργεῖαι ἁθανάτου, as being the greatest abuse of the species, and a dishonour to the human nature. That such instances of lust and uncleanness, as are here mentioned, were practised frequently by the heathen in their sacred rites, see Lev. xviii. 21. 1 Kings xiv. 24. xv. 12. 2 Kings xxiv. 17. Pet iv. 3. Hence St. Paul, in the epistles to the other churches, not only expressly mentions the barbarous and ungodly idolatry itself. Such actions of lust were also among the Grecians in their worship (Epiph. Hares. xxvi.). And instances are there given to excite the reader to a virtuous life. Ver. 27. For the worshipping of idols not to be named. The Jews were forbidden to make mention of the names of the heathen idols, Exod. xxiv. 12. 13. where the Lord said unto Moses, that he should not let him see the Chaldean, who added to the name of God, and of the idols, the name of the heathen, to name an idol after the Gentile fashion, to defile the name of God, and of the idol, and of the name of God. In the apostle, the same notion is evidently expressed, as if he had supposed some such word as had some affinity with the true name, but withal expressed their contempt and abhorrence of it: thus they called Baal, Bosheth, i.e. shame ( Hos. ix. 10). And when the mount of Olives was delayed with idolatry, they called it the "Mourn of Corruption" ( μακάκα τοῦ ἀλοιποῦ; 2 Cor. vi. 17). And Lactantius marks the Hebrew Beth-el, which signifies the "house of God," when it came to be the seat of idolatry, was called Beth-auen, i.e. the house of vanity, or the house of desolation (Nativ. chap. 25, which is changed to Bolbebol into Beolbebol, i.e. Domus Stercoreus, by way of contempt and decision: and that grand impostor Barcho- chab, who would have passed for the Messiah in the reign of Tiberius, was called of the Seldanists, Seni-lum mendisc. (Syntag. ii. cap. 6, where more instances of this occur). And, as the Jews were not to mention the names of the heathen idols, or strange gods, so neither might they be called by these names. (Ver. 7). Man- monides says, that, as the Hebrew canons, it was forbidden to make an infuld swear by his god, or even to mention the name thereof (De Princ.)

For the worshipping of idols—is in the beginning, the cause, and the end, of all evil. Idolatry is, in the opinion of Ter- tullian, the principal crime of mankind, the chief guilt of the world, the total cause of God's judgments and displea- sure; for thus he begins his book, De Idolatria:—"Prin- cipale crimen generis humani, summis sancti reatus, tota causa judicii idolatria;" intimating hereby, that it is a kind of original sin, that has brought all other crimes into the Judge of the world passeth condemnation (Tennison on Idol. p. 39). Lactantius goeth still higher in his censure of it, calling it the inexpiable wickedness (Instit. lib. i. cap. 19). But we shall see that they are both taken for the same thing. The writer in his sentiments upon the guilt of idolatry; for he calleth it, errorem et opus, οὗ τὸ πάσχος, "the beginning and end of all errors" (De xxviii. de Idol.); which are the very words of our author.

Ver. 29. For either they are mad when they be merry. i.e. When they dance before the idol, or rejoice at the idol- feast, in which both the wise and those who are mere heathens, are very commonly present, they often have the verbs used in the following verse, and there are but two or three in the Bible where it is so used (see Acts vii. 41); or it may refer to the mad howlings in their orgia, or Bacchanalian feasts, or to the drunkenness and extravagance commonly attending them. It is possible, that they gave themselves up like wild beasts, that their heads wreathed about with snakes, wildly brandishing their thyrses, and tearing the flesh even of living animals to pieces with their teeth. Julius Firmicus thus describes these revels: Heile [in Origis] inter ebras puellas, et virulentos senes, cum scelerum pompam precederat, alter nigro amnicu- teter, alter ostensio anges terribilis, et cruentus ore, dum vivas victimas, et capita inveniant, et in venationem imperiant (Instil, xxxviii.); which is expressly mentioned, called also, νεκροσ τινας καμελημάζουσιν (ver. 21).

Or else lightly forswear themselves. i.e. Without any scruple: which is not to be wondered at; for an oath can have no force, if it be given to an idolatrous god, whom neither convinced of the truth of their religion, nor influ- enced by the power of it, nor affected by any awe or expec- tation of punishment. Immaterial altogether; every instance of it being the beginning of the perjury of the heathens; as that of Antiochus the younger, who, notwithstanding the oath made to the people of Israel, yet overthrew the wall of Zion (1 Mac. vi. 62). And part of the charge given by Ju- das Maccabaeus to his men, before his final engagement with Nicanor, was to show the falsehood of the heathen, and their breach of oaths (2 Mac. xcv. 10). To this sin of perjury, so frequent among the heathen, Spencer and other learned men think the psalmist alludes, Ps. cxlv. 7, 8, "Deliver me from the hand of the strange children, whose mouth talketh of vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood. Forsake ye him, for he is the adversary of the soul, and hath neither life nor light; that they may swear falsely, yet they look not to be hurt. The like observation is made upon idols in the epistle of Je- remy:—"Though a man make a vow unto them, and keep it not, the god of gods will show him mercy. But should they swear by his name, and falsely swear to them, by lifting up dextra falsitatis, "the hand of deceit" (see also Ovid. Fast. lib. vi. ver. 651).

And who hath not wrought in vain those which have no life; that they may swear falsely, yet they look not to be hurt. The like observation is made upon idols in the epistle of Je- remy:—"Though a man make a vow unto them, and keep it not, the god of gods will show him mercy. But should they swear by his name, and falsely swear to them, by lifting up dextra falsitatis, "the hand of deceit" (see also Ovid. Fast. lib. vi. ver. 651). This is the sort of oath by which they all swear, which is to be apprehended, whether they swear by their gods they swore by had neither life nor power, so the heathens feared not any punishment from them for any breach of faith, as knowing they were ignorant of what passed, and were never sure of spoiling their witnesses, therefore, very vitally scorces the heathens on this account, when he says, Tuttis iut per Jovis, geminum percurranque Can- car, inquit, se, et imperciorem magnitudo se in suo amore, of being sensible they would punish them for their perju- ries; but their idols being res nihil, "mere nothing," their oaths like wise were thought to be of no consequence; hence they made a jest of the obligation or sacredness of them; not unlike those Greeks of whom the orator speaks, quibus substantiam falsae juraciones, ut fieret, dedit Gaeus, or those whom Juvenal describes, interpedios altar tangere, approaching the altars boldly, without any sense of fear, though without a legal power; hence the oaths are, in this wise this further reason to promise themselves impunity in the commission of many of their crimes—that herein they imitated their deities, and were warranted by their example. Dr. Grabe seems not sensible of this, and things read, which is the reading likewise of the Alex. MS., as a cor- rupt one, into the margin, substituting ὅς δὲ εἰς Ἑλλάδα, for ὅς δὲ εἰς Ἑλλάδα, and soomitsesthe heathen, one may infer, that the nothingness of the idol will not, as has been pretended, excuse the worshipper. For though an idol be formally nothing of that which it is, yet, as the heathen say, such and such a stone, or such and such a name, or stone, yet relatively an idol is something; and an oath by it, or worship and sacrifice offered to it, is not offered to no- thing, but to that which is commonly offered in and about those heathens upon their onomac relisions.

Because they thought not well of God, giving heed unto idols. Not unlike that is of St. Paul, Rom. i. 25, where it is said, τῷ θεῷ τοῖς ἔθεσιν, they worshipped the creature more than the Creator, τῷ τινι κτιστα- ναι, i.e. they worshipped the creature jointly and together with the Creator; or rather, as the original words will bear, they worshiped the creature when they worshipped the right of the Creator, i.e. they worshipped an idol, or stone, yet relatively an idol is something; and an oath by it, or worship and sacrifice offered to it, is not offered to no- thing, but to that which is commonly offered in and about those heathens upon their onomac relisions.

Despising holiness. Καθαρατονομος, ψευδοτριες. The Vul- gate renders, in dolo contentemtes justitiam, applying to &c. to the last sentence. St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, reads with an awkward footnote, "this thing follows from the former." The word νομος, which we translate law, properly means a rule, a standard, and in this sense we render it. The Vulgate rendered praeventio, either by justitia or veritas, applying it to that branch of righteousness which consists in the act of preserving the truth in the opinion of the &c. which one man has a right to expect from another. And, therefore, Dr. Magny, with great judgment, conjectures, that the true reading here is, veritas, which seems the more probable, as nothing is more common, than the exchange of ἐρετος and ἐρετος and vice versa (see notes in Philo, De Decem Orac.).

Ver. 31. For it is not the power of them by whom they swear: but it is the just recompense of (leg. against) sinners, that punisheth always the offence of the ungodly. Our ver- sion is somewhat obscure; but the meaning is, that idola- ters and false swearers, who have no god, or if they have, Vulgar rendered praeventio, shall certainly be punished; yet not by any act or power of their idols, or false gods, who can take no cognizance of it, for they are neither capable of sense nor motion; therefore the ungodly God, the revenger of injustice, and of strange and false worship: that the punishment of perjured persons, when it has happened (which the superstitious pagans laid much stress upon, that the false gods, which was no gods; see Juv. Sat. viii.), was rather to be ascribed to the vengeance of the only true God. St. Austin therefore rightly states the difference, non te auditis leporum, sed unius Deus fallacem. which all other nations were infected. He enlarges upon the folly of idolaters, and the inverte is carried on against such as make idols; particularly images made of clay. From this he proceeds to the more particular mention of the maker of them less excusable, than of the groaven ones in the former chapter; inasmuch as himself and work are both a composition of clay. Nor do we think it a very attempt to make a deity of such perishing materials, and by a hand itself frail and mortal, is little less than a contradiction; that they are correct answers to the work which the life, sense, or motion, in common with other images; but are more describable on account of the earth they are made of, which speaks its own decay. The chapter concludes with a warning to the Jews not to be infected with the images and forms of the idols of the heathen; and the like notions suit with the morals and character of him or his people. For it is certain, that Solomon revolted to idolatry, and that this otherwise great prince, contrary to the caution given,From Exod. xxiv. 21. beloved of the Wife of Zibmonites, and other strange women, who turned his heart after other gods. And it seems highly probable, by what is mentioned, that he did, at least, in this the forty-third year of his reign, show very little improvement in the good fortune to keep themselves pure from the abominations of the heathens; and from hence one may conclude that this writer fixed written after the captivity; for before that time he could not say this with any truth or confidence, when idolatry was so common both in Israel and Judah.

Nor an image spotted with divers colours, the painter's deceitful labor of art, and hence Græcius, in his introduction to the history of the Jews: 'I. is, the author of this book to be an Alexandrian Jew; for they, following the exhibition which the LXX. make of the dialogue supposed likewise to be Alexandrian Jews; see Holo de deceitful labour of art, and hence Græcius, in his introduction to the history of the Jews: 'I. is, the author of this book to be an Alexandrian Jew; for they, following the exhibition which the LXX. make of the dialogue supposed likewise to be Alexandrian Jews; see Holo de deceitful labour of art, and hence Græcius, in his introduction to the history of the Jews: 'I. is, the author of this book to be an Alexandrian Jew; for they, following the exhibition which the LXX. make of the dialogue supposed likewise to be Alexandrian Jews; see Holo de deceitful labour of art, Ver. 1. But thou, O God, art—true, i. e. The true God, being a that necessarily exists; whereas the existence of idols is only imaginary; or the meaning may be,—that thy word is true, and thy miracles real; but the oracles of demons are equivocating, and their works lying wonders.

Ver. 2. For if we sin, we are, thou knowest thy power: The whole verse is very obscurely expressed; the sense of this passage seems to be,—if we sin, we are in the hand of God, and under the power of his vengeance, and shall feel the effects of it. At the end of the former chapter, the author of the ancient Greek version, instead of the Hebrew, reads, as if the word "sin" here and "sins" on the other occasions, were simply "transgression." So in all the other places of scripture, where good men, as Moses, David, Ezra, Daniel, lament the sins of the Israelites, and supplicate for them, this consideration is more expressed, than what we find in our translators in those iniquities and transgressions his peculiar people.

But we will not sin, knowing that we are accounted them, i. e. If we continue faithful, and do not sin against thee, thou wilt reckon us in the number of thy children, and fill us with mercy and loving-kindness. All the ancient English versions, it is observable, read in the present tense; thus Coverdale's: "If we sin not, then are we sure that thou regardest us;" and the Arabic is in like manner, Si minime peccamus, in tuo tuamque proprietatem nos reputari novissimae. The comment of Messeer du Port-Royal upon this, who was a most erudite writer about the hands of God, as his enemies; if we sin not, we are in his hands as his friends;" which is followed by this useful reflection; "How careful therefore should we be to pursue every day those virtues, better than anything, which whatever may make him our enemy, because there is no escape from his sovereign hand, which is all-powerful either to save or to destroy." St. Anian quotes this very passage, and draws the like inference; Quis dignus cnhabituationem apud Deum, non emittit ivi vere, at habitation consuetudinis (lib. de fid. et oper.)? There is also another sense of this place, which seems more agreeable to the Greek, viz. We will not sin, because we know that we are in the number of thy children, and that thou regardest us as thine own peculium; from this consideration and persuasion, the fear of God is a powerful warrant this may particularly be supposed; but in such an impure sense it is often taken, particularly Rom. i. 27, where the vices of the idolatrous heathen are enumerated. "We may hence see the danger, and condemn the vicious taste of pictures, or statues, represented naked, and in indecent postures, which (says Calmet) raise loose ideas in weak and unguarded minds, and more so in tempers already corrupted and depraved." (Calmet.)

Ver. 5. The sight whereof enticeth fowls to lust after it. Our translators seem to have made use of a copy which reads, οἱ δὲ θητηρίων which is the reading of the Alexandrian MS., but not of the Septuagint; our margin refers, οἱ διαβόλων θητηρίων. Dr. Grieve, instead of ὑποστάσεις, in the singular number; as the Vulgate dots incessatet; and would not have us so much as to attempt the correction of the reading of the next sentence? By lust, here mentioned, probably is meant that filthy lewdness which the demon, that reared in the idol, often raised in the worshipper towards the image itself; for, that very great and scandalous indecencies were practised, not only before, but even to the very statues themselves, are notorious from Fliny and Athenæus. Thus the latter: Pylagmonio, regem Cyprum, annulorum Veneris adiunctam, et feminam, solutumque dementem, tanquam si uxoriam esset, sublevato in lacteatum numine copulatam amplissimam (lib. vi. cont. Genn.) And indeed the word lex, as well the construction, for in such an impure sense it is often taken, particularly Rom. i. 27, where the vices of the idolatrous heathen are enumerated. "We may hence see the danger, and condemn the vicious taste of pictures, or statues, represented naked, and in indecent postures, which (says Calmet) raise loose ideas in weak and unguarded minds, and more so in tempers already corrupted and depraved." (Calmet.) are most ridiculous, as are made by the plasterer or potter out of clay; which, though very ancient, and probably before those of stone and metal (see Principes de la Sculpture, lib. ii. cap. 1, for the first mention of clay), have in the same way been made before those of stone and metal. There is less difficulty to believe, that images of earth and clay were the most early, yet upon account of the meanness of the materials, and because the same lump of clay could not be used for the same purpose, and often for vessels of dis Shame, he attempts to make a Jupiter or an Apollo."

Ver. 13. "Vain gods! Idols are generally called cacitatis in the prophetic writings, and by the LXX., as frequently translated μαρσα. In Hebrew they are called image, which signifies, 1. things nothing worth, or have no existence, "τα πλασματα," "things that are," as they are called in the additions to the book of Esther (xiv. 11), Dicturnum image, says Mercer, a mithilite, quasi nihil idola sint (Com. in Job xvin. 4). St. Paul confirms the same, when he says, that God is in the world of the same kind of image, Eph. vi. v. viii. Idols are, 2. called image, as being αληθις, not gods, without power or strength (Lev. xix. 4. Ps. xxxvi. 5), whereas Ελιμ and Ελιον are Gods of strength (see Drus. observ. see. lib. xv. ch. ii. 13). Idols are, because they are abominable and accursed things. By the LXX. they are also styled "ει δεινη εις ονοματεραν," because they are "ὑμεις"- "onymous, viz. (b. chap. 11). Hence the phrase, "animam reddere," "to die."

When his life which he lent should be demanded; To the young, draweth gold. Phaedrus thus expresses the thought, Cusa more victra flagitiat destinam. Life is represented in the same manner as a debt by many of the ancients; thus Plato, και ἐν δεινῃ και ταυτα, vita etiam est negotium. St. Paul represents, in like manner, the occasion, Dederunt (Diu) vitam tanquam pecuniam, μαλλα πραιτιστη die (Tusc. Quest. lib. 1). Thus Seneca, speaking of the wise man, says, Vivit commodus ahi, representations sine tristitia reddundus (De tranq. anim. exp. 11). Hence the phrase, "animam reddere," "to die."

We meet with the like thought in Plato: see also Joseph. Antig. lib. vii. chap. 15. lib. viii. chap. 12. Epic. lib. ii. cap. 15. Lake xvi. 30, where the same expression is used and on the like occasion κατον απεκλεισθη την πνεους των δεινων ευγενες."

Ver. 9. Note how hehscaring his care is, not that he should have more care of his life than others; but that his life is short and uncertain, which is the marginal reading; and that at best his life is but short, but his whole contest and aim is for glory, and to carry the prize from all competitors, even the most celebrated in other callings; and the preceding expression of the preciousness of the plastic art, above that of sculpture, &c. as being the mother-art, " mater statuarum, sculpture et costruam," (see Step. Dict. Hier. in voces Praetextatae), or that his own excellence excells or equals the best performances in metal; but his ambition herein is faulty, for he ought to consider this material difference,—that not only his own life is short and uncertain, but that the materials of his counterfeiting things, i.e. his earthen false gods (and such Varrus assures us were common even in the city of Rome; see Pliny, xxxv. 12) are moulder and brittle; whereas the materials of the present time, and the vessels which are mentioned, Namus, or workers in brass, make their deities of what is more solid and durable, and do not descend to the same instances of the hasty change of the worship of such gods as come out of the smith's furnace, or are fashioned by the anvil and hammer, is not here the more commendanted upon account of the value or strength of the materials, but is a rebuke to thelings of Arnobius, who was once guilty of it, a degree of madness (Lab. i. cont. Gent.)."

Ver. 11. Forasmuch as he knew not his Maker, and him that formed him, of whom he was; He cannot have the like comparison and observation, "τοιον ουκ εις καλον σκαλακτη γινεται γλυπτες," &c. &c. "The clay and the potter are of the same matter; the potter indeed excels the clay in beauty and dignity; but it is not owing to any difference of nature, but to the wisdom and appointment of his Maker" (De incomp. Dei, nat. bom. 27). His obligation in particular therefore to God stands confessed, who made him what he is; and having given him, that he may be a vessel for the purposes he sees fit to have for the work of his hands, and for the salvation of his people, therefore the most desirable. And though in general the potter is the best judge of what comes properly under his own art and way of business, and knows what is most suitable and may be used for the meanest occasions, yet for the more noble end of the work, and for vessels of dishonour, he attempts to make a Jupiter or an Apollo."

Ultra facias rem Si poscis, recte; si non, quocumque modo rem (Epist. lib. i. epist. 1). Which cannot be better translated than as it stands in its version, "Si poscis, recte; si non, quocumque modo rem." Thus is quoted the hammer's return, and its taken conduct of mankind is very just: "Our life and our employments are like the pastimes of children: like them also, we make much ado about nothing; we have them for some time, but we lose them, and we have them not, and should we have them, we have them not in the way we sought."

Ver. 14. And all the enemies of thy people, that hold them in subjection, laborum et servitium, which seems to imply more than holding them in subjection; it means oppressing them, and abusing their power over them. Accordingly Junius renders, qui potestin in iepum absumtum. From hence likewise an argument may be drawn, that Solomon was not the author of this; for where there is being held in subjection, and oppressed by their enemies, does not agree with the happy and prosperous times of Solomon (see 1 Kings iv. 20, 21. 12, 19. 46. 22. 26, 27. 20. 28. 34, 35). But it is not a case of the oppressed state here mentioned, and were not so in the time of Solomon, it follows, by an easy consequence, that this book was not written by him, nor in his time. This probably relates to the condition of the Jews in the captivity, when this writer seems to have lived. "Are most foolish, and are more miserable than very babes." As being idolaters; for that children, through inexperience and weakness of judgment, may often mistake images or statues for real persons, is no wonder; since sometimes art has arrived to such a happy imitation of nature, that even grown men have been taken in the first sight, at a distance, have mistaken them for life. Hence those expressions in the poets, vivi de marmore virtue, and spirantis ara. And hence probably the fable of Pygmalion's love of a favourite statue. Lactant. Instit. 8. 15. 16. is the doctrine of Lucasius, "Pueri infantes credunt signis omnibus athenae.

Vivere, et esse homines."—observes, like this writer, that such as worship idols are weaker than children, "illi enim simulacra homines putant, hi Deos.

Ver. 12. For they counted all the idols of the heathens to be gods: which neither have the use of eyes to see." i.e. They cannot observe the behaviour and devotion whereby, with their votaries look up to them, and prostrate themselves before them, or any reflection but upon the monstrous manners, Ps. cxxv. 5-7. cxxxv. 16, 17, which this writer seems to have copied. Nor can we better expound that controverted passage, 2 Sam. v. 6, 8, than of David's ridiculing the gods of the Jebushites, or certain brazen images.

 fused, calling them, as the lane and the gate of Demos, supposed indeed by them to be the divine guards of the fort, the innumerable protectors of it (see Gregory’s not the faculty of respiration, though necessary to the very being of life; and for the same reason the offering incense and sweet odours to them is absurd. Then, too, they are gods, and of the respect intended by them. It is equally vain to put up prayers and supplications to them; for, as appears from the instance of the worship of the Idols, such things are the mere work of gods, from morning even unto noon, "there shall be no voice, nor any that will answer!" (Kings xviii. 26). Philo says such worshipers, whom he calls, heathen philosophers, is not, rathe pleasant, but pleasant to teach. Heus vosri egregii, voto rum suum, et felicitas finis est, redii Deos similis; orate igiur at simul fatis vestris status, non violentes ocella, non audientes auribus, et suum felcitate intromini. Nor fingers of hands to handle; and as for their feet, they are slow to go. And though they are often represented to their worshippers with thunderbolts in their hand, or else made to appear terrible with daggers, and other instruments of vengeance, yet have they no use of them, nor do the wicked experience any harm or punishment from them.

 Thus we see that the God of the Lord of Heaven and Earth would be better rendered unable to go; for idols cannot properly be said to move slowly, which do not move at all.
 (Compare here the same as διψᾶται, i. e. "feet idle and useless for walking"—Ver. 16.)

Ver. 16. But no man can make a god like unto himself.

Οὐδεὶς γὰρ ἀνθρώπου ἁπάντησιν πᾶσαι ἔχον θεόν. Nemo enim similis est homini. Ver. 16. in the Vulgate, a substantivation of διψᾶται, διψαμένοις, which is the sense of the verse, which our versions follow, as if the original reading was, διψάμενοι, and not διψᾶται. The Alexand. MS. has ὀνομάζειν ἐμοί σὸν διψᾶται, which is a neologism from the noun ὀνομάζειν, and does not mean "be similar," but means "none but the artists can make a god like, or equal to, a man:" for the maker of the idol, having life and motion, far exceeds the artificial god, who wants both: herein only the idol-makers, and such as worship and confide in them, are like the idol, because they are equally senseless. And thus that passage of the psalmist is to be understood,
 "They that make them are like unto them, and no are all they that put their trust in them."—Ps. cxv. 8 (see De Muis, loc.)

Ver. 17. For he himself is better than the things which he was made (ver. 16).

34. [Notes to this passage, or near to it.] If the maker, therefore, of the idol be mortal, how can the dead thing which he worketh be supposed to have immortality? The reasoning therefore in the epistle of the apostle to the Romans, that an idol is not the work of making a god, and it ceased to be any longer their workshipmanship! If idols had any sense, they ought rather to worship men as their makers, since even the laws of nature teach us, that, according to the usual course of causes and effects, the maker is more perfect than his work, and not prepotently more than the work they make," (Serm. de tribus paucis. And Laconis or hee expressly says: "What divinity (says he) can an idol hace, which it was in the maker’s power to have made in another manner, or not to have made at all?" Upon the comparison, therefore, as Philo says, (and as the text here assigns) the artists themselves served rather to have been consecrated, and to have received divine honours, than their works to be defined, and themselves forgotten: which shows the great absurdity of idol-worship; that is, of worshipping a thing which is not serve on the block, after all his handy-work.

Whereas he lived once, but they never. "La étés mi Experive, et tu mi manu movi, et quod ex me natus es, et tu maledixi eum, et non est " (De laet. 111, 26).—But the and all the editions; it but it seems difficult to determine what he relates to, or is governed by, except some such preposition as ab and dropped, or understood before, or we may, and commonly before, of, and that is no doubt as this be objected against, why may not ᾧ γὰρ ἀνθρώπου ἁπάντης καὶ χρῆσεται, if this sense is confirmed by the Vulgate, Syriac, and Arabic versions, and, therefore, probably may be the true reading.

Calmet renders, Force qu’ala quelques tems, which answers to as or s, the former of which might likewise do here.

Ver. 18. Yea, they worshipped these beasts also that are most hateful! To ἐν πόσει ἢ ἐν σφυρίνω, which may mean either animalisious or odious, or both, cro-dodiles, serpents. Thus Cicero, after having mentioned that almost all sorts of beasts were worshipped by the Egyptian, Bosus, canes, lupus, fides, quibus nihil odium, ob-summus, laudatio quietis unius, quipsimilior reverti que, says that even such animals as were really mischievous and horrible to mankind were adored by them, viz. crocodiles, asps, serpents; etiam animalium monstros inhumanitatem, “reversum caput” (De Consol. See note on xi. 15. and xii. 21). This worship of the serpent is the more surprising, as the naturalist observe, that “he has the vertebrae, the caput reversed,” which is occasioned by the subtility of the serpent, there is no deadly enmity between mankind and the serpent, and the strongest aversion and antipathy to it, above all the beasts of Mr field: This says, Mr. Mede, discovering itself both in the natural and sensitive faculties of them both; for their harmours are poison to each other, and each of them is astonished and frighted at the sight and presence of the other (Disc. 13, 35).

For being compared together, some are worse than others.

Either more mischievous, more odious, or more senseless, than others, God would say, let us have nothing to do with the, and the Vatican, and some other copies, it must be confessed, seem to countenance it, which read, ἐν πόσει ᾧ ἐπι-γείτους τὰ μὴ ἀληθεύεται. And so does the Vulgate, which has a much more sense than our versions. Nor is this like sense favoured by the Bishop’s bile, and all the ancient English versions; but here, in this place, is liable to many objections, whether taken adverbially, or considered as a particle, as in (I. Cor. xiii. 7, 8).—Vulgate, MS. ἐν πόσει ἐπι-γείτους τὰ μὴ ἀληθεύεται τὰ μὴ ἀληθεύεται, which our translators very justly render, "being compared together some are worse than others, when they are called, as by the particular animals which the Egyptians worshipped, as appears by the next verse.

Ver. 19. Neither are they beautiful, so much as to be ac-sied in respect of the works of God. They are, howtibles render more properly and explicitly, "Neither have they any beauty to be desired in respect of other beasts."

Calmet observes, that as to the appearance of reason and form from the different animals of the earth, and the beasts, elephant, and fox, are more surprising, sagacious and cunning, than the ox, sheep, wolf, or beetle, which the Egyptians reckon among their deities. And as to beauty, almost all beasts, (not to mention birds, which may be here included among the (τὸς, or living creatures) are preferable in that respect to serpents and crocodiles, which they have such a great regard for (for in the Samaritan MS. the name of Port-Royal, a rendering of this and the foregoing verse may be, that some of the animals which the Egyptians worshipped were so frightful and monstrous, that, it compared them with some pieces of art, or pieces of nature, of which not statues expressed to the life, they seem less worthy of adoration, because such finished pieces of art have somethings in them pleasing and entertaining to the sight, and are other great beauties, that has lost the grace of blame of men; whereas their sacred animals, and serpents in particular, are so odious above all others, that they naturally strike those that look on them with dread and horror.
(But they went without the praise of God and his blessing.)

i. e. says Calmet, they are not of the number of those whom God praised and blessed: they have, by being abused and perverted to idolatry, renounced, in some measure, God’s benediction, and lost that original goodness and beauty which they were possessed of in common with other creatures, when they first came out of the hands of their Cretor. (or Gen. i. 30, 31. And author says, that those claudes, provoking with the crime of idolaters, cursed in like manner these animals, as in the beginning of the creation he did the serpent, the instrument of man’s deception and ruin, but that according to the meaning that we find in ἐν πόσει ἢ νασίν ἐν σφυρίνω, the animals are the instruments of no, upon his breast and his belly (Gen. iii. 11), for so the LXX. read, by way of punishment and disgrace, being promised immediately before, according to the sense of the words, 41. Or generally thus, "All created beings, animate and inanimate, praise God in their beauty, and derive it from his hand as a blessing; but odious and deformed objects, such as crocodiles, serpents, such as worms, the claim not their Maker’s praise, as not having received from his bounty those amiable and good qualities, which are to be esteemed a blessing." Some have fancied the meaning here to be, that God passed by all creeping things, and ser pents among the rest, when he gave his blessing to other creatures. They seemed to him, as it were, to indelibly have blessed them with their share of praise, when he pronounced of the works of his creation, that they were very good, as being produced at first from corruption, and consequently not of his making.

This position, which is both held and supported, the one unsupported by scripture, the other contrary to it, and to the received notions of true philosophy. Nor can I assent to those interpreters who think the meaning here to be, that serpent chosen or appointed, whose like was not to be found in the places, usurped the glory due to God only, and riled his power of blessing; for though the fact itself must be acknowledged, whatever the real object of the history. There is thus a manifestly erroneous and scandalous meaning warranted by the original, or any of the versions; it arose, probably, from mistaking the rendering of the Vulgate, and reading there effugiatu nemini Dei, instead of effugiatu, as it should be rendered, with the proper sense. Those who have the least knowledge of Arabic interpreters understand these words of the worshippers themselves, and not of the animals, and indeed that sense is agreeable to the beginning of the next chapter.

CHAP. XVI.

ARGUMENT.—The author opens this chapter with the observation (xi. 16), that God deals more graciously with his favourite people than with the wicked, exemplified by a parallel passage; in which he declares, that he, like a father, regards the children of the Egyptians, which came upon their tables, and made them to eat and fly from even their necessary food; but the Israelites were fed with quails. That God, even when he permitted his enemies to deal more than he were with the heathen, shown by a comparison between the punishment of the Egyptians by flies and locusts, and that of the Egyptians by the plagues of locusts and death. Though the torment was greatest for the present, had a sovereign remedy appointed for their cure, even the brazen serpent, which was the means and instrument of health, and a sign of salvation to such as turned to it, and with faith looked upon it. To the strange hail and rain sent upon the Egyptians, is opposed the manna, or bread from heaven, given to the Israelites: that, to serve the purposes of God's providence, but the serpent, by calling itself their support, according to his appointment; so that hail was not melted by fire mixed with it, nor manna dissolved by its power, though the sun had a different effect upon it. By all which instances, opposed to each other by way of antithesis, God's care in preserving the righteous was remarkably displayed, and his vengeance against sinners no less visible.

Ver. 2. Thus prepared for them most of a strange taste. In a taste they were unaccustomed to. Covendale renders, "a new taste;" for we must not suppose any new creation of quails for their use; the miracle consisted in this: that they were made to appear, to satisfy their appetite, at such a particular time, and fell in such places only as God appounced, viz. round the camp for their nourishment. Bishop Patrick, from the authority of Loddolphus, thinks, that locusts are here intended; which seem to feed upon the young leaves of trees, and are the only fowls, manifestly understands real birds (Ps. xxxviii. 28, See De Muis in loc. Bochart, vol. ii. p. 163).

Isir up their appetites. "Eis eis. This seems not properly rendered, for that appetive was sufficiently keen, appears from their impatient murmuring for meat. The Geneva bible renders better, "To satisfy their appetite thou hast prepared a meat of a strange taste." But Covendale's and the Bishop's Holden come nearer the Greek: according to the former, God gave them "their desire that they longed for;" according to the latter, he "prepared for the desire of their appetites a strange taste," which is "calmed, En lui donnant la nourriture délicieuse qu'il avait désirée. The psalmist expresses it by, according to the LXX. ἠδίκητος οὖν ἐπέδωκεν τῷ Ἱσραήλ (Ps. lxxvii. 29). This gracious dealing, as it is here called, seems to refer to the first sending of quails, mentioned Exod. xvi. 13, rather than the second, which happened a year after (Num. x. 31), for the Israelites, in their second passage for them, betraying too much importance, with all need and place for their murmuring, and, as the psalmist expresses it, "While the meat was yet in their mouths, the heavy wrath of God came upon the whole congregation." The versification is (Ps. cxv. 31). Calmet seems to include both, and thinks there is a mixture of mercy towards his people, even in this judgment; his reflection upon it is worth inscribing: "If God had not been pleased to take his people thus delightfully, even when they had provoked him, what will he not give them, when they shall be faithful and obedient to him?" In either sense the instance proves what the author brings it for; viz. God's different manner of dealing with his own people, and such as are erring, multitudes of the sons of men,II.

Ver. 3. To the end that they, desiring food, might, for the ugly sight of the beasts sent among them, loathe even that which they most needs desire. Καὶ τὸ δισεκατομμύριον ἄγεται αὐτῶν τῆς ἀπορίας τῆς (Rev. xiv. 17). It seems to be a simple and literal translation; "To the intent that they . . . might begin to loathe even their necessary appetite." The Vulgate and St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, render in like manner, Elogio necessitatis curiosissimum, i.e. Through the disgracefulness of the animals sent among them, διὰ τὰς ἀλλοιωμένας τὰς ἀναφοράς, as the true reading is, particularly the fogs, which melted and spoiled their meat, they loathed the thought of those very animals which they had eaten. Josephus gives the same account of these disagreeable animals, τις τοις νῦσσας οὕτως ἠθικαί, c. r. L. Dominus passionem in eorum genera consummavit,

Ver. 4. For it was requisite, that upon them exercising tyranny, should be inflicted a terror, which the LXX. ἐν ἀναγεννήσεσιν ἡμῶν ἀριστούργημα, "Poverty without excuse," according to some of the ancient English versions; the Geneva bible has "extreme poverty," and Covendale's follows the Vulgate and Septuagint, that which the Egyptians detestable. It will bear any of these significations, which occasioned such a difference in the versions. The author shows, in this verse, by a comparison, the great difference in dealing with the Israelites and Egyptians in three particulars. 1. That he punished the Egyptians with rigour, as a severe judge, tormenting them for their tyranny and oppression, and with such severity as he had deserved, because they would not give that which was theirs, nor want or hunger, occasioned by the animals which infested them, and drove them from their necessary sustenance: but he chastised his own people as a father, afflicting them somewhat; and then, by his sparing them, and giving them refreshment, how tenderly he had dealt with them in comparison of their enemies. 2. That though he suffered the Hebrews to be in want for a small season, yet he kept them from perishing by hunger in the wilderness; and to remembore, as it were, that short affliction by hunger, he fed them after, not only with necessary food, but satiated them with delicacies in abundance, "But a succession of plagues, without respite, pursued the Egyptians." (Exod. lib. iii. 225.)

Ver. 5. For when the horrid fleece of beasts came upon the earth, the Israelites did not suffer, but the Egyptians did not signify fearness, but poison. Thus (Apoc. xiv. 8) what our version renders, "the wine of the wrath of her fornication," Mr. Mede expounds the poison of her fornication (see also xvii. 3, where there is the like expression). And it is remarkable, that the same word in the Hebrew, signifies both wrath and poison (Mede's Works, p. 910). And δαιμον is used by the Hellenistic Jews in the same double respect. In the observation of this |A. D. 1170. XX.

Ver. 10. ὡς εἰπον καὶ ἐν θυρείῳ δὲ καὶ ὡς ἐπέπραξα, which our translators rightly render, "He shall suck the poison of asps, the viper's tongue shall slay him." And in verse 14 of the same chapter, ὡς ἐπέπραξα, which is synonymous to ὡς εἰπον, is used in the same sense. Χωλ δέδειν ἐν γύρω τινι, which, though it signifies both wrath and poison, our version takes in the latter sense, and renders, "the gall of asps is in him, wherewith he hath filled his heart." Among the Septuagint and other Greek versions, Ps. lxi. 4, ὡς ἐπέπραξα καὶ ἐν τῷ θυρείῳ δειμνόν, which in our version is happily rendered. "Their poison is like the poison of a serpent." This poison, as naturalis obser, observe the consequence of their rage, and thrown out by it, and therefore may be considered as one and the same. The word ἀλφάκιος, here used by our author, intimates, says Bochart, the affliction by serpents, which accordingly renders this place, Superovint (ταυρίνων εἰς ἐπιθυμίαν), serpentina venenum (vol. iii. p. 425).

And they perished with the stings of crooked serpents, thy sons shall be stung, and the people of Israel, by giving them the circumstances, that they were winded, by the serpents, by their rebellious murmuring, provoked God to send serpents among them, whose poison was so mortal, that it brought the most painful death; and this circumstance accordingly renders this place, Superovint (ταυρίνων εἰς ἐπιθυμίαν), serpentina venenum (vol. iii. p. 425).

Ver. 5. Rather, rather ver. 6. Learned men, are of opinion, that here the serpent is to be understood as the Egyptian emblem; and therefore the passage is to be understood as follows:—"All there were created for vengeance—zeals of wild beasts, and persons who should be the instruments of destruction" (Eccles. xxxix. 30, where the margin refers to this very passage). But it has been thought by some learned men, to have been a punishment adapted on purpose by God to the transgression of the Israelites, which was evil speaking against the Lord, and slandering his providence. In this view, the conformity between the sin and the punishment is very visible, and the justness of it is plain. There were several different serpents of a kind that served them, each of them, it is said, was an emblem of the same kind—both, as has been heretofore proved. Solomon makes the same comparison, Eccles. x. 11. The serpent was a known hieroglyphic among the Egyptians, and persons who were ignorant of nature and perfection in turning, was one reason of its being made the symbol of their year.

Var. 6. Having a sign of salvation, to put them in remembrance of the commandment of thy law. The sign of salvation here given, was God's command, upon a pole or standard, like the Roman eagle, for the cure of the people. It was, in the opinion of many learned men, the image of a serpent, or the likeness of a serpent: and if this figure be so taken, as to adorn the Jews how to conduct themselves upon other occasions, when a like mysterious trial should occur, viz. to comply with all God's positive commandments, and yet not remove any reason of such an injunction should not be discoverable by them. For the choosing this image, which had no inherent virtue in it, rather than any other, was the more will of God, who can manage, evidently of no importance in themselves, effectual to what purposes he pleases, as might be proved from many other instances in scripture.

Var. 7. Upon the head of each man outwardly was not saved by the thing that he saw. The more beholding it did not concern the benefit of a cure; nor could it, though fixed in public view, effect a single recovery by any natural operation; God did not order it to be erected on any such account. It was a sign to the Israelites, that their skill or persuasion he had, that the efficacy of this brazen serpent could heal the Israelites by any power of art or command of the hand of man. Therefore, it was thought rather inconvenient and improper for such an effect. Nor can we find, says a learned writer, an instance, or example of any like trespasses that was ever known to cure a disease, unless a person of superior cunning. Among the numerous serpents, the cure was effected by a local application of some proper remedy to the part affected (More's Mystery of Godliness, p. 430). What, therefore, was the issuing of this order, and this brazen serpent and the disease the diseased look towards it, and the healing virtue be conveyed through their eyes? Undoubtedly this appointment, being made to the Israelites, who had learned to neglect the momentous occasion, had a reference to the mystery of Christ, whose victory over the old serpent, the grand enemy of mankind, was hereby typified and represented. Many of the ancients are of the same opinion, and imagine this serpent to be an emblem of the cross, and a symbol of sign of that salvation afterward to be effected by it; but Justin Martyr is more particular, for in a discourse in which he concludes these verses with the words accordingly renders this place, Superovint (ταυρίνων εἰς ἐπιθυμίαν), serpentina venenum (vol. iii. p. 425).

By 2 Esau, that the act of the saviour of all.] The name 2 Esau. This, I think, relates to the Apoc. see note on ver. 29, and comprehends the passage to this, show his heart, and comprehend, and see the consequence of this plague. The words 2 Esau, or Saviour, here used, admits of several acceptations: 1. He may be called a saviour that saves by not suffering us to perish, that is, by thus saveth another, commonly doth it upon a prospect of some advantage to himself, either by selling the poor captive, or of making him his slave, which something abodes in glory. 2. The word also signifies to preserve the life of another, but also one that is the restorer of some happy condition which was lost; and thus the Roman orator explains it, Qui anissimam salutem dati liberavit. Our translators, it is observable, insert the word saviour or deliverer could confer was but a temporal happiness, which is, likewise, a lessening of it. 3. The judges of Israel, who delivered their country from the vengeance of Midian, the Syrians, or the Philistines, are by Nehemiah called 2 Esau. x. 27. But then these savours saved but one country, or perhaps city, as Camillus did Rome, for which he was extolled to eternal glory. Some rabbies consider 2 Esau as a name very nearly resembling 2 Esau, or Saviour, and rare to be better than a shorter one, as the example of the Jews, which brought them out of Egypt, that brought the Israelites out of Egypt, that rescued them from their greatest bondage, that overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red sea, that afterwards sustained them there, and at last gave them possession of Canaan. But even this deliverance was but a type of a greater, designed by God for the destruction of sin, and the establishment of the church. We see the expression of our author is agreeable to the sentiments of the ancient Jewish writers, and is founded on the very high notions which the Jews entertained of their great God, of deliverer. Our translators, it is observable, insert the word saviour, or deliverer, not, conceding God's mercy, to save and heal his faithful children, to this instance only of his goodness. And indeed, the idea of God's philanthropy is greatly conveyed in a more comprehensive sense than a mere deliverance from the venom of serpents.

Var. 9. For the biting of grasshoppers and flies killed. This writer seems to intimate that the locusts, so far as I understand grasshoppers, and so they are called Judg. xii. 13. Ps. lxxxviii. 46, killed numbers of the Egyptians. But, if it be true, as some think, that the word locust, from the same Greek word as the word locust, of locusts is from, quia consumptas ilia quas fuisse viam subiicebimus, sic ad mortem eos adignit (vol. ii. p. 469). Thury's account of them is really dreadful. In India, cam pestus longitudine esse traditum, Deurum Irm persens est intelligii. Nunc quidem cernitur, et tanto violenta pestis stridet, ut aliis aedificat; soluendo obabant solliciti suscepientes nemorum polpis non detersum. Et quam parum sit sit Maria transiens, immensum tractum percutens, diviserent se consequent mula, multa contiuati adversantes, omnibus vero morum coeidentibus (Nat. Hist. Lib. iv. cap. 23. Boeh. Horoz. lib. iv. cap. 5, Bacon's Natural History, cent. 10). Agreeable to this account of Thury, is that which has been given by travel, who has seen that many of the places of locusts he saw in Barbary in the years 1724 and 1725 is beyond expression; that in the heat of the day they formed themselves into large bodies, appeared like a succession of clouds, and darkened the sun: that they marched directly and forward, climbed over trees, walls, houses, ate up every plant in their way, and let nothing escape them. That the inhabitants, to stop their progress, made trenches all over their fields and gardens, in the manner of a great many other places, such as the walls, the barns, the granaries, the cellars, and the like, placing in each a great quantity of heathe, stubble, and such like combustible matter, they set them on fire upon the approach of the locusts, but all to no purpose. (Shaw, with a remarkable passage in Exod. x. 5.) Exod. x. 5, it is said, that “they shall cover the face of the earth,” where the Chaldee paraphrase reads, "They shall hide the face of the sun from them." This, as is observed, was running in the respect due to the canonical scriptures, if I should pass over in silence that beautiful description of the plague of locusts in the second chapter of Joel, for the purpose of a more observant examination of the Chaldee paraphrase. Such a description is, indeed, more analogical to the case than the Vulgate, which describes the locusts, as it were, as a train of horses, and directs the shepherd to watch the pasture, lest the locusts devour it. The injustice of this description, it is evident, in a country, or the storming of a city by an army; which description is the more remarkable, because the analogy is carried on throughout so properly and naturally, "in the regularity of their march, eating up the provision, burning the country, scaling the walls, running about through the conquered city, breaking into houses, and the general horror of the inhabitants, that (says a learned author) if one would have every part of the surrounding country destructive, he might possibly do it, if he could hardly have been done in more proper terms" (see Nicola's Confer, par. iv. p. 152).

And flesh killed—for they were worthy to be punished by such kinds of visitation, they were sorely wounded them, and then sucked their blood till death. And in this sense many commentators understand those words, Exod. vii. 24, "he sent his plagues upon them," as it was, "was destroyed by reason of the swarm of flies;" to signify, that many of the people were poisoned or strung to death by them. See Poole's annot. in loc. and Ps. cvxviii. 43, where the LXX. read οἷον αἰχμέας, καὶ κανίμωνας ἀρσητίνας as if a particular sort of fly was meant; but the true reading, as I have elsewhere observed, is, καθενοποιήσας, which includes flies of all sorts, which through their num, destroyed them. We read of Scripture almost in a natural manner, no mischievous and deadly, that the Greeks thought fit to have a particular god to deliver them from them, under the title of Πυθεύς, (Plut. Solon, De Dii Syr., Symut, ii. de Paul-sebub.) We cannot but perceive in this punishment of the Egyptians, a conformity of it to the sin of that people; for the noise, tumult, and stinging of these vengeful animals, answered to the passion of hate, and severe blows of the Egyptian taskmasters, and might be designed to revenge that harsh treatment. Not is the justice of God less to be admired in this punishment. The Corinthians was extravagantly calculated for the punishment of a nice, effeminate, and luxurious people, no less indulgent to themselves than inhuman to others; for pride and vanity of Egypt, and great self-complacency in their name, and their praise, and their pride and vanity of Egypt, or what a greater mortification to their niceness, than to be thus tormented, and beset everywhere with shools of frogs, and swarms of flies and locusts, which were sent against them. (Ver. 12. But thy word, O Lord, which healeth all things.) This scene is to be spoken of the very person of the Λόγος, and is undoubtedly taken from Ps. cxvi. 20. "The word of the Lord, a strong tower, a sure defence for the righteous;“ and it is, indeed, a copy of the same. "He sent his word and healed them, and they were saved from their destruction." That the Λόγος is here meant, seems reasonable to suppose, because it is certain, he inflicted the punishment referred to; for in Numb. xxii. 5, 6, where it is said that the people murmured against God, the Chaldee paraphrase read, "They murmured against the word of the Lord;" and afterward it fol,owed, that "God made the locusts, which devoured the corn, to come among the people." But we learn still more expressly who that divine person was, whom the Israelites tempted, or spoke against, from these words of St. Paul, 1 Cor. x. 9. "For to this end God delivered them into the hand of the serpents, that they might be destroyed of serpents." It is certain, then, that the Λόγος was the person murmured against, and that punished them for it. And it seems very probable, from the passage of the psalmist before quoted, that it was he that likewise cured all them that were rightly disposed for a cure; and that the brazen serpent was the symbol of the power of healing which the Almighty exerted, and whose divine power and goodness to heal all that truly turned to him. The Chaldee paraphrase on Numb. xxii. 8, thus understands it, "Et quinque monstros serpentes virum, et consilicium serpentem unicum, et cor ejus intentum erat in nomen verbi Domini, vivabat, i.e., "Whosoever shall look on the serpent, shall be healed, if he directs his heart to the name of the word of the Lord, and not to the heart of any man, and he directed his heart to the name of the word of the Lord, he accordingly recovered, and lived." The like presence of the Λόγος upon the earth, this occurrence of the brazen serpent, and the cure of the people, are referred from John iii. 14 (see Tenison of Ithol, p. 399). It may also, according to Calmet, be understood in this farther sense, viz. of a word of God's mouth, or of "his holy words." Ver. 13. This seems to be an analogous thing, of the centurion in the gospel seems to have been convinced (Matt. xxi. 6); for, instead of troubling our Saviour to come to his house, he says, out of a principle of faith, "I know that wilt heal me," and so he was healed. Of the power of the latter to heal all the diseases of the soul, to cure those that are broken in heart, and as containing a medicine to heal every infirmity and sickness, we must continue to be understood, when he says, Omnis morbus animae imitatur in scriptura medicamentum suum (in Ps. xxxvi.). Ver. 13. Then leændest to the gates of hell, and bringest up that. We meet with the same thought, and almost the same expression, Tob. xii. 2. "He doth courage, and hath mercy; he leadeth down to hell, and highteth up again; neither is there any that can avoid his hand." The expression of the power of places seems to be taken either from 1 Sam. ii. 6, or Deut. xxxii. 39, see also Apoc. i. 18, where Christ is said to have the keys of hell and of death. By the ancient Jews, the entrance of the city was understood, as a house, that has its doors and gates; and death, in their language, as the gate or entrance into hades; and to die, or to descend into the grave, is to go down to hades or to be consigned into the hands of death. And it is, indeed, to be observed, that there is a leave hades, or to open the gates of death. Agreeably to this notion and phrasing, so frequent to be met with in Homer, Virgil, Theocritus, Euripides, Herod. Theogon., etc., is the common usage of this phrase in the Old Testament, and Jewish writers. In Job xxxviii. 17, the expression is very observable, and occurs twice in the same verse; "Hath not the same been mentioned before thee, that thou seest the doors of the shadow of death?" By the like phrase the psalmist describes the afflicted state of such as had been in captivity, and groaned under the severest hardships, (Ps. lxxxix. 14; Jer. ii. 5; Ps. cxiv. 11; Ps. lxiv. 24; Ps. lxviii. 12;) and it seems again remarkable, and close to the present purpose, "They were even hard at death's door," which the LXX. render γενναίοι τὴν πόρταν τοῦ νεκροῦ. And when God shows his power in restoring men from such an afflictive state, he is then said in scripture, "to lift them up from the gates of death" (Ps. ix. 23).

Ver. 14. A man indeed killeth through his nature: and the spirit, when it is gone forth, returneth not: neither the soul received up, returneth again. St. Jerome's bible, as it is called, reads, Homo autem occidit quidem per malitiam suam, sed spiritus eius per transgressum est in diem in diem, et returnerit nec aliter: the sense follows, which was indeed the purpose, and indeed the purpose, and indeed the purpose. And indeed the purpose of the Geneve bible seems preferable, "A man indeed by his wickedness may slay another, but when the spirit it is gone forth, returneth not, neither the soul received up again; the soul that is taken away." And in this sense almost all the commentators understand the words, καὶ ἡ καταγωγὴν τοῦ αἵματος, καὶ ἡ σφαλματα, καὶ ἡ ἀμισία, καὶ ἡ παθήσεως, καὶ ἡ τύναξις, καὶ ἡ πάθωσις καὶ ἡ ποιήσεως. According to Grotius, the sense is, that a wicked man may indeed kill another, but he cannot hurt or destroy the soul; which, after it is out of the body, is not out of the power of man to injure; making the sense to be full with the same Matt. x. 28. Calmet understands it in the same manner, L'homme n'acquiert pas l'ame, mais il est dans le pouvoir de l'homme de l'entraîner à errer, et arrivez de lui, ou de lui, not the soul cannot be destroyed, and not not be able to destroy or annihilate the soul, when God has taken it again to himself:" its substance is inaccessible, and beyond the reach of malice and violence (Con. in loc.) That after death, and before the day of judgment, the souls of men are reserved in a separate state or region, a paradise of comfort and rest, or a prison of misery and despair, according to the doctrine of the synagogue, or ancient Jews. But this passage of our author not only favours such an opinion, but seems likewise to point out the place of this receptacle. It is removed, when the term of the subject is over, from me not away in the midst of my days," Ps. ii. 24, by Arias Mont. rendered from the Hebrew, Ne facias me ascendere, i. e. "make me not to ascend," or to go upwards to the invisible region of separate and departed souls. It seems also probable, that human souls, after their separation from the bodies, are conveyed to the regions of the celestial sphere; (Luke xvi. 22,) into regions of bliss or misery, as they have respectively deserved: and in that intermediate state have either a ravishing foretaste and pleasing hope of future happiness, or else the reverse of it; "the miraculous region, the rains, fogs, and showers, were they persecuted, &c." That proud Pharoh, who could say to Moses, "Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go," he might have answered in the next word: but such judgments, being persecuted with storms and tempests beyond all precedent and example. For hail, and particularly such dreadful storms of it as are described in the sacred history, was quite unusual and miraculous in those parts of Egypt, where, according to Josephus, Philo, and Pliny, there was no rain. Hence, with great judgment, they are said by this writer, to be "persecuted with strong rains," "novis aquis, according to the Vulgate; i.e. rains falling at times or in places where it was not usual and customary. Hence, that hail and scisma in the Peshitta, "He gave them rain in lieu of rain," even in new and strange rain, is not to be extended to all parts of Egypt; for in the maritime parts, and those toward Ethiopia, instances of this sort of weather sometimes happen, and when it falls, especially if the wind continues hequal, and is supplied by the overflowing of the Nile. Thus Philo; Apoy2 etiam prope her."

"Aegypti huic, nemat, hie, lamae, et non bivis, sed orai ver."

In our version, therefore, when we are told of the Egyptians, "who were not able to avoid the plague of hail, because through the might of God, according to Moses account (Exod. xix. 19), the servants of Pharoh to gather their cattle, and all that they had in the field, into their houses; or what need of this caution and warning, if their doom was fixed, and they could not avoid it?" I think, therefore, this does not relate to all the Egyptians, but to such obstinate and careless ones among them, as regarded not the word of the Lord, but left their cattle in the field, and the harvest was destroyed by the intense violence of the hail; which is no wonder, since the hail was of an uncommon bigness. The Complut. ed. of our version, in the first place, says to be "persecuted with strong rains," because they were severely, and without mercy, persecuted by these, and at length consumed by them and the lightning intermingled. The Vulgate and Coverdale omit this word in their version. We may here observe, that lightning is also mentioned in this plague agrees with our authors, ", qui est fruus, filius nus exultantiae, et illius, ut erat

"Ilamov tristis, plurima et alio exagerta grandiis, ventorum confugientia et obterrensem procedit stromae," such a terror, that Milton thus beautifully expressed in a few words:—

"Fierce rain with lightning mixt, water with fire

In rain reconqu'd,"

(Parad. Reg. b. iv.)

And this God did to show that he was Lord of universal nature.

Ver. 17—19. For, which is most to be wondered at, the fire had more force in the water, that quencheth all things—Sometimes the flame was mitigated, that it might not burn up the waters in the sea; but this by far surpasseth, as there was a time it burneth even in the midst of water above the power of fire, that it might destroy the fruits of an unjust land.

One cannot help observing many marvellous qualities and effects in the fire sent from heaven to punish the Egyptians: 1. That it kept burning, though mixed with rains and hail; and yet the hail was not melted by it, and instead of it, was mitigated, as if the water nourished it, and helped to inflame it; not unlike, says Calmet, that fire which fell from the Lord, and was consumed by the water. 2. That it was the fire, and not the trench, which the prophet Elijah had ordered to be poured upon the altar and the wood in great abundance, to make the wood and altar fire; but we find that this fire was "put from the sky by fire," as Job 39, 40. 2. That this fire, hail, &c., happened in Egypt, where such storms were unusual, and spread over the whole country, except the land of Goshen; whereas other storms of lightning were but the effect of local causes, and not of comparison, and fall within a small compass. 3. It melted not the hail with which it was mixed. Philo gives the same account of the lightnings, "quae eavim a quo non sit on. &c." Vulgo her grandson in tanta rapidegna gressasent, tamen nec eam liquentunt, nec ab exstingvabatur, sed cadem usque duramina, et sursum deorsum carasuntur, grandissimam modum conservabant (Dr. Mose, lib. i). 4. The lightning and hail spared all the cattle and fruits of the Israelites, but destroyed both man and beast, and every herb of the field among the Egyptians. Lastly, it never burnt or hurt Rameses, one of the chief princes of Egypt, nor did it remove any of the houses and buildings. 5. That they could not be put out by blowing, as if it had sense and reason to know and distinguish them. Capelius objects against our author for supposing that the animals which were sent in the former plagues still continued, as he saith, "they were the same birds of lightning and hail," "ranae, et omnia animalia prin-sis in Aegyptis immunda pridem infestant abducta et extin-

"Eum scripsisse Mose (Ps. xliii. 9).

Such terrible rains, such stormy winds, such thundering and lightning, and such floods as might swell the Nile and render it navigable, instead of being dried up by the Egyptian power, as in the case of the river Jordan; but, on the contrary, this showed the might of God against the Egyptians: as it was acting upon the ungodly. Instead of offering any forced interpretation, I must ingeniously acknowledge, that our author, in the latter part of this chapter, seems to have used a rhetorical exaggeration, to make God's dealing with the Egyptians appear more terrible, which may be observed also in his account of manna, and the Egyptian captivity in Egypt (see Job xii. 25—28), in the same way, where circumstances are inserted, purposely designed to raise terror and surprise, and to heighten the description, which are not to be met with in the account of Moses, or the plagues.

For the world fighteth for the righteous: This is true, whether applied to particular persons, as Moses, David, &c. or to whole nations. It is particularly visible in the history of the Jewish nation, which may be considered as a theocracy, and God their king and leader; at different times he commanded the elements in their favour. The air thunders, and his arrows go abroad, to assist Joshua, the day of battle, in the victory of their people; the sun shines upon the victory; the fire consumes Korah and his rebellious accomplices; the waters stand on a heap, to make a way for his chosen; the earth at one time openeth her mouth for the ingathering, and at another, shutteth her bosom; and at his command, becomes a desolation, and Goshen another Paradise. This discretionary power (if I may be allowed the expression) in the elements, that are vague and inexistable, and a sort of wisdom to determine when, where, and how to act, and with what degree of violence to discharge themselves, is finely represented in the original, Job xxxvii. 25, which, however, has given rise to the latter part of the word phreno-

"Those possess in Jacob vagis supinentia, aut quis de-pit phrenomeno distinctum intelligi? This fine thought, perfectly agreeable to the context, is wholly lost in our version.

Our LXVII. and our version in the Vulgate, or proper translation, τα δ' ἴδον γενέσθαι φλόγεις σωπού, ἢ κολλετοί εἰπάνθων (Grey's lib. Job, p. 272, also see Mercer in loc.).
Ver. 20. Instead whereof thou feddest thine own people with angels' food.] Called also ambrosia, γᾶς ἀμβροσίας, τῆς ἀμβροσίας, xic. 21 (see note on that place). We are not bound to place, or any other word, on the end of this sentence, as is so called, either to signify its excellence above common food, or because God gave them manna from the habitation of angels (and thus the Chaldee paraphrased it) nor the Chaldee phrase, a wonder of angels, an instance of singular honour, and special dignity to the Israelites to be attended by such messengers; or, either or all these accounts, it is in the meanest sense, as it was prepared from heaven, and so it is styled Exod. xvi. 4 (see Theodoret on Ps. lxviii. 26). By St. Paul it is called "spiritual meat!" (1 Cor. x. 3); and in this sense it is taken by many of the fathers. It is the Lord's unleavened bread which is the eucharist in particular, whose saving virtue the manner of nourishment, by manna, has been thought mysteriously to represent: for whereas manna was in substance yeast, but yet was of great strength and vigour, it was a proper image of the power of spiritual food, which being invisible, yet gives life and nourishment more truly and perfectly than bread and solid meats. And thus they interpret the words of Moses, Deut. vii. 3. "Therefore he fed thee with manna—that he might teach thee that man liveth not by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." And did send them from heaven bread prepared without their labour.] By heaven, we are not here to understand that very place where the great and glorious presence of God was, as when they were in the cloud by day and in the fire by night, manna descended only from the clouds, and therefore our Saviour tells the Jews, "Manna gave you not that bread from heaven." (John vi. 32). It is said to be bread prepared without their labour because it was provided for them without the round about the habits of the Israelites, and was ready every morning for their use. Instead of labour to subdue the earth, and man to live from the earth, the Israelites were furnished with manna, which supplied the place of corn, and was ready prepared for them. And this made their ingratefulness the greater, because they at length despised this heavenly nourishment, and ran to the pursuit of the flesh, as a more delicious and agreeable diet. Hence, or from its being thus always ready, says De Muis, and with him agrees Dr. Hammond (see comment. on Ps. lxiii.), it was called manna, from the Hebrew verb, מַנָּע, which signifies to prepare, or make ready. The common etymology of manna he condemns, as if it was so called from the Israelites' doubting about, and examining what it was; for though men, in the Chaldee and Syriac, may have such a sense, yet it has not in the Hebrew, which was the language of the Israelites: and therefore he blames Josephus, who was a Jew, for so understanding and ex- planing it. And no, in the Vulg. and the Syriac, it is, tuam opus, of whom God was the maker. The word manna signifies, according to the Vulgate, man's sustenance, or more properly, man's nourishment; not manna's, which is a thing of human generation. And the sense of the Syrische and Arabic versions; the latter reads, "Episcope sapor immutabilus apud eum cu cuius effectus, et subministrat eum cumum appetitio sui, in quilibusque semper repadur, et quia finitum non est; sed quoque in hoc, quod ad eum vocatum est, et in eum venit, et in eum est, et in eum deducitur, in manna the taste of what they most loved to the righteous, or God's faithful servants only; with respect to all others it adjudged of no alteration, and some have ascribed that to a wicked, as being a vicious taste, it was quite insipid. The reasoning of the same learned father against manna having all sorts of tastes indifferently to all is very strong: "To what purpose did the Israelites murmured against God and his servant Moses for want of meat, and their Egyptian food in the wilderness? Might they not have found the taste of what they wanted and desired in the manna, if indeed it changed its nature according to the wish and liking of Pharaoh?" (Retractat. lib. ii. cap. 90). From this supposed quality the manna was declared to be an emblem, or sign, of the eucharist, which may be considered as spiritual manna.—that as there were unworthy receivers of the manna in the wilderness, to whom the manna was merely such as was necessary to their support, so there were unworthy receivers of the spiritual manna, the souls of men; in wicked ones, it produces no change for the better, no improvement or addition of good qualities; but upon the well-disposed it has most excellent effects, as an admirable means of making them fit for God, and far beyond any sensible sweetness, according as the Holy Spirit, which is the dispenser of all graces, sees it most useful for the spiritual exigences of any convert, and draws them in their weaknesses, or to enlighten them in their doubts, or to forward their progress in the ways of build-ness (in loc. cit.). Messiaeni suo Port-Royal have the same reflection (Comment. in loc.).

Ver. 22, 23. But snow and ice endured the fire, and melted not, that they might know that fire burning in the heaven is in the sight of all. Hence we learn that in all cases of sin, the terribleness of the fire and the murmurs of the enemies. But this again did even forget his own strength, that the righteous might be nourished. Mamma is here called snow and ice, from its likeness, says Calvin, to the hoar frost, which begets the icy cold and voluptuous snows (Exod. xvi. 14), and from its soluble quality of melting in the sun, and turning to water, as snow and ice do; hence calls it a power of endurance, as a man may not be apt to melt," which the Vulgate readers, Quæ facile dissolvabatur sicruit glacies. A comparison is carried on here between the effect of the lightning mixed with hail upon the vehicles of the Israelites, and the like effect of snow and ice on the manna of the Israelites; that as the former burnt intensely and unusually for the destruction of their trees and plants, so the latter did, or, as the author elegantly expresses it, purposely forgot its own strength, for the other's preservation and nourishment. Hence the Israelites might easily perceive the hand of God against their enemies, and his interposition in their favour—when lightning, even under all the disadvantages of being mixed with rain and hail, could occasion such a desolation, as if its violence was rather increased than abated, and the fire itself, though in its full strength, is in this case far different, as prepared for their nourishment, though naturally disposed to melt.

Ver. 31. For the creature that serveth thee, who art the Master of all, shall serve for their punishment, and abate his strength for the benefit of such as put their trust in thee. The author here speaks of the same creature which he treated of in the preceding verse, and which the fire serves, and so is of a much more powerful in the water, when it was ordered to affect the Egyptians, but abated its fury to contribute to the good and advantage of the Israelites. This obedience of fire to the will of its master, appeared remarkably in the double effect of the fiery furnace, which lost its power over those saints that were in it to such a degree, that even "the smell of the burning was not perceptible," and (Dan. xii. 1) through its exceeding fierceness, slew those that were within, or without. But as it acted where it was not, "increasing its strength against the ungodly for their punishment, and abating its strength for the benefit of such as put their trust in God" (Dan. iii.). We may also understand this place in a large sense, viz: that the whole creature serveth its maker, and thus this is an used, Rom. viii. 21. In which sense it should be likewise taken in the three foregoing verses (see Wall in loc.). And indeed some of the old versions plainly favour this general meaning: the Syriac in particular renders here, εις τον ουρανον της αρχης, εις τον ουρανον της αρχης και ανεστης, which is called, renders, ordinat transfiguratione gratia; or deservient, quod Coverdale's translation follows. And indeed the observation is equally true of the other elements, all of which are, according to the Scripture sense, used in the earth for mercy or judgment; and when the creatures do exceed their natural powers, it is by the will and particular direction of their creator, for inanimate beings have certain fixed and established limits, and they are therefore not compelled to exceed them, when they cannot pass. Hence the psalmist, speaking of those things which are often the causes of great calamities in the world, says, "Fire and hail, snow and vapours, winds and storms, fulfil his word, or pleasure!" (Ps. cxviii. 8). Philo, in his description of the Egyptian plagues, observes, of all the elements, what our author does of fire in particular,—that God makes use of them occasionally, as his instruments, to destroy a guilty land; at one time he employs them for the production of things, or the preservation of persons, and at another, the very same are made destructive in their effect, to the destruction of persons and things. See Philo, ἡ φλόγα ἡ και ἡ κατάρα, ἡ και ἡ καταρακτική, e. s. l. Elements universa, terræ, aequus, aer, ignis, ex quibus mundus constat, de somniis Dei quin max. instar est devastandi imperium regionum ineruntur, imperium, potentiæque quæ Deus utitur, ostendunt; qui quidem eadem sedurientur ad ram procrassionem temporis, et tam commodum est, ad impo- situm non est, ut alia aliquid, sed ut aliam a multiis. Vers. 25. Therefore even then was it altered into all fashions, and was obedient to thy grace, that nourisheth all that believest in thee, "towards whom is the desire of thy thoughts!" I. e. says Calvin, the fire, to obey the orders of its master, and in the mixture of the providence of its providence was variously altered, and acted not only in a different, but contrary manner. It destroyed the creatures of the heaven, viz: the hailstones; the Hebrews, in Egypt; it burnt even in water; in the wilderness it seemed to have little or no power at all, and affected not even that which was of a nature apt to melt. And herein it acted in obedience to God's mercy, for so he understands grace here, as Vatablus likewise does, rendering here benevoluti tuei, which, as it takes care of mankind, and particularly of his chosen people, shows both the goodness and necessities of the good and faithful, according as they ask or need it, ὅποιᾳ ἡ ἐνδεικτικὴ ὁμονοία, pro indigentium voce, says the Arabic. It shows renders, or, renders; but undoubtedly this is a mistake; the true reading there I suppose was, but corrupted by some accident, ad voluntatem indigentium. According to this, there is another expression, viz: without into all fashions and as into all tastes or agreeably to the desire of the users in general, or such in particular who ate it with faith and thanksgiving, in which sense they understand ταπεινὸν τῆς ἐντολῆς; they act it out, but do not mix it into all fashions or tastes, agreeably to the desire of the users in general, or such in particular who eat it with faith and thanksgiving, and accept it as such. This, though exactly the sense of the twentieth and twenty-first verses, and so seemingly not necessary to be repeated here, is confirmed by the ancient versions, particularly the Arabic, which reads, proptereos donum tum in remquam situm tum in capite, et in omnibus pro indigentium voce subscibetur. It is observable, first, that Jacob, in the original, is here rendered gift, and not grace, as our translators have it, i. e. the gift of manna, called here, by way of excellence, and its extensive use, τελεοντικα. Secondly, It is probable that the Syriac and Arabic interpreters have followed different senses in this vers, or however differently pointed, for both of them have δυνάμεις in the nominative case. If this indeed was the true reading, it follows from the circumstance mentioned a little above (ver. 21), τὰ ὑποκείμενα τῶν ἵκνων, but there seems no necessity to alter the present reading of the Greek, for τελεοντικα may be understood of fire, and δυνάμεις of manna. And fire, very properly, is called, as is also other beast, because he can properly enough said to be subservient to the gift, i. e. to the preparation of the manna, by God's appointment, and be seemingly altered in its qualities with regard to it; for it takes care of the manna from the very end of the chapter, to be one continued reflection on the circumstances mentioned ver. 27, that manna endured the fire in all methods of preparation, and is not affected by the effects of the morning sun only; if indeed by τελεοντικα, ver. 31, we understand the creation, we may then take this place too in a more general sense, viz: that because the Egyptians, Greeks, and ancients, had a conceit that there were some gods of the earth, others of the air, some that ruled the fire, and others the water, therefore the true God altered the elements into all fashions; for he chastened the Egyptians, not only by the earth and the sea, but the air thundered, and his lightnings went abroad, so that he might teach them that he was the foreign ruler of the elements, and that the God of Israel was the same as the God of the whole universe.

Ver. 36. That thy children—might know that it is not the growing of fruits that nourisheth man: but that it is thy word that giveth light, which lighteth every one that seeth it. The people Israel were hereby taught, that it was not the nature of manna, as such, that sustained them, but thy will, or command, or blessing, which by that provision supported them; for without that they would neither have been able to eat, nor was it but corrupted and good for nothing, if kept contrary to God's command. It was the observance, therefore, of God's word or direction in all its particulars, and his blessing upon the supply, that was their support so long in the wilderness. Or it may be taken in the same sense with Deut. viii. 3, which Calmet thinks it an imitation of, viz: that as man doth not live by bread alone, so neither does he by any of the sorts of the fruits of the earth only (for so I understand γενέσθαι τοις ἐξερρήσιοις, but by any thing else that God is pleased to appoint for his nourishment, and will favour with his light. For though they ate no meat, and the earth prove barren and unfruitful, yet can the Lord supply means, as he did manna to his chosen, to God such as he dependeth on him for. And therefore, of the nourishing Israelites, "Can God prepare a table in the wilderness, or can he give bread, or provide flesh for his people?" (Ps. lxix. 20, 21), was a wicked distrust of God's providence, and a direct contradiction of Calmet. Messieurs du Port-Royal raise another very useful reflection from hence, viz: not to depend on any of the creatures, but to rely upon God alone, who uses and governs them, in all which he is so wonderfully and peculiarly free, as it is not only in our marrying that introduces persons into the world, nor bread that nourisheth us, nor diseases that kill them, nor medicines that cure them, i. e. independent, and he that is not only, who makes use of the creatures, in all these cases, as.
his instruments, to fulfil his own wise decrees and purposes

(Com. in loc.)

Ver. 28. That it might be known, that we must prevent the instruments of three kinds, and at the daysgiving pray unto thee. The literal meaning of this, as it relates to the manna, is, that such among the Israelites as would gather this blessing vouchsafed for them, were obliged to prepare themselves, lest the heat of it should melt it; but there is likewise a beautiful moral coiled under it, and a very useful reflection to be drawn from it. For had God enjoined that we should gather manna as ready if we come in time, but if we delay till the sun arises, it melteth away and is gone.—God is very gracious, he giveth to all a gathering time, and expecteth we should use it as he intereth; but he also showeth the necessity of our using of the present time, that we may eat the labour of our hands, when the evening of age cometh (see Bishop Babington on Exodus, God forbidding manna, and the next day appearing, had already a moral design or meaning under it,—to teach the Jews not to extend their care of necessary supplies beyond the present day, but to have the provision for the morrow to the divine providence.

Ver. 29. For the hope of the unthankful shall melt away as the winter's hoar frost, and shall run away as unprofitable water; I. S. Sacred Israelites, as we are here showing the manna before sunrise, found it melted away
as the hoar frost, and to be as useless as corrupted water.
This comparison is used here rather than any other, because manna in scripture is likened to it. Exod. xvi. 14, it which it resembled not only in appearance, but in its short duration. And such other ungrateful persons as are unmindful of God's favours, or are in no concern or haste to return thanks for them, will see their hopes vanish in like manner. For though God gives his blessings with great readiness, yet it is only to the humble, he loves a grateful benevolence, and to give in abundance to them that are ready; it is not the less, that order he may continue them to us, or increase them in some greater degree and proportion.

CHAP. XVII.

ARGUMENT. A farther account of the Egyptian plagues for their ill usage of the Israelites, particularly the thick darkness, and the blindness of the bondmen of Egypt for three days, excepting the land of Goshen, where the Israelites were, which enjoyed the blessing of light as usual.—A description of the terrors of an evil conscience, that the Egyptians were continually haunted with imnaginary species and apparitions, and had no inward quiet, from an apprehension of danger and mischief from hissing serpents and fierce beasts, which seemingly passed before them.

Ver. 1. For great are thy judgments, and cannot be expressed: therefore unuttered souls have erred. ] i. e. For want of knowledge and considering them, they have erred
and missed them; for the knowledge of them keeps men in their duty. According to Calmet the meaning is, "Do not be afraid for the judgements which thou pourest out upon the wicked that oppose thee will." In the history of the Egyptian plagues maniacally evinces this, and therefore when people were greatly mistaken, when, by offending God, and injur ing his chosen people, they exposed themselves to their enemies to have the fierceness of his wrath upon them.
Covadeus's and the other ancient English versions render it, "Therefore men do err that will not be reformed with thy wisdom." And the marginal reading is to the same effect. Ver. 2. When morning came were they smitten as the holy nation, they being shut up in their houses, the prossomers of darkness.] This plague of darkness is mentioned first Ps. cv. 28, where the rest are enumerated, though the ninth in order, according to the Mosaical account, where the succession of them is strictly preserved, Carrying in the account from De Maimon, a new, as well such as none of the rest, as it startled and awaked their guilty consciences, and filled their minds with melancholy and despair. This darkness was purposely sent at that time, when it might have been observed that all men are so much in the world, as is the state of the night, about sun rising. This is intimated, Exod. x.

23, where the LXX. read ὧν ἐδοξῆκατο ἐπί τοὺς ἐπιπλέον ἰσραήλ ὡς ἀγέλασμα, i.e. "no man rose from his bed for three eight days," and the coming of Egypt's plagues is denoted, which our translators do not fully explain, when they render σοῦ by place. And the like seems intended here by λαμπροτάτος ἡμέρας, The Chaldee paraphrast renders the passage above first mencip. for the darkness commenced," Erunt tenebrae super terram Εἰγυπτος in aurora, at recedent præs tenebras noctis. Philo's account is more particular and circumstantial, living between λαμπροτάτος ἡμέρας, the Almighty vouchsafed us, our manna, as to the day, or every day, a supply of manna, and appoint it to be gathered very early for the comfort and sustenance of the whole day, and were they in duty and gratitude obliged to be as early in their returns, and to be ready if we come in time, but if we delay till the sun arises, it melteth away and is gone.—God is very gracious, he giveth to all a gathering time, and expecteth we should use it as he intereth; but he also showeth the necessity of our using of the present time, that we may eat the labour
of our hands, when the evening of age cometh (see Bishop Babington on Exodus, God forbidding manna, and the next day appearing, had already a moral design or meaning
under it,—to teach the Jews not to extend their care of necessary supplies beyond the present day, but to have the provision for the morrow to the divine providence.

Ver. 29. For the hope of the unthankful shall melt away as the winter's hoar frost, and shall run away as unprofitable water; i. S. Sacred Israelites, as we are here showing the manna before sunrise, found it melted away
as the hoar frost, and to be as useless as corrupted water.
This comparison is used here rather than any other, because manna in scripture is likened to it. Exod. xvi. 14, it which it resembled not only in appearance, but in its short duration. And such other ungrateful persons as are unmindful of God's favours, or are in no concern or haste to return thanks for them, will see their hopes vanish in like manner. For though God gives his blessings with great readiness, yet it is only to the humble, he loves a grateful benevolence, and to give in abundance to them that are ready; it is not the less, that order he may continue them to us, or increase them
in some greater degree and proportion.

CHAP. XVII.

ARGUMENT. A farther account of the Egyptian plagues for their ill usage of the Israelites, particularly the thick darkness, and the blindness of the bondmen of Egypt
for three days, excepting the land of Goshen, where the Israelites were, which enjoyed the blessing of light as usual.—A description of the terrors of an evil conscience, that the Egyptians were continually haunted with im-
naginary species and apparitions, and had no inward
quiet, from an apprehension of danger and mischief
from hissing serpents and fierce beasts, which seemingly passed before them.

Ver. 1. For great are thy judgments, and cannot be expressed: therefore unuttered souls have erred. ] i. e. For want of knowledge and considering them, they have erred
and missed them; for the knowledge of them keeps men in their duty. According to Calmet the meaning is, "Do not be afraid for the judgements which thou pourest out upon the wicked that oppose thee will." In the history of the Egyptian plagues maniacally evinces this, and therefore when people were greatly mistaken, when, by offending God, and injur ing his chosen people, they exposed themselves to their enemies to have the fierceness of his wrath upon them.
Covadeus's and the other ancient English versions render it, "Therefore men do err that will not be reformed with thy wisdom." And the marginal reading is to the same effect. Ver. 2. When morning came were they smitten as the holy nation, they being shut up in their houses, the pros-
first Ps. cv. 28, where the rest are enumerated, of them in the darkness which, they have omitted, he lays great stress upon God's sending "evil angels among them," as if the circumstances of their wrath, anger, and displeasure, were of no influence. Depriving them of the means of escape to allude to the Roman army. Lightfoot's opinion, and that it had more effect upon Pharaoh than all the foregoing plagues. If indeed these were real, it may even have been just judgment upon God, and agreeable to his usual procedure, to punish the Egyptians by such evil angels as they, perhaps, had made the objects of their worship, or their magicians, in their enchantments, had had with them to the time of their deliverance, intimates, as if God, for the punishment of the wicked, sometimes makes use of cademones, as his instruments of vengeance, for so many interpreters understand his words, and there be spirits which are created for vengeance, which in their fury lay on sore strokes; in the time of destruction they pour out their force, and appease the wrath of him that made them" (xxix. 20). This was likewise the opinion of some of the early fathers, as Philarchus, An illustrious era quod a superbum Romanis dictur, et Chrispsipus opinatur, damnum quedam praetextum esse eum, quod non viderint adversas injustias et implos utuntur (Plat. in Problemat).

Var. 5. But waives (as of waters) falling down soundlessly.

That they understood great and terrible noises, for so the comparison which is included in the parentheses, as not being in the common version understood (Hackett), x. 1, 15, xiv. 2, 3, 5; or screeching and ill-breathing in the air. This is the better, perhaps, it is also the only word meaning, which probably is the meaning of the verb maladictio" in the Syriac version of this place; or, lastly, that they were frightened even at the sound of their own voices; for so the Arabic renders, Prophan isporam vocos continuo cum strepitu conjunctae perterrentem eos.

And saw visions appeared unto them with heavy countenance; perhaps, this expression is to be understood of a somber, or a gloomy color, or as it were, a heavy downpour. But, I will not be thought to be absolute, that this does not seem to be tautology? For what are corpore formibus, or sad visions, but visions with sad or heavy countenance, or heavy visions, as you sense? That is why Dr. render, Phantasms mequantium historiam, ut iste quis tatis erat vultus, consummante, applying the words to the Egyptians themselves, that they, through fright, had heavy or melancholy visions. The vulgate renders it in like manner. Personen tristes illis apparitio pavorem illius praeexistent. Calmet understands it in the same sense, besides they voyagent parmi des spectres affreux, qui les remplissent entièrement. But, I will not be thought to be absolute, that this seems preferable to that in the common editions, is clearer, and may well suit the context, and I am inclined to prefer, viz., that this fire was in appearance only, phata, esperientis, was not real but imaginary, arising from and suggested by their terror. I mean by "appear" in use of the word imagine, "self-raised, self-kindled," it expresses more still, something like that of our Savio, "a fire that is not quenched," which is very applicable also to an evil conscience. This makes the clause "more secure and difficult; and if it be taken as a description only of the state of the Egyptians during the plague of dark
For being much terrified, they thought the things which they saw to be worse than the sight they saw not. [Adage]

Ver. 9. For though no terrible thing did fear them; yet, being scared with beasts that passed by, and hissing of serpents, they died for fear. The verb fear, is here taken in a very unusual and improper sense; one would imagine, according to our version, that the spectres and apparitions were so bold and courageous, as not to be afraid of the Egyptians; instead of Gen. xlii. 8, as if they were sneamy, nous, and they are here deservedly ridiculed, because, notwithstanding their pretence to wisdom from a knowledge of the magical art, and their skill in the mysteries of divination, or impeding and preventing things; they did prevent those calamities, which they pretended to remove from others, from falling upon themselves: for as in some of the former instances, when the Egyptians, they could neither remove their own calamity, so the multitude of the nations, by their false wisdom, were brought to the truth, and the fear of the Lord, as it follows here, 'their vanity in wisdom was reproved with disgrace.'

Their vanity in wisdom was reproved with disgrace. For they that promised to drive away troubles and terrors from a sick soul, were sick themselves of fear, worthy to be laughed at. The wise men of Egypt, and the magicians among them, was one of their more remarkable instance, among others, of the allegorical strain.

inary dangers, suggested by an evil conscience, though no terrible thing, no real animal, no dreadful monster, from without, at this time, actually frightened them, had such an effect upon them, that they almost died through fear. An image shown to them in a dream is, indeed, peculiar, and the noises of other animals, God might permit to haunt them, as they had probably offended him by the worship of them, and the sense of their guilt might now die. But they could not, therefore, in such a state of darkness, and under an incapacity of attending to or executing any business, had little else to reflect upon but their own condition and the cause of his displeasure. From this sort of this, some beautiful instances of which Longinus produces from thence in his chapter Ἰπί γενησαις, sect. 15 (Eurip. in Orest. passim). Not are lively strokes of this nature wanting in some celebrated pieces of the modern drama. But though such representations are very common among the poets, yet I cannot agree with Capellus, that this and some other instances in this chapter are mere poetical fictions, invented at random by this writer, the sport of his fancy only; for there is nothing in this description so improbable, but what may be supposed to have happened. We may possibly, with a little imagination, may we not, lastly, understand this place metaphorically, of an evil conscience itself? for ἀνουρία, which is here rendered beast, signifies also an insect, or reptile, and particularly the centipedes, which are continually running about in Lewis and Mark ix. that died not? and why may not the hissings of the serpents allude to dreadful apprehensions of devils, and the powers of darkness? The feetheathens themselves could describe the remorsees of the mind, by animals gnawing the liver, and by furies armed with hissing snakes, &c., and may not these be considered as figures of the same import in this place?

Ver. 10. They died for fear. — If we should understand these words strictly, there are instances in history to justify the observation. Vopiscus, speaking of annual thunders, very singularly accounts for them by this supposition. "Humanus, ut multe terrrores ipsum examinavi esse diciatur" (In Vit. Car.). And Pliny, "Crescere formidinme morese sequebatur" (lib. vii. epist. 37). But I rather incline to think this an hypobolic expression, meaning only, that they were ready to die; not unlike that of St. Luke, δυνάμεις ἀπὸ φιλον (xxv. 20), and that of St. Matthew, ἐντὸς ἡμῶν ἦσαν ἀγαθοὶ λουκείοι, "because as it were dead men" (xxvii. 4); not that they actually died for fear, but were ready to do so—like that too in Homer, where an ancient scholarist remarks, ἠφθαλομεν, ἀντὶ ὅπως, ἤφθαντον.

During that they saw the air, which could of no side be avoided. Here again our translation seems faulty; for is this any proof of their conviction, that they denied they saw the air? Is it not rather a proof of their want of versus? The air is still invisible, as is here expressed, avoid seeing it? but neither is this true, that they could not avoid seeing the air; for do people in a fright see it only, or best; or is a thick darkness the proper medium to see the air in, which at midday we only discern by its effects? Do not some learned grammarians and etymologists tell us, that it is called φαο, quod aer per se sit obscurum, and it does not often signify darkness, and is synonymous to ἀνουρία, especially in the feminine gender, which I take to be the sense and true acceptance of it in this place for I conceive the author's meaning to be, that they denied they saw the air, because God commanded which could not escape their notice, as it was on all sides of them. Their inward terrors were so great, that they refused to mind or take notice of the outward darkness which surrounded them, as bearing no comparison or proportion to their fright within. The three following verses, manifestly relating to an evil conscience, greatly confirm the interpretation.

Ver. 11. For wickedness, condemned by her own witness, is very timorous, and being pressed with conscience, always foreseeth grievous things. That this observation is true, the following verses demonstrate, that the most of these wicked tyrants sufficiently evince; for none have been more subject to this fear, which an evil conscience inwards, render them more timorous than those of either sex in the height of the greatest temporal society, and for their greatness and tyranny have been most terrible to others; and yet even these have trembled in company only with themselves, and have been observed to shun retirement, as the reproof of conscience is then most sensible, and its labours most powerful and affecting. See the account of Dio-ners, and the calamities of the great)^. Moreover it is certain also, that when the same orator finely observes, "Suas quenque feras, suum facinus, suum scelus, suas audacia de mente atque sancta de devirina, similem facere, similem habere," how the tyrants, &c. (Plin. v., p. 644), And in another place the same orator finely observes, "Suas quenque feras, suum facinus, suum scelus, suas audacia de mente atque sancta de of death, where the light is as darkness!" (x. 22). "Adversus applied to "sin,, in this sense, may have here again the signication which we have given up before. For "sin" is confessedly a state or region wherein men can do no thing; it is that night, according to the language of the New Testament, "wherein no man can work." (John v. 4). And thus the word in the grave whither thou goest" (Eccles. ix. 10). Grotius here again dislikes adversus and reads οπερ "ονομα, ad pax "ονομα, "ονομα, "ονομα, but besides that the same epithet being repeated seems very unlikely, he is more strongly against adversus, as it is not so much implied in "sin, as itself which, according to the etymology of many learned scholars, is "to disturb, "to injure." It is the Crit. Succ. in voice), the same with the Hebrew sheol, which signifies a place which is dark and obscure, where nothing can be seen. Probably, therefore, the true reading may be either uterum, "as the grave," or, rather, as Tartar seems here referred to, ευιδατος ευ πασιν, according to Homer's description upon the same occasion:

As for Night, in the mythology of the heathens, is failed to be the daughter of Orcus and Taras, and is described by them to be a place of darkness and misery, the seat or kingdom of Hades, and the darkness which the poet imagines to have been the source of all miseries and disasters or calamities. According to Calmet the sense is,
"That a state between hope and fear creates to itself more uneasiness, because the ignorance and uncertainty the mind is in
of the evils and misfortunes which may happen, keep it in a continued state of inquietude, and it is apt, in such a situation, to imagine and represent dangers and calamities which are not greater than they really are, through ignorance of its true state, and for want of knowing distinctly what to fear or rely upon. It is called a faintness, or darkness; for the hope it does not suppose the power to be of the cause that inflicts the evil, and if it approaches to despair, it represents the Deity as impossible. In the midst of such a variety of renderings and interpretations, there were no doubt some of which darkness was designed to be the scene of the greatest calamity or expectation, of which the poet may have been conscious, to any satisfaction, or some new light to clear up the obscurity.

Ver. 14. But they sleeping the same sleep that night, which was "sin,, the darkness, was not overcome. Of ευ αθερων εις the true reading, it must be either taken in the sense of our version, or in that of the margin; in the former sense the Arabic interpreters understand it, rendering of any calamity and, greater, which is attended with less of presence of mind;" which seems to be Grotius' sense of this place. Metus reminus, patirum rationem deceree, &c. According to Calmet the sense is, "That a state between hope and fear creates to itself more uneasiness, because the ignorance and uncertainty the mind is in
of the evils and misfortunes which may happen, keep it in a continued state of inquietude, and it is apt, in such a situ-

tation, of which the poet may have been conscious, to any satisfaction, or some new light to clear up the obscurity.

Ver. 16. So then, whosoever there fell down was straitly kept, shut up in prison, where there was not any communication of the place or the reason of his coming thither, but was rendered under heavy constraint, and in the midst of sullen stones. For ευ αθερων and ευ αθερων, i. e. "a night truly internal," which agrees well with the context. It is observable that the autor here mentions the Egyptians as sleeping, and "sleeping the same sleep," not that they were really so, for their fears would not permit that, but because, like persons asleep, they were in a like state of darkness, could transmit and execute nothing, and had like disturbed fancies and wild imaginations.

Which came upon them out of the bottoms of inevitable hell.] "Еτι η αθερων ευ αθερων ονομα, ευ αθερων ονομα, is it as difficult to say why the word "sin,, in the Greek, as what "infinite hell" is in our version. The word "sin,, in the Greek, is the hell the place strictly so called, and by the "darkness of hell come out of the bottom of it," the darkness of hell beneath, or niter darkness, as the term is rendered there. This surely might have been better rendered intolerable, as Αδιαντος is translated above, than inatable, which carries too harsh an idea with it, expressed so laxly; and in deeds it was used for "the place of darkness where the souls of sinners which are alleges to be inevitable? Job very emphatically calls it a though agreeable entertainments, and which, at another time, would have delighted and charmed the ear, not only lost all their relish, but proved a punishment, and created new desires. Of this no man* ever deeply sent forth his glorious voice in thunder, no wonder that conscious guilt should shrink; according to that of Seneca, Pavesies ad eum fragorem, et quoties aliquid efficiat, efficiat (Cato, lib. iii. 21). But that horned and ungainly devil usually charms the fancy; that noises merely imaginary, for of such churlish lust we understand this description, should have been a bad example, and given fatal effect, destructive to the godly conscience, which takes away the poignancy of every enjoyment, and sits brooding mischief and misery to itself. This sort of panic is beautifully described, Lev. xxvi. 30, 31. "And it shall come to pass by reason of all these afflicts, so that even the sound even of a shaken leaf could chase them." to the Egyptians understand it in this manner, "That the Egyptians were the instruments of the Lord, though they could not see them, and thought the Israelites happy, that they also did not suffer like them." This seems to be the sense of our version, as it is of the Geneva and Bishops' bible, but it is not so well supported by the context.

Ver. 2. But for that they did not harm them now, of whom they had been wronged before, they thanked them. Or eti ou boeswv aipophnion, cpseuvtov. Here again the sense has been reversed. It is said not that the Israelites thanked the Egyptians for not hurting them now, who before had much oppressed and injured them; but there seems to be a thanksgiving for the kind treatment of the Egyptians for not doing what, at that time, however inclined, they were incapacitated to do. There is also another sense, which has no better foundation,—that the Israelites was told by the Lord to take a different opinion of the Egyptians, and therefore he had not before so much wronged them, were now not in a capacity to hurt them. And thus Coverdale, "And they that were vexed sore (because they were not hurt now) thanked them;" and so the Vulgate, Et qui ante laetarent, quod non

And brought them pardon, for that they had been enemies. Kai oti ou boeswv xworh to xoyn. This is capable of two senses; that the Egyptians had been enemies, that the Israelites asked for indulgences of the Egyptians for the many injuries they had formerly done them, which is the sense of our version, and of the Geneva bible, and so Vossius expounds, 2 Mac. iii. 4. Ps. xxvi. 9. But the Israelites, and Coverdale renders, fear; but, as a real contrition, is natural enough to be supposed at this melancholy juncture, and might indeed be expected from people in their sad and helpless condition, entirely at the mercy of their enemies. It is no new thing that men thank those who are ready to do them hurt, and forgive those who have formerly done them wrong. In this sense, xrapo must be taken adverbially, as it is sometimes, and may be considered here the same as tregou, And thus it is used, Gal. iii. 19, 4 tregou, tov prokathathmav, xrapov pesev, i. e. according to our version, "The law was added because of transgressions;" which seems not much unlike the expression here, tov xworh xrapo xworh, "they bore hatred or detestation, because of their former transgressions and differences." There is also another meaning of this passage,—that the Israelites beseeched God, that there always might be such a difference made between his own people and others, as might lead to hatred and disaffection and the other enemies, as there was in this particular instance of the darkness (see Exod. xi. 7, where the like expression is used). Coverdale renders according to this latter interpretation, "And bade them that it might be a difference, and doth so the Vulgate, Et ut esseret differentia, donum (xrapo) petebat."

Ver. 3. Instead whereof thou gavest them a burning pillar of fire. Xrapo dpv tov ephakhm sthav. The sense of this place according to most interpreters is,—That instead of an Egyptian darkness, God favoured his people with a light of fire, as it is described by the psalmist (Ps. lxvii. 15, for their assistance in the night-season. It is called here "a burning pillar of fire," because in the night flames are more visible, by reason of the darkness, whereas in the daytime they are almost extinguished at some small distance away (see note on x. 17). "Xrapo dpv in the original do not so properly signify "instead whereof," as our version has it, as quoniamphor or proper quid, as the Vulgate readers, which Coverdale's and the old English versions follow. "Therefore, had they a burning pillar;" or we may understand xrapo to signify, "for whose sake," or "upon whose account;" and as this word stands in the original, referring it probably to the Israelites, who, in the preceding verse, had requested that God would make some difference in their favour; and so the Syriac interpreters seem to refer it.

Both to a guide of the unknown journey, and a harmless sun to entertain them honourably. [Dmse] et Aabalo phourerwv; i. e. It was as a harmless and inoffensive light to the Israelites, as to conduct them safely on their journey, and to protect them on the latter part of this verse; there is nothing in the original to authorize or justify what is here mentioned about "entertaining them honourably;" the true reading of the Greek is, "to grant them their request." And, indeed, this march of the Israelites may be said to be truly honourable and magnificent, being under the guidance and direction of Almighty God, who was the immediate cause; and, if it was a figure of the appearance of a grand and superb triumph, than a tedious and painful journey. And in such august terms the prophets of the Lord, and the Apostle, and I have the pleasure to find the version which I have given of this place confirmed by the Geneva bible, which renders, "And makest the sun that it hurted them not in their honourable journey, and the darkness, which exposeth it: Frasbain columnan;—quem et exspect profectiones ignotae, et sol innocens magnificis pergratim.

Ver. 4. For they were worthy to be deprived of light, and imprisoned in darkness, who had kept thy sons shot up, by whom the uncorrected light of the law was to be given unto the world. Though God communicated his will to the patriarchs and patriarchs, by the writers conveyed to them, in covenant with him; yet had not the Egyptians, when in Egypt, any express knowledge of the law as such: this they had not, though they had the law at Sinai, where God himself promulged it to them in form: 'I which commanded them to teach their children, that their posterity might know it, and the children which were yet unborn, might have a knowledge of it, and might show their children the same" (Ps. lxxviii. 5—7, Deut. iv. 9, vi. 7). But this revelation was not designed to be confined to that people only; God by his means, and through his word, caused that the knowledge of his law: 'To them pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the law, and the service of God, and the promises' (Rom. xi. 4). But the law, as it was given by Moses, could not be delivered to others, and they were the appointed channels; an appointment which this author here dwells upon and magnifies as a mark of God's favour and kindness to his church, and the happier consequence from other nations did receive the uncorrected light of the law, and the excellent and sacred records of ancient times, and the several prophecies of these holy men, whom God raised up and inspired, from time to time, among them: by their means, in fact, we now converse with those great persons, Moses, David, Solomon, and others, and understand and reap the fruits of their wisdom and piety, by the writers conveyed to them, through the providence of God; for the Jews, by their numberless dispersions, were undesignedly made a kind of preachers of righteousness to as many as they lived amongst, and to those that were called by grace. There is evidence from the Jewish history, the fountain-head of the true religion; Jerusalem, in particular, was the seat of Maschilese, the high priest of the law and temple, of Ahab and his heart and dwelling in Sion (Ps. lxvi. 1), and in David's time it was "known in her palaces as a sure refuge" (Ps. xviii. 2). From hence he sent out his ambassadors the prophets, to publish his laws and decrees to the world, which learned men have observed could be done with more ease and speedier conveyance from hence, than from any other region of the habitable world. And from hence accordingly, as from a central point, the light of the law first, and the gospel afterward, shone out to the surrounding nations (Life of King David, vol. ii. p. 32).
CHAPTER XVIII.

occasionally to execute his inhuman and cruel commands. This was the scene of a revolting act of sacrilege, which Libanius, who was the minister of the old law, as Jesus Christ of the new, was a lively figure of him from his very birth, both of them, through the divine protection, being preserved from it. But the Israelites, when the Lord, in his infinite and present reading of the Greek text here seems faulty in all the copies, and probably may, by a small alteration, be thus read: Ehude, qui est domino, ergo est domino.

I am encouraged to offer this emendation from the authority of the Oriental versions; the Arabic reads Ehude for Ehune; the Syriac, Sed deus unus sanctus, which ad eos castigando, et multitudinem filiorum eorum exterminandum abscondaverat, omnes simul in hymnotum perdidit. The Geneva version renders in like manner, "By one child that was cast out and preserved to reproove them, thou hast taken away the multitude of their children," and the Deyoyn bible is to the same effect.

Ver. 6. Of that night were our fathers certified afore, that assuredly knowing unto what oaths they had given credence, they might afterwards be of good cheer. God had foretold their bondage in Egypt, and promised their fathers that he would be with them, and bring them up thence, and put them in possession of the land of Canaan. This is what the oracle foretold, which says God to him in a vision, "that the seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them, and they shall afflict them four hundred years; and also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge," and afterward they shall come out with great substance" (Gen. xv. 13). This future condition of his seed in both these respects, was represented to him by the Passover, and the way which God had signified to the Israelites' mercy in the iron furnace of Egypt, as it is called, Jer. xi. 4, and by a "burning lamp," or a light kept burning, which decked his presence from thence (Gen. xvi. 17). Moses had likewise consecrated them with the particular time of their going out of Egypt, and that it should be immediately preceded with the Passover, and that he would deliver them out of bondage, to the great happiness and advantage of their posterity. And thus the phrase is used in many parts of the gospel, particularly Matt. ix. 2, where the Vulgate reads, confite, filii, and so do Beza and Junius in loc. (see also xii. 6). Or: "And with one consent made a holy law, that the saints should be like partakers of the same good and evil," i.e. At the same time that they sacrificed the passover, they unanimously made a holy agreement, and entered into covenant, confirmed by the sacrifice, to have but one common interest, that they would share alike the good and the bad which should happen to them; that as they went out of Egypt with the great mercy of God, they should take in the common dangers in their march towards the holy land, and afterward divide the promised inheritance fairly and impartially among them. The Vulgate accordingly reads, et concordia congregatio distributio, uniform and not male receptuum.

The fathers now singing out the songs of praise. There are two senses of this passage, according to the different reading of the Greek, the Vatican copy has τιμωρεων γαρ τους πατριωτους ανθρωπον, which is followed by our version; i.e., the fathers now sang songs of praise and thanksgiving to God for their deliverance, as it is accomplished. According to Tansuesius, εις πατριωτους ανθρωπος, means: That the fathers began the chorus, and the rest followed or joined in it. The Alex. and M.S. and Complut. edition reads εις τους πατριωτους ανθρωπους, which the Vulgate and Junius follow; i.e. the children of Israel sang the praises, or hymns, to the honour of their great forefathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to whom they ascribe their deliverance. The Greek word is τιμωρεω for τιμωτα and is a very expressive word of triumph, as if they were actually delivered from it. And thus Calmet, d'Egypte, says: "I chantoient deja par avance ces cantiques. II est leurs chantier comme sunt de deelh, d'attente de midiou,* and the word was always a time of triumph, as if they were actually delivered from it. And thus Calmet, Ie chantoient deja par avance ces cantiques. Ie leur chantoient comme est de deelh, d'attente de midiou, and the word was always a time of triumph, as if they were actually delivered from it. And thus Calmet, Ie chantoient deja par avance ces cantiques. Ie leur chantoient comme est de deelh, d'attente de midiou, and the word was always a time of triumph, as if they were actually delivered from it. fore we are bound to confess, to praise, to laud, to celebrate, to glorify, to honour, to extol, to magnify, and to ascribe victory unto him, that did unto our fathers and unto us all these things, and brought us forth from servitude to freedom, from darkness to light, and from bondage out of Egypt to live with freedom and light to the great light" (see Ainsworth on Exod. xii. 8).

Ver. 10. But on the other side there sounded an ill acccording cry of the enemies, and a lamentable noise was car-rried to them, and they were sore feared thereof. e. t. There was a great outcry of the parents, like Rachel, weeping, for their children, because they were not. How great this cry was, may be conceived from the scriptures, comparing and setting forth this occasion to the destruction of the first-born. But when all the first-born, the noblest offspring of them, were in one moment destroyed together, what comparison may be made or what words suffice enough to express it? The words here seem too faint, and the affliction would be better expressed in those vigorous mournful terms by which the LXX. express the lamentation of Exod. xii. 25 for the loss of his blessing, ἀνεκνέεις γαρ ἡ ἰματος σελα; Φωνὴ μέμης εἰς πόνον, καὶ τέως θλίψεως. (Gen. xxvii. 34): or of the Egyptians, and all the house of Joseph and his brethren, for the death of Jacob, καίνινατον ἐις ἑτερον γιών καὶ εἰς ἐκφράσεις ἔλθεν (Gen. I. 10).

The Chaldee paraphrase upon Exod. xii. 30, where the great cry of the Egyptians is mentioned, observes, that though Goshen was in the midst of the land of Egypt, and Pharaoh's palace at the entrance of it, yet, when Pharaoh did issue from his palace and out of this par-lanchly occasion, Audita est ejus vox in nocte Paschataque usque ad terram Gosen; deprecatur enim Pharoar voco amnis. But Jeremiah compared their calamity to this: the same sense, Miseraibilis hoc ille ferebat vocu lamentantium puerorum. But I think the sense of our version preferable: for as for the death of the first-born was a sudbden stroke of God, as they were all cut down in the moment, the cry of the children themselves seems not so probable, as that of their parents lamenting for them; which is the sense of our author. So, Jeremiah's, as it is called, and of the old English versions.

Ver. 12. So they all together had immemorial death with one kind of death; Υπὲρ τοῦ γένους τῶν πατέρων. Ὅμοιοι is used in the aforesaid verse, xiv. 15. And so name of the blessing, and as the word is called, and of the old English versions.

"Omnia parumari perecurre nomin descem." (Ainew. VI.)

Would not the sense of our version be somewhat improved, if the rendering was, "So they all had an immumerable death together, i.e. at the same time, with one kind of death." So the Chaldean paraphrase applies those words of Job, xxxiv. 20, "In a moment shall they die, and the people shall be troubled at midnight, and pass away suddenly," and makes it a "moment of their death." I say, the psalmist accordingly calls the first-born, "the chiefest of all their strength." (Ps. ev. 36).

Ver. 13. For whereas they would not believe any thing by reason of Jacob, they would be as they had merited; the magicians Jannes and Jambres contributed much to this insensibility and disbelief of the Egyptians; for they would not acknowledge God's power manifested in their former plagues: indeed the magicians, by their enchantments, had imitated some of the wonders performed by Moses and Aaron: when they cast down every man his rod, they became serpents, as Aaron's rod did (Exod. vii. 9), another by another, and by their enchantments they were enticed upon the land of Egypt, as Aaron had done (Exod. viii. 7): and therefore they had a specious pretext to look upon such things as a phantasma, or bird of the air, not as any certain proof of the divine omnipotence. But suppose these to be real miracles performed by the magicians, which some have thought to be ἐκωανία, or in appearance of birds, but a delusion, and therefore of less credibility, was not sufficient to render their obstinacy excusable, because, though the enchanters could do mischief, it was not in their power afterward to remove and remedy it: and the plague of darkness in particular was such, that the magnicians, upon account of it were, "seek themselves of fear worthy to be laughed at!" (xviii. 8). The degree or rather the method of God's punishment in the several plagues of Egypt, is curious, and worth observing; first, "he smote their cattle with frogs, and their flocks, and their herds, etc.," and such other things as were grievous, but perhaps even so affecting to them as the loss of their goods. 2dly, Therefore God smote their cattle, a greater plague than the former, because the Egyptians had a great number of them in particular families, but he smiteth, at once, all the first-born throughout the whole land of Egypt. 3rdly, He observes (says a very learned critic) a kind method of proceeding in punishment, that he would give some previous afflictions to warn men in time, so as to make them shun the greater evils by repentance (Dacier's Art. on Aristotle, Art. of Poetry). And then he introduces, in the Egyptian plagues, which he compares to Homer's account of the plague, supposed to be sent from heaven by way of punishment, and acting first upon males and dogs, before it came upon other animals (Homer, i. 314).

to observe is the same as Igs. on Verum illud Dei (B.v. ch. 11). That the Nòys should be mentioned by this writer in terms not only of grandeur and magnificence, but divinity itself; that omnipotence and immensity should be ascribed to him, and that he was numinous, and the throne of his own glory (see Rev. xv. 3) and Mr. Mede, b. v. ch. 10, for though our English translations have thy throne, yet no copies of the Greek do warrant this, nor insert eóv here, nor eóv in the same verse (see Rev. xvi. v. 4, xvi. 11). This so exalted a notion of the Logos, I say, our author probably took from the traditions at that time among the Jews, or from some hints in the Old Testament, or some authentic or from some probable traditions, the LXX. in particular, who, in many places of their version, speak of the Logos as a divine person, and sufficiently show their sentiments on this head. [Exod. x. 3, which the Vulgate translates quasi vir tagnator, and the LXX. more strongly, Κυίος ἀνθρώπων θεός. But the description here is more like that of a man who appeared to Joshua in the LXX. man, with a drawn sword in his hand, who called himself "The prince or captain of the host of the Lord" (Josh. v. 14).] It is a mark of the person of the Logos the worship which Joshua paid him, and the title of Jehovah given to him, and was, according to the best interpreters, "the Word of the Lord," or "the very Logos." And thus the very exaltation of the Logos; and this also is noticed, by Patris sui. Jesus typical ad Jericohannum stricto gladio appetens, promissit se populum defensurum (Ad A. M. 2253). The same divine person who conducted his people out of Egypt, and brought them into Canaan, is here brought in, and that he might be equal to the great Jehovah, or Jehovah himself, his likeness & θόλοις τα παρασκεία, victorious over those that people by styling their first-born. The Chaldee paraphrase on Exod. xii. 12, to express the greatness of this destruction, says: "thus 10,000, in the sight of the great number of principal writers, the attended him, Nonaginta mille myriades angelorum perdentum. It has been objected against this interpretation, that the Gen. xxii. 16, and the same person was represented as the ancient Hebrews, that is, the Logos; but to this the answer is easy, viz. that the divine person called the Lord, Gen. xix. 33, who "rained down from heaven fire and brimstone from the Lord upon Sodom and Gomorrah," was, by Philo, the ancients, and the best interpreters, understood to be the Logos, who, as he assists and succours such as are Israelites indeed, so upon his enemies, says Philo, he sends, ὁ θεὸς καὶ φίλος φόντος, "in the same manner, without any imputation, be said to be the executioner of the divine power. The comparison of the Word of God to a sharp sword, which this writer uses, occurs in scripture, Ephi. vi. 17. Heb. iv. 12 (see also Philo de Chirub.)

And it touched the heaven, but it stood upon the earth. The Logos here is represented as the destroying angel, mentioned 1 Chron. xxii. 16, who, when he brought that great plague, which slew seventy thousand men from Dan to Beer-sheba, is represented as visibly standing between the camp of Israel and the camp of the Egyptians. For in this hand, stretched out over Jerusalem. Our author is to be understood of the same divine person who is so magnificently described in the former verse, who, though equal with God, and partaking of the fulness of the Godhead, was his holy Father's agent in his communications with mankind, particularly with regard to the children of Israel, his pecu unum; and is expressly called "the angel of the divine person., not only as being the herald and publisher of his will upon earth, but as minister to execute his orders, sometimes to preserve good men or a chosen nation, and sometimes to effect calamities on his enemies. In all the visions of the Logos than to the person of FAME. As Virti has used it,

Parsa metu prince, non se secutus attollit in naves, ingenitique sole, et epist inuc nutub dubit.(En. lib. iv.)

Or to Discord, as Homer has applied it?

"Discord : dire sister of the slaughterings power. Small at her birth, but rising ev'ry hour. And her horror can be bound.
She walks in earth, and shakes the world around."

(Pope's Iliad. b. v. 902.)

This last description, however it may be extolled by the critic as a just allegory, and a noble instance of the sublime, and as such is quoted and commented by Longevity, yet can be regarded only as one idea, the creature of a fine fancy, and not as a real person, like that in the description before us, who has not only a being in, but an almightiness over, nature. The expression of the destruction of the first-born, yet standing upon the earth, when applied to the Logos, seems equivalent to that which God uses of himself, "Heaven is my throne, and the earth is my footstool." (Isa. xlvi. 2.) This agrees that description of Orpheus, speaking of the Deity,

Ver. 17. Then suddenly visions of horrible dreams troubled them sore.), "Visions of horrible dreams" is an unequal expression, and seems to be the word "visions" translated quasi "horribles visions," i.e. "visions or apparitions in dreams." And thus the Arabic understands it, saw somnorum spectrae exspectantur eos, or "visions and horrible dreams." which is Calmet's sense: His interpretation, but before some des visions horribles. The scripture makes no mention of these terrible dreams and visions preceding the destruction of the first-born. It may not improperly be asked, whether these dreams and visions happened, whether the parents or the first-born, and for what end or design? To suppose them sent to the first-born themselves, to advertise them of the terrible destruction; the thought of which would be of little use; for what effect could such a notice have upon persons immediately to die, especially such of the first-born as through their infancy and tender age could not have trans

And it seems that, in their alarm, they were incapable of showing any repentance! Such a scene, indeed, laid open to the parents, of the sad approaching fate of all their first-born, their dearest pledges, and growing hopes, and as afflicted them for their loss, and their deplorable situation, and consequently to their misery, as it affected them so nearly, and might be of future service to the parents, to prevent their sinning against God in the like manner. But did not Noeess give them notice and warning of this imminent calamity very expressly! (Exod. xii. 45.) And was not this more to be depended upon than uncertain dreams and airy visions? This account would be given on some non-technical, or to be designed exagrgeration, such as we meet with in prophetic substance, where instances of dreadful apparitions, warning persons of some grievous approach, as if they were the practice of God, or the de

And one thereof here, and another there, half dead, sheweth to him his death. This, at first sight, seems a little inconsistent, as our translators have rendered it. It is not sudden death always understood to be an utter destruction, the same marks of destruction that are represented (ver. 12) as destroyed in one moment suddenly, be with propriety said to be "cast here and there half dead," suffering as it were a lingering death for can a person "half dead" (ἐμπαθής) escape the death that is all power? It is therefore thought the true reading here to be ἐμπαθής, i.e. that one thrown here and another there (ἐμπαθής) destroyed at the same time, and in the same manner, declared the cause of this common death and general calamity, viz. that it was the just judgment of God who inflicted it, and not the power of evil angels, nor the force of magic, nor any thing "natural that befell them: which affords a good ground, and very apparent reason, to say that the Logos destroyed such numbers in an instant. But as the sense of this place may seem confined to that of the immediate context, and the preceding verse of the same passage also having very great apperations, the meaning of this passage is generally taken to be, that the first-born of the Egyptians were apprised of their imminent danger, and acquainted with the actual cause of their destruction, viz. being half dead through the apprehension of it, declared to their relations and friends the true reason upon which they should suffer, and why all of them were sentenced to die. According to this interpretation, Junius renders very properly poenitentem by moriturum, which makes the sense much clearer; and the Syriac and Arabic both express it by the same word.

Ver. 20. Yet, the tasting of death touched the righteous also, and there was a destruction of the multitude in the wild erness: but the wrath endured not long. From the de struction of the first-born the author takes occasion to men

fore are we bound to confess, to praise, to land, to celebrate, to glorify, to honour: to extol, to magnify, and to ascribe victory unto him, that did unto our fathers and unto us all these signs, and brought us forth from servitude to freedom; and to the degree of that darkness to great light' (see Ainsworth on Exod. xii. 8).

Ver. 10. But on the other side there sounded an ill according cry of the enemies, and a lamentable noise was car-rried forth thereunto. The Lord knew the cry of his people, was a great outery of the parents, like Rachel, weeping for their children, because they were not. Now great this cry was, may be conceived from the scriptures, comparing any fainting to the first-born, or two or more first-born. But when all the first-born, the noblest offspring of them, were in one moment destroyed together, what comparison can be made? Yet, it is enough to express it? The words here seem too faint, and the affliction would be better expressed in those vio-gorous mournful terms by which the LXX. express the lamentation of Esau for the death of his brother, audire dico vno mugillum, et pomium elapho (Gen. xxvii, 24); or of the Egyptians, and all the house of Joseph and his brethren, for the death of Jacob, ἐπειδὴ ἠπνεύμη νόμος και εὐχαρίστησεν (Gen. i. 10).
The Chaldee paraphrase upon Exod. xii. 30, where the great cry of the Egyptians is mentioned, observes, that though Goshen was in the midst of the land of Egypt and the place of their dwelling at the time, yet, when Pharaoh called to Moses and Aaron upon this melancholy occasion, Anduta est ejus voco in nocte Paschatis usque ad terram Gosen; deprecabatur enim Pharaoh voco namem, ut ille domum fugeret; and to this other another sense is given by some interpreters, 'That there was a great cry of the children themselves, making lamentation.' This is favoured by the Arabic, which renders, Vox puerorum plor-abantur, and makes it, Pharaoh, I am afraid, takes it in the same sense, Miseraibilis huius ferebat vocu lamen-tium puerorum. But I think the sense of our version far preferable; for as the death of the first-born was a sudden stroke of God, as they were all cut off in one moment, the cry of the children themselves seems not so probable, as that of their parents lamenting for them; which is the sense here, the great cry of the children, in the Septuagint; as it is called, and of the old English versions.

Ver. 12. So they all together had innumerable dead with one kind of death; i.e., the very words used by God to Pharaoh in the Egyptian plague, Exodus ii. 18. And so Moses is often understood in the classic writers. Thus Virgil:

Omnia parumum perccerre nonum possem.' (Exeun, vi.)

Would not the sense of our version be somewhat improved, if the rendering were, 'So they all had an innumerable dead together, i.e. at the same time, with one kind of death? And sundry scholars and enthusiasts, the Chaldee paraphrase applies those words of Job xxiv. 20, 'In a moment they shall die, and the people shall be troubled at midnight, and pass away (suddenly), and none in the morning.' But the Hebrew psalmist accordingly calls the first-born, 'the chiefest of all their strength' (Ps. cv. 36).

Ver. 13. For whereas they would not believe any thing by reason of the Egyptians (i.e., the Egyptian magicians), 'Nieto ym arteon, which would be better rendered, 'Though they disbelieved the rest of the miracles, and were not persuaded by all their other calamities;'' And thus Calmet, Il n'avoue point cri tous les autres prodiges, à cause de leurs magiciens. And so the Arabic version expressly reads, Non credentes omnibus calamitatumque sibi accidenter. And the Sy-rae, His antem omnibus, propter magiam, non credentes. The magicians Jannes and Jambres contributed much to this insensibility and disbelief of the Egyptians: for they would not acknowledge God's power manifested in their former miracles, but disbelieved the magickal operations, and imitated some of the wonders performed by Moses and Aaron: when they cast down every man his rod, it became serpents, as Aaron's rod did also (Exod. iv. 7). With their enchantments also they brought up frogs upon the land of Egypt, as Aaron had done (Exod. viii. 7); and therefore, they had a specious pretence to look upon such a power as an imitation of art and magic, which was not as certain proof of the divine omnipotence. But supposing these to be real miracles performed by the magicians, which some have thought to be ñoηγερις, or 'in appearance only', the imitation of art was not as sufficient to render their obstinate exeousable, because, though the enchanters could do mischief, yet it was not in their power afterward to remove and remedy it: and the plague of darkness in particular was such, that the magicians, upon account of it, were 'sick themselves of fear worthy to be laughed at' (xviii. 8). The degrees, or rather the method of God's punishment in the several plagues of Egypt, is curious, and worth observing; first, they brought forth frogs upon the land of Egypt, and sent them forth such other things as were grievous indeed, but not so affecting to them as the loss of their goods. 2dly, Therefore God smote their cattle, a greater plague than the former, though upon their own bosom. Therefore God smites their bodies with painful sores and biles, very grievous and loathsome, yet he spared their lives. But now, when all the former plagues were ineffectual, when all the wonders were wrought by the number of them in particular families, but he smite him, at 5c, once, all the first-born throughout the whole land of Egypt, and all the first-born of the Egyptians. Hence a kind method of vengeance in punishing, whereby it sends some previous afflictions to warn men in time, so as to make them shun the greater evils by repentance (Dacier's Not. on Aristot. Art of Poetry).

Orphain, καλειστά τοις ὕπολογγοις διελθείς τινὲς αὐτῶν ἔδωκεν. (Ibid. i.)

On mules and dogs the infection first began, And last the vengeful arrows fix't in man.

They acknowledged this people to be the sons of God.] This last plague, viz. the death of their first-born, at length subdued the stubbornness and hardness of their heart, and made them confess that only the power of God was the reason that this people, in whose behalf he so signally interposed, were his sons, or chosen. The Greek reads ὦ ἐκ τινος in the singular number, alluding, probably, to God's styling Israel 'the son of his right hand' (Exod. xix. 3). But

Ver. 15. Then Almighty word leaped down from heaven, out of thy royal throne.] Grotius applies this description, which is very grand and magnificent, to an angel commissioned by God to execute the punishment. Or rather the first-born of the Egyptians: other learned men have imagined, from the titles and attributes of the divinity here mentioned, that God inflicted this last and most sensible plague upon the Egyptians immediately himself; for Exod. xii. 4, he says, 'At midnight will I go out into the midst of Egypt, and all the first-born in the land of Egypt shall die.' Bishop Wall, who condemns Grotius for applying these words to a created angel, says, they must, necessarily, be understood of a divine person, and he assigns for his opinion the three following reasons:—1. That the word is here called the Almighty, shewing, that he is the source of all; a royal throne in heaven;" and descending from thence in dreadful majesty, commissioned by God to execute vengeance upon this occasion. 3. That its figure and appearance were so extraordinary, as to inspire universal admiration and terror to the tabernacle and temple, having the incommunicable name and attributes of God ascribed to him, and divine worship and adoration performed to him alone. 4. That the phrase, the "Almighty word of Jehovah," (1 Cor. x. 2. Exod. xxiii. 20. Philo de Agricultura); and so may be well supposed to be the agent in slaying the first-born, and in vindict and desoli-ation of the Egyptians, and to have occasioned the Sermo Dominii interfert omnem primumgenium in terra Egypti. Lastly, there is a description not unlike this, Rev. xix. 15. And to particularise the person, it is said, ver. 15. Επιβίων οἱ ἡγούμενοι ζῶσα, οἱ Μωυσῆς Οὐραίος, which Mr. Mele observes to be the same as that cast Verbum illud Dei (B. v. ch. 11). That the Λβόξ should be mentioned by this writer in the capacity of guardian angels can have no importance to itself; that omnipotence and immensity should be ascribed to him, and a royal throne assigned him, probably the throne of his own glory (see Rev. xvi. 21, and Mr. Mede, b. v. ch. 10, for the true sense). As to standing upon the earth, no copies of the Greek do warrant this, nor insert εν τοι, nor do the oriental or any ancient versions take notice of it; though the Logos, so far as the writer now appears to have particularly looked back from the traditions at that time among the Jews, or from some hints in the Old Testament, or some authentic paraphrases of it, or from some ancient writers, the LXX. and in many places was the Logos understood as speaking the Logos as a divine person, and sufficiently show their sentiments on this head.

As a fierce man war into the midst of a land of destruction, (whom were cut off in the sight of God and by the sword,) and standing up filled all things with death;"

Thus in Moses' song, the Lord, or Jehovah, is represented as "a man of war," Exod. xv. 3, which the Vulgaze, who, in quasi vir augurum, and the LXX. more strongly, Κύριος εператорος ἀληθιος. But the description here is more like that of the person who appeared to Joshua in the form of a man, with a drawn sword in his hand, who said, "I am the prince of the host of the Lord." (Josh. v. 14), but was himself a divine person, as appears from the worship which Joshua paid him, and the title of Jehovah given him by that event, according to the Jews, ascribing both "the Word of the Lord," or "the very Logos." And thus the very learned Usher; Jesus Dominus noster, princeps militiae Patri sui, Jesus typice ad Jerichum stent, quoniam salvum nos de delubrum a M. a. 1559. The same divine person who conducted his people out of Egypt, and afterward their chief leader and commander, was likewise Adonai, in the former sense, and properly understood in the former sense, in the latter, by saying their first-born. The Chaldean paraphrase on Exod. xii. 12, to express the greatness of this destruction, ετερ, that almost an infinite number of destroying angels entered in is said: "I am the hand of God, which smote the land." It has been objected against this interpretation, that the title of a destroying angel is an unworthy appellation of the Logos; but to this the answer is easy, viz. that the divine person who appeared to Joshua in the sight of God and by the sword was understood from heaven fire and brimstone from the Lord upon Sodom and Gomorrah, is, by Philo, the ancient fathers, and the best interpreters, understood in the Logos, who, as Israel's prince and succour, such as are Israelites indeed, so upon his enemies, says Philo, he sends, Θεὸν καὶ φύσιν διέτησεν, "inexorable ruin and destruction" (De Somm., the Logos, or he being a divine person in every sense, is understood as an executioner of this vengeance. The comparison of the Word of God to a sharp sword, which this writer uses, occurs in scripture, Ep. vi. 17. Heb. iv. 12 (see also Philo de Chrest.).

And it touched the heaven, but it stood upon the earth.

The description here very much resembles that of the destroying angel, mentioned 1 Chron. xxi. 16, who, when he brought destruction upon the people, traveled with property in men from Dan to Beer-sheba, is represented as visibly standing between the heavens and the earth, having a drawn sword in his hand, stretched out over Jerusalem. Our author is to be understood of the same divine person who is so magnificently described in the former verse, who, though equal with God, and partaking of the fulness of the Godhead, was his holy Father's agent in his communications with mankind, particularly with regard to the children of Israel, his peculiar; and is expressly called the angel of the divine counsel, not only as being the herald and publisher of his will upon earth, but as minister to execute his orders, sometimes to preserve good men or a chosen nation, and sometimes to inflict destruction upon a wicked people, and fills both heaven and earth with his presence. Upon all these accounts, he must have proper greatness be said to "touch the heaven, and stand upon the earth." How much more properly and beautifully is this expression applied to the Logos, that it is not only fit to be in heaven, but also in earth, as says it, "Parce mare primo, non usque atollit in auras, Increditerque solo, et capit usque usque condit." (En. lib. iv.)

Or to Discord, as Homer has applied it?

1. Discord: dir state of the slaughtering power. Small at her birth, but rising ev'ry hour, While scarce the skies her horrid head can bound She sticks in earth, and shakes the world around. (Pope's Aeneas. b. iv. 462.)

This last description, however it may be extolled by the critics as a just allegory, and a noble instance of the sublime, and as such is quoted and commended by Longinus, yet certainly is not suited to the Logos, who is not only not a real person, like that in the description before us, who has not only a being in it, but an almighty power over nature. The expression of touching heaven, and yet standing upon the earth is equivalent to that which God uses of himself, "Heaven is my throne, and the earth my footstool" (Isa. lxvi. 1). To which agrees that description of Orpheus, speaking of the Deity, Ἀρχές θεος ἐν οὐρανὸς καὶ τὴν πλατείαν ἑωράειν. Xpontel. A 8691, ἐν τοις ἑωραμένοις βασιλεία.

Ver. 15. And one thrown here, and another there, half dead, showed the cause of his death. This, at first sight, seems a little hard, as our translators have rendered it. Is not sudden death always understood to be an utter deprivation of all sense and life? Can they then who are represented (ver. 12) as destroyed in a manner to be "cast here and there half dead," suffering as it were a lingering death or can a person "half dead" (ὑποθνεω) show the cause why he died? I once therefore thought the true reading here to be ἑυθυρρακε, i. e. that one thrown here and another there (ὑποθνεω) destroyed at the same time, and in the same manner, declared the cause of this common death and general calamity, viz. that it was the just judgment of God who inflicted it, and not the power of evil angels, nor the force of magic, nor any thing natural that befell them; which affords a good sense, and very applicable to so sudden a stroke, which destroyed them. But as the sense of this place may seem confined to that of the immediate context, and the preceding and following verses refer both to dreams and apparitions, there is no necessity to be, that the first-born of the Egyptians were apprised of their imminent danger, and acquainted with the true cause of it, by apparitions and notices given them in dreams; and being half dead, openly acknowledged the apprehension of it, to their relations and friends the true reason upon which they should suffer, and why all of them were at once sentenced to die. According to this interpretation, this renders very properly true the expression, ἑυθυρρακε, which makes the sense much clearer; and the Syriac and Arabic both express it by the same sound.

Ver. 20. Ye, the tasting of death touched the righteous also, and there was a destruction of the multitude in the wilderness: but the wrath endured not long. From the de-
tion; the overthrow of the Israelites in the wilderness; and, by a comparison of God's dealing with the Egyptians and his treatment of his own people, he proves that those who were punished without mercy, the sentence of death against their first-born being executed without any mitigation, reserve or exception; but Aaron no sooner appears in favour of the offending sons of God (and may be here called the priestly lineage), than we discover the peculiar dispensation, and the wrath of God is appeased. The expressions used by this writer to describe their destruction, seem too mild and favourable for so great an event. "The scripture doth not say, that so many as fourteen thousand and seven hundred were slain by the plague inflicted on them for murmuring against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi. 41, 42); yea, he felts in a later passage, that the veil was upon the body of another, as it follows, ver. 23. Death may rather be said to have had more favour of the Israelites, but it is described here as a small calamity, and an incomconsiderable loss, in comparison of what happened to the Egyptians. It is observable that Saphir, by which this destruction is expressed, both here and in the book of Numbers, signifies likewise a tumult or commotion; and so it includes, elegantly, the cause and the effect; the sin and its punishment.

Vers. 21. For then the blandness man made haste, and stood forth to defend them; and bringing the shield of his proper ministry, even prayer, and the propagation of innocence, set himself against the wrath, and so brought the calamity to an end. That is, in the scripture language, Aaron interceded, and put upon the remainder to make an atonement for the people, who otherwise had shared the same fate with all the rest, whether that he showed the great power of the ministerial function with God. And thus St. Jerome, Currons in Dei sanctificatu voe prophesbat, i. e. "The wrath of God coming, as it were, full upon the arms of Aaron, was stopped and passed over the priesthood." It is worth observing, that Aaron, who undertakes to intercede for the people, is here described by the great character of the blander man: upon which the fathers, and some of the ancients, would make all the priests of God to be, who stand forth to defend others by their prayers and ministry, and would do true service to their posterity and the whole church, with a view to the great purpose of reconciliation. St. Gregory, in particular, thus happily enunciates a blandness conduct: in such a minister about holy things; "If a man be enslaved to present himself before God by prayer, and whom he has difficulty obtains forgiveness, how shall one that is conscious of his own bad life, and must conclude the God of purity and holiness to be his enemy on that account, dare to take upon himself the high dignity of an intercessor for others? How shall he, to any purpose, implore God's mercy for his brethren, who stands in so much need of it himself, and has reason to desire of his own acceptance?" (Greg. Past. ii. 33. 43. I. Amb. in Hab. cap. 3. 20.)

Vers. 22. So he overcome the destroyer, not with strength of body, nor force of arms, but with a word published he him that is stronger and more powerful; of the angel which destroyed the Egyptians from touching the Israelites (Exod. xii. 23. Heb. xi. 29), so the smoke of Aaron's incense (figuring the mediation of Christ) stayed the coming of the wrath, and prevented it. The language, through the prevalence of his intercession, "repented him of the evil, and said to the angel that destroyed the people, It is enough, stay now thy hand" (2 Sam. xxv. 16). The Greek text of this passage of our author is different according to the copies; the Vatican edit. and Alexandr. MS, read εἰκεντο τὸ γὰρνο, and so the Vulgate, Syriac, and Arame. render; i. e. he overcame the plague or trouble, contrary (says Calmet), occasioned by their murmuring; for so γὰρ sometimes signifies, as well as autelitl, in which last sense it is improperly taken by the old English version, for the purpose of explaining this word. And as the translator of the Complut. edit. has εἰκεντο τὸ γὰρνο, which our translators manifestly follow here. The sense of the passage in either reading is, that Aaron stopped the plague, or threat of it, by an incense which he wrought with more propriety, render; i. e. by the prayer which he so powerfully addressed to God; "Aaron le surmonte, says Calmet; par la priere de la priere et de la toune d'Aaron, et par l'interposition de lui, le dieu, as mentioned in the books of Moses as an argument or motive urged by Aaron. There seems great strength and energy in the original words, מָנָה עַל שְׁכִלוֹת אֶדֶם, i. e. "He le intercede, the destroyer himself; and, as it were, forced or constrained him to relent." This efficacy and almost uncontrollable power of prayer, is finely displayed upon an other instance of disobedience, which provoked God's displeasure against the Israelites; they had solemnly promised to serve God as long as Moses constrained them by Moses, and immediately after, as if in defiance of his vengeance, they made the molten calf, and sacrificed to it the greater part of the people out of fear of Moses. God says in Moses, "Let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may consume them." (Exod. xxxi. 10) intimate, as if he could do nothing against them.

Vers. 23. For when the dead were now fallen down by heaps one upon another, standing between, he stayed the wrath, and parted the way over all the people of Israel: whereupon he shewed himself obediently. The scripture has here the cryptic form, that no more than fourteen thousand and seven hundred were slain by the plague inflicted on them for murmuring against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi. 41, 42); yea, he felt in a later passage, that the veil was upon the body of another, as it follows, ver. 23. Death may rather be said to have had more favor of the Israelites, but it is described here as a small calamity, and an incomconsiderable loss, in comparison of what happened to the Egyptians. It is observable that Saphir, by which this destruction is expressed, both here and in the book of Numbers, signifies likewise a tumult or commotion; and so it includes, elegantly, the cause and the effect; the sin and its punishment.

"In the long garment was the whole world." (Isa. 63. 1) "It is not written that Moses made a garment for God, which he used to wear; but in the long garment was revealed to him all the world, (figuratively) as it were in the long garment, the whole world was written, which declarest the word, the spirit, and the mystery of God. (Strom. 5. sec. also Amb. de fug. sec. cap. 3.)" It would be tedious to mention all the many mystical conceptions of Moses standing in prayer in the long garment of the high-priest's robe. This is a very remarkable instance of the allegorical interpretation, which was chiefly in vogue from the time of the Septuagint version, to that of Aquila, for no other writer in the Septuagint, except that of Menag. Fez. vol. 1. Plutarch abounds in expositions of this sort: nor is it any wonder, that our author, who was most probably an Alexandrian Jew, leaves these many allusions and metaphorical significations in the writings of Barnabas, Hesma, and others of the apostolic writers. And we have a very remarkable one in St. Paul's Epistles: τὸ γὰρ ἅγιον ἄραθ, ε. τ. λ. (Gal. iv. 24, 25) taken from the prophetic passage, of which we shall not trouble the reader with the argument of our author, which is not so far fetched or mystical, as the former: viz. that upon the long garment, or high-priest's robe, were all sorts of ornaments, for so χορτασμος very frequently signifies, as well as the word. And some have thought this sense of the word to be more applicable to the place, and to agree better with the context, where some of the ornaments are mentioned, particularly the re- semblent breast-plate. In this sense Jesus understands the words, rendering, In talvi vestimento totus crat ornamentis; and thus the Greek bible, i. e. in the long garment of the high-priest, as there were six precious stones; the Greek accordingly expresses this by περισυλλαβικά ἄρθρα in the singular number. Hieron were engraven, in Hebrew characters, the glorious names of the patriarchs, Jacob and Joseph, and Aaron; according to their generations or births, called here the fathers, or the heads of the tribes; the names of the six elders were inscribed in the right shoulder of the robe; the six to the left (Joseph, Amis, ibid. iii. cap. 7). In the high-priest's breast-plate were likewise the urim and thummim, which gave answer in difficult cases; but the learned are not agreed upon the manner of consulting, or receiving the answer from thence. These two ornaments, says St. Jerome, which signify light and perfection, intimate, that in God's holy places, both the first-born and holness of life, should always be inseparable: that truth should be engraved in their very heart, and that the light within should shine forth in all that appears outwardly—not that they only received it, but, their very hearts, their dress, should bespeak them more immediately the servants of God, and have some tendency to teach and instruct others. Veritatem mente concipiat, et ipse cum habito resonet et orante, ut caput ejus introit lucidit, sit doctrina populorum (Lccon. epist. 127. de vest. Sacerdot.).

And thy majesty upon the head of his head.] Upon Aaron's triple crown, and, as it were, the glory and majesty of the sacred name of God; "Holiness unto the Lord," being engraved in a golden plate upon the forehead. We may also, with Josephus, understand this allegorically, that the triple crown of Aaron represented the glory and majesty of the Almighty (In loc. cit. Ecclesi. xvi. 13).

Ver. 25. Unto these the destroyer gave place, and was afraid of them.] If such regard was paid, even by the designs in the holy things, the high-priest's apparel, and the sacred habit, appearing in his robe of glory, as to stop his hand and alter his purpose, we need wonder the less at what Josephus reports concerning Alexander.

"Upon intelligence that he was drawing near towards Jerusalem, Jaddus the high-priest advanced to meet him, together with the rest of the priests in the habits of their order, and the heads of the people, and encouraged the lemmity. When Alexander saw from a distance the order of the procession, the people all in white, with the priests at the head of them in their silken robes, and the high-priest with the golden crown and plate upon his head, he gave his mitre upon his head, and a golden plate upon his forehead, with the name of God engraved upon it, the majesty of this spectacle struck him so, that he revered an awe, that the priests were advanced to, and embraced Jaddus, adored them, to conceal their description, and, instead of destroying the city, he went up to the temple, and sacrificed there in form." (Antiq. lib. xi. cap. 8).

For it was enough, that they only tasted of the wrath. We may hence see the truth of that observation, "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man avaleth much" (James v. 16). For upon the intercession of Aaron, God thereupon espoused his people, and was pleased that the specimen only of his displeasure for the instruction of such as yet remained alive. His design was by a taste only of his severity, to make his chosen people sensible of the great dan-er universal nature is obnoxious to God's will; that all the elements fulfill his pleasure, and change their known qualities and powers, either to take vengeance upon his enemies, or to succour and protect his chosen.

Ver. 1. As for the ungodly, wrath came upon them without-merit, because they knew the things before what they would do.] This, Calmet, should be joined to the former chapter, in which the author mentions, that the wrath of God began to be known before they knew what they would do. Aartu, it is a word of the Chaldean and Hebrew language, which signifies to stop its progress; but, says he, when God determines to take vengeance of the Egyptians, nothing is able to stop or withstand it; it admits of no intercession, nor knows and understands; and the work begins with the successive plagues, and slain all their first-born in the same instant, his severity and indignation pursue them quaeque vivum, to the very last, to an utter end of them, which was accomplished and their destruction consummated. God knew the obstinacy and stubbornness of Pharaoh; he had pronounced of him long before, that he would not hear their words; but, says he, when they all knew and signed done by him (Exod. vi. 4). He knew the evil heart of the Egyptians, and their invertebrate malice against Israel, and he prepared a punishment suitable to their indisposition, and treacherous intention.

Vol. III.—116

Ver. 2. How that having given them leave to depart, and sent them hastily away.] Koi πρὸς αὐτούς συνεπάγοντο αὐτοὺς: an expression which signifies, that they not only urged them to be gone, but assisted them in their departure, and furnished them with all necessary that they wanted for their journey; which is conformed by what the prophet says, "He that is the God of (their) holiness is their strength," and "that they may want nothing" (Tit. iii. 13, see also Acts xv. 3). This hasty departure of the Israelites was foretold in the twenty-fourth chapter of the book of Exodus (Exod. xxv. 18), and, as it were, to send you away, shall thrust you out from hence altogether. The translation of the LXX. too is very strong and remarkable in this place, ἐκθεσιν ἀναλεθῶς, when you set out,cleverly, and with a large expedition, eagerness and impatience to perform it; and the Chaldee paraphrase upon the place is most full to the present purpose. ExpeLinda expellet vos, et eum dimissurit, exuit eum; and in the account which follows after (Exod. xii. 35), relating to their departure, it is said, that the "Ebrews were urgent upon the people that they might set forth the land, but they determined to set fast toward, and pursue the Egyptians; render with a peculiar emphasis, εἰς τὸ ἔξοδον ἡμῶν, and the learned rabbins observe, that the Hebrew word which expresses haste, is used in this place where it implies a departure on so extraordinary a journey (also in the Hebrew margin) which increase the signification, and implies a more than ordinary care and haste in urging their departure; and no wonder that they were so importunate, they supposed, they say, that the place where the same paraphrase continues the account, Si moram trasserint ipsi hic homo unam, ecce omnes Εβραῖοι mormuraverint, "If the Egyptians had one hour's delay, all are dead men;" and therefore what Josephus adds is not improbable, that the Egyptians made the Hebrews very considerable presents to induce them to go the sooner away.

Ver. 3. When the people were yet at a distance. The Hebrew for this phrase is used in the sense of the word, that they went seven days to come to the place of dwelling of the Egyptians, because they were the first-born, and were slain; so that the word is like the word in the 5th verse, where the Israelites went to bed, or to sleep. In the night of the 15th day of the first month, upon this solemn anniversary, they heard the sound of trumpets, and in that solemnity they were to keep it in the same manner, for seven days; which were not so many days of mere sorrow, but were the allotted days for the funeral prepalations, and the performance of those previous rites and religious ceremonies to the body of Jacob, deceased, which were usual and customary among the Egyptians; and Joseph, as living among them, or for other reasons, thought fit to follow on this occasion (see Bishop Patrick on loc. boch. Our version therefore seems again mistaken, when it represents the Egyptians, in so short a time, making lamentations at the graves of the dead, just before they were buried, and in the space of three days only, others six, after their general calamity (see Usher's Annals ad An. Mund. 2513). Herodotus expressly mentions, that till the seventy days for the funeral preparations were fulfilled, they could not be buried; for the word in Exod. xxv. 3, the Egyptians did not put the body into the coffin (lib. ii. cap. 80), which seems confirmed from the order observed by Jesus the borer, when burying the Egyptian to whom; for when the set days for the funeral preparations were fulfilled, the sacred text says, they then set forward, in order to bury him; the crying, therefore, or lamentation, or grief was to be continued during the space of the first-born; for it must be much too early in point of time, according to the best accounts which are given of the Egyptian customs, on such occasions; they seem rather to be crying over the exequarium justa, the prepa-of the Israelites, as on the banks of the Red sea, immediately after their passage, or of them after their continuance in that situation; and if taken in the latter sense, is it any wonder that the Israelites should be yet mindful of the plagues of Egypt, which were so very lately inflicted, and some indeed but just passed, and all of them very signal ones, and that with all the advantage of some considerable time in the wilderness; that the sense of the many signal mercies which God had vouchsafed to them in their Egyptian bondage, was not yet obliterated; they compared the plagues inflicted on their enemies with the many blessings conferred upon themselves; how the river Nile, contrary to its nature, was troubled with foul blood; and instead of fishes, which it furnished before in great abundance, they were filled with blood! It may not be improper to mention here that we have a tradition in the Synagogue (Ann. ad A. M. 5513), lasted barely a month or two, and according to the Jewish computation, which is the longest, not a twelvemonth! Some critics therefore understand it to be a new revelation affecting the Jews, and that which was formerly known as the first book of the prophets in the Septuagint (Numb. xi. 5), cast forth disagreeable shores of Egypt (Exod. vii.) that the soil of Egypt, rich and fruitful as it was, instead of cattle and treasures useful, bred venomous serpents, and would have occasioned the destruction of the Hebrews. -They remembered how, through the providence of God, and his distinguishing care over them, they were free at the same time from the plagues of Egypt, and enjoyed a rational dispensation, and they were not left without water and both conspired to plague the Egyptians, those very elements favoured the Israelites, the former in supplying them with food, and the latter by opening a passage for it.

How the ground brought forth flies instead of cattle. The marginal reading is, live. What is more despicable (says Philo) than a house! and yet of such force and manner as that which now proceeds from the Egyptians an open confession and acknowledgment that this was the finger of God, who can make the most incomparable creatures become benefactors, when appointed to execute his vengeance! (De Vita Mosae, lib. i., c.) The version here is not very accurate, or rather this writer, for the ground in reality does not bring forth flies, much less cattle; the meaning is, and the sense is more natural and just, that the ground was so disposed by God, as to be a proper nidus for the generation of flies, but did not afford its usual nourishment for the support and increase of cattle. This is supported by the psalmist, enumerating the gracious dispensations of God's providence, says, "He bringeth forth grass for the cattle;" and immediately after he addeth, (the word is, in the Hebrew) the Lord watered out of the earth, for the comfort and refreshment of men; where the sense is not, that God bringeth these good creatures themselves immediately out of the ground, but maketh use of them, and disposeth it in a manner proper for the producing them.

Ver. 11. But afterward they saw a new generation of flies, when, being led with their appetite, they asked delicate meats. The meaning here is, that as the ground was so disposed as to bring forth flies, and the river frogs, for the punishment of the Egyptians in an unprecedented manner, so, to show his favour to the Israelites, God furnished them in the wilderness with a new sort or generation of flies for their entertainment. But we are not to imagine that the quails, as the flies here referred to, were at that time in Egypt, dead, and out of use, as having never before existed; the expression is figurative, and indicates, either that those birds were in the desert, where they did not use to appear, or that they were new with respect to the Israelites; the meaning in such large flocks was unusual. Moses, who mentions this after a more simple manner, says only, that a wind from the Lord carried them into the wilderness, and caused them to appear about the midst of the wilderness. Josephus supposes these birds to come from the Arabian gulf, and then adds, very oddly, that they were so tired with crossing it, that they considered the sea as some sort of a desert, and that being disposed to rest; they were not disinclined to try their course, and appointed where they should fall. This seems another instance, where Josephus, by attempting a solution, extremizes the miracle.

Ver. 12. For quails came up unto them from the sea for their cattle. In their season, in season; they are the same as the pigeons that came down to the当事人 in season, in season; they are the same as the pigeons that came down to the ground from heaven. Grotius, in his notes, has observed aptly, that they have fancifully done, that one particular bird, the guide and conductor of a great number that followed, is here meant, for απενεχθεν, by synecdoche, but for a multitude of the rest, who followed in the train of the guide; and this is a common practice in the scriptural account of the plagues of Egypt; thus, it is said in our version that "The plagues which were upon them were so great, that the Egyptians were not able to go out and enter, but the plague was upon them of more or less; or besides; "That in the midst of their triumph for their present deliverance, it was an increase of their joy, when they remembered besides in how much they were favoured. Or they were not so far in favour when they were in Egypt, and the signal difference he made in the execution of his plagues, between the Egyptians and his chosen. Or it may be possible to understand them thus, that the Israelites after their continuance in the wilderness, for some considerable time in the wilderness, that the sense of the many signal mercies which God had vouchsafed to them in their Egyptian bondage, was not yet obliterated; they compared the plagues inflicted on their enemies with the many blessings conferred upon themselves; how the river Nile, contrary to its nature, was troubled with foul blood; and instead of fishes, which it furnished before in great abundance, it was instead of cattle and treasures useful, bred venomous serpents, and would have occasioned the destruction of the Hebrews (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 1), if it was likely that they should be tired just at that particular spot, and could not fly farther, or stop shorter, or that God humbly took them, as it were, on their paws; they were not disinclined to try their course, and appointed where they should fall. This seems another instance, where Josephus, by attempting a solution, extremizes the miracle.

Ver. 13. And punishments came upon the sinners not without former signs by the force of thunderers. The rendering of the Geneva bible is more intelligible here, "But punishments came upon the sinners, not without signs, that might, as they might, be comprehended, and, so serving to the destruction of such" (Anv. ad A. M. 5513), lasted barely a month, and even according to the Jewish computation, which is the longest, not a twelvemonth! Some critics therefore understand it to be a new revelation affecting the Jews, and that which was formerly known as the first book of the prophets in the Septuagint (Numb. xi. 5), cast forth disagreeable shores of Egypt (Exod. vii.) that the soil of Egypt, rich and fruitful as it was, instead of cattle and treasures useful, bred venomous serpents, and would have occasioned the destruction of the Hebrews. -They remembered how, through the providence of God, and his distinguishing care over them, they were free at the same time from the plagues of Egypt, and enjoyed a rational dispensation, and they were not left without water and both conspired to plague the Egyptians, those very elements favoured the Israelites, the former in supplying them with food, and the latter by opening a passage for it.

How the ground brought forth flies instead of cattle. The marginal reading is, live. What is more despicable (says Philo) than a house! and yet of such force and manner as that which now proceeds from the Egyptians an open confession and acknowledgment that this was the finger of God, who can make the most incomparable creatures become benefactors, when appointed to execute his vengeance! (De Vita Mosae, lib. i., c.) The version here is not very accurate, or rather this writer, for the ground in reality does not bring forth flies, much less cattle; the meaning is, and the sense is more natural and just, that the ground was so disposed by God, as to be a proper nidus for the generation of flies, but did not afford its usual nourishment for the support and increase of cattle. This is supported by the psalmist, enumerating the gracious dispensations of God's providence, says, "He bringeth forth grass for the cattle;" and immediately after he addeth, (the word is, in the Hebrew) the Lord watered out of the earth, for the comfort and refreshment of men; where the sense is not, that God bringeth these good creatures themselves immediately out of the ground, but maketh use of them, and disposeth it in a manner proper for the producing them.

Ver. 11. But afterward they saw a new generation of flies, when, being seduced with their appetite, they asked delicate meats. The meaning here is, that as the ground was so disposed as to bring forth flies, and the river frogs, for the punishment of the Egyptians in an unprecedented manner, so, to show his favour to the Israelites, God furnished them in the wilderness with a new sort or generation of flies for their entertainment. But we are not to imagine that the quails, as the flies here referred to, were at that time in Egypt, dead, and out of use, as having never before existed; the expression is figurative, and intimates, either that those birds were in the desert, where they did not use to appear, or that they were new with respect to the Israelites; the meaning in such large flocks was unusual. Moses, who mentions this after a more simple manner, says only, that a wind from the Lord carried them into the wilderness, and caused them to appear about the midst of the wilderness. Josephus supposes these birds to come from the Arabian gulf, and then adds, very oddly, that they were so tired with crossing it, that they considered the sea as some sort of a desert, and that being disposed to rest, they were not disinclined to try their course, and appointed where they should fall. This seems another instance, where Josephus, by attempting a solution, extremizes the miracle.
is nevertheless ravishing and beautiful; so this writer makes us assent to this unconditional statement, without assigning any reason whatever for it, and makes no allusion whatever to what happened in Egypt and the desert, and from hence illustrates God's dealings with the Israelites and the Egyptians, whose minds were, whether displayed in the way of judgment or mercy, but fixed on the earth, and not on the nature of things, yet no ways discontented the regular and beautiful order of it.

Ver. 19. For earthly things were turned into emery, and the things that before swam in the water, now went upon the ground. i. e. Both the Israelites and their cattle passed the Red sea itself, as safe as on dry ground, and the frogs, leeches, and serpents, which were Egyptians in the sea, but entered into the houses of the Egyptians, and even into their "kings' chambers" (Ps. cv. 30).

Ver. 20. The fire had power in the water, forgetting its own kind; and this was a sign of his converting nature. This refers to the plague of man, hail, and fire mixed with it, mentioned before. It is observable that in this plague, God made use of three of the elements at one time, as his instruments of vengeance. For as the Egyptians had a conceit that there were many local deities, some presiding over the air, others over the waters, some celestial, and others ruling over the earth; hence Jehovah, the only true God, thought it necessary to assert his own unity, and show the immensity and universality of his dominion and power, by commanding at the same time so many of the elements to be active to chastise this rebellious people (see note on xvi. 16—18).

Ver. 21. On the other side, the flames wasted not the flesh of the corruptible living things, though they walked therein; i.e. The fire had no power over the same, which the sun could easily dissolve in the field. Manna is here called icy, not only from its resisting the fire, but from its being generated in or by the air, and from its resembling in smoothness the hoar frost on the ground; the Genesis bible renders, "Neither melted they, that which seemed to be ice, and was of a nature that would melt, and yet was an immortal meat." As ambrosia was supposed to be the food of the gods, so manna, as containing all nourishment, according to the account of the bread of angels inhabiting there, is called ὀρυζός τῶν ἀνάμνησις by this writer, and by Philo ὀρυζός ἀπορροή (see notes on ch. xv. 14, 15). And some others drawn from the heathen writings. Calmet observes the ambrosia of a.Now in history of these mischievous and destructive creatures.

Neither melted they the icy kind of heavenly meat, that was of nature apt to melt. i.e. The fire had no power over the same, which the sun could easily dissolve in the field. Manna is here called icy, not only from its resisting the fire, but from its being generated in or by the air, and from its resembling in smoothness the hoar frost on the ground; the Genesis bible renders, "Neither melted they, that which seemed to be ice, and was of a nature that would melt, and yet was an immortal meat." As ambrosia was supposed to be the food of the gods, so manna, as containing all nourishment, according to the account of the bread of angels inhabiting there, is called ὀρυζός τῶν ἀνάμνησις by this writer, and by Philo ὀρυζός ἀπορροή (see notes on ch. xv. 14, 15). And some others drawn from the heathen writings. Calmet observes the ambrosia of a.

Ver. 22. For in all things, O Lord, thou didst magnify thy people, and glorify them, neither didst thou lightly regard them; but didst assist them in every time and place. We should observe here, that in the history of the world, God glorified the Israelites in all things, and assisted them in every time and place, is another instance of Jewish optimism and the selfish spirit of patriotism, that if the Scriptures do not prove to be the accomplishment of that people, who imagined themselves to be the only beloved of God, that they had an unchangeable interest in him, and that no neglect or undutiful behaviour of their core could influence his favour with them, which is drawn from his favourable treatment of them, against their enemy, and reject them; that God would never punish his own people in covenant, with him, and who were called by his name, in any such severe manner, as to make them ashamed of their own nation, and cause them to persuade them that their city or temple should actually be destroyed: but notwithstanding their boasted interest, inflamed alliance, and fond dependence upon their adoption private blessings, they are treated hereafter with such meanness, and set a mark upon them, like the curse of Cain, as St. Austin expresses it (Com. in Ps. lviii.), to let others see, what a difference in the same people the love or displeasure of God can make, and that his favour to any nation is not absolute, but that it may be unexpectedly changed, and that as one observer sees (tom. iii. p. 210), that our author in this work proceeds upon right principles in making the Egyptians, as well as the Canaanites, to be an accursed seed from the beginning, and the end of the days of Israel to be a seed doubly blessed, as being the progeny of Shem and of faithful Abraham; but that he is guilty of a two-fold error in his inference and consequences, first, in presuming that the curse derived from their father Cham should be perpetually upon the Egyptians; secondly, that the blessing derived from Shem and Abraham unto their seed, should continue, and go along with them in every time and place. For, it is contrary to the calendar made by this learned author, of the opposite fates or destinies of the Egyptians and the Jews, began in his own time, and is to continue, and shortly after our Saviour's resurrection to be out of date, and even quite inverted; for the lot or destiny which this good author assigned unto the ungodly Egyptians, 'That wrath should come upon them without mercy unto the end' (xix. 1), did at length fall upon his presumed holy ones, upon the Jews his countrymen, of whom St. Paul gives this melancholy account, and very indifferent character; 'That they both killed the Lord Jesus and their own prophets, and persecuted the apostles, being contrary to all men, and displacing God; forbidding to speak to the gentiles that they might be saved, fulfilling up the words of the prophets, and filling them that were upon them to the uttermost' (1 Thess. ii. 15, 16). But this induration, which through their own fault hath happened to the seed of Shem and Abraham in a greater measure, is not to continue for ever, and shall not prevent the blessing of Chaim, or the Egyptians, will not, we have reason to think, be a perpetual curse upon people, nor their rejection be absolute and final: but continue only until the world shall be filled with the knowledge of God, and the progress of his glory shall be so far as to fill up and complete the plan of a universal salvation. When I speak of the greatness and prevalence of Christianity, I mean its progress throughout the world. Hence the pollutions of the soul communicate themselves to the body, as the defilements of the body vitiate and infect the soul; with great reason, therefore, it is required as a necessary means towards attaining wisdom, that we should glorify God both in our bodies and in our spirits, which is the advice of the inspired writer. 1 Cor. vi. 20.

Cl. i. 15. Add to the end of the note in ch. vi. 16. The context of Christ in the present case is not of such a nature as to give another sense of this place. That righteousness has always existed and shall never cease to be; for there have been from the beginning, and will ever continue to be, some good persons, in every age, who maintain the cause of the true God, and oppose the forces of wickedness, both by word and deed, in every place and time. Christ throughout his life was the channel of communication between the right and the wrong; he dispersed light and knowledge upon the earth, and was the great and laudable end proposed by the author of this book; and when sincerely intended, and happily accomplished, is the glory of all other works and undertakings.

To the end of the note on ch. i. 4. add,—It is observable, that the author here insists upon purity both in body and spirit; not only as necessary as the punishment of sin, but obtained without such a perfect integrity. The body itself indeed, as such, cannot be the habitation of wisdom; but through the soul, which is the temple of the Holy Ghost, and the actions and passions of one necessarily affect the other. Hence the pollutions of the soul communicate themselves to the body, as the defilements of the body vitiate and infect the soul; with great reason, therefore, it is required as a necessary means towards attaining wisdom, that we should glorify God both in our bodies and in our spirits, which is the advice of the inspired writer. 1 Cor. vi. 20.
And from that of Empedocles,

Chap. ii. 11. Let us enjoy the good things that are present; still the Grec, a bruisement, a dissipation enter, as one chose qu’on bruse, et qui s’en va en poussee (Conn. in loc. 11. 1. 6).

Chap. ii. 12. At the end of the note add—It was even the opinion of the wise heathen, that a good and virtuous life was the surest way to immortality. Thus Anthesmises in Lucianus, the prophet, saith, &c. to the effect of eke ócias, i. e. “those who aim at immortality ought to live justly and righteously.”

Chap. ii. 13. As gold in the furnace both he tried them, and rejected them. But burnt offerings. According to the best explanation which the commentators and Jewish writers give of the burnt-offering, the victim’s throat was to be cut, its body dissected, its inner organs, and the fat burnt out, and forwards it was to be burnt to ashes, that, if possible there might be nothing of it left. It is a very strong and beautiful image which this writer has chosen to represent the great variety and intensities of sufferings, which the saints undergo for righteousness’ sake; for as in the holocaust of the victim, the entire victim was entirely consumed in the flames by the appointment of God, and in honour of him, “so right dear and precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his saints,” when, “enduring a great fight of afflictions,” they expire in the cause of virtue; for martyrdom is of all others a sacrifice the most perfect and pleasant; and it is incapable of offering: it is an instance of the most consummate forbearance; in the language of Senec. Spectacula Deum dignum, ad qua specie Deus intentus operari suo. His description of the most intense passion known to man, and the way in which it comes nearest to that of the inspired writers, and is indeed a surprisingly fine sentiment from a heathen philosopher: He est ille homo honestus—qui igitur tota corporis tota situ paupertas, dum quamvis horribilem esse extendenda per patibulum manus, non quirit quidqua paupertas, sed quam bene (Ap. Laeont. lib. vi. Inst. cap. 17).

Ch. v. 21. At the end of the note add—I shall only observe further, that there is a very subtle distinction, as applied by this writer, is not unusual in some of the Greek poets:

Kλησθήσομαι βρεταν., καὶ γυμνός ΒΕΑΟΣ Οβεσθεσθώ Δῆλον—
(Fab. Pthry. Od. xiii.)

ΑΛΛ' ἔλεγκ τινί Ζεὺς ἄρτετον ΒΕΑΟΣ Καθαρίσθω καρπον—
(Aesch. Prom. 559.)

Ch. x. 4. At the end of the note add—Nor is Aratus to be understood as designing to cast any reflection upon the earth’s structure, when he calls it in what follows ἄγνωστος ἄνθρωπος, a term as diminutive as that used by our author,—

Οδέ ές πάντοι

Κλησθήσομαι, ἄγνωστος ἀνθρώπων (Oxon. did άγνως τον άνθ.)
(Phenomen. p. 32. ed. Oxon.)

Ch. x. 10. Dr. Grabe thinks that ἄγνωστος, which is the reading in the Gene. and which he should probably take, is the former signifies only to grow rich, but the latter to make rich, which is the sense of the author in this place; and thus ἄγνωστος is used in Lucan. Quoniam fidel. scr. ed. ut. tom. ii. p. 194. That, however, the geographers limit this sense (Graff. Proleg. tom. ult. cap. 4).

In ch. xiv. 3. After the words, “of the inscription upon the Phares built by Sotirius,” insert—Gruter has an inscription upon the same occasion to Castor and Pollux.

ΕΕΙΟΥ ΜΗΤΑΛΟΟΙ ΔΙΟΣΚΟΡΗ ΚΑΒΕΡΟΙ COSTARI ET POLLYCI DIIS MAGNIS.
(Grut. Inscept. vies. p. 13.)

But the most remarkable is that of Jupiter Urins Bosphe- rus, published by Professor S. W. Smith, and after- ward more correctly by Chisal, who engraved a copy of the stone which was brought from the Bosphorus into Eng- land in 1731, and is now among the curiosities of Dr. Mend’s library. It is supposed that it appeared in the statue: Philo, son of Anipater, being mentioned in it, who lived under Alexander the Great see Pll. Nat. Hist. xxxv. and the statue likewise is a fine nature of lightning to arrive, as it is so.

Οίονικος εν πώρινος της δυσφορίας καλοί
Who could deny to a figure diseased and extinction, or an absurd representation of the ruin of the body of our poetic; and all possibility of recovery from its dust, which the companions drawn from an earthen vessel will better suit: and this in- deed was the sentiment of the Epicureans, and as such maintained by the libertines here introduced, that when the soul quitted the body it was dissipated into air, “in tenebris evan- ens anima;” and thus Calmet explains this term as meaning, suivant le Grec, a bruisement, a dissipation enter, comme qu'on bruse, et qui s'en va en poussee (Conn. in loc. 11. 1. 6).

THE BOOK
THE WISDOM OF JESUS THE SON OF SIRACH, or ECCLESIASTICUS.

My Lord,
The great regard which you have always shown for whatever may tend to promote the cause of virtue and goodness, and the affection which you were pleased to express for your clergy, encourage me to hope for a favourable acceptance of the following sheets.

The excellent morality of the Wisdom of the Son of Sirach, and the justness of its observations, which have stood the test, and gained the approbation of so many successive ages, have deservedly recommended it to general esteem. A celebrated metropolitan (Archbishop Whiglit), in particular, one of the early lights of the Reformation, had such a high opinion of its worth, and the great usefulness of its being thoroughly understood, that he purposely engaged the learned Drusius to undertake an illustration of it, under his patronage and encouragement.

Though I might, after the example of our author, in celebrating such famous men as "are leaders of the people by their counsel, wise and eloquent in their instructions, and by their knowledge of learning meet for great purposes," be induced to attempt a parallel between his favourite character (ch. I.) and that of your Lordship, yet I choose religiously to adhere to the advice of this wise writer, not to offend in the presence of great men, nor to court favour by the mean artifice of flattery.

May the same good providence of God, which, from a calamity that threatened your life, reserved your Lordship for the happiness of this diocese, still continue to watch over you for the future benefit and service of his church.

I am, my Lord,
Your Lordship's most dutiful and obedient servant, RICHARD ARNALD.

The Book of Ecclesiasticus, according to some writers, is so called, because the ancients divided the books of the Old Testament volume into four sorts; the first contained the Pentateuch, the second the Prophets, the third the Hagiographa, the fourth the ecclesiastical or apocryphal books, as not being in the Jewish canon. Among the ecclesiastical books, this of Jesus, the son of Sirach, being most remarkable and useful, it was Xαρατζείς, called Ecclesiasticus, whilst the rest of the same class have lost their name. According to others, this title was given by the Latins to it, to denote its use in the church, its being read for the sake of edification in the public religious assemblies; or, lastly, because, like Solomon's Ecclesiastes, which it resembles in name, as well as matter, it teaches and... instructs such as attend to it by the admirable precepts which it delivers, and the earnest and frequent exhortations therein to wisdom, which in these sapiental books is another word for religion. In the printed Greek copy it is improperly styled The Wisdom of Sirach, which is an abbreviation made with great absurdity; for it ascribes the book to Sirach, who was neither the author nor the translator of it, and therefore could neither way have any relation to it. It is more usually and properly called, The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach, because wisdom, in some branch or other of it, is the subject of the whole volume.

The author opens his work with the eulogium of wisdom in general; then he enters into a variety of useful particulars, and continues to deliver many important precepts and instructive lessons for the right conduct of life, to ch. xxiv. where wisdom is supposed to speak herself in person, and by the most engaging persuasive motives, which are conversant with the value and importance of piety. He proceeds, and almost what is human, in the sublimity of his sentiments: and at length finishes the whole with a panegyric, or solemn commemoration of the most celebrated worthies of his own nation, illustrations instances in their respective generations of the several virtues he has been recommending. The books of Proverbs, Canticles, the method and order of Solomon, and exhibiting, like him, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, not in separate books indeed, but as parts of the same work (Not. ad Script. Eccl. Euseb. lib. iv. cap. 29).

The ancients styled this book the Greek name Nabares, signifying that it treats of and comprises all the duties of religion, and morality so full and comprehensive, as that there is scarce any virtue which this excellent piece does not recommend, and lay down rules for obtaining it; nor a vice or indecorum which it does not expose and discourage; it forms the manners of persons of all ages, sexes, and conditions, by an infinity almost of useful maxims and instructions. One learns from it all the duties of religion and civil life, both what pious commands, and politeness and good manners expect. Every one may here discover, so full and obvious is it, what he owes to God, to his country, his neighbourhood, his family, and to himself; how to behave in the different relations of life, either to superiors or inferiors, friends, relations, masters, and so on, may be thought, as indeed some have represented it, to comprise all the duties of both tables: for the precepts which it delivers, and the principal matters which it treats of, may be divided into four sorts: 1. Theological. 2. Political. 3. Economical. 4. Ethical; or rules respecting all sorts of men indifferent, how Greek, or how Christian. These four heads take in most, if not all, the maxims of this book, so that what lies dispersed in the great volumes of philosophers and moralists, is collected into a short compass, and to be found here as it were in miniature: in short, the author has given us at once a whole treasury of wisdom, and with great propriety, how Greek, or how Christian. These exhortations, reproofs, examples, prayers, praises, &c. so that truth appears in different attitudes and forms, but beautiful and engaging under each, and shines with so complicated a lustre, as cannot but draw attention, and command respect and admiration. But besides the excellent moral instructions here given, some learned men have discovered in it certain vestiges of a more deep and recondite wisdom, and judge it to contain the more secret Solomon’s secret wisdom (see Lee’s Dissert. on the second book of Esdras, p. 52); which probably was taught in the schools of the prophets, and, after the cessation of them, in those of the great doctors of the law, and interpreters of the sacred writings.

It was composed originally for the use and advantage of those who should live and act agreeably to the laws of God; with this view the grandson rendered it into Greek, and with the same design has it been translated into many other ancient and modern languages. On the same account, as being an instructive manual, and good for the use of edifying, it has met with general esteem, especially in the western church, and introduced by our first reformers, and the venerable compilers of our articles, into the public service. Nor can it fail of producing, in such as are well disposed, those fruits which one never fails of gathering from the knowledge of truth, when searched after, not merely as a matter of speculation or curiosity, but with an honest intention to practise what it teaches. For this reason I have endeavored to convert the precepts and make his design more useful and extensive, I have sometimes ventured beyond the common and literal sense, and have accommodated a more exalted and spiritual one, extracted either from the valuable comment of Mssieurs of Port-Royal, or what occurred to me, and seemed naturally to arise from the text, and could not be inferred from it: by these means I have brought home to Christians what, by this writer, was originally directed to the Jews, and have assisted the reader to find out the duties of the new law, in the letter and precepts of the old one.

There is one more excellence which I must not omit, which is common to this with the book of Proverbs, that it is, in the highest degree, most useful and beneficial, in such short and weighty apothegms as may most strongly affect the mind, and yet not overcharge the memory; a method in which the wisdom of the ancients thought it most proper to deliver the rites and mysteries of religion, as well as their civil laws and constitutions. For truths which depend upon demonstration and a long and abstruse chain of reasoning, are not so obvious to all capacities, as those which are couched in short memorial sentences, in expressive aphorisms, in single and often independent propositions, as all collections of proverbial and sententious truths are, which being founded upon experience, and authorized by the observation of others, are admitted as just and approved maxims, and are such as successively handed down to posterity; and every age confirms, and finds the benefit of them.

Though it is indubitably certain that this book was not written by Solomon, who lived many ages before, and there is in the work itself internal marks to declare it so, yet it hath been ascribed to him on account of the great resemblance of matter and style, and made by the Latin church to be one of his five books, as they are called, and is so quoted by several of the fathers, and as such in most of them joined with them, and like them wrote such wise in the Alexandrian MS, and supposed, according to the Epistle to the Ephesians, which is written originally in metre. St. Jerome says, that he himself saw a Hebrew copy of this work, not under the name of Wisdom, but of Parables, or Proverbs (Pref. in Prov.) Munster also... and Fagius mention others; but Scaliger, Drusius, and Huetius, think none of these to be the original, but either Ben-Sira's alphabet, or some late Hebrew version made from the Greek, such as that which appeared of the book of Tobit, which Fabricius mentions (Bibl. Gr. tom. ii.). And indeed it must be acknowledged, that this book is composed very much in imitation of the Proverbs of Solomon, and very frequently alludes to and copies from them; hence by Athanasius, or the author of the anonymous (sic) Dissertation of 1805, this writer is said to be ὁ Σολωμοῦ, with this difference, only, that the sentences of the book of Proverbs are not so closely connected, especially from the tenth chapter of that work, as those of this writer, who more frequently ranges under distinct heads what he observes upon the same subject, and in the Roman edit. and some MSS. titles are occasionally prefixed to some chapters, denoting the contents of what follows, though even this of our author might have been more perfected in this respect, as his reflections upon similar occasions lie too much dispersed, and the distribution of chapters not regular, being probably different collections by him, and not sorted so orderly by the translator as one might expect, and as is intimated in the Prolog.

We are therein informed, that the Hebrew Sirachides gathered many grave and short sentences of wise men that had been before him, some scattered ones, or remains, probably, of Solomon's three thousand proverbs (1 Kings iv. 32), successively de-ivered down (see Tertullian, Bibl. Rabb. tom. i. p. 249, Huetius, Dem. Evang. prop. 4). Nor is it too doubted, but that the common-place book of some learned men, as well as some of his own, were added by the last Jesus, the son of Sirach, to his grandfather's book, or from marginal additions of other men's sayings of the like nature; which being too few to fill a book of themselves, and, as other fugitive pieces, liable to be lost, if not collected togeterher, were joined to this larger work in the same kind, to be ready at hand when occasionally looked for. Thus Solomon's Proverbs were augmented with a new collection by the men of Hez-kiah, taken, as some imagine, from copies of Solomon's Proverbs, with these sayings added, which therefore passed under the name of Solomon. Be-that as it will, such books of apophthegms were made, as it were, heads of a common-place book, to which, such things of the same nature were reduced. So the ancient vocabularies have come to be enriched with many new words, by their possessors in different successive ages. We cannot otherwise account for the variations in the several Greek copies of Ecclesiasticus, and the translations of it, nor for the entire sentences which are found in some and wanting in other copies. And I have sometimes been inclined to think that text, vi. 22, "Wisdom is according to her name, and is not manifest unto many," is one addition of the translator, where he derives the Greek word κόσμημα from a Hebrew one, which signiifies covered, or hid, which the elder Jesus, who wrote it, could not do, but such as might, who was skilled in that and the Hebrew tongue. And the like probably may be observed of xiii. 8, as the reading is in all the present Greek copies.

The Hebrew Sirechides wrote his book in the language of the Jews of Jerusalem, such as was used after their return from the captivity, probably either in the Babylonian dialect, or Syriac, as a manual for the Jews in Egypt. This learned work itself to have come down imperfect, either through the author's death, or the loss of some part of it in Egypt (see Bishop Chandler's Vindic. of Def. p. 81—87): which may perhaps account for the great incoherence and abrupt transition in many places. We have no authentic monument whereby we can know how long the original was preserved; it is supposed to have been lost, either in troublesome times, or dropped through disuse. The Greek is the present and only original, and is the most early and authentic translation of this work, made for the use of the Jews in Egypt in their dispersion, who had then almost all forgot their native tongue; and so this, as well as other books, not canonical in which he departed from the text, has been too literal a translation, which often occasions the sense to be either obscure or deficient. The translator himself has the modesty to acknowledge, that he doubts he has failed in expressing the full spirit of the then language, whether it was the ancient and pure, or more modern and corrupt Hebrew, and ingeniously apologizes for not coming up to the exact propriety and expressiveness of the original; which might indeed easily happen, as it has to the law and the prophets, which lose much of their energy, when attempted in another language, as is well urged in his favour in the second Prologue. It is well if inaccuracy be his only fault; Drusius seems to think, that he has sometimes actually mistaken the original, and often in the original, to make more obscure and intricate passages; and no wonder that this too should happen, for even the Greek version of the canonical books has often stumbled on seemingly plain ground.

There is a strange transposition of chapters in the best Greek copies of this book, from ch. xxx. to ch. xxv. and in other copies, which, when so transposed, on which account the printed editions, as may well be expected, greatly differ from one another; these, with the number of various readings, which Heschelius has collected with much exactness, and are chargeable chiefly on the carelessess of transcribers, show the present state of it to be corrupt and audacious. And with respect to the Greek translation itself, I am far from contending that the language is beautiful, or altogether correct. On the contrary, it does not always seem agreeable in construction to the received rules of grammar; and especially the uncommon use of the Greek particles, so frequently to be met with in it, has been objected to, as harsh: but these particularities I conceive to be mostly owing to the adoption of the Macedonian language, and are not so properly faults, as modes of that adopted tongue. But that it abounds with solecisms, as Camerarius and others have charged it with, I cannot admit. For the Alexandrine Greek, in which dialect this book, as we at present have it, undoubtedly was written, however wide from the common and received way of writing, has yet, by some men of learning, been observed to concur with it very surprisingly, where one would not expect it. Hebrews indeed often occur in the text, and so they do in the Greek one of the Old and New Testament; but they are not reckoned by the judicious faults or blemishes. Philo, I believe, is not one among the teachers of the Christian fathers, who wrote in Egypt, nor do the LXX. often transgress in this way, unless when the perplexity of the original, or their defect of understanding it, drove them accidentally so to do, which perhaps may be the case of the translator of this book.

I have before intimated, that in his version, he often changed the Macedonian Greek language; for from the time of Alexander the Great, it is certain, the Jews began to hellenize, and that the Greek tongue, spoken by the Macedonians, became more-common among them. And indeed, it is no wonder that the Jews of Alexandria, to whom that monarch, and the Emperor of the East, not attending to the privileges with the Macedonians, and other Greeks, should, by their constant intercourse with the other citizens, among whom they were there mingled, be necessitated to learn and constantly use the Greek language, and that should happen to them here, as did before at Babylon on the like occasion; I mean that, with the Latins themselves to a foreign language, they should forget their own. And this will appear the more probable, as we learn from Philo, Josephus, and the apocryphal writings, particularly the books of Maccabees, Wisdom, and this of Ecclesiasticus, in which frequent allusion is made to Greece in rites and customs, that the Jews had learned their philosophy, and entirely forgot all the contents of their opions, ever since their conversing with that people under Alexander the Great, the Ptolemies, and Selecideus his successors, who reigned in Egypt and Syria.

The old versions, particularly the Syriac and Arabic, are sometimes so wide from the Greek, that one scarce knows how to pronounce them from it, often inserting long phrases foreign to it, and in other places omitting as much; and yet there is no good reason to think that they translated from any Hebrew copy: if that indeed was certain, they would stand on an equal foot with the Greek, excepting its being translated so early, and by so near a relation. Nor do they, as proper, follow any ancient or better authority. As to the Vulgate in particular, it is uncertain what copy it follows, or of what authority that copy was: it sometimes adds whole sentences, which have nothing to answer them in the Greek; possibly the translator, to be more explicit, gave two renderings of the same sentence, or, as Huetus conjectures, inserted some form of Latin as from some other work. It does not appear to have been interpolated, except some marginal annotations should accidentally have crept into the text, much less to have been corrupted with design by an offic-cious hand: and there is still less reason to assert, that any alterations have been made by the pious fraud of some Christian, to make it conform to and correspond with the Vulgate, as Huetus says, or, as the Greek has, without any warrant or proof, more than once intimated. Bossuet, Calmet, and the other commentaries follow the Vulgate too implicitly and securely, and make that version the foundation of their annotations, and no wonder that the popish expositors should adhere religiously to it, which the council of Trent has confirmed and ratified. It may be observed of all these, and of Grotius himself among the rest, that by commenting from this, instead of the Greek, which serves now for the original, a sense is often given either superfluous or foreign to the author's meaning.

The old English versions, as Coverdale's and the Bishop of Baths, have followed the Vulgate too closely, imitating and transcribing it in many faulty instances: the Geneva often departs from it for the better. Our last translators are not so servile, nor do they follow any one Greek copy invariably, as it is difficult, I may say, impossible, to fix upon any one copy as the true standard of the rest; but they seem chiefly to have regarded the Complut, which, though it lies under a suspension of condemning its Greek to the Vulgate; yet Dr. Grabe (Prolegom. cap. 3. § 1) says, it exhibits a text in this book, "Non nuper fictum aut interpolatum, sed jam olim a patribus actum lectum." But they scruple not occasionally to prefer the Latin before the Greek, where they think it gives a better sense, and sometimes even to adopt conjectures, unsupported by any copy, for the same purpose. But upon the whole, either not attending to the singular goodness of a text, or not expressing fully the spirit and propriety of the Greek, their rendering is in many places inaccur-curate and obscure, and in some faulty and mistaken. These defects are indeed discernible in many translations, made immediately from the original; but they must necessarily be more numerous, where translations are made from one another, as most of our English ones probably are; which holds true of the canonical books (see Boyle on the Style of the Holy Scriptures), as well as of the apocryphal writings.

The learned are divided in their sentiments about the time of writing this book. The first opinion is of those, who refer it to the reign of Solomon, and make that prince to be the author of it. But to the reasons before hinted at against this notion, we may add, that this writer speaks of Solomon himself, very much to his discredit; of the kings his successors; of prophets, and other famous men, who lived before and after the Babylonish captivity; of the twelve minor prophets, and cites the very words of Malachi, and several passages of the Old Testament (see note G at Deut. xxxi. 24); and by inserting the words of a de-priest, whose time, whether we understand it of the first or second of that name, will by no means synchronize to the era of Solomon's reign. And the author in some passages (as xxxiv. 11, 12. li.) discovers certain particulars of his own life, which cannot be applied to that prince. The second is of a time so much beyond as progressing after the date of the translation of the books of the Old Testament into the Greek, as Eleazar, and in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphe, between A. M. 3711, the supposed year of Sim-on the Just's death, and A. M. 3783, the year of Euter-getes the First's death, according to Usher, and other chronologers. This opinion is in part admissible, and may be true so far as it relates to this writer's borrowing into Egypt from the Sibyl and Orphists, as by writing this book of Ecclesiasticus, which was under another reign, and in his more advanced age. The third is of those, who place him either under the pontificate of Simon II. of whom they understand ch. i. or of Onias III. before Christ, cir. 171 years, and make him (the grandfather) to go, or rather flee into Egypt, or at the commencement of the reign of the Jews under Antiochus Epiphanes, to whose troublesome times they refer ch. xxxiv. xxxv. xxxvi. li. This opinion is as much too late for the author's writing his original work, and agrees not with his seeing Simon the Just officiate, mentioned ch. i. nor does it allow a sufficient distance of time between the two Sibyls, the author and the Greek translator, the latter of whom translated, as he himself says, under Eutergetes, which must mean the second of that name. The new hypothesis advanced in the following discourse of the respective times, makes the grandfather to have written Ecclesiasticus some time under Euter-getes I., about 232 years before Christ, and the grandfather to have been in the first of Simon's, or of Simon II., or rather of the joint reign of the two brothers. Which date is proposed as most probable, because otherwise the life of the translator would be carried beyond the age of man, as will appear distinctly from the chronological table annexed; for the favour of which I am obliged to the singular goodness of a very learned prelate, to whom religion and the republic of letters are greatly indebted, and whose sentiments on all occasions are so just, that every the least work of his is truly valuable.

Some disputes have been raised concerning this writer, from his being called Jesus, the son of Sirach. From the first some have contended, that the author of this book was Jesus, son of Josedec the high-priest, mentioned Hag. i. 1, as we meet with several of this name in the Jewish history; but as that Jesus lived in the times of Zachary, Malachi, Ezra, and Nehemiah, he must have been some centuries before our author; for these holy men flourished under Da- rius Hystaspes, who preceded even Alexander the Great two hundred years; but this writer lived after prophecy had ceased, after the time of Ezra, and the perfecting the canon, even after that of Simon the Just, the last, as is generally supposed, of the men of the great synagogue, from whose family, by Ezechar, probably this writer was descended. From the time of his father’s death he was young; when he was bidden, with some rabbins and Christian writers, that, as the Jews have now a book among them which they call the book of Ben-Sira, i.e. the book of the son of Sira; and this book containing a collection of moral sayings, this Ben-Sira, or the son of Sira (of whose proverbs Fagius has given two alphabets in Hebrew and Chaldee, with a Latin version, of the same name), likewise. For this Ben-Sira, according to some Jewish writers, was the son or nephew of Jeremiah, and not long after his time, and had a son named Uziel, and a grandson Joseph (names which suit not either the author or the translator), and so must have lived in the time of the captivity, or soon after the return from it; but the manner of Ecclesiastes, with flourished after the time of Alexander the Great, and the establishment of the Greek monarchy (see Bux. and Baroloc. Bibl. Rabbin). With as little reason is Jesus, the writer of this book, supposed by others to be one of the LXX. interpreters; for though it is probable he went into Egypt in the time of Ptolemy, Philadelphus, yet that he was sent thither, or assisted in that translation, or took the hint from questions proposed to those interpreters, to set about his own work of moral sentences and apothegms, is all conjecture. This notion took its rise probably from Aristides mentioning one of that name amongst those interpreters, which, suppose it true, though his account is generally reckoned fabulous, is not sufficient to determine that Jesus, the son of Sira, was the person.

I have, in the comment on the book of Wisdom, considered and examined the principal councils, on the sanction of which the Romanists ground the canonicalness of this, and the other apocryphal writings, to which I beg leave to refer the reader; at present I shall take leave to enter under an apocryphal pretence, which is urged by some of that communication, viz. that besides the first canon of scripture, made in the time of Esdras, there was another added in the time of Eleazar the high-priest, by a council then assembled at Jerusalem, when they sent their seventy-two interpreters to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, for the translating their Hebrew bible into Greek, in which council they canonized the books of Tobit, Ecclesiastes, and some others. In answer to this, I observe,—1. That it does not appear by any evidence that the Jews ever had any such second canon among them. 2. Had there been any such, they were of tenancies of their laws, and not by the command of their elders, ever to have parted with it. 3. To what purpose should they afterwards reject such a canon, or what would they have gained by it? Possibly they might have been willing to abolish or mutilate those scriptures, as Isaiah and Daniel, which prophesied of the coming of Christ, at the time when the Hebraism of the Jews was declining. If they had encouraged them to attempt an alteration as to these books in which there are no such prophecies against them? 4. Had these, now called apocryphal books, ever been made parts of the canonical scriptures, it would have been a wicked sacrilege in the Jews after to have rejected them; nor would Christ, that so often and so often reproved them for taking away the true sense of Scripture, have failed to have condemned them more severely for renouncing whole books of it. As there is then no such canon any where to be produced, nor any probability that the Jews should receive any such, who religiously adhered to the first as delivered to them by the prophets, and still less reason to imagine that they ever should part with it after the times of Christ, there can be no evidence of any kind can make it, that there never was any such second canon of scripture made by a council of Jerusalem (see Cusin’s Schol. Hist. p. 14, &c.). Calmet indeed says, that it is a received opinion of the catholic church, that this book was placed in the canon of scripture; and that it may be demonstrated by the time and circumstance of the composition of the condition of all Christian churches, and by its being quoted by a great number of ecclesiastical writers, as a work inspired by the Holy Ghost. To the first assertion I answer,—that if, by the catholic church, he means the church universal, it is not true. Episcopius, to show the agreement of Christian churches in the canon of scripture, enumerates the decisions of nine of the eastern, and nine of the western, and two of the African churches, determining for the canon as we now have it, and excluding all other, but the twenty-two books received by the Jewish church, and contained in the Hebrew bible (see Joseph. cont. App. lib. 1). If, by catholic church, he means that of Rome in particular, his judgment cannot outweigh the decisions of a larger number, and churches of greater authority, viz. those of Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioc, and Constantinople, to the contrary. As to the second pretence, that the fathers reverence and quote this book as scripture, it may be replied, 1. That the term scripture is often taken laxly, to signify any ancient ecclesiastical writings, containing excellent and pious instructions in them; in regard whereof this book, and the other of Wisdom, may have been called holy writings, and divine books, and sometimes canonical ones, but not in so true and strict a sense as the other uncontroverted books are. 2. That when either the Greek or Latin fathers make a more honourable regard, or some attention to particular passages in the books of Maccabees and Esdras. And this, God willing, shall follow with all convenient speed.
PROLOGUE.

Almost all the prophets.] Either this is a mistake, or they mistake who make Malachi the last of all the prophets. For, to understand this passage, you must know that God's father (to carry the matter as high as possible), though undoubtedly the grandson is meant here, as the learned have very justly observed that this book was written in the third century before Christ, and translated about a hundred and thirty-three years before his advent (see Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 41); we cannot reconcile the assertion here with the facts. The interpreters who have written on this subject, as Pufe- lachi, and the completing of the canon; which Helwicus, Prideaux, Usher, place about anno 428. Artaxerxes 37, except the word prophetic is to be taken in a more lax and extensive sense (see the following discourse).

PROLOGUE II.

For in the eighth and thirtieth year coming into Egypt, when Evergetes was king, &c.] The learned are greatly divided how to settle this difficulty; they are not agreed whether the words should be understood of the thirty-eighth year of the translator, or of the years of the reign of Ever- getes, or of the thirty-eighth year of jubilee, or of the thirty-eighth of the Domnysan era, or of the thirty-eighth year of the Jews' deliverance from slavery under Prude lachi, and the completing of the canon; which Helwicus, Prideaux, Usher, place about anno 428. Artaxerxes 37, except the word prophetic is to be taken in a more lax and extensive sense (see the following discourse).

Greek this same book," τῶν τὰς διδασκαλίας τινα γιανδίστα, viz. his grandfather's, which he before recommended as a most useful book. This makes his whole prologue consist of a little, and is nothing else than the translation of a prologue to the account given in the anonymous prologue above." I could not conceal from the reader this ingenious conjectur e; how far the circumstance of time, and the era of the respective writers, will confirm it, the learned must determine.

Where there are intrinsic characters in any author, that show the age he did or did not live in, or give ground for reasonable conjectures of the time he wrote in, little notice should be taken of authorities who are only writers of a distant, subsequent age, to the prejudice of the author, whose characters they overlook or contradict. This is the case of the translators of the book of Athanasius, which is joined with the prologue of the Greek translator of the book of Ec- clesiastics. It is probable he is the same Athanasius, bishop of Alexandria, as Euthaliius dedicated his edition of the Acts and Epistles to, who flourished between the years 459 and 490, as is proved by Zacagni the editor: and so, he was above a century at least from the age of the great Athanasius, and at too great a distance from the age of the translator of Ecclesiastics, to regard his additions or deductions that may be drawn from any expressions in the prologue aforesaid. For instance, the Hebrew Sira chides speaks in the praise of the twelve minor prophets, xlv. 10, "And of the twelve prophets let the memorial be blessed."—So that he not only lived after them, but even after the prophecies were collected into one volume, which the translators of the twelve prophets, as did the collection of the five books, where Moses under the name of the Pentateuch, and of the Octateuch, when the three other books were added to it.

And to be honest with Malachi, the last prophet, made one in the collection of the twelve prophets, the same Hebrew Ecclesiastes quotes the very words of Malachi, as a pre- diction of his, then yet to be fulfilled. For speaking of Elias, who, as Malachi foretold, was to come before the great and terrible day of the Lord, he epitomizes what Malachi had said upon that occasion (iv. 5, 6): "Elias (says he) was ordained to pacify the Lord's judgment before it breaks forth." And then quotes the very words of Ma lachi (xlvii. 10), "To turn the heart of the father unto the son." But how then are we to understand Athanasius when he says, "The son of Sirach lived almost after all the prophets!" It is of no consequence whether we understand him at all. If he meant almost after the twelve, or any of the minor prohets, that is plainly mistaken. And if he uses the word prophetic in any other sense, it is foreign to your purpose. Possibly he might learn of the Jews (who esteemed the Septuagint to be a lower degree of prophecy) to call those prophetical who were not. And if he, rather, with Josephus, to term some holy men prophets, who lived in the interval between the ceasing of prophecy and the advent of Christ, and predicted a few future events, relating to public or private affairs, which came to pass accordingly, as Josephus affirms. The same prologue of Athanasius confirms, that Sirachides was no less "familiar with the word common," which, I think, intends no more than that his collection of wise, pithy sayings, was in as great repute, was known and read as much as the Proverbs of Solomon, which were in the greatest esteem for their wisdom and learning. As much as to say,—Sirachides was looked on as another Solomon, for his wise, moral, and economical precepts. Eastern commentators, like Ptolemy, undertook to explain them (not to be stretched to every degree of equality. Sirachides might imitate Solomon, and resemble him in many things, without coming up to his full height of wisdom, much less to his great name.

The learned are indeed much divided in opinion, touching the thirty-eight year, mentioned in the prologue of the Greek Sirachides, but most of their reasons may be answered, and methinks I see, in the prologue itself, light enough how to understand it differently from them all. His words are these: "Εἰς τὴν ἔτος ἡμέραν ὅτε ἔστω Εὐσεβίου Βασιλείαν ἐγένετο εἰς τὴν δυσάρεστην ἡμέραν ἔφθασεν εἰς τὴν ἔτος ἡμέραν. For I take the sense to be, "For in the thirty-eight year (Evergetes being then king) after I had come into Egypt and journeyed there all that whole long time, I met with a copy or exemplar of this book, found with no small learning."—To synthesize, is to be equal in time or duration with some other thing: and here is nothing to synthesize with besides the thirty-eight years of his abode in Egypt, which began from the year of his first entrance into that country, and concurred with the succeeding years to the thirty-eighth.

In Mr. Sirachides, or Sirachides (as some manuscripts have it) is not classical Greek. For though φθασεν doth usually stand in the Greek writers for (as in) taking the particle ἐν in a contrary sense to that I use it in, yet since φθανεν signifies a sudden and unexpected death, ἐφθασεν may not signify a counterpart of a writing, copied upon, from or after it. It must be remembered, that in Alexandria, the common people, as yet, spoke Macedonian Greek, and our translator, conversing much with them, might fall into their dialect, or compose Greek words as they did, though not so much in use before him, when he thought them to be more expressive of his meaning.

This thirty-eight year is divided into four parts of the jubilee year, surely did not consider that those years, no more than the sabbatical years, were observed out of the way, and the design of the design was, to preserve the inheritions of families within their own proper tribes; and therefore when a possessor, through misfortune, or luxurious living, had been forced to mortgage his estate, or sell it, with the right of redemption, at or after the revolution of fifty years, and so the inheritance was restored to the family that formerly possessed it; but as the Jews had no inheritances in their dispersions, the jubilee year was impracticable, and the observation of such an epoch needless, and next to impossible.

Nor will recourse to the Dionysian year help those who would make thirty-eight a year of Sirachides' death, that expected for his era, beginning from the first of Ptolemy Philadelphia, and Philadelph reigning but thirty-eight years, according to Ptolemy's Canon, at most ninety-nine according to Josephus, and a century and forty years, according to thirty-nine centuries. The Greek Sirachides' book, and consequently an hypate year or two the thirty-eighth year of the Greek Sirachides.

The year of the Jews' deliverance from slavery, under Ptolemy Philadelphia, bids fairest for a Jewish epoch to be remembered in Egypt; but as this deliverance has no other nor better authority than that of Aristus (for Josephus follows him), the fact is doubtful, especially since this deliverance is said to be purchased with a large sum of money by the Jews, which how they were slaves, and not long age, and captive into Egypt, were able to amass, is not easy to guess. The year of this deliverance is not mentioned by Aristus. Eusebius (upon what authority I know not) places it in the second or third year of the reign of Phili- drus in Egypt; and herein the Egyptians imitated the king, Julius, come to the throne of a newly-conquered kingdom, should make it one of his first acts to do the most provoking thing possible to a superstitious, changeable, sedulous people, viz., to abstain from publishing any thing that called their religion and their gods, and exposed the tyranny and cruelty of their ancestor kings, and perpetuated the history of the shameful destruction of their nation, in the cause of those revolutions; and herein the Egyptians imitated Julius Caesar; therefore, from the reckoning of Julianus Africanus, it places it in the latter end of his reign. By the computation, therefore, of that year, this version makes union with Evergetes the First, for he reigned but twenty-four years; and to those twenty-four years the five or six years of Philadelphia, after the Sirachides had made this pretended Greek version, and you get no higher than five or six years more, which fall short of the thirty-eight years in the prologue.

Indeed, by Eusebius' computation, the Greek Sirachides might come into Egypt, and begin his translation the second or third of Evergetes; but then there are other circumstances that overthrow this opinion also; for the Hebrew Sirachides undertook a new work under a king who was not so friendly to the Jews, and from whom he was in danger of his life after many sufferings by false accusations, &c. This could not happen in Ptolemy Lagi's reign, because the elder Sirachides was scarcely born at that time, at least he was too young to repair into Egypt to get wisdom and knowledge, which, as he himself seems to intimate, was the chief object of his gaining. Nor was he hence capable of writing a book of such wise instructions and observations, Nor is it likely that he or his people should suffer such grievous things under Philadelph, a prince of whose humane temper, and a particularly learned in the Jewish nation, according to the same Eusebius: if then we bring the Hebrew Sirachides into Egypt, not sooner than the reign of Evergetes the First, the Greek Sirachides could not in his reign produce the book; for a proper interval must be allowed between the writing and the translation, much longer than the reign of Evergetes, or even that of Ptolemy Philadelphia, because Sirachides wrote his book in Hebrew, or in the language of the Jews at Jerusalem, as a manual for the Jews in Egypt, which must therefore be supposed able to read and understand Hebrew; besides, it is certain, that Ptolemy Philadelphia did not translate this book out of Hebrew, because the Jews had then almost all forgot their native tongue. Thus the Greek prologue of the translator: "Having found a copy of it in Hebrew, and translated it into Greek, I translated it into our language, for me to bestow some diligence, and travel to interpret it with great watchfulness and skill, in my leisure hours, to bring the book to an end, and set it forth or publish it, the Greek version of this Egyptian dispersion or peregrination, were given to study or learning, before prepared in manners to live according to the law." This was to persuade his readers, to acquainted with the book; "to the intent (says the translator, in the same prologue) that those which are desirous to learn, and are addicted to these things, might profit more much more in living according to the law; and that the same people might easily happen within the compass of three generations, or of a hundred and twenty years, and not much sooner; consequently the Greek translator did not take too quick upon the heels of the Hebrew writer, but his age must be brought down to the reign of a later Ptolemy; and if he did translate, as he says he did, under the reign of Evergetes the First, he must have been at that time to the Second, and at a good distance from Evergetes the First.

The opinion of those (which is the general opinion of learned men) who make this thirty-eight year to be the year Sirachides died, which is a year too late, and seems to be too vague an expression, without some word, expressive of his age, to restrain it to that sense, unless it should appear that such omission is not infrequent in this translation: the mention of his own age at all does not seem to be of any importance towards raising the value of the work itself; but the long stay in Egypt before he undertook it, implies that he was well qualified for such a work, and fully acquainted with the want his countrymen were in of such a translation.

The following genealogical table may contribute to strengthen what I have advanced above concerning the age the translator lived in; at least it will show that Jesus the younger could not translate his grandfather's book under Evergetes the First.

I have collected from several passages of E- clesiasticus, that Sirachides the writer was of the priestly line, and if we may credit the reading in some Greek MSS. Bezia. 1, 3, he was descended from Eleazar, the brother of Sirach, the son of Simeon, of the tribe of Levi, that God called him Levite, and which therefore, from the reckoning of Julianus Africanus, places it in the latter end of his reign. By the computation, therefore, of that year, this version makes union with Evergetes the First, for he reigned but twenty-four years; and to those twenty-four years the five or six years of Philadelphia, after the Sirachides had made this pretended

But whether the elder Sirachides was of the family of Simon the high-priest by Eleazar or not, it is certain he was of a competent age to remember Simon’s graceful performing of the duty of high-priest; that he was not of sufficient age and experience, before the reign of Evergetes I. to write his book, in old age; and that the reign of Evergetes I. was too short (twenty-four years) for his grandson in advanced years to translate this book under the same

THE AGE OF THE TWO SIRACHIDES.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. All wisdom cometh from the Lord.] The author opens this book, as Solomon does his of Proverbs, with the commendation of wisdom; he shows its eternity, emanation from God, and union with him. Wisdom is sometimes taken for that eternal wisdom, which is an essential attribute of the divinity; sometimes personally, for the Ψαπεια, or the Word begotten of the Father; and sometimes for that derivative wisdom, which God’s infinite goodness is pleased to communicate to mankind in different measures and proportion. But in scripture, and in these sapiential books particularly, whenever mention is made of wisdom with any mark of commendation, either the sincere practice of religion and virtue is meant by it, or such knowledge, at least, that has a near and strong influence upon it.

That all wisdom cometh from the Lord, is exactly the sentiment of Solomon (whom this author very often imitates and copies) Prov. ii. 6, “The Lord giveth wisdom, out of his mouth cometh knowledge and understanding.” And therefore St. James well advises, “If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally” (i. 5, see also Dan. ii. 20—23; Sapiens humani tribuit Deus (says Lactantius) quam terrenus Peter dare nullo modo potest (De Opificio Dei, cap. 19); distinguishing God

Evergetes: as, on the other hand, the grandson must have lived beyond the usual period of men, to begin this translation in the thirty-eighth of Evergetes II. according to Usher, or his father Sirach must have exceeded the like period, did he, the son, at the thirty-eighth year of his life, reach the reign of Evergetes II. and yet his grandfather Jesus be acquainted with Simon the First.

posed me from the beginning," following a copy which read, "he works the creation from everlasting, and also from eternity;" Virgil has the same comparison,

"Quem qui seire velit, Libyci velit equorid idem dilato Deum, qui non et in potestate," an archaic verse; also ambiguous numbering them (Lib. de Arene numero); and the Pythian Apollo, to recommend his oracles; and raise a high conceit of the inhumanity of his knowledge, boasts of his skill in this particular.

Odea 7-29.

And as one cannot count the days of ages past and to come, so is it equally impossible to date the epocha of wisdom, to fix the time when she first began to be, or to determine her certain period. The impossibilities here referred to (for such must be acknowledged with respect to human power) God only can effect, who, as the prophet sublimely describes him, "measures the waters in the hollow of his hand, and defines the line of the numberless and fathomless, weight of the earth in a measure, and weighs the mountains in scales, and the hills in a balance; whose spirit none hath directed, nor showed him the way of understanding the number of the years." Deut. iii. 9.

Ver. 3.

"Who can find out the height of heaven, and the breadth of the earth, and the deep, and wisdom?" See vi. 22, and note upon it. As in the former verse wisdom is called the earth, andheat, and deep, so here it is called the number of the years, and the numberless and fathomless, which is compared with these; nor this it is compared as many as cannot be measured; intimating, that as these cannot be measured or numbered by any but God, so neither is wisdom comprehended, or can be perfectly comprehended by any else. Thus Job, speaking of the unsearchable wisdom of God, and his unfathomable perfections, puts these inquiries, and illustrates the doctrine, by an example which is given by some of his contemporaries:

"Canst thou search out the Almighty to perfection? It is higher than the heaven, what canst thou do? deeper than hell, what canst thou know? the measure of it is longer than the earth, and the breadth of it the sea" (xx. 7-9).

And the apostle cries out, "O the depth of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out!" (Rom. xi. 33). Hence, in his Theogony, describes the height of the heavens by saying, a smith's anvil would be nine days in falling from thence to the earth; which is as random a conception as the height of heaven or number of the years of Archimedes was rash of numbering the sands beneath.

Wisdom has been created before all things, and the understanding of prudence from everlasting.] Hierophant Phaon. [Cicero, Cato, &c. If we should understand wisdom here personally, it does not follow that the Logos is a creature, or even the first-born of every creature in point of order and time; the expression here rather implies his existence before all things, even before the beginning of the visible world. For if the Logos created all things, as the scripture assures us, that "without him was not anything made" (John i. 3), he cannot himself be any part of the creation, either in heaven or earth, or be numbered among the creatures, as he was before all creatures and beings. It is well worth observing, that wisdom is not here said to have been created ποιηθεν ποιηθήναι, "the first of all things," but ἡγεμόνας ἡγεμόνου, before all things; before the creation of the heaven and earth, and to have been ἐξ αἰώνος, from eternity, as also is strictly taken in the preceding verses. ἡγεμόνας is used in this sense often by the LXX. and by this author, xii. 11, 12, 5, xviii. 3, and is equal in meaning ἐξ αἰώνος, at least to cc. xxiv. 3. See note on that place, where the verb ἐξαίρετο, the same that is here used, must mean an eternal generation, as it is said of God, eternus esse, "he is eternal," from the beginning, and before the world; in which sense most catholic writers understand it, Prov. viii. 22, a passage particularly resembling this, and from which probably it was borrowed, "the Lord before his works of old;" i.e. before the works of the creation, from everlasting, or ever the earth was. It is observable, that our translators render, "The Lord posright knowledge of God, and the true way of worshipping him, were discovered but to a few nations; "God showed him to the Gentiles by his hand, and taught him what he should do, and had no knowledge of his laws," as the psalmist expresses it, Ps. civii. 19, 20. Thus again Baruch, ch. ii., "No man knoweth her way, nor thinketh of her path; but he that created her hath power over her." Or if we understand this of God, we see that the psalmist calleth upon the Deity to know all the way of knowledge, and hath given it Jacob his servant, and to Israel his beloved." Secondly, "Whoso is devout, but oftener, used to proceed with the sense of the book, does not put when he is a child, but when he is a man, and he is not the joy. It fills the soul with a holy confidence, with inward satisfaction and complacency. And though the world has not often a just consideration of, and regard to the good man's merit, yet is he not the less honourable or glorious in himself; his glory is as much above common applause, as piety is preferable to ambition. According to vulgar opinion, indeed, to inspire men with the fear of God, is to fill them with melancholy and sadness; but the wise man here assures us, that this is the only true source of joy. To fear God, is not to startle at and tremble before an all-powerful Being, nor to tremble at his judgment, but to tremble at the love and favour, at the mercy, and not the judgments, of God, which are not just and severe, but loving and merciful. Thus the psalmist: "The blood-thirsty and deceitful men shall not live out half their days" (Ps. ix. 25). But wisdom, or the fear of God, is the surest road to health and the years of thy life shall be increased" (Prov. xi. 3, and iii. 16). It is also the surest way to procure God's blessing, and to preserve men from all evils and calamities; for "the angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them" (Ps. xxxiv. 7). And in some following verses, to the inquiry, "What man is he that lusted to live, and who would fain see good days?" the answer is, "Eschew evil, and do good, seek peace and ensue it." Vers. 13. Whoso feareth the Lord, it shall go well with him at the last, and he shall find favour in the day of his death. And he that serveth the Lord shall be blessed." The Syriac has, Colenis Demum proper exitus, et in fine dierum suorum benedicetur; and the Arabic, Timentis Deum optimus eft finis, et in extrema diebus suis efficatus est. The sense of the verse is, that the good man in his last hours shall not be tormented with the worm and sting of conscience, with sad reflections upon a past ill-spent life, but shall be filled with the thought of approaching happiness, and a joyful expectation of entering into a better state, and receiving the reward of his piety. He shall die with a quiet and easy conscience, and, like good old Simeon, depart this life in peace. Thus Gal. vi. 16, St. Paul says, "They that walk according to this rule, i. e. the rule of righteousness, peace is on them, and on the Israel of God;" for we may well expound the passage as an affirmation of what is, as a wish of what may be. I refer it to the learned to determine, whether this is the proper rendering—"they that walk according to this rule;" and we may well expound the passage as an affirmation of what is, as a wish of what may be. ments of the Lord, is the principal point or fulness of wisdom (see ver. 16), the practice of which gives men a better understanding of the Psalms and Proverbs, than any maxim of human learning can infuse; for without piety, or the fear of the Lord, wisdom is falsely called, and degenerates into a vicious cunning. It has an exalted title in the book of Ecclesiastes, not because the fear of God is in the heart, and it continues with their lives' end. Or it may mean, that a good disposition and a religious temper are born and brought into the world with the faithfulness of their infancy have a fear and dread of God, and enter very early on a course of piety and religion, and are not sooner conceived and born into the church, say Messenians. God, great and good, is not a thing formed in their womb, he had a natural compassion for the poor and fatherless (xxxii. 18). And the contrary temper is well described by the Lord himself, as he says, "God is no respecter of persons; he regardeth none, except they be terrified from their mother's womb; as soon as they are born they go astray, and speak lies" (Ps. liv. 3), i.e. they are naturally addicted to such vices. Or we may understand this of some effects of the grace of God in the hearts of children. It was the case with the prophet Jeremiah, of whom God says, "Before I formed thee in the belly I knew thee, and before thou cam'st forth from the womb, I sanctified thee" (Is. lxii. 3); i.e. he was directed in the womb, and before he was born. There is a remarkable plenism in the Greek here, την την και τον ανατισσενον, which is a Hebrewism: there are frequent instances of the like construction in this book, in the Vulgate (Wis. ii. 20, and in the Greek additaments). Ver. 15. She hath built an everlasting foundation with men. . . i.e. in just men more particularly, such in whose heart the fear of the Lord is strongly rooted, the impressions and good effects of which will not be easily effaced in them or their children. As wisdom was from everlasting, so her delights have ever been with the sons of God, and is expressed (Prov. viii. 21) in the habitable parts of the earth. And as she delights in the children of men above all others, as being the image of God, among whom she has fixed her residence, so will she shew her beauty more as a dear delight to God by sin, deface his image (Wis. i. 5. John xiv. 23). What wisdom says of herself, Prov. viii. 23, ἡ γυνὴ ἡ πόρινν, ἀδύνατον, exactly expresses ἡ γυνὴ πόρινν, here, which is rendered more exactly by Paraphrases, ἡ γυνὴ, ἡ ἰδίωτα, Gentilis, omitting niutiavi, as Junius renders. And what she observes of the Jewish nation, xxiv. 8, that "the Creator of all things caused her dwelling to be in Jacob, and in Israel, her inheritance," the like may be said of all the children of the Godhead, for whom the Lord is father, but himself also the Son of the Father, and Lord of the whole creation; who are the objects of his peculiar affection and protection. The Vulgate here adds three verses, which are not in the Greek copies. Ver. 17. She filleth all their house with things desirable. In the foregoing verse it is ἐσπαρεν ἀπειθεῖ, according to the idiom of the Hebrew tongue, which expresses a satiety or fulness by εἰς . . . ἐπιθραυσθη (see St. Jerome, Quast. in Genes.). Flosus has the like expression, Unde suntale pri- ritate ege sape exili ebris (In Captiv.). The reading of the Complut. ὑπὸ αἰδοῦ, which our translators here follow, seems more agreeable than ἀπειθεῖ, which the Vulgate and LXX. have. The nature of the word seems to incline to the first sense, ἀπειθεῖ δὲ τοῦ γεωργοῦ εἰς παρακλήσεως, seems also corrupt. It would be better read, ἀπειθεῖ δὲ τοῦ γεωργοῦ εἰς παρακλήσεως. Ver. 18. The Vulgate also is faulty here in rendering γεωργοῦντας by gen- ratuamur. The sense of the passage is, "The fear of the Lord is a crown of wisdom, and the respect of God enriches those that have it." The psalmist observes the like of the faithful, that "riches and pleasantness shall be in their house" (xxiii. 3). Solomon represents the satisfaction of the heart as the reward of the fear of God (xiii. 1), and the semblance and image of a most elegant and delicious feast, where the τὸ καλότατον generally abound (Prov. xi. 1). Ver. 15. The fear of the Lord is a crown of wisdom, and the respect of God a precious inheritance. Besides inward content and satisfaction, which is the usual sense of peace, it has several other senses among the Jews, applicable also to this place. Thus Gen. xxx. 6, "Is he not worthy of life?" (see ver. 14), and also xxvii. 14. It signifies also prosperity; and the usual salutation of wishing peace to any one, or his house, always included prosperity (see Matt. x. 12. 13). So Numb. vi. 24, "The Lord is thy peace," and prosperous; and xxv. 12, "I give unto him my covenant of peace," i.e. to make him and his family prosperous (see Ps. lxxi. 5. Isai. xxxvii. 17. Lam. ii. 17. Accius). Ver. 16. The Lord is of service both to soul and body, giving health to the former, and χάριν bia (a strong expression, denoting also the part of the psalmist's confidence) to the latter. The conclusion of the verse, "and it enlargeth their rejoicing that love him," is omitted in the Vatican and Vulgate, and is probably an interpolation from ver. 12, to which it agrees exactly. Ver. 19. Wisdom raiseth down skill and knowledge of understanding. Our author uses ψυχήν in the same metaphorical sense, x. 13. The meaning is, "Wisdom, or the fear of the Lord, is the source of true knowledge and presence; without this, knowledge is falsely so called, is proud, presumptuous, and overbearing; and prudence degenerates into craft and cunning. Persons of great abilities and attainments, being not sufficiently guided by the fear of God, are infinitely more dangerous to society, to the church or state, than even the most wicked men, who have less or no skill or wisdom. The Lord is an heifer of peace, who can at any time and by himself make the most wonderful and michtuscious attempt." Upon the next verse both the Syriac and Arabic translations paraphrase very largely, and insert a great deal, omitting all that follows, either in the Greek or the Vulgate. The Chaldee paraphrase often inserts very large portions, without authority from the Hebrew, in many parts of the Old Testament. Ver. 21. The fear of the Lord drieth away sin, and where there is a profound respect of God, the fear of the Lord and his judgments, when it is strongly rooted in the soul, inclines men to and encourages them in the performance of their duty, and thereby keeps them from sin and punishment, its sure attendant (see Prov. xvi. 6). It either puts them upon observing a prudent circumspection and caution in their actions, or to atone for sin committed, by correction and repentance. Terrell says, excellently, Qui presumit, minuit veretur, minuit praecavit, per pluricentur: timor fundamentum salutis est (De Cultu Feminarum). This verse is wanting in the Roman edit. The Chaldee and Arabic paraphrases render it, but Grotius understands by ψυχήν, the meek and patient man, whose behaviour and temper are such as they are not easily inflamed, his reason interposing against his passions, though in extremity, and concurring with them in their urgent actions, and insensibly disarms its fiery. This interpretation, though countenanced indeed by the context, seems to want an article to confirm it. Instead of this latter clause, the Vulgate, Grabe, and Clemens Alexanderinus (Fadag. lib. i. cap. 8), insert, ἀπειθεῖ δὲ τοῦ γεωργοῦ εἰς παρακλήσεως. Ver. 22. A furious man cannot be justified, for the way of his heart shall be his destruction. . . Our translators follow a copy which read Syedere ἀρίστη, as the Complut. that of Camerarius, and some other copies, have it. The Vulgate and Alexanderinus, which have οὐκ ἐστιν καταλλάλης, is substantially the same sense as the word justified. The Chaldee paraphrases render, "he may be justified," but Grotius understands by ψυχήν, the meek and patient man, whose behaviour and temper are such as are not easily inflamed, his reason interposing against his passions, though in extremity, and concurring with them in their urgent actions, and insensibly disarms its fiery. This interpretation, though countenanced indeed by the context, seems to want an article to confirm it. CHAPTER I.

To St. Paul's observation and advice, "Be not high-minded, but fear" (Rom. xi. 20). Our authors often say, the more he cannot be justified, for more is intended than is here expressed; it means, that it is highly criminal, and to be condemned, and shall not escape punishment, according to the magnitude of the general error to which all others, or to the furious person himself, the impiety or violence of whose passions proves often fatal to him in its consequences. The Greek expresses patronomai, a word which is taken from the balance, and literally means, that the excess or preponderance of passion will overturn a man. This, in a larger sense, may be understood of other irruptions of the passions, if criminally indulged, will be the certain ruin of a man.

Ver. 23. A patient man will bear for a time, and afterward joy shall spring up unto him. But he will bear with injuries for a long time, and not disturb the calm of his mind, nor forfeit the reward of his patience. According to Calvin, the sense is, that the good man is often exposed in this life to evil treatment, persecution, and reproaches; but is not dejected or discouraged by his present affliction: he will wait awhile, and, upon a terms destined, until the appointed time, for his deliverance. In the mean time, he rests himself upon God's promises until death; and then he will find himself not only delivered out of all troubles, but filled with joy and glory in a better state. But St. George, in his Abridgment of theAuthorized Translation, observes, that, having approved themselves to him by their patient endurance of tribulations, they may at length enter into joy and happiness. If this be understood of the existence of the Christian in the finally in the history of the patriarchs and apostles. St. Paul thus describes the state of himself and fellow-believers: "We are troubled on every side, but not distressed; we are perplexed, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed" (2 Cor. iv. 8, 9).

The reading of this verse, as it is in almost all the Greek copies, seems corrupt; the Authorized Translation, MS. seems preferable, ἐπειδ' ἐκεῖνος ἐκπέμψατο Ἡλέκτραυς, καὶ ἔστη ἢ ἐκπέμπται ἔναν ἅγιον. The Vulgate agrees, but the Septuagint and Tigurine copies, according to the copy probably which the Vulgate followed, et poste reeditio juvencit. This observation is particularly true with respect to Job, who was an equal pattern of suffering and patience; and therefore we read, that God made his latter end as prosperous as his beginning.

Ver. 24. He will hide his word (i.e. for a time, and the lips of the beginning shall declare his wisdom. As applied to the meek man, the sense is, "He will stifle his resentment, and not break out into indecent and outrageous expressions; he will keep silence; he will withdraw his words, because he comand of his temper he pain and grief to him; and his moderation and conduct in this particular will be both admired and commended." If understood of the good prince, and under adversities of government, it is, "that he will not openly complain of the Almighty, but silently bear the discipline of affliction, and wait God's own pleasure, knowing that in the end, that which he withholds, the soul that seeketh him," Lam. iii. 25.

The description of this religious resignation in ver. 28, 29, of that chapter, is very fine, and close to the present passage; "It is good that a man should both hope and quietly wait for the salvation of the Lord: he sitteth alone, and keepeth silence, because he hath borne it upon him: he putteth his mouth in the dust, if so be there be hope that expectation gives the same excellent advice of submission to the divine will, "Hold thee still in the Lord, and put thy trust in him, and he shall bring it to pass," Ps. lxxxv. 7, which whole psalm, a learned learned, says, must be prefixed to this, and the foregoing verse of this chapter (Patrick's Comment, in loc.). This trust in God for deliverance is very beautifully called by St. Paul, ἐπειδ' ἐκεῖνος ἐκπέμψατο, καὶ ἔστη ἢ ἐκπέμπται, ἡ ἔργα του ἔργα του. Ousander understands this of calamity in particular, which the good man is loaded with for a time, while his innocence remains, which he may be called an unjustly innocent. He has wronged sufficiently; but afterward his righteousness shall be acknowledged and confessed before his men and just dealings be as clear as the noon-day (Comm. in loc.). The case of a poor, silent, and modest reservedness, which is not hasty to speak, nor forward to boast or exult itself; which instance of wisdom shall not go without its due praise, nor suffer for its own backwardness. Some copies read, ὡς ἐπειδ' ἐκεῖνος, the "lips of the faithful," but ὡς ἐπειδ' is the more general reading, which the Vulgate and our translators follow; i.e. his silence shall be recompensed with the praise of all men. Our author has the like expression, xxviii. 16.

Ver. 25. This is the treasures of wisdom; but godliness is an abomination to a sinner, i.e. In the treasury or bosom of a wise man, are many useful reflections and observations, which he understands and doth properly to bring forth and publish. For the true mark of a wise man is to know how to keep his thoughts and words to himself, and not to talk at random, reproachfully or unreasonably anything. "Who is a wise man, and ended with knowledge among you?" says St. James, iii. 13.

"Let him show out of a good conversation his works, which are written in that book." Many good lessons of instruction and morality are delivered by persons of great piety and understanding, which are disagreeable to the wicked, and, as so many wise men, are despised by him. (See Wicl. ii. 12. 14, &c.).

Ver. 26. If thou desire wisdom, keep the commandments, and the Lord shall give her unto thee. See ver. 5. The author of the book, of Wisdom accordingly observes, "That into a malicious soul wisdom will not enter, nor dwell in a body subject unto sin" (v. 4). Some copies read the beginning of this verse with an introduction, as the Roman in paterfamilias, and the scholiast on Erasistratus, opus quia wise man? keep the commandments? And thus St. Anselm, Concapusti sapientiam? Serva mandata: and he makes this observation upon it. Prior est in recto, sed tardius; mundus labor orientis, sed non recte et sapienter in diem, ut patet ex verbis suis. (Adv. Faustum). The sense of this passage is not unlike that of St. John, vii. 17. "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine of God." And thus the Lord directs, "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him, and he will show them his covenant" (Ps. xxv. 14). Job has determined the matter, when he says, "Behold, the fear of the Lord, and the wisdom, and the knowledge of persons to depart from evil is understanding" (xxviii. 9).

Ver. 27. Distress not the poor, when thou art poor. Noli susceptibility adoramus. According to old versions and the Tigurine a reading, the words are, the commandments of the Lord, i.e. to the commandments of the Lord, when thou art poor or distressed. The Tigurine version renders, Religion Domini permanere reexcesse inoptum. The sense is, "Do not distress the poor, when thou art poor or poor."

The instances of the verse, and those of the Lord, exempt. The verse does not exempt them, with the Vulgate, nor the Septuagint. The oriental versions too omit them. Dr. Grabe has inserted them from the Complut. which our translators here likewise.

Come not unto him with a double heart. i.e. With affections divided betwixt God and the world; for God requires the whole heart, and to be served with uniform obedience and sincerity. Or the sense may be, "Do not offer thy devotion with a doubting spirit." Accordingly St. James advises to "ask in faith, nothing wavering?" (i.e. because the person of such a dishonorable disposition has no grounds to expect that he shall receive anything of the Lord (James i. 6, 7, Matt. xxi. 21 Mark xii. 23. 24, 1 Tim. ii. 8). The Aramae takes it in this sense, rendering disputis existas--accepi stoc a te, "when thou art poor," are not in the Vul. Alex. MS. nor Vulgate. The oriental versions too omit them. Dr. Grabe has inserted them from the Complut. which our translators here likewise follow.

It seems to be a Hebrew text. However, the content is not clear due to the fragmented and unclear text. The text appears to discuss the consequences of poor behavior, such as adultery, and the importance of maintaining one's merit and truth. It also mentions the protection from God and the importance of self-control. The text seems to be from the book of Ecclesiasticus (1 Kings 5:11, 15-16). The text is difficult to interpret due to the lack of context and clarity in the extracted text.
mercy. St. Chrysostom's comment upon the words is,
"for the Lord is merciful.' I Cor. 1:18, 2. St. James' epistle, Orat. 6. According to Calmet, it is to show no signs of anger and impatience at any trying or severe dispensation we may labour under, not to let any hasty word foolishly escape, that does not agree with God's right, wisdom, or goodness, in so visiting us.

Ver. 3. Choose unto him, and depart not away, that thou mayst be increased at thy last end. 1 Cor. 1:8, 9. That the purposes of thy heart and thy ways may be acceptable before the Lord. The PortRoyal comment understands this of increasing to perfection; that nothing so much displays and improves men's virtue as patience, and at the same time prospers in it. It is good that the patient, which will at last be reaped from thence, after patience has had its perfect work, springeth up unto eternal life. Some copies accordingly read the former part of the verse as In time, et al dum accesserit, which is agreeable to the context, and invoketh the sense; or the meaning may be, that in thine old age, thou mayst abound with such good things as may make thy latter end comfortable. Under the old law God rewarded the faithful services of such as cleaved unto him with long life, victory over enemies, and suchlike temporal blessings. Janius renders, ut aegeris ad fines succurrat usum, that thou mayst always thrive and prosper, even to thy latter end. Instead of apostatizing or revolting from God, in whom alone the happiness of men centre, make the psalmist's resolution your guide and direct you to God, and put not fast by God, and to put my trust in the Lord God!" (Ps. lxxii. 28.)

Ver. 5. Whatever is brought upon thee take cheerfully, and when thou passest through the valley of the shadow of death, consider that the former end of all things is the beginning of eternal joy, is much to be admired and approved. It is in quo Deus tentat, sustine, cum gratuam acteone; the rendering of which follows, as & al diligenter tempora igitur, is neither literal nor full; the true rendering is, "be patient in hoping for a change of your present low estate;" and so Grotius takes it. Patience esto in mutationes temporum suas penitencia; and Janius, Et ad dilectationem temporum complacere, to be patient in hope. The Geneva version, "be patient in the change of thine affliction," is literal indeed, but reaches not the sense. The psalmist secures better to express it (Ps. xxxvii. 7, 8). Hold thee still in the Lord, and abide patiently upon him!" (see James iv. 7, 1 Pet. v. 6.) Pythagoras gives the same advice in the like circumstances, "Omnia te egressas, testi Deus, extrinxet" (1990, 1990).

In suffering, or bearing afflictions, God enjoins not an aridity, he neither expects nor wills an utter insensibility; he intends a feeling when he scourges, and allows a proper degree of distress and pain to be experienced. The discipline of God, correction, submission, and resignation. St. Chrysostom thus illustrates the sense in ver. 5, ὑπὸ τὸ γέφυρον ἡμᾶς ἥδει παραβίασις, ἐποίησαν γενόσθεν, σωθή ἐπεὶ Αῆρες ἐθέλεισθαι θυσίαν, ὁμοιότατα, ὑπωκρίνεις, ὅτι πεπαυγάσθης ὁ θεὸς πάθος, i.e. by temptations and afflictions a man is brought, as it were, to the touchstone; by these his intrinsic excellence and godliness is discovered, and the greater the improvement and proficency is under them, the more acceptable is the sufferer to God, and the brighter lustre is added to his virtue. Ver. 7. And do not cast away your confidence, but let your faith full; i.e. have not recourse to any unlawful means for succour, which men of little faith and great impatience are apt to fly to. Many in time of tribulation are tempted to fall away after different sorts of confidence and succours out of their own will. To keep their hands from dishonesty to get a living; others have denied the faith, and, for fear of persecution or the sword, have turned to a false religion. Some have been corrupted and to trust in evil arts, as sorcery or magic, to help them in their losses and distress, as was the folly of Saul, in consulting the witch of Endor. The precept of fearing the Lord, and waiting for his good time here, the fruit of the soul's actual experience, is often repeated in this chapter, and yet there is no tautology in this respect; it is only, says Osnander, to keep our faith awake, that we should not be tempted to think God has forsaken us; Some have been tempted to trust, and to do evil in their own eyes, and also, through fear concerning his promise, and defer for a while answering our expectation (com, in loc.).

Var. 9. To that fear the Lord, hope for good, and for everlasting joy and mercy.] Eloquentia ex adjutor, nec ex adjutum, atque ineffabile, probably the true reading is Dom. Deneis, in this construction, signifies to expect, wait for, or trust to or in any thing or person. The Geneva version takes it, the fear of the Lord is the surest guide to good things, and in the everlasting joy and mercy" (see the use of this phrase, Ps. xxx. 5, 6. exv. 16. Isa. 5, 10., according to the LXX.). By abyss we may understand the darkness of his soul, that which saps our spirit, and the greatest reason to expect. For did the Lord rain bread from heaven upon his faithful Israelites, and shall any doubt whether he can at all times nourish his people, or send flesh to their mouths to satisfy their hunger with bread? Is God not the same God of the same good things for it, though even the fields should fail, and the earth itself grow barren? God is not tied to ordinary means, nor our maintenance to the fruits of the earth. He shall find men, and bring it to Elijah, if God so commands (1 Kings xxvii. 6), and a little oil as long as he pleaseth shall continue running, and not fail (ver. 14). Infinite is his power, and they promised his methods and ways, to reward and comfort them that cleave to and depend upon him.

Ver. 10. Look at the generations of old, and see; did ever any of them perish in his fear, and was forsaken? or whom did he ever despise, that called upon him?" Run over the histories of all ages and nations, consider that of the patriarchs and prophets, that they were not10 received any where nor had any instance of the Lord's forsaking and deserting them, but he had always delivered them. This is very full of comfort to all who fear, and have to do with the Lord. The winter appearances. They are, in the sense of God's grace; and the usual instances in Abraham, Joseph, Phinehas, Joshua, Caleb, David, Elias, Daniel, and the three children; and then concludes, in terms not unlike our author's. Thus consider ye then, and see, that the Lord is that. Isa. iv. 7, 8. "Remember I pray thee, who ever perished being innocent; or where were the righteous entirely cut off?" This observation is confirmed by an enumeration of particular instances of God's goodness, and his dealing with them, as recorded in the Bible. In the history of Joseph, in the life of Moses, and in the trial of Abraham. "Lord, in thy great mercy, and to the praise of the everlasting joy and mercy you have founded, I would lay forth some of the chief examples of the grace of God, by which he has delivered and preserved his people. A good, and a full, and a true, and an eternal life; and this by a wise providence, that the principals might dread the like ingratitude towards God, which made the Jews so deplorable an instance, and such a dreadful sample for the world. In the life of Moses and the divine deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt. And this is not the same indignation seized upon many churches of the gentiles too, for their disobedience, which before fell so heavy upon Jerusalem! For the divine disfavor or displeasing condition are the once famous churches of Corinth, and the rest of Africa? And hath not multitudes fixed their seat in the temple of God, even in the once venerable seven churches of Asia? If therefore no favourite church or people, however they might presume upon, were protected by their privileges, none ought to think themselves secure of the divine favour any longer than they are careful to do his will, and obey his laws, and love his people. What a fine reflection is this of our author's! and what a noble encouragement does it contain in the light we have considered it in, to invite men, who fear for the Lord, and are patient in the trial, to be stronger inducement to piety in successive generations, than his confident appeal, for the success of it, to the happy experience of all former ages.

Var. 11. For the Lord is full of compassion and mercy, and forgiveth sins, and saith in time of affliction.] As afflictions are generally occasioned by sins, so it is observable in the history of the divine dealings, that the remitting sins, is mentioned first in order, before his releasing or delivering in time of affliction. And so in Hieroclibi's sickness, when the prophet is sent unto him, and says, "Early in the morrow day he shall arise and go to the house of the Lord."

2 Macc. iii. 32. And following verses, when Heliodorus had been scourged for his sacrilegious enterprise, the priest is first said to have made an atonement, and God thereupon to have granted him life (see also Eccles. xxviii. 9, and the note on that place). And in the cures wrought by Christ himself we find that the forgiving the sick man's sins, "Son, thy sins are forgiven thee," is the ordinary preface to the healing. Ver. 12. Woe be to fearful hearts! i. e. Such as fall away in time of persecution. As fear is often recommended, so we find it as often forbidden. Unbelief is so commonly the source of fear, as to render it unbelief to us, that we find them often linked together. See ver. 13, and Rev. xxii. 8, where δεδομένα αὐτοῖς οὖν οὖς, together. When St. Paul speaks of the "chastening of the Lord," he says, "It is a kindness which saveth me," as he was just sinking; although it was a good prayer, yet, because it proceeded from carnal fear rather than faith, our Saviour presently rebuked him, "Wherefore, when thou shalt have eaten a friend's flesh, thou shalt not say, My soul, I have eaten a friend's flesh; but, This is a grace of the Lord." And the faint-heartedness argues want of faith, so patience in adversity, the fear of God, and a constant reliance upon his promises and mercy, are inspired and strengthened by trials. So many copies read σπάλλειν κεφάλας; and such one the Vulgate seems to have followed, rendering σαύπλειρες κεφαλαί; but the present reading seems preferable, as the other is expressed in falling down part of the verse. By faith alone here, we may understand such as are negligent and slothful in the work of the Lord. The writer to the Hebrews, using the same expression, advises "to lift up the heart of the faint-hearted, and to make feeble knees, and to make straight paths, i. e. to go straight forward in the paths of holiness (see also Jer. xlviii. 10). And the sinner that goeth two ways! i. e. Such sinners as go after two different ways, when God presents opportunities of outward appearance and profession, but the world in reality, and at the bottom of their hearts. God abhors such hypocrisy and insincerity; he demands the whole heart, and none other than his have. He says to David, " Thou art a man of God, and Austin, at so great a price, to make us his own, and to exclude any partner, tanti emitt, ut solus possit (Is. xx. 19). And thus God declares, Zeph. i. 5, that "he will eat off them that worship the host of heaven, them that worship and swear by the Lord, and that swear by Molech." Such a double heart and the people of God's house, those, who, under the name of religion, have served their own gods (2 Kings xxvii. 29, 30). It was this double-mindedness which Elijah reproved, when he said to all the people, "How long halt ye between two opinions?" for the writer to the Hebrews (Heb. xii. 13, 14) has declared, "Who are they that serve their own gods?" and from this point to the conclusion of the chapter. The inconsistency of serving two such objects, or even their uniting together, is intimated in Dagon's falling down before the ark, and in Moses's returning to sacrifice the abominations of the Egyptians unto the Lord (Exod. viii. 26). Ver. 13. Woe unto him that is fainthearted! for he believeeth not God, as the Vulgate. The Vulgate is more explicit, Vae dissoluto corde, qui non credunt Deo, et ideo non protectentur ab eo; i. e. such as either disbelieve God's promises, or that their prayers shall be heard. Faith is more than a mere belief, without which believing, such have no good reason to expect God's protection, nor will they be so happy to find it; whereas "the Lord is high unto all them that call upon him, yea, all such as be of his name," Ps. xxxvii. 27. For the promise is still stronger to them, Ps. xxxvii. 40, 41, "The salvation of the righteous cometh of the Lord, who is also their strength in the time of trouble, and he shall deliver them by his hand, and shall save them, because they put their trust in him. Where the reptile is not idle nor superfluous, but is purposely introduced to confirm the truth of the observation. The Greek is still more observable and full, καὶ ἑξεδύσατο τοῖς Κόσμος, καὶ παρεδώκατο, ἰδοὺ δὲ εἰς τοὺς Κόσμος καὶ ἑξεδύσατο τίς ἑδραμαθία καὶ ἑκάστος ἐκ τῶν Κόσμων τὸν κόσμον τῶν Κόσμων καὶ ἑκατον, εἰς τὸν κόσμον τοῦτον. If even the record of the creation is written upon our children, when their children either distrust, or refuse to apply to, or depend upon, how much greater affront is offered to God, when, after so many tokens of his goodness to his creatures, they will not believe and depend upon them, as they fix their dependence elsewhere, and seek a foreign help and protection? Or the meaning may be, that such as tremble or doubt, let them make the "strength of God," Ps. xxv. 5, unshaken means for their safety, or place too much dependence upon any, shall find themselves disappointed, and be taken in their own craftiness. And thus God by his prophet threat- eneth the same for them, and says, "I will therefore strengthen mine hand as a man of war, and prepare mine army, according to the counsel of God, strengthened themselves in the strength of Pharaoh, and trusted in the shadow of Egypt; that the strength of Egypt should be their shame, and the trust in the shadow of Egypt, their confusion." (Isa. xxx. 2, 4.). Ver. 14. Woe unto you that have lost patience! and what will ye do when the Lord shall visit you? i. e. "Visit your offences with the rod, and your sin with sorrows!" The Vulgate reaches not the force of inanegetat, when it renders, "be visited with vengeance;" the version of the Arabians, "a visitation, true, who shall visit your iniquity?" and Januas, I presume, means, the same when he renders, omnia animadvertit Dominus. The sense may be "Be visited with vengeance;" neither shall God unmercifully bring upon you, ye have betrayed great impiety, and have with difficulty been kept from revenge, how will ye be able to bear it? when the Lord sees you the glancing hand of God, or stand in his sight when he is angry, and is a consuming fire? Or, according to Calmet, What answer will ye be able to make, who have disbelieved his promises, after you have been made to feel your dependence upon the arm of God, or to acknowledge? We shall be made aware of your faith and practice! The Port-Royal comment understands it in this further sense, of being weary in well-doing, not going on with or finishing a course that we have began, but leaving it, or fallen neither by the way-side, nor on stony ground, nor among thorns, to bring no fruit at length, with all these advantages, to perseverance, through a want of perseverance, and a present continuance in well-doing. See 2 Sam. xiv. 14, "I am in great stress; let us be unhappy, as they not only lose the benefit of all the good they formerly have done, but will moreover be punished for their faithless stay in abandoning God, and being ashamed of his service. Ver. 16. They that love him shall be filled with the law. The Vulgate has, repulsi sunt legis ipsius, which the Geneva Versions explain as his law, his word, and his promises, and thus render it, "They that love him, shall be filled with his law." Where there seems a small mistake; the rendering probably was designed to be, "they that love him, shall be fully filled with his law." Syrac. Dilegentes eum diligenter, et saepe ut in al氖 in cohortes, voluntatem ipsius: and Coverdale is to the same effect, "They that love him, shall fully fill his law;" i. e. they will search into and study his law to know and find out his will from thence; and the Holy Spirit shall engrave on their hearts the knowledge of the word of God, because they sought it not merely for speculation, but to practise it also, as is intimated in the context, Ps. 119. 15, 16. St. Paulianum non egerimus, incensus in manus Domini; i. e. into the hands of an angry God. In this sense the words respect Heb. xx. 31, and indeed, ἐνυποκρίτης, which is used of the conscience of sinners, is introduced in the context, and has some connivance to this. But the reflection in the following part of the verse, with which the chapter concludes, plainly determines for the first. The sense of the whole, as the translation shows, is, that it shall be given to them that love him, a fullness of knowledge, clothed with majesty and power, yet there is this pleasing consideration, that his power is tempered with equity; that he is full of mercy and loving-kindness; and therefore, to rely upon his goodness, and submit to what he shall appoint by way of visitation and punishment, is far preferable, than to trust to the injustice, malice, and revengeful passions of men, whose mercies themselves, as they are falsely called, are often cruel. Whereas all the dispensations of God are full of tenderness; when he spares us, it is through his mercy; when he threatens or punishes us, it is out of a love, which will lead him to redeem us, and to give us an inheritance of immortality. After all, he desires the salvation of every soul, and wills no man to perish, but that all should come to repentance. The number of the book of Wisdom will help us to conceive aright in this matter; seeWisd. xii. 16, where he observes, that that power, which in men is the foundation of injustice and oppression, in God is the beginning of righteousness; and because he is the Lord of all, it makes him to be gracious unto all" (see also ver. 18, and the note on both.)

CHAP. III.

Ver. 2. The Lord hath given the father honour over the children, and hath confirmed the authority of the mother over the sons; i. e. He hath enjoined him, that he should be so honourable as to be heard by the children; and he hath enjoined the mother to be so honourable with regard to them; and thus the Tigurine version, Dominus patrum hiece honorabilissimus reddidit. His will is, that their children should respect and obey him, and that their children, having made them as it were his representatives on earth, and his supreme authority in some sort vested and lodged in them to instruct, command, reprove, or punish them. He would have them respect and obey their father and mother. It is certain, that, ancedly, and even under the old law, the parents had a power to sell their children (Exod. xxi. 7), if they themselves were reduced to extreme poverty; and in some cases had a jurisdiction of life and death over them. Kepos padpis, which the margin renders judgment, and the Vulgate judiciuin, and our translators more properly, authority, is a Hebrew, for niphat in that language signifies both to judge and to rule.

Ver. 3. When honoureth his father maketh an atonement for his sins. Our version follows a copy which reads έπικρατείωσις, which, in the text, is επικρατείωσις, porceta explicant; i. e. he shall obtain remission and forgiveness of his own sins when he prayeth; and thus St. Ambrose, quoting these words, explicant, "forsit, ut amans suam patrem, et sperans eum in veritate, peccata suae remittatur," as in ver. 3. The Tigurine version has votorum quotidiorum compositor, which perhaps is the meaning of the Vulgate, in oratione diei et noctis. It is certain, that the fathers and mothers had a power to sell their children; that a dutiful son will pray for the forgiveness of his father's sins. But the first sense I think preferable. Ver. 4. And he that honoureth his mother is as one that loveth life; i. e. He that honoureth his mother will receive a sure and substantial good, by the decided good deeds to recommend him to God's favour and blessing. See 1 Tim. vi. 19. Tiv. ii. 9, where ανδραπόθεμα is used in the same sense. It has been observed by learned men, that human laws generally take their rise, and receive their force from the rules of morality, and that the reason why parents are the objects of respect and honour be given by children to their fathers, but take no notice of the mother; as may be seen in some Persian laws mentioned by Aristotle, the Roman ones received in the Digests and Constitutions, and in several passages of the Greek philosophers, which occur in Epictetus and Senecius; all which consult only the honour of the father. But God in his laws teaches us to preserve a just reverence to both the parents equally; as the persons whose ministry he uses, to bring a young generation into the world (see Grotius in Decal. Proo. i. 8). And this wise author, like another of the same name, as it were, interceding the predecessors with God, demands from the present generation, pressures the duty owing to both very largely in the first sixteen verses of this chapter.

Ver. 5. Where honour is, there shall have joy of his own children; . . . i. e. God shall bless that man with a numerous posterity, who pays the reverence and respect due to his own parents; and thus the Arabic takes it, Qum, "where there is honour, there will be joy of the children." Hence the fathers and mothers are to be counted as "the gods of our children;" for God will give such a one obedient and dutiful children, who, by their discreet conduct and religious behaviour, will be a joy and comfort to him. The Greek has only in general, οικογενειας τοις εουσαις; our translators properly enough insert the words, his own, and the Syriac confirms their sense, jeudadistam percepte e filius suis. They will prove to them such, as he himself was to his parents; "Upon the same account and grounds (says a very learned prelate) that any one expects obedience from his own children, he must know that he ought to pay it to his parents likewise. And where is the parent that does not think it reasonable that his children should obey him even against their inclinations, and prefer his wisdom and experience to their own wills and weak understandings, and thereby incline them to make use of their own humour?" (Fleetwood's Rel. Dut. p. 26.) It was a wise saying therefore which is recorded of the philosopher Socrates, and may be applied to all parents, and is said to be expected from our own children," ος αι δυνασμενοι τοις πατροις, της αξιοτητας και δοδας αναφερονται. (Apud. Laert. lib. i.)

Ver. 6. When honour eth his father shall have a long life; This may either be strictly taken according to the promise in the fifth commandment, "Honour thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon earth, with all the blessings the right observance of this precept may be incident; or may be taken in a more general sense, since long life is promised to the observance of God's other commandments likewise, that dutiful children shall in general be blessed. Long life being counted a blessing, is therefore in scripture frequently used for it. And the Jews understood it no otherwise, than of being in general blessed.

And he that is obedient unto the Lord, shall be a comfort unto his mother; i.e. He that obeys God's commandment in this particular, will comfort, support, and succour his mother under all his misfortunes, and will particularly will be tender of and provide for her in her old age, when she is helpless: for so I would understand δομινος πατροις δομινος μητροις. Ver. 9, is probably taken, Philen. ver. 20. Or it may mean, that a virtuous good child will be a blessing, and occasion much joy to his mother. Thus Homer introduces Hector embracing his son Astyanax, and saying that he is the greatest blessing that he has, and be a comfort to his mother, xqapi & qiperes pares. The oriental versions understand the place of the reward which attends such obedience: Syriac, omnis mincer de Deo, qui materem honorat; and Arabic, omnis eit premium eus propter obedientiam matri impensam.

Ver. 7. He that seetheth the Lord—shall do service unto his parents, to his masters. i.e. He will set himself towards them with the fear of a servant, as well as the reverence of a child (see Luke xv. 29. Mal. iii. 17. Gal. iv. 1. Phil. ii. 22.) Fathers and mothers have a right over their children by God's authority, and therefore their children must serve them with the fear of their God; and be subject, in all cases have over their slaves by purchase. The one is founded on force and necessity; the other on nature, and those numberless obligations which children owe to them that were not their capacity, but are connected with their own estate. Unto God they are the authors of their being and existence, health, power, and all the advantages either of body or soul which either they or their slaves, in the language of scripture (Exod. xxi. 31), is the manner as it is the means of their being the objects of their service, and that children are the blood and substance of their parents. A slave owes his labour and service to his master; but children reverence and gratitude, obedience, and all the kind returns which it is possible for them to make (Calmet in loc.). Anciendy the authority of the parent over the child was almost absolute; the Roman lawgivers gave the children, when they were of age to the parents' power, in the same state of society, together with slaves, the parents were masters of them, and all they had, till they were emancipated, as slaves are, and had not only power to expose or sell them, but in certain cases to put them to death (Steele in loc.). But these are privileges which do not naturally or reasonably attend the parent's authority and relation; and therefore there is great abatement to be made from all arguments only founded on customs and usages, though of wise and civilized people. The custom and practice of the Jews, and all the eastern nations indeed, sufficiently evidence the parent's authority to include the power of the disposal of their children; but they do not show the reasonableness of such authority, nor is it in the law of God, according to the normae of Lactantius's observation is close to the present. Domitian ciumdum esse qui sit pater, etiam Juria Civilia ratio demonstrat; quis enim potestis filios educare, nisi habes in eis Dominum parentem, aut Dominum possessor? Cuius in manibus, et in consencio, et eorum sententia, et eorum operis, et eorum bonorum. (see Sen. Dei, cap. 3.) It is this very thing considered that the fathers have a right to command of children. To Gaudemiana, concerning the education of her child, Amet, et in Parentem, subjiciatut Dominicus: sit Plato, Mater tu, eadem et hae et. And in another place, Tuis servi vivat impietas, Pater (Asin.).

Ver. 8. Honour thy father and mother both in word and deed, that a blessing may come upon thee from them. The Vulgate adds, et in omnibus parenti, i. e. by submitting patiently to their animadversions and chastisements. Rel. et vsipis is omitted in many Greek copies, as it is also by the Vulgate and oriental versions; the Complut. has it, which our translator has followed, and Cicero, in De officiis, c. ii. 66. 5. 1. of Gaudeniana, concerning the education of her child, Amet, et in Parentem, subjiciatut Dominicus: sit Plato, Mater tu, eadem et hae et. And in another place, Tuis servi vivat impietas, Pater (Asin.).
and upon character not an be, reflection dvri consequence The ofi'end

The prayer of a parent procures the blessing of God over his children, and is helpful to him that honour and reverence which religion and nature require from them; their blessing is an inheritance, or an estate to their children, though they should have nothing else. Further, it is their duty to provoke their parents, and thereby draw down their curse upon them, have felt the terrible effect of it upon them and their posterity. History furnishes too many examples of the singular care that children take of parents. The most ancient we meet with is that of Noah upon his younger son, Canaan; "Curse be Ca-nan, a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren," which was accordingly fulfilled, as the learned agree, many ages afterward; and of how great importance a good and dutiful behaviour towards parents is, we may learn from the happy consequences of the parable in which God so confirmed by his providence in the event, that it might powerfully prevail upon children to honour and obey their parents, and not do anything whereby they might displease and provoke their parents and bring upon them a curse.

With this expectation and view Isaac blessed Jacob, and Jacob the twelve patriarchs. Jacob's care in particular not to offend his father, and thereby bring on him strong displeasure. He would have acted thus and by his example taught children not to make light of a parent's displeasure. "My father (says he) peradventure will feel me, and I shall see him to have a displeasure to me, and he will curse me, and I shall be a blessing." (Gen. xxvii. 11. And is not the parent's curse, which Jacob so much dreaded, when forced from a parent by unthankfulness and ill usage, so strong and fatal as to make all our other authorities unnecessary and applicable to all persons at this time, as hereunto a Jew and his children? St. Austin mentions a most melancholy instance of ten children who were cursed by their mother, all children and dutiful children as have been careful to preserve their reputation, by a continual trembling of all their limbs (De Civit. Del, lib. xxii, cap. 8).

Ver. 10. Glory not in the dishonour of thy father; for thy father's dishonour is no glory unto thee. St. Chrysostom, quoting this passage, illustrates it by the instance of Cethus, who exposed his father's shame and nakedness. "Children ought to be exceeding careful to conceal the faults and mischances of their parents; the same pity would have endeavoured to cover Noah's cruelty or injustice, had he been guilty of that, was so careful to cover his nakedness, folly, shame and nakedness of a man's understanding; and such infirmities being no less dishonourable than those of the body, the like caution should be used in not discovering or exposing such errors as his Bel. He should any assume the liberty to throw reflection upon a parent, to render him little and despisable in the esteem of others. We meet with various things to be done the like, the text being in Abraham, who labour'd to deprecate David his father in the sight of his people, and to undermine and weaken him in their good opinion and favour; "For when any man that had a controversy came to the king for judgment, Abra-horn said to him, There is no man deputed of the king to hear thee; O that I was made judge in the land, I would do to every man right and justice." And by this insinuating and unassuming he stole the hearts of the men of Israel (2 Sam. xvi. 2. 6) This in any other case was criminal —in a son quite unnatural. There is that near relation and intimacy between parents and children, that nothing can affect the father so much as the honour of the former, without being communicated to and descending upon the latter; the branches will in proportion share in the good or ill condition of the root. The object of their prayers, of their care, the sense may be according to Calmet—Be not ashamed of thy birth and original, for this is a reflection upon thy parents, and in consequence a blot upon their own. Abraham was the best father that ever was, and was ashamed to pass any longer for the son of Philip; but when he claimed Jupiter Ammon for his father, he paid so indifferent a compliment to the honesty of his mother, as to render even his own birth tainted and suscius.

Ver. 12, 13. My son, help thy father in his age, and grieve him not as long as he liveth; and if he understand

Ver. 9. The blessing of the father establisheth the houses of children; but the curse of the mother rooteth out foundations.

And despise him not when thou art in thy full strength.

"Do not despise him, when thou art in thy full strength," that is, as thou art, as thou art at a later age, when thou art rising in esteem and glory and authority. This verse seems to refer to an aged parent in the behaviour of Joseph to an old blind decrepit father, when he himself was in the highest point of strength, glory, and power (Gen. xlviii.). "For it is a reproach to a man, a young man to despise his aged sire, Isaac, his pains and quickness to oblige him, by getting the venison, and making savoury meat, such as he hath fetched from his hunting. And for his father's blessing, less to be admired (Gen. xlviii.). Calmet understands by ıyśk, riches and power; and then the sense is,—if thou art more rich, more powerful, more honoured, more vengeful and less obedient than thy father, despite of his weakness, obscurity, or poverty. The marginal reading, in all thine ability, may seem to comprise all these, but the first seems favoured by the context. That ıyśk is often understood by riches, when it is not without an unpleasant meaning, as in the Greek, in which our translators render, "Give not thy soul to a woman to set her foot upon thy substance," (see 1 Kings xvi. 11. xlvii. 9. yx. 8, 12, and then the sense and expression here will be equivalent to that in xvii. 6. ים הנפזר פְּלִיו לְרַחְמָא אִנָּה, "he be not unmaid of him in thy riches." Grosius thinks that there is an elision here, and makes the sense to be,—endeavour to ﯿֵּטָא לִי אֵצְלָא, with all thy power, and as much as possible, not to despise, or any way bring thy father into disgrace, nor through any misconduct be the occasion of giving him such a sense of grief or pain, as is contrary to it. And so Junius, Honorine loco omnibus viribus subs, and refers to Gen. xvi. 10, as a parallel ellipsis, and the Tigurine version is to the same effect, illum asperpari et potius eum esse auctor hominum. Much I am surprised that we have not a word to express such an action."

Ver. 14. Var. 23. Be not curious in unnecessary matters: for more things are shown unto thee than man understandeth.]

Vet evi pericuris, quibus omnium mundi . Some copies have vobis omnis mundi . which signifies, such as it is.

Do not endeavour by the strength of thine own parts to search the deep things of God, since even those that are before us we cannot comprehend, if left to ourselves; and so it is that we cannot know of them merely by our own natural powers; or, Be not curious, for no pericuris is generally understood, or non, for no, because God doth not wish thee to cern thee to know, and of which no account will be demanded of thee. The Geneva version renders not amiss, be not curious in superfluous things. Grotius understands not amiss, that to be curious is to press after God's will, when God has not thought fit to discover or reveal; and so does Dr. Spencer (vol. i. ch. 2). God, it is certain, has enjoined the reach of human apprehension, and must be resolved so to limit our powers that the irrational and ceremonial laws are absolute prohibitions or commandments; and no reason of their being forbidden or commanded at all appears.

Ver. 24. A stubborn heart shall fare evil at the last; and he that loveth danger shall perish therein.]

A hardened and iniminent heart, such as was that of Pharaoh, Antiochus, Judas, the Jews, and such like, is called stubborn.

And by God's calls, or the warnings of his ministers, shall experience his vengeance, and particularly at the hour of their death, they shall be seized with such a dread as shall drive them to despair, and to leave all the fineness and safety behind.

Thus will such not only contract in the house, but also be forewarned; to them for their obstinacy it shall happen, as it did to the Egyptians: vengeance shall come down upon them one way or the other, as thunder and hail, fire and lightning, and, as it were, from the house, through the means of godliness. Our author probably alludes in this verse to Num. xxv. 15, 'Seek not after your own heart and your own eyes, that ye may remember and do all my commandments, and be holy unto your God.'

Ver. 25. Without eyes thou shalt not see; and without ears thou shalt not hear.]

In the former sense of the original word was dehors, which signifies, such as it is.

It is sufficient to say, that the sight of the wicked, if they meet with it at all, is not(I may say) a sight for the eyes of the straight. The rendering of the Greek is, Without the pupil or sight of thine eye shalt thou see light, Pupillae nos habebus inducer. With his eye on such sight, which is the meaning of the word.',

In the latter sense of the word, it signifies, such as it is. The rendering of the Greek is, Without the pupil or sight of thine eye shalt not see light, Pupillae nos habebus inducere.

This verse renders not amiss; for, Without eyes, or eye, shalt thou not see, says the Rubric. By the expression of thy eye, which is used in this place, is meant both thy eyes, or, if thou hast not an eye, or it were not thy eye, or thy eyes, which were not thine ignorant by pretending to knowledge. The sense of the passage is,—it is not only a fruitless undertaking to attempt to see into the works of God, but the more we seek to do so, the more we shall find ourselves in a situation, likewise dangerous, and not to lead such presumptuous inquirers into errors, and sometimes, by the more they understand, to make him more of that sort, or that thou hast not. be better rendered by wickleness than sorrow, as it stands now in our version. The sense then of our author in this place is, to fall from one wickleness to another; till he fills up the measure of his iniquities. St. Austinreply compares the habit of sinning to a long chain, which keeps the sinner confined like a pris-oner in prison, and as his iniquities increase, he is unavoidably a slave to it; Vive nee materni tenetisque indoigno nihii extemam fecerit: quippe ex voluntate verter, facta est hiado; et durn servitut hidam, facta est consuetudin; et durn consuetudin, non resistitur, facta est necessitas (Confess. lib. viii. cap. 5).

Ver. 29. In the punishment of the proud there is no remedy, for he does not repent; and the reading is much clearer. The proud man is not healed by his punishment; to which Junius seems to agree. Quam inducturus superbo afflicto, non est curatio, understand sed cura. By this, the proud man is often taken in this boasted boldness, and with a sort of defiance, are, in the scripture phrase, called despisers, according to that excellent description of them, Prov. xxvii. 5, as it occurs in the LXX. with reference to the moral condition, ζευκα την θεον, εσσετετε και ισε διειρυ χαι δοτες, which Jerome's Bible well renders, Impius cum in pro-fusionibus, consummationem ignominiae et opprobrium. The sad catastrophe of such hardened sinner is more strongly noted by our author.

That when God visits such sinners, he does not deal with them, but visits their whole families, and all mortal and incorrigible, and just all remedy; there is no balm in Gilead that can do them good. The Vulgate has Synagoga Superborum non est sanitas, following a copy in the LXX. with reference to the moral condition, την θεον, μοιραιαν, γαρ την οικουμην την θεον συνινευευς. But the Vulgate has Synagoga Superborum non est sanitas, following a copy in the LXX. with reference to the moral condition, την θεον, μοιραιαν, γαρ την οικουμην την θεον συνινευευς. Junius Donnus qui reddit Gratia facta, in posteriorum re- cordatus est. He looks upon what is done to the poor as done to himself, and keeps an account of good and char- itable works, and what he would do in a similar case,

Ver. 31. He that requites good turns is mindful of that which may come hereafter; O δοανοις θεοι, προειρησθαι εις τον απώλεθαν. The Syriac and Arabic understand this of the beneficent and charitable man, who, for his readiness to succour others, shall himself find help in time of need. Others apply δοανοις to God himself, who requites good works. Of course, everyone has done such works, whether in a more or less valuable and certain security (Hos. xviii. 19).
ECCLESIASTICUS.

Helpeth and taketh under her protection them that seek her. She catcheth hold of them, as Camararius understandeth the word, and recovers them as from falling, snatching them out of the jaws of death, from the mouth of the lion, as it were out of the fire (see his Myrotheciom, p. 304).

Ver. 13. He that holdeth her trust shall inherit glory; and whereas Camararius rendereth, "The Lord shall bless him," Prov. iii. 35. "The wise shall inherit glory, but shame shall be the promotion of fools," where the reading of the LXX. is remarkable, ἡ ἀtheta τις εὐφορὸς ἀφιέρωται, the wicked exalt despairing, for as the transgression of the wicked exalt as much as man's glory as the earth is full of the habitation of vanity is full of the habitation of vanity, if he will hear me. The observation in the latter part of the verse, is particularly verified in the history of Jacob and Joseph, whose God's blessing went along with, and prospered their master's family and substance and force of their sake; but probably this writer alludes to God's blessing the house of Obed-edom, and all that pertaineth unto him, because of the ark of the Lord, which continued in his house three months (2 Sam. vi. 11, 12). In like manner will God bless a soul, into which wisdom vouchsafes to enter, and, by her indwelling, prepares a fit temple for his residence, and a holy temple of God, which is a temple holy unto the Lord, as it was called; and so the marginal reading has it. What may seem to confirm this is, that ὕποσις here used with-out an article, is like a common noun, and not like a proper noun, and as such is used, as a sacred place; whereas when God himself is meant or referred to, he is the ὕποσις, the Holy One, κατὰ φύσιν (see xxiii. 9). But in either sense, it furnishes a very useful reflection, that man should pray, and be reverent himself, and hold in his bosom the sacred office, or execute the ministerial function, but such as are truly wise and strictly religious, for such the Lord requires only to serve at his altar. The Vulgate will ad-mitt that he be reverent, and pious, and to the latter end, and the oriental versions require it, Ministri ejus sunt sancti ac puri: "Holiness unto the Lord," is their motto. Ver. 14. He that is of an unwise heart, and reverence given to him in a day of misfortune, and an evil time, shall have despondency, and becomes not the desire to get the good opinion of the whole Sanhedrin, and show a more particular respect and regard puerorum to the Lord, the king, and the congregation, is to be feared as being in the way of any man's inheritance, and the marriage of a wife, etc. (see Ps. 73:7) (Daniel xii. 2) (Ecclus. vi. 44). The Vulgate renders, Qui innumerum filium, permanebat confidens, probably followed a copy, which had προσεζήτησιν. The true reading seems to be that which is followed by our version, οἱ προσεζήτησιν, (ver. 74) and, καταρακτήσατε πετασμός, which is a strong expression. See xiv. 24—27, where the like security is prom anced and described. Ver. 15. In any case commit himself unto her she shall inherit her; and his generation shall hold her in possession.] Various are the readings of this place: the true seems to be ὅ, ινα ἐκπραξήσῃ, ἐκπαθῆσῃ ἄνθρωπον, in ver. 15, and the marginal, in ver. 16, and even in the Vulgate. One may be, and with faith and trust in him, he will give her to him, and his posterity. Or, If a man is faithful and sincere in his inquiry for her, and constant and persevering in his search after her, and in such a state of inconstancy, he will inherit an inheritance to his posterity; So posterity in possidens, says Calmet; and the oriental versions make the possession to be here and to descend to his posterity. And if a man be faithful, and his posterity shall be established by her, Isa eju ejusbohecoe consistat. Some have forced the words to another sense, That a faithful inquirer shall inherit his possession; or, the advantages which attend upon him, and go along with her, shall be in his possession. But I think, though Ver. 19. If the first she will walk with him by crooked roads; i.e. The way that leads to wisdom is rough at first setting out, and has several difficulties and turnings to perplex and discourage the traveller. The ancient philosophers called it the crooked road of learning. But it is extremely good for the soul; that which leads to virtue, which is another word for wisdom, and happiness at the end of it, is described at the entrance as rough and unpleasant; but the way which leads to vice is delightful, leading to life, the other opening wide to ruin and destruction (Matt. vii. 13, 14). If we understand this of science, Quinillian's observation will hold true. Liberalius, in his discourses on square and round, says, the bus omnia, proficisciium juvenca, perniciosam humos.
She will bring fear and dread upon him, and torment him with his discipline, until she may trust his soul, and try him by her ways. Wisdom will prove the discipliner of her addresses to her, before she is familiar with, or communi-cates herself to him; and particularly at the beginning, or at his first approach, which the Greeks called the straight, to wo o good arg, she appears distant to him, and will make trial of his constancy by hardships and sufferings, and the sincerity of his love to her by his readiness to execute her commands. As a man of understanding, if he be a man of virtue, and the worthy mentioned Wis. x. were proved by sufferings, for her sake, and at length saved through wisdom. The design of the author here is to encourage young candi-ds to join themselves to wisdom, by warning them of the necessarily of wisdom in this a particular way, proving the integrity of a new acquaintance, before he ventures to take him into his bosom, or make him to confide in him a way, her company, delights to disappoint, tease, and cross him, and often seemingly shits him on purpose to try his temper, and find whether he is a gentleman or a fool. This is the way how much he is ready to do and undergo for her sake.
Ver. 20. But if he go wrong, she will forsake him, and be over his own ruin. Delapsae sedes eis eis quae necem erit. Or perhaps, Be peremptory in her demand of the Greek. To deliver into the hands of ruin is a Hebraim, not much unlike the phrase in scripture, "The hand of adversity, the hand of hell, and of the grave," So God is said sometimes to give men over into the hands of their own counsel, which is in effect giving them eis the hand. The author still continues the metaphor of two roads, that of virtue is called the straight way, delightful way; the other crooked, wrong, deceitful, and dangerous.
Ver. 20. Observe the opportunity, and beware of evil.] The Vul-glape adds, dicere verum, not improperly. If by you we under-
hi of St. Paul, "See that ye walk circumspectly, because the days are evil." This sense seems confirmed by the context; and because when the times are bad, and vice fashionable, there is danger, through a false modesty, which often hinders men from doing what a good conscience requires of them, for fear of disobligeing, or being thought singular; it therefore follows very properly, Be not ashamed, when it concerneth thy soul nearer to thee. When he is asleep, or other worldly business is pondered by thee. The Vul-glape adds, dicere verum, not improperly. If by you we under-
hi of St. Paul, "See that ye walk circumspectly, because the days are evil." This sense seems confirmed by the context; and because when the times are bad, and vice fashionable, there is danger, through a false modesty, which often hinders men from doing what a good conscience requires of them, for fear of disobligeing, or being thought singular; it therefore follows very properly, Be not ashamed, when it concerneth thy soul.
Ver. 21. There is a shame that bringeth sin; and there is a shame which is glory and grace. As he that should die of hunger, if he should eat his bread which is gross, it is not the food, would be justly thought guilty of his own death, so he that complies with evil company, or sinful customs, out of a vicious motive, is no less guilty of an evil deed. On the other hand, he who, when others entice him, sheepishly complies even against his own sentiments and conscience, or, to please them, owns and adopts vices he has never been guilty of, is made guilty of a sin which is not his own. There is also a shame which bringeth sin, when a man is laughed out of his modesty, when he is discouraged from doing any good action, or going on in the way of goodness, through being others' scorn, or ridicule; a shame which a soul steadily fixed is resolute enough to despise and withstand. Thus David: "The proud have had me exceedingly in derision, thy fornication and wicked action," (Ps. cxvii. 1). This was the great commendation of Noah, that he went on in building the ark, and doing what God had appointed him, notwithstanding the sneers of an infamy filled with other consideration (St. Chrysostom, in cap. 6, Gen. Hom. 23, who produces this example to illustrate the passage before us). An instance of a commendable shame, and which brings credit and glory to a man, is when he blinks from being mocked and laughed at, as a heap, he is ashamed of a past mispent life, and shows by his great penitence and contrition, that he is determined not to offend in the like instances for the future; neither will I do it again. Our authors resum this subject, ch. xli. xlii., and gives instances himself, when shame is fearful or commendable: see Prov. xxvi. 11, "There is one who is too bold, and there is another who will do nothing; these are exactly the same as here, eos autem exspectare quos maius, et autem aliquam diem et ipsi hostes," Ver. 22. Accept no person against thy soul.] Those that under-tend the metaphor of two roads, that of virtue is called the straight, the other crooked, wrong, deceitful, and dangerous.
Ver. 23. Refrain not to speak, when there is occasion to do good.] i.e. When you have an opportunity of doing good, either to religion, if it is attacked, or to thy injudicious approbation of it, or the neglect of it, or the unkind hopes others have of you. But St. Chrysostom extends this brotherly reproof to all that are incommodate or faulty in one's family or neighbourhood; he expresses himself very strongly, τον τον των φωνας των την εκτροχοις, τον την εκτροχοι, the (in cap. 9. Gen. Hom. 29). And in another place, his concern for a lapsed brother, and his warmth to reclaim him, are truly noble, διδωκε, τιλω, διδωκε δια τελος καθηκοντος, τιλω δια τελος.
Das saluvm volo facere fratrem, peremptum animam cerno, neque cognatione junctos possum contemnere; reprehendat qui velit, accesse qui veli; imo vero nemo reprehendat, omnes laudabunt, quod apud nos tanta sit via caritatis (Hom. 47. in Julian). We are also obliged to break silence when we may save an innocent man's life or property by speaking seasonably, and when we discover any wickedness, then we are bound to bring this, in temperate language, ye should be rendered, in temperate language, i.e. on a proper and fit occasion, the perfection of speech: being the meaning of it. A word spoken in season, how good is it!" as Solomon observes. And hide not thy wisdom in the dust of. As the Vulgate omits the word eis the hand, only which makes the difficulty. The Vulgate turns them to an evil end, either for sin of omission, or i.e. Hid not the beauty of thy wisdom, when it ought to be displayed, and may do service. Grotius takes it in the same sense, but supposes an ellipsis here. For when they are wise, eis the hand, eis the hand eis the hand eis the hand 1. e.e. Hide not thy wisdom as beauty, which is carefully guarded from the sun and weather. The author may be supposed here to

Ver. 55. The Lord said to the Sire of the feast, 'You have observed correctly, for the wisdom of your children is not begotten by reason, but by the presence of the Lord, who, by his wisdom, has taught them to walk in the footsteps of understanding.'
God is not so hasty as they would make him, nor yet so ready to strike as they represent him. I have hitherto found him favourable, I have escaped unpunished, though I have delighted in wickedness, and practised all uncleanliness with greediness; and [Plutarch] observes, that this is the result of such false reasonings and conclusions: God's forbearance is no sufficient reason to overlook his justice; he often spares a wicked person or nation, not because he will not avenge his punishment, but to increase their guilt and bring down on them a more dreadful vengeance. He suspends his judgment till the wickedness of the Amorites is full, and when iniquity is at the height, then he smites, at his arm, and destroys them as our own in his justice. St. Chrysostom finely exposes this kind of false reasoning, \( \text{καθ' ἰθέρας, ἑαυτῷ μὲν ἐναργῶς ὡς ἔκτοθεν, κ. Ἱ.} \); but Cicero saith quidem to quidem non sic dignius, interdum non enim ad illud judicium, sed etiam, sicut etiam, ad causam in ipsius quantum. But he that has hitherto escaped the common calamities of all other men, is no more than a man who has often been near death, for he is as much in peril as he that has been many times at the point of death.

Ver. 5. Concerning propitiations, he not without reason add sin unto sin: \( \text{ἀπὸ χαίρετος τῆς λόγου, γάρ.} \) Do not presume too much upon pardon, and thereby he induce to sin the more frequently, in expectation of it; which seems no more than to be afraid of provoking him by repeating the acts of sin. Some copies read, \( \text{πᾶν τὸ ἔργον γὰρ ἐν πληγομένῳ προδότην ἔργα, ἐν ἑαυτῷ, ἢ ἐν ἱππαρκῷ.} \) The meaning of which additional phrase either is, that we should not be too confident, or so abundantly secure in \( \text{πληγομένῳ} \), for our sins shall be forgiven us as in our immediate need; or it is a word of caution, and a matter of much consideration, which may betray us into presumption. Lastly, if \( \text{πᾶν} \) be understood as the act by which God is appeased, viz. the offering of a propitiatory sacrifice (\( \text{ἐκ προδώσεως,} \)), \( \text{ἔργα} \) and \( \text{ἔργαι} \) are generally, I believe, taken; then \( \text{ἐρωτήματα,} \) which follows, may signify a sin-offering; see Lev. iv. 21. Rom. vii. 3; and so the original word is used.\( \text{τὸ ἔργον} \) signifies both the crime and expulsion of it. But the sense either way comes to the same thing; a caution to be fearful of provoking God by many sin-offerings, or propitiations for sin; for no such sense is to be understood of propitiating super peccata. The meaning of which additional phrase either is, that we should not be too confident, or so abundantly secure in \( \text{πληγομένῳ} \), for our sins shall be forgiven us as in our immediate need; or it is a word of caution, and a matter of much consideration, which may betray us into presumption. Ver. 6. Not a little is there satisfaction upon goods unjustly gotten; \( \text{καὶ οὐκ ἔχοντες ἔθεσιν ὑδάτων.} \) All the editions have \( \text{οἵτινες ἔχουσιν,} \) but the reading followed by most of our translators, \( \text{ὅτι ἐξ ἔργων παραλαθήσονται.} \) When the author here asserts that riches unjustly gotten will prove a snare to them that have them, he says nothing that will not neither prevent nor alleviate any ill, nor that they will be of no service to a man at the time of his death, because he remains in his way. In this they will not be dissuaded to live in vice, nor shall the sovereign Judge have any regard to or consideration of the power, dignity, or estate of such offenders as have enriched themselves by repeated acts of injustice; but seek to themselves the satisfaction of conscience, and shall they rise from thence, to appear at the great tribunal: according to that of the psalmist, \( \text{Ne utroph} \) utroph, \( \text{οἰκοίνων} \), \( \text{οἰκίας,} \). He that wills not to give to the poor (\( \text{Ps. xlix. 5.} \)), even though he be very rich, yet shall he depart from him. But the sense of the proposed verse is, that riches unjustly gotten will prove a snare to them that have them, because they will be of no service to a man at the time of his death, because he remains in his way.
sions. The Complot, indeed has it, from whence our translators and Dr. Grabe took it; but it seems improperly placed here, for it disturbs the sense, and spoils the connection.

VI. 1. Without giving an answer." St. James expresses the same by ἐφη λεγόντας καὶ στόλησεν, i. e. give a true and right answer. The Vulgata is very full, Cum sopitiionis prohiberet responsuum verum.

Ver. 12. If thou hast understanding, answer thy neighbour; if not, lay thine hand upon thy mouth." Digitio comproprietatis; so the Vulgata. This is Latin law, and appears maxim very like this, ος οδιος καταθήκη τοις νόμοις και τον ἱλαρόν ἀνθρώπου, etc. It is a law, and care of the tongue. The Vulgata inserts a reason for such a caution in speech. Ne capiatis in verbo indiscreti, et confundaris.

Honour and shame are in talk." Solomon has more fully expressed this when he says, "Life and death are in the power of the tongue." Prov. xvi. 21. Nothing is more serviceable, and at the same time more misleading, than the tongue. He adds, an advanced doctrine is that it exposes them to shame, according to the good or ill use that men make of the blessing of speech. It is the seat of persuasion in some, and a world of iniquity in others; it shines in and recommends the man of eloquence in a good cause, and disgraces the libellous labouring in a bad one. When employed to bless and praise God, it is the best minister of its own advantage; when it is used to mock and curse men, it is set on fire of hell, and will sink men into it. It is therefore of the last importance to know how to govern the tongue, without a discreet conduct of it, a man may speak some things of cheap and mean life, nor esteemed religious before God. The tongue of man is his fall. This is rather too laxly expressed; the Vulgata very properly adds, Linguis imprudentis subvertere est ipsius. Euripides has a sentiment very like this, ἄνθρωποι στόματα τοῦ ἐξουσίων.

Ver. 14. Be not called a whisperer, and lie not in wait to hear with your ears." The strength of this passage is that of one neighbour privately, and doing an ill turn by a secret and sly insinuation to his prejudice. This sort of a slander is a poisoned arrow that fleeth in the dark, that wounds covertly; and they who wish to be despised are frequently called by this writer, "lying in wait with the tongue." καταθήκη καὶ λεγόντας, hoarding and railing, differ from this vice only in degree. Solomon has admirably described this practice. Prov. xvi. 28. 29. "Whoever has no wood is, there the fire goeth out, so where there is no talker [in the Heb. whisperer] striketh censers. The words of a talebearer are as wounds, and go down into the innermost parts of the belly." Such insidious persons are with reason compared to the serpent, which bites without giving any warning; one feels the sting without knowing from what quarter the mischief comes. Solomon uses this comparison in Ecclesiastes 11. 4. "Surely, there is a sound will bite without enchantment, and a babbler is no better," according to our translation; but the Hebrew words truly render the word ὠπομονοῦντος, i. e. he is a babbling. Proverbs 26. 22. "Whoever has no wood is, there the fire goeth out, so where there is no talker [in the Heb. whisperer] striketh censers. The words of a talebearer are as wounds, and go down into the innermost parts of the belly." Proverbs 26. 22.

For thereby thou shalt inherit an ill name, shame, and reproach. Our version follows a copy which reads, ὁ ὀνομα τῆς προφητείας, ἀπελεύθησάντων καὶ ἔκατον τῆς κληρονομίας. Heuschelius has οὐκ ἐπηρεάζεται, in the third person, and so the Vulgata, Improperly or unhappily. The passage is frequently quoted by τῆς ὀνοματοποίησεν, not an ill name, but an ill name. And so indeed ὀνομα is sometimes used (see Acts i. 15. Rev. iii. 3. 6. Prov. iii. 19. 47. Tit. iii. 1. etc.) in a sense like manner. Nam. iii. 40. 43. xxvi. 53, 55, and other places.

Ver. 15. Be not thyself a great matter or a great small. If this be understood strictly, such a perfection as this is not possible in our weak state, and therefore all such confidence or assurance rather is—endeavour to get as much knowledge and insight into affairs as you can, whether they be matters of speculation or practice. The Vulgata seems to understand the words in a judicial sense. Justinus pulsium et magnum stimuleri, as if the meaning was,—that in any suit or controversy, the same fair and impartial judgment should be pronounced in the cause of a poor, as well as a more rich or more powerful person, according to that charge of Mercur. D. II.

There is also another sense of this passage,—"Fall not into any sins of ignorance or inadvertency, commit not any sin, either great or small, but have such a guard over yourself, as not to be surprised into them, by any great or little occasion. And thus the Syrius understands it, Multum, vel parum ne delinquas. And so spagios is often used by the Hermætics and Hellespontines, as opposed to great and small, as equivalent to labellum; and so it is often to be understood in the LXX., see Num. xii. 11, &c. I Esdr. viii. 77, and by this writer himself it seems to be used, xxiii. 22. 1 Esdr. xxvi. 22. Hooker's Heb. Bible, etc. The reading away is said, 'That we should be diligent observers of circumstances, the little regard wherof is the nurse of vulgar folly; and Solomon's great attention thereto was what made it so difficult a subject for him, and so wisely and sincerely to pierce every thing to the very bottom, and by that means gained more knowledge, and became the author of many parables' (Ecc. Pol. p. 169).

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 1. Instead of a friend become not an enemy. The whole of this verse has been thought by many to belong to the fifth chapter, because the conclusion of that chapter seems at first, consisting only of the period or sentence, contrary to the general method of this writer. 2. This chapter, it is observable, begins in the Greek copies with a conjunction, καὶ ἔνα ὀνόματα ὑπὲρ ἔνας λόγος, which implies some conclusion or the like before this verse; and therefore also, and particularly the Latin ones, do actually so connect them; and, according to Rabanum, this sixth chapter does not begin till the fifth verse in the common editions. Lastly, The context, etc. It seems probable that this chapter is only a continuation of the same subject: for the words, "Instead of a friend become not an enemy," may very well refer to the sin of whispering, or backbiting, which is so dangerous and unclean to friendship and to the public, as the true friends of one another, that may traduce him more effectually, and under that mask undermine him more successfully. The English version, "Instead of a friend become not an enemy," is therefore a true translation of τῆς ὀνοματοποίησεν, and if so understood, this passage should have been translated, "Instead of seeking an enemy, find a friend; for he that tells lies, is harmful to the man; and he that seeks an enemy, is an enemy to himself, and to his friend. But the friend that knows how to be silent, is the friend that knows how to be等等.

Ver. 1. Whoso faeth the Lord shall direct his friend's ight: for as he is, so shall his neighbour be. To be blessed with a sincere and valuable friend is a particular gift of God, a reward of a man's piety and virtue. Such persons are the sweet odours of heaven, pleasant and pleasant to the sense, of good ances- tance and pattern of friendship recorded in story; the scripture describes it in the fullest and most sensible man- ner, when it says that the soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David; and he deploys the power and the margin furnishes another sense, Get him in the time of trouble, to expresse, and so Junius renders, Sir comparat- orius emendamus. I think that the εἰδηνα should be joined with άναστην, as our translators seem to understand it, a more proper construction; only it may still be asked, why does Solomon say this in this instance and not in the Corinthians? And so the Syriac, Ne temere te conscendas illi; to which agrees the Rome's Bible, and that of Junius; and so παράθεσις is used. John ii. 21, ἐν αὐτῷ ἦν ζαυγὴ φαντασία των παράθεσεως. That pre- sent of Solon, φίλον μη μενείν αὐτῷ, κοινονοῦντος μενείν αὐτῷ άπολλονίου. Μέλι άπολλονίου is an unusual expression, and wants an authority to con- firm it, except απ᾽ αυτοῦ is sometimes debet to be understood from 1 John iv. 1. To make this join is too hasty, and too sure a conjecture, κοινονοῦντος is too technical and too mistalce. Hesychius, from some authentic copy, as I presume, and not by mere conjecture, reads κοινονοῦντος με; and why might not some other ancient copy formerly have κοινονοῦντος, as I have conjectured, in the place of κοινονοῦντος, as unfortunate words? As Isa. lvii. 3, ἧς ἀπολλονίου, χόρον αὐτοῦ, καλλήρετα χαίροντα, and the εἰδηνα might be absorbed in that which follows. The Vulgate seems to read bnteludens, rendering, Conspiciemus adhuc. Of the sense of the passage, a genuine friend changed into an enemy, will reveal all the faults which he knows, has heard, or observed, during his acquaintance; and the more intimate and longer the friendship has lasted, the more it will be dreaded; the more noise will it also make, and the more fierce and implacable will be the hatred; according to that wise observation of Pliny, Aristarchus necessitatis, si quando contingat dirimi, in summa virtutis simulation, et e artissimus federibus, si semel rampartum, maxima nascendar e diesida (Lib. xxxix. cap. 4). This and the following verses are waning in the oriental ver- sus.

Ver. 13. Separate thyself from thine enemies, and take heed of thy friends. i. e. Avoid suspected or declared ene- mies, and avoid your friends; and you may place no certain confidence, such as are described, ver. 8—10. Companions only of the table, flat- terers, and occasional attendants upon great fortune or power; to look upon them in a colour, and not in a due and true indistinctness, and perhaps openly or secretly do you some ill turn, when you are reduced to misfortunes. Count there- fore none real friends, but such as you have proved, and have found faithful in adversity. Phocylides describes the ἑκάστην προσβολῆς έγκλεις, almost in the same terms, whose maxims very often agree with those of our author. King Antigonus's wish or prayer, as recorded by Plutarch, is agreeable to the advice of this wise writer, and proceeded from a like sentiment, "The gods keep me from pre- tended friends; against open and avowed enemies I can guard; but what betrays me?" Closer has the same like observation, έαυτὸν διδασκομένην, τις την προσέγκλεις, δια την (Strom. lib. vii.).

Ver. 4. A faithful friend is the medicine of life; and they that fear the Lord shall find him. Friendship is the very life and soul of a man, as necessary to his subsistence and well-being as medicines are to preserve health. Nay, other medicines, and indeed their excellence is much less signal and superior to those that are in health; but friendship is neces- sary to both. The Latins have well intimated this by the terming friendship necessitudo, and friends, necessarii. For all those who fall short of the true friends, are but wind and sand, till friendship seasons and gives a relish to all enjoyments. For what pleasure is there in life, ex- cept one has a friend to whom he can talk his soul, who will divide his griefs, and double his joys? What fellowship is not ungrateful, if we have none to share with us in it? and what calamity is not

though this may seem overrating the point, yet has it a good moral, and intimates the sense of our author.

Ver. 7. If thou wouldst get a friend, prove him first, and then let him partake of a few with a worth and merit; by this means you will not have many enemies, and only valuable friends (Ad. Damon).

Ver. 5. The story; may make both. The margin furnishes another sense, Get him in the time of trouble, to expresse, and so Junius renders, Sir comparatarius emendamus. I think that the εἰδηνα should be joined with άναστην, as our translators seem to understand it, a more proper construction; only it may still be asked, why does Solomon say this in this instance and not in the Corinthians? And so the Syriac, Ne temere te conscendas illi; to which agrees the Rome's Bible, and that of Junius; and so παράθεσις is used. John ii. 21, ἐν αὐτῷ ἦν ζαυγὴ φαντασία των παράθεσεως. That present of Solon, φίλον μη μενείν αὐτῷ, κοινονοῦντος μενείν αὐτῷ άπολλονίου. Μέλι άπολλονίου is an unusual expression, and wants an authority to confirm it, except απ᾽ αυτοῦ is sometimes debet to be understood from 1 John iv. 1. To make this join is too hasty, and too sure a conjecture, κοινονοῦντος is too technical and too mistalce. Hesychius, from some authentic copy, as I presume, and not by mere conjecture, reads κοινονοῦντος με; and why might not some other ancient copy formerly have κοινονοῦντος, as I have conjectured, in the place of κοινονοῦντος, as unfortunate words? As Isa. lvii. 3, ἧς οὐκ άναστήναι, χόρον άπολλονίου, καλλήρετα χαίροντα, ... goodness of metals is proved and tried. And this the Vulgate, the Geneva, and Coverdale's version, seem to follow. But the first sense seems preferable.

Ver. 22. For wisdom is according to her name, and she is he, and whoever has an instinct therefore, even if it were Hebrew or Syriac, not being extant anywhere, one is at a loss now to know what particular word was understood. The Greek word ἡ̂ θεος, translated he, first, and then the meaning of it, the allusion would have been plaider and better understood. It is probable, the translator derives the Greek word ἡ̂ θεος from an eastern root; and a strange use of it as a verb: it is a translator who was skilled in that, and the Greek tongue, endeavours to preserve in this version an allusion to some Hebrew word, which signified cow or lid. If there were no such word in the Hebrew tongue, he would, in essential wisdom, used also for secrecy and concealment, which was its primary sense, the name might then metaphorically be translated a concealment, for some things hiden and covered. Possibly there was a Syriac or Chaldean noun formed ̂ ἦθς (whence ἡ̂ θεως) from ̂ ἦθα (see Dan. i. 20, magus, bogtyn, which by pharsalia is rendered in Greek, ̂ θεος. It is well known that the wise men in the earlier age used to communicate their parables and figurative expressions. Hence the learned have contended, that they were then called ̂ θεωροί, or ̂ θεώτεροι, or ̂ θεωκρίται. And the word is derived from a root which signifies hidden, by interpretation is the ̂ ὅθους among the Persians, answering to ̂ θεος, or the wise man among the Greeks. The same root is likewise in the word ̂ ναβαλ. Nabal (says Abigail) is his name, and lolly is in him; as his name is, so is he (1 Sam. xxv. 23). Nabal in the original signifying a foolish man; or ̂ ναβαλ signifies him, who, or one whose name is, is not exact, yet it was sufficient that they were probable and known, and warranted among those to whom they were spoken, so that we are not to be surprised, that false writer should derive his hero from a Hebrew root, which signifies hidden. As to the truth of the observation itself, that wisdom is concealed, he intimates it, i. 3, and xxiv. 4, where he elegantly describes the throne of wisdom to be in a cloudly pillar. And the sacred penmen, particular Solomon, use a term for wisdom no less expressive, viz., ̂ κλάδος, which means and implies obscurity, both in the Hebrew ̂ קָלָדָא, and the Greek κλέας. And to give them the following words, which are parallel to those of our author, Whence then cometh wisdom, and where is the place of understanding, seeing it is hid from the eyes of all, and sweeter than honey, and cannot be found? The word ̂ ωθος, not amiss when he asserted, that truth, which is another word for wisdom, lay hid and concealed in the bottom of a great deep.

Ver. 23. Put thy feet into her fitters, and thy neck into her chain. The wise man represents wisdom herself as a soverregnue queen of such great worth, that her service and even her chains are honourable (see Prov. i. 7—9). Calmet says he alludes to an ancient superstition custom of the Babylonians (see Herod. lib. i. Bar. vii. 42), and of the Egyptians (see Tab. Isaeus, or Germans, who put chains about their persons, and on themselves before their devils, to testify their close and inviolable attachment to them: Dum lucem Dis sacram ingredieantur, vinculis as oblagat, at seae Dis obstructos propiusque proximam devictos esse. And perhaps the next verse may have some such allusion too (see Bar.
vii. 62, Isa. xlii. 7). Or the meaning may be, that by her thou shalt be advanced to great honour and dignity (see margin). The literal rendering is, "The desire of wisdom shall be given thee;" and thus the Vulgate, Conpencispinon sapientias dabitur ibi, which is a Hebraism, and equivalent to "the desire of wisdom shall be given thee." The sense is, thou desirest shall be bestowed upon thee; and so the Ti-gurine version, Et quam desideres, sapiantia ibi dabitur; and the Syriac is to the same purpose, Ipe vata tanzi dimittrunt a nobis. And perhaps the poet, or poet, or poet, doeth the patristic, "He will inform thee, and teach thee in the way wherein thou shalt go, and guide thee with his eye" (Ps. xxxi. 9). I shall only observe farther, that our author in the latter part of this chapter sets down five means or CHAP. VII.

Ver. 3. Sow not upon the fruitful of unrighteousness, and thou shalt not reap them secretly. The Scripture often uses this comparison in speaking of sin. See Hosea x. 13. xxvi. 12. Deut. xxiii. 25. Jeremiah xxii. 15. Whence we find the verse of righteousness, "Sow to yourselves righteousness, and reap in mercy." Job has the same observation in the like terms, "They that plough iniquity and sow wickedness, reap the same." (vv. 8, 9.) The last part of the LXX. is more express, εἰς τοὺς φιάλης σαφῆς ἐπιδέοντι, and thus Solomon, "He that soweth iniquity shall reap vanity!" (Prov. xviii. 28), which the LXX. give more properly and fully, εἰς τοὺς φιάλης ἐπιδέοντι, καὶ ἐπὶ πεπλάσματα καὶ ἐπίθεσθαν ἑκάστους κατάστασις. And St. Paul, "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap; he that soweth to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corrup tion!" (Gal. vi. 7, 8.)

Ver. 4. Seek not of the Lord prescience, neither of the king the seat of honour. The design of the wise man in this chapter is to dissuade the hearts of men from the practice of those ambitious spirit of such aspiring persons as are full of themselves, are fond of titles, and forward to thrust themselves into places of power and authority, and perhaps are not able to perform the duties of power and authority. Like the sons of Zebedee, they have the vanity to ask to sit the one on the right hand, the other on the left, in the kingdom, whose forwardness our Saviour reproved (Luke xix. 11), and whose thought may be that those who were most pressing for preeminence, and the seat of honour, are generally such as are least qualified for it. It is the most promising circumstance in a man's favour, that his ambition is directed into an office of importance, or raised to some dignity, against his own will and inclination, or however without his seeking or applying for it. Such a man we one may be sure is devoted to mischief, and was counselled rather by very wicked and depraved minds than seeking preeminence. This is well shadowed in Jobham's parable (Judg. ix. 15), wherein the bramble is represented as more ambitious than the olive, fig-tree, or vine, and prosecute accepts of that power and sovereignty, which the rest had the modesty to decline. This is applicable to prelirerces in the church as well as in the world. For instance, the Roman synod of Rheims, and the synod of Rambanus extend it even to the episcopate, to which high dignity humility is no little recommendation: such a self-denying and modest temper, as St. Cyril commands in Cessar. xiii. 1. *Vivite, obdurate, et quietus et modestus, et quales esses consueverunt, qui ad hunc locum divinissimum eliguntur; non vim fecit, ut episcopus pecunia; sed ipse passus est, ut episcopatum coactus quadrempe adiuvavit." —Curt. lib. vii.

Ver. 5. Justify not thyself before the Lord; and boast not of thy wisdom before the king. The former part seems to be an imitation of Prov. xxii. 2, at least the Vulgate so understands it, adding the latter part of that verse (Quo- jam agnitor cordis ipsae est) to this passage; and indeed the addition contains a substantial reason against spiritual pride, because a man, however plausible or sanctified he may appear in the sight of others, cannot hope or think to impose upon God, who knows the imperfection of our best services, and that no flesh should glory in his presence. As we are told, therefore, before God, we must be neither expected nor prepared to his presence; we must be so far from being supposed to know the grace of God, as to be astonished at it, and to expect no merit of我们的 own, but what is thought as considerably less than our power and capacity as they are elevated above others in point of rank and dignity, they have a sort of jealousy, a kind of secret dislike against such as make a figure; and therefore, as far as we are able to rivet them in, the more they have a train of followers, and much court and deference are paid to them, and great things are said in their commendation; even merit, when so distinguished, becomes an argument for their human actions, and an occasion to ject their hatred. David did not draw upon himself the indignation of Saul, till his great valor appeared, was confessed, and extolled; nor could envy bear that depreçating song. Saul has slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands: and when the victories of Antipater, or any of his generals, were mentioned to him with applause and commendation; no burst of applause was made, nothing glads his heart, for he was vanquished, but then he was jealous and grieved that it was done by another hand than his own; Vincit quidem hostis volat, sed Antipatrum viros insigniabatur, sum tantum temporum triumpha, quibus deinde victoriae (Curt. lib. vii.). Democritus mentions the like temper in his father Philip; and how envy and discontent work in the great, we may see in a much lower instance mentioned by Xenocrates, who, hearing of the public success of a young man's son, merely because he had outdone him in desti- crity, and being a better marksmen had slain a lion, and beat, which the prince's javelin had missed (Episcop. lib. iiii.).

Ver. 6. Seek not to be a judge, being not able to take away iniquity; i. e. To break through or withstand all the secret arts of iniquity to pervert you; for great are the dangers and temptations to which a judge's office exposes him, either from the attempts of designing men, or the importunity and solicitations of friends. But an upright and just judge will apply the readiness of his heart, and the wisdom of his mind, to those arts which all may with hid eyes, and prove stumbling-blocks in the way of his uprightness, ought not to be applied to; but for they who thrust themselves into the tribunal, and, through ambition, covetousness, or any prevailing interest, betray its sacred oracles, and make such use of them as are not only unprofitable to the public for every instance of negligence, corruption, and want of judgment. The judicious Hooker applies this direction to the high stations and functions in the church; "For with respect to these, it is always a special mark of God's good grace, to give any of his people the power of the public for every instance of negligence, corruption, and want of judgment. The judicious Hooker applies this direction to the high stations and functions in the church; &c." (Eccl. Pol. b. v. p. 316.)

Ver. 7. Let at no time thou fear the person of the mighty, nor a stumbling-block in the way of thy uprightness. i. e. Should commit an offence against thee uprightness, by being awed through the power, or swayed by the authority, of one of the great personages of the kingdom, you are, in the loss, or defect, of that power, or character, which are so commended to you, as a mark of God's good grace, to be the judgment first, lest they should be biased by the judgment of those of greater. And this seems to be the meaning of that pre- cept, Except, Ezech. xxv. 1. "And they that use thee to wrest judgment;" and the charge to Joshua is, who had the care of God's people after the death of Moses, "Be strong and of a good courage, be not afraid, neither be thou discouraged." (Josh. i. 16.) These prayers which are commendable qualities in a private person, often become criminal in a magistrate; his silence, easiness, or indifference, is, as it were, a consent to the crimes of others, and he commits an evil as often as he does not hinder or punish one. A judge, says Plato, ought to be both wise and resolute; wise, so as to judge for himself, and not be influenced by others in giving his determination; and resolute, to pronounce his sentence without fear, and execute it without concern or partiality (lib. ii. de Leg.). Messiares of Port-Royal apply this passage to the go- vernors and subordinates, to whom it must be observed, qualification, "They ought to be both in season and out of season, to reprove and rebuke with all authority such as oppose the truth," or occasionally "as they are against, through an evil conduct. Athanasius Chrysostom, and other primitive lights of the church, were as remarkable for their resolution and courage on such occasions, as for their charity and meekness on others; and St. Peter and John is, "Lord behold their threatenings, and grant unto thy servants that with all boldness they may speak thy word" (Acts v. 29.). If the heart be want- ing to speak, nothing but a "slow and steady growth," that finest understanding without this will make but slow pro- gress in the work of the Lord.

Ver. 7. Offend not against the multitude of a city, and then thou shalt be safe (or, and thou shalt not fall down among the people.) The words and then, inserted without authority, by our-Calmet, is, Provoke not the multitude or people by rough language, or a haughty and imperious behaviour, or by an odious and disagreeable law, or a hard and oppressive sentence, which will strike them with terror, and make them run into the other extreme by an abject flatness, or mean compliance, which will make them insolent and assuming; but preserve a medium between pride, vanity, and contempt, and the servile and abject ascendant; nothing is more difficult than to temper severity and compliance, as to preserve the love and affection of the people, and to avoid the displeasure and discontent of the multitude: by the following advice of the young men, he answers the Israelites readily; and by threatening to chastise them with scourges, he endeavours to frighten them into obedience. Nor was he less imprudent in sending Adoniram as his ambassador to them, who had the principal care of those tributes of which they complained, the consequence of which was, that they stoned him; and the king himself was obliged to provide for his own safety by flight (1 Kings xii. 11, 18). Vatubulus understands the passage of mixing in public tumults and quarrels. And so；not more can be made of the other,

For instance, translators, public us, and the not generous of this latter sense, according to Calmet, — Be not afraid of asking too much of God, who is infinitely rich, and has gifts of immense value to bestow; but covet earnestly the manifestation of his power, and let him wellOW him all that is necessary to make his majesty to be acquainted with, or grant. Inmate. Solomon herein, who asked not long life, honour, or riches, which in the opinion of men are of great worth; but only true wisdom and a gift worthy of God to bestow, and of such a prince to ask.

Ver. 11. Laugh no man to scorn in the bitterness of his soul: i.e. Let him lay in his heart, for he that insult such a one affronts God that made him so; according to that of Solomon, " Whoso mocketh the poor, reproacheth his Maker; and he that is glad at calamities, shall not be unpunished." (Prov. xvii. 5.) If a man falls into disgrace, or comes to misfortunes through his own fault or mismanagement, even then one should spare reproaches, and consider, that he has probably suffered enough for his sin, and is not to be further impressed with his sufferings; for, instead of adding his confusion, or adding to the load of his misery: but as to such as lie under natural infirmities, either of body or mind, who are born handicapped, or suffer from their own overbearing, or such as are reduced to poverty, through some sad accident, and not through any real fault or negligence of their own; to sport with such unhappy objects, to pro- ceed and mock and jest at them, to make fun of, to present them or their parents as sinners above all others, whom we ought rather to pity and to comfort, is not only an instance of rash censure but of great cruelty. True and true humanity and condescension rather sympathize with the afflicted, and weep with those that weep, especially such as Providence has visited in so severe a manner, and whose own voice, and whose own sin it is, that makes their behaviour and rude insult in Shimei cursing David, when he fled in great anguish and grief from the face of his son Absalom (2 Sam. xvi.); and in that scornful taunt of the Babylonians, as is one of the songs of Zion? (Ps. cxxxix.) Isocrates has just the same sentiment with our author, and assigns the like strong reason against upbraiding others in their dis- tress, "ο βαλει επι κα ριν κα παινιον και εμοι δομησιμωσιν." (Ad Durmon.)

Ver. 12. Drive not a lie against thy brother; Παρεκδοή ψευδών, (see the like expression, ver. 13.) Calmet thinks the original word was "charosch, which signifies to invent, as well as to plough. There is the like advice, Prov. xi. 29, where the Hebrew word is the same, which makes a pro- duction; or, as it is rendered in the LXX. into a field, or into a vineyard, which signifies to have the land prepared; and in the LXX. have well rendered the place, μη τρόμοιν από δια μαχαιρίων, means that our version gives but imperfectly. The sense is, Do not invent any false accusation, or any ill words or false arguments against thy friend or brother; an injury of this sort done to one near a relation, and one that puts his confidence in thee, will aggravate the guilt; or, if we understand this of lying, strictly called, the phrase then denotes the secret and clandestine manner of it. It is a Hebraism, which signifies to work under ground, that, as the husbandman toils in ploughing up the ground, to raise an increase from it, so a wicked man labours in his mind, and turneth over his heart to invent a lie, which he may do mischief with.

Neither do the like to thy friend; Μη δὲ δογμα τον αδελφον. This differs very little from the former, and the ancient versions explain it as meaning the same thing. Our learned Fuller only gives a different sense to this pas- sage, " Do not secretly forge a lie against, while you are de- vising or preparing it," (see Leg. lib. x. Simón Epict. cap. 38. Ecclus. xxxiv. 19.). This irreligious temper, in supposing by gifts or money to purchase heaven, Lucian well expresses in his treatise, De Sacrifice. Epictetus, "οι φαγεται, δακρυαινοι κα παροικοί ερείπεις." (Stat. vi. 540.)

Ver. 10. Be not partialhearted when thou mockest thy prayer, and neglect not to give alms. Be not discouraged in thy prayers, nor fall into despair about the success of them, if they are not immediately answered, or in the manner thou wouldst have them; if God defers giving what you ask of him, he seems perhaps that it is not proper or expedient for you to have it; or imagine that you have done truly, and must have safety and happiness, and he will at length reward your patience, and trust in him. To your prayers add alms, as the most effectual means to reduce past defects, to amend the future of your children, and to prevent the sins of others; and from this sense of this farther sense, according to Calmet, — Be not afraid of asking too much of God, who is infinitely rich, and has gifts of immense value to bestow; but covet earnestly the manifestation of his power, and let him wellOW him all that is necessary to make his majesty to be acquainted with, or grant. Inmate. Solomon herein, who asked not long life, honour, or riches, which in the opinion of men are of great worth; but only true wisdom and a gift worthy of God to bestow, and of such a prince to ask. casional he was innocent in some certain cases; as when told, for instance, to avoid a greater evil, as poisons are given, or go to prison as a punishment. And to this contrary in a set treatise on the subject; it is likewise forbidden in the law without exception, and by our Saviour in the gospel.

For the custom theref is not good.] It will by degrees lead you to other bad acts, as perjury and false swearing. Thus Cicer. Qui mentiri solet, pejorare solet: quem ego, ut matutinae inoccavisse possint; ut pexur, exorare facile poscunt. Ver. 14. Use not many words in a multitude of elders.] If, by elders, we understand ancient men, there is exactly the same reason. "When ancient men are in place, use not many words," for before such, reserve and silence are always commendable, especially in the younger sort; but if by elders we mean scribes, and persons of a public character, it stands to them as a metaphorical precept, that, the oriental versions have it, the advice then is to speak gravity, weightily, διαλογιν πολλα, "much in a little!" not to adopt a show of learning, or sport with words of fancy; nor to wander from the matter in debate, or tire the audience by a tedious barangue, which is wasting the time of such a solemn assembly, where only matters of the greatest consequence are attended to, and come under their cognizance.

Ver. 15. Use not vain repetitions by asking the same things in thy prayers. The Scripture represents the worshipers of Baal as much addicted to this request as to singing. Raging Baal, hear us! and it is the character of the heathen in general, that they thought to be heard for their much speaking. Such repetitions our Saviour condemns, but he does not absolutely prohibit them. We should not be always not be always making the same requests, through distrust or inidelity, as if God would not otherwise attend to our prayers, or they would be ineffectual without them (see Ezek. 20:26). This generalization of frequent relapses into sin, and asking forgiveness often for the same faults; as if the advice was, Repent sincerely of your sins, that thus may not be obliged to mention them often. We are not to be so vain in our requests, nor to be so circuitous, as not to be every day asking pardon for repeated transgressions (Isa. lxxiv.).

Vulgar latine work, neither husbandry, which the Most High hath ordained.] The words, Gen. iii. 19. "In the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread, until thou return unto the ground," are not only a curse, but a figure of speech, urging Adam, and all his posterity, to take pains for their livelihood, and to employ themselves diligently in their several generations for their own support, and the profit of their country, and learn for what it needs one to cultivate the earth. It points out the way to another place, as a precept of divine institution, and not merely a curse, because Adam, before he had deserved a curse, was yet enjoined to till the ground, to show the pleasures of industry, and not merely to enjoy the pleasures of it. And though its fertility was such as perhaps not to need any husbandry; yet God, by thus employing Adam, intended that he should be diligent to till the ground, as Adam himself lived himself, so we may presume he bred up his children in like manner; his two first-born, though heirs-apparent to all the world, had yet their peculiar employments, the one in tillage, the other in pasturage (Gen. iv. 2). According to the learned Bochart, the improvement of soil was at first by the direction and instruction of the Most High himself; and Cain, a tiller of the ground, had the realities of husbandry communicated to him by inspiration (Hieroz. par. i. lib. ii. f.). Anciently the greatest men esteemed nothing more honorable and worthy their study than the art of agriculture; and the careful observation of the Old Testament, and of the first founders of kingdoms and states. Among the Jews, Persians, Greeks, and Romans, kings, consuls, dictators, generals, were not ashamed to assume the character of husbandmen. And thus, Virgil, Pliny, and other great names, who tempered the severity of their studies with the pleasing toils of agriculture; some of the first note among the Romans in the middle ages, are put among the parables of our Saviour; his discourse was so full, that we could find Virgil, Pliny, and other great names, who tempered the severity of their studies with the pleasing toils of agriculture; some of the first note among the Romans in the middle ages, are put among the parables of our Saviour; his discourse was so full, that we could find in the New Testament, such as Camillus, Regulus, Fabius, and Cincinnatus, were fetched from the plough, as Gideon was among the Israelites, from the threshing-floor, and was called to be a prophet, as when he was driving on the twelve ploughs his father had going in the field.

You. 16. "Neither thou art among the multitude of a sinful multitude," and of them, white and green long. In Isa. 1. Join not thyself to, nor be ranked with, the congregation of wicked and ungodly men; but be assured that God will take speedy vengeance of all such as know not him; or possibly it may mean, Do not comfort thyself with the presence of sinners, or the company of wicked men, as you see them to be wicked in the sight of God, and are allowed to be in the world; that are led astray to the calamity of the world, is, if a society in wickedness was any alleviation of thy fault, or was any safeguard or security to thee. The Alexandrian MS. agrees with the copy which the Vulgate follows, and so does the Vulgate. Most other Greek copies transpose part of this and the following verse thus: μονομοιον εστιν εσπευτικον πεπικελθον πολλον την φυσιν ους. Medieval MSS. and several Jewish translators, as Coverdale's. The same passage, which Coverdale's version follows. The Syriac and Arabic in rendering ver. 17 take no notice of the version of the Saviour; nor of the Vulgate, and some are assigned them; the reason there given for humility is general, and affects every man, Quomion postremus omnium hominum finis ad vernes et corruptionem tendit.

Ver. 17. The judgment of the most wicked is fire on worms. Some understand this passage of the dead bodies of criminals, that were denied burial, and consumed by worms, but more commonly by fire, lest they should infect the city by their stench; but it seems as if a greater and more intense punishment than that in the valley of Hinnom, was here to be understood. It has been variously controverted among learned men, what this fire and worms signify. Some think a fire in heaven, more valuable, more copious, and more terrible. In this case, it is joined with the valley of Hinnom, as a place of torment, which the Greeks, Romans, and the most valuable of the ancient writers, have understood in exactly the same manner. Some take the fire and worms of the Syriac rendering of the place, the sense will conclude much stronger for a material fire. 3. They urge the approval of the Saviour. (Hieroz. 11. 9.) Most Commentators, and especially the Saviour himself; for which conjecture is confirmed by the Syriac rendering of the place, the sense will conclude much stronger for a material fire. 4. The testimony of the ancient versions. (Hieroz. 11. 9.) If we read the estimonum, with a late learned editor of Junius, and the Vulgate, we take the Hinnom, as a place of torment, and the valley of Hinnom, as a place of torment, the sense will conclude much stronger for a material fire. On the other side it is answered, that the texts of scripture above are to be understood, and they are material and matter, and not to be understood in a metaphorical sense; the very topography of the place, the topography of Hinnom, and the figure and picture of hell. 2. That the quotation from Judas is apocryphal and may likewise be so the next in sequence. In the day of judgment, by putting fire and worms into their flesh, and they shall feel them, and weep for ever, διενοθεσθαι το ανθρωπικον ανθρωπων; or if we read the estimonum, with a late learned editor of Junius, and the Vulgate, we take the Hinnom, as a place of torment, the sense will conclude much stronger for a material fire.

But I see no reason why both these may not be admitted, and reconciled in the following manner, viz. That corporal sensible pain, such as that of fire and worms, shall torment the bodies of the wicked, and stings of self-condemnation and the horror of despair shall wound and gnaw their conscience. Take the expression either way, sufficient unto the sinner is the evil thereof, and dreadful is that fire.

Ver. 18. Change not a friend for any good by means.] Μη δεδομενοι φιλον εις εικονα φοινικον. This is accurately rendered, φιλον δεδομενοι εις εικονα φοινικον. The clause is attractive or valuable, and also the Tigurine version hast it, Νε περιμενεται αναμνευ το φοινικον. But the place is probably corrupt, and the true reading is, φοινικον, and so one MS. agrees with the copy which Junius follows, and the Vulgate, but not the Tigurine conjecture; and Ossabouen makes the same emendation. See notes on Thoeph. Char. p. 89, where the definition of sordidness is, "πολυθρονμισθωτος, which see. The word is an adjective of riches, 2 Mace. i. 35. iii. 6. iv. 8, and the oriental versions expound it by πεσκινιν in this very place. It should also be so corrected, xxvii. 12. 17. Euripides expresses himself upon the subject like this writer: Ουτων τι πλοννιν δεδομενοι μοιοντο φιλον. Αυτων εκτελεσθαι βολητας, καινος γενεστε. And Plato speaks to the same purpose; μοιοντας φιλον αυτων μοιοντο τη δωμενη γενεσθαι, καινον γενεστε. This writer's sentiments upon friendship are much to be admired; he sets the like value upon it, ver. 11, 15.

Ver. 19. Forego not a wise and good woman: for her grace is above gold. My avtani γυναικα μεγαλην, a, e, c. "Must not be despised," she values, and values so highly, even a one be thy principal aim and mark to choose for a wife, and take care not to err or mistake in a matter of such importance. The prophet makes this a general, eternal rule, as the like express, viii. 9. A woman of such qualities as are here described, viz. discretion and goodness, is a gift that cometh of the Lord, and ought to be esteemed better than gold (Proverbs 8:11). The Vulgate undersetters, in this place, and that of the next, render what the word of God calls a great fortune. She is such a peculiar blessing, that this author says, "She shall be given in the portion of them that fear the Lord" (xxvii. 3). The Vulgate undersetters, in this place, and that of the next, render what the word of God calls a great fortune. She is such a peculiar blessing, that this author says, "She shall be given in the portion of them that fear the Lord" (xxvii. 3).

Ver. 20. Whereas thy servant worketh truly, entreat him not evil, nor the thee treing that bestowest himself wholly for thee. *Sedevae xwro aitw e, i, e. Who wastes and impairs the passage is, his health, and strength, in thy service, exposed to a variety of dangers, and particularly to heat and cold, and the inclemency of the seasons (Gen. xxxi. 40): none of them following such laborious occupations as inensibly ruin health and strength, and when written, render them continually liable to hurts and accidents. The author seems to make a difference between a servant and a mercenary, the work imposed upon the latter, is so much more severe, that he requires diligence in both, not merely an eye-service, and orders a proportionable recompense and return to be made to them. Not to entreat them earnestly, and with an earnest heart, to have their health and strength, for to entreat them earnestly, and with an earnest heart, to have their health and strength, for this is the only way to the success of the work.

Ver. 21. Let thy soul love a good servant, and deuad him not of liberty. The author is not here speaking of a slave taken in war, or bought with money at a market, but of a native Jew, who serves a Jewish master; the law appointed that such a one should have his liberty in the sabbatical year (Exod. xxv. 44). The sense of his words is, that the master takes not a servant, not a slave, but above a servant, a brother beloved, both in flesh, and in the Lord." (Philem. ver. 12, 16, see also Apost. Constit. iv. cap. 12. Ecclus. xxxiii. 30, 31.)

Ver. 22. A wise woman will keep the care of her body, and show not thyself cheerful toward them, i. e. Be not so indulgent or over fond of them, nor ready to grant them every liberty they may wish to have, for liberty often terminate, and be to them a ruin in the world. The话说 was the ruin of Dinah; her curiosity to visit the daughters of the land at a festival time, and to partake of their amusements and sports, was the occasion of the vile disturbance that befell the family. Wherefore it advises to keep young men out of the way of all company that may corrupt their morals; but this caution is much more necessary with respect to women, whose innocence is more hazardous, and who are principally attended to, and secured, and the carriage of all about them be more circumspection and reserved before them. Cato the censor carried his resentment very high for a vulgar infraction of this law, that he boxed the ears of his son that received any pretty and lovery woman to their table. (In Vit. Cat.) The wise Solon's saying, ἄρα γαρ ἁπάντων ἀσύλλογον τῆς, the

Ver. 23. *As to the care necessary to be observed towards children in their youth, this was also general, expressive of the manner in which they were set upon in the Apostolic Constitutions: Κοιδόμοις ως ἐν τοίνυς τό κόσμος τῆς σιτίας ἐπὶ αὐτὸν ἀνελθέντες καὶ διότινας, καὶ μισοῦσιν οὐκ ἔσθε σύνοικοι τῇ χαίρεισιν ἐκ τῶν γυναικών, e, t, l, lib. iv. cap. 11, and at the conclusion of the same constitutions, this subject is given out for fixing them in marriage soon and wisely. The education of daughters among the Jews was formerly very strict and severe; they seldom married before their eighteenth year is seen. In this respect, a daughter is called in Hebrew, alınus; i. e. one concealed, or shut up.

Ver. 25. Marry thy daughter, and so shall thou have performed a wroth and a mercy; but give not to woman of thy standing. The Jews had a high opinion of the married state, and matched their children early, which they did so to fix their inclinations, but were very cautious about the moral qualifications of their daughters-in-law. And indeed in marrying daughters, regard ought chiefly to be had to those which are likely to promote their best and truest interest. For happiness is not possible to be attained in marriage without actual and true affections of husband and wife, associate, which are not always the attendants of high birth, wealth, or honour. Parents, therefore, in settling their young children, should have a care for the choice of their choice and conduct; but rather virtue, sobriety, and discretion, which afford a much more reasonable prospect of happiness in that state. These accomplishments which Abraham took against the daughters of the country, and his express commandment for a wife to be taken to his son out of the faithfull, teaches us plainly, to prefer religion and the true fear of God to honour, wealth, and the like. This wise author accordingly advises, to prevent coming to this extremity, not to marry a person whom one cannot love, or has such forbidding qualities, as to create disgust; to take a woman in marriage, not for the sake of her nobility, and the like. In this, the same advice is given out for all marriages that we shall make, either for ourselves, our friends, our children, or such as are under our guardianship and charge (see Gen. 22. 29. 31. 41.)

Ver. 26. Hast thou a wife after thy mind? forsake her not: but give not thyself over to a light woman. Our translators seem to have understood this passage of unfaithfulness to the wife, long-kept and loved, and the giving way to another and a more adorable woman for evil seasons for woman for evil: but be serious; which (probably is a forensic term) seems to relate rather to casting out by divorce; which is confirmed by έφθη. which, and is properly rendered by the Vulgate, edithui, and in the margin, "a hateful woman," one that is disagreeable in her person, or odious for her bad qualities. According to the law of Moses, one might put away a wife not beloved, provided there was a legal cause for so doing; but divorce, though tolerated among the Jews, was never approved or condemed by the wisest of that nation, unless some unmentionable crime was committed. This advice is not necessary. This wise author accordingly advises, to prevent coming to this extremity, not to marry a person whom one cannot love, or has such forbidding qualities, as to create disgust; to take a woman in marriage, not for the sake of her nobility, and the like, which is as bad, condemning a man's self to live with an odious and disagreeable partner for the term of life; but choose rather a daughter that is adorable. She, who will sweeten life, from whom, as there can be no occasion, so there ought to be no inclination to part.

Ver. 27. Honour thy father with thy whole heart, and forget not the commandment of the Lord. This verse was not forgotten of them; and how canst thou recompense them the things that they have done for thee? The advice of Tobit to his son is very like that here given; *My son, son, son, son;" to live upon, and not despise not to live, but despise not to live, nor despise nor despise. gers for thee, when thou wast in her womb." "St. Ambrose has some sentiments upon the occasion, which one cannot but admire. The poor may "dwell with the mother undergohes for the child, as sickness and louting during the time of gestation; the strict regimen she is obliged to submit to: the great confinement and self-denial in which she is placed; the everlasting "horrors of the birth of children; the certain great pain, and often death itself, attending the birth, and the constant fear for the child's life and safety.—immediately adds, St patres maternum, non recordantur. Nisi propter Te, Domine, quibus te gestavit, non alimenta quasi tibi tribuit, vero pietas tua affectu immutabiles labrath, non sanctam, quam pro te daremos, sed tibi momentum, tibi monumentum..." (Eccles. 20. iv. viii.). —See note on i. 8. By Plato, parents are styled, οις τε γενεσθαι; and Plato gives the reason why they are so called, as being a sort of visible gods, imitating the Invisi- ble in bestowing life; he has the same observation with our author upon the occasion, Oiño τοις γενοντιος ὑποστρατεύων, αὔριονγενεσι γινοντος γένος (Allegor. lib. ii.). Aristotle mentions three sorts of persons whom we should be solicitous to render like-minded with the gods, our parents, and our instructors (Ethic. lib. ix.).

Ver. 31. Fear the Lord, and honor the priest; and give him his portion for the first fruits and the trespass offering, and the gift of the shew-bread, and the sacrifice of sanctification, and the firstfruits of the holy things. There is the like advice, ver. 29. The sacrifices and offerings which were offered were for the sake of the soul of the man, and probably here means maintenance. The duty of main- tenance is expressed in various terms by this writer; as, not forsaking his ministers (see the like command, Deut. xix. 20.); and theEpistle of Austin, De sac. 15.); and the prayer: and to ascertain what belongs to them, he enumerate five particular; mentioned also in the law: 1. Αρνε- ς, offer his good haves, ou debes quos ea (Com. in Lev. xviii. 31.); 2. τοις τε γενοντιος ιερεις, in the sense of τοις τε γενοντιος; 3. ἐπαναναφασαν ἐπειδῆ ης τὴν ἐνεργίαν, ἐν ἑαυτῷ ἐστιν ἐν σιν διανοία. 4. τιμή, τιμάω, and 5. πιστις, and a properly rendered, and a trespass offering. Trespass-offerings were for sins of less note and import, sins of ignorance or omission, through forgetfulness; as, not observing the legal washings and purification of the priests, not yielding the firstfruits, for voluntary crimes, and willful violations of the law. 3. The gift of the shoulders in the peace-offerings (Exod. xxix. 27. 35.); and of the fourth and firstfruits of the vines, the wine, and the oil, fuge, &c. (Deut. xxv. 3.) to which some add, the firstfruits of animals. These were also called παρουσαεις.

2. The offering πουτας, or such portion of the vic- tim, or trespass-offering was usually belonged to the priest which indeed was the whole of it, except the kidneys, and the ramp, and the fat upon the inwards, which were burnt upon the altar (Lev. vi. 5—8). It may not be improper here to observe, that in Eastern countries, especially in Persia and Arabia, and a sacrifice was offered. Trespass-offerings were for sins of less note and importance, sins of ignorance or omission, through forgetfulness; as, not observing the legal washings and purification of the priests, not yielding the firstfruits, for voluntary crimes, and willful violations of the law. 3. The gift of the shoulders in the peace-offerings (Exod. xxix. 27. 35.); and of the fourth and firstfruits of the vines, the wine, and the oil, fuge, &c. (Deut. xxv. 3.) to which some add, the firstfruits of animals. These were also called παρουσαεις.

The Greek sometimes preserves the Hebrew name, manuam (see Exod. xvi. 5, 7, 11), and often uses סיה celery sim- ply for it (Lev. ii. 13. vi. 14. 15. Exod. xv. 14. Amos v. 2.): Sometimes it is called παρουσαεις (Ps. x. 6. 7. Prov. x. 5, 10.), and by this writer, θεος δύνανε, as being the most holy of the offerings of the Lord made by fire; and, accord- ing to the Hebrew, in holiness of holinesses (see Lev. ii. 3—10. vi. 17.). The remnant of this was Aaron's and his sons, the priests: and their maintenance. The firstfruits of holy things; this differs from θεος before mentioned; it seems to be the tithe of the tithes, sanctitatum de- cina, which the Levites themselves paid the priest (Neh. x. 38. 39.; xx. 28.); for the Levites are not mentioned in the context of holy things, because all the tithe, whether of the land, or of the fruit of the trees, being the Lord's, it was holy unto him (Lev. xxvii. 31.; 20. xxx. 8, 9., 20.)

[Note (hand in poor).] That noth- ing may be wanting to recommend thy service, join works of charity and mercy; invite the Levite and the poor to dine with you, as the laws appoint, Deut. xxiv. 26. xxxvi. 9, 10. Some understand this place, but I preserve from the context, that it relates to the poor man's tithe on the third year, which yearly was taken in kind and given to the Levites; but the husbandman carried not to Jerusalem, but spent it at home, within his own gates, upon the Levite, father-CHAPTER VIII.

Ver. 4. Just not with a rude man, lest thy ancestors be disgraced.

Ver. 6. Help to any man in distress; ... for so Coverdale's version, "Keep no company with the unlearned, lest he give thy kindred an evil report;" i. e. Have no acquaintance, friendship, or intimacy, with rude, unlearned and untaught persons, lest it bring a reflection upon yourself and family, as if your own education had been bad or neglected, by your choice of such a companion. All acquaintance with the unlearned and untaught, is dangerous to thee and to all around thee; for there is great reason to be afraid that it is not faulty, such as has humility and ingenuity enough to acknowledge its low state, and inclination and desire to learn more. Besides, a rude man is such, as are here condemned, and their company to be avoided, whose ignorance is wilful, and who obstinately resist in it; who consider knowledge as a burden, and truth as their antagonist; and who set rights above truth, and ignorance and weakness should be discovered. As we are sure, by telling such the truth, and kindly admonishing them of their mistake, to have care for itself, it is better to have no converse or society with them, lest by our honest freedom, either to instruct or reform them, they should think themselves affronted, and turn their minds and inclinations against us. And, further, we report something to their disgrace and prejudice, which may affect and wound us through their sides. But the sense followed in our version seems preferable, and more agreeable to the original; for it is better to have a man that is rude, and wants good breeding; for if he knows any family misfortune, which persons of politeness would overlook or cover over, he will not fail to make it known, and make their failings and infirmities to be the subject of his coarse raillery.

Ver. 4. Reproof not a man that turneth from sin, but remember the days of his youth, how he was sofull of virtue, and was without sign of humility and grace to turn from sin, so it is an instance of great degeneracy, to reproach or ridicule any one for becoming better. A good man will not revile a sinner, even while he corrects such, and may set an example to all; but rather show a generous pity and concern for him, and endeavour to restore such a one in the spirit of meekness. The stead of supposing one is6, and strongly condemning him, consider him as fall as an instance of human frailty, and it serves to remind him how liable he himself is to miscarry every moment; to convince him, that he stands as much need of God's help to continue him in a state of grace, as the sinner does of his mercy to restore him to it; and that if God should proceed against him with rigour and strict justice, he deserves nothing but punishment. He is therefore tender of the returning prodigal; he goes out to meet him, he embraces him with joy, and as he finds him thoroughly sensible and ashamed of his past folly, he testifyeth his love, and shows him that his resolutions increase pleasing hope, by opening unto him the riches of the goodness and mercy of God.

Ver. 6. Dishonour not a man in his old age; for even some of us are like him; i. e. a very stout old man, who for we wax old also; i. e. shall come, if we live, to the same state, and may reasoning the exact to reprove ourselves, when the infirmities which are inseparable from age begin to overtake us; therefore let us bear with them. Ne derides in senem decerpit; scio, nos, si vixerimus, grandavi ac senes futuros. Consider also, as the Geneva version has it, "that they were as we which are now old;" were once in the prime of vigour, though now the objects of ridicule, and that we are hastening to the same period, to partake of what they suffer. Are not all men disposed of long life, and is it not looked upon as a particular favour of heaven when extended to any great term? How then can old age be dishonourable, which is not an evil in itself, and all covet to arrive at? If to be cut off in the midst of our days, that we may "be carried before our time, and brought as an offering into the temple of God;" if to have our lives to be full of days, especially if time has been well improved, may surely be a good and a blessing. According to Gellius, age in itself is not an evil, that neither birth nor fortune was more respected; that a kind of veneration was paid to persons advanced in years, as to so many gods and fathers; Apul antiquissimos Romanos, antiquissimos, et pauperum annos honorem, satis multos annos, annos etiam, quos non amare et sinceris tribut, quam autem solius; majoresque natu minoribus celebrant ad D.Cum prope et parum victum, etique in omnino, loco omni specie honoris, priores potestosque habitur (Nech. cap. 15; Theop. cap. 86; Lib. 2).

Ver. 7. Rejoice not over thy greatest enemy being dead; One should not rejoice at any accident or ill fortune that happens to an enemy, even in his lifetime. Charity enjoins this, but humanity commends rather a concern for him when he is dead, and it is out of his power to injure us any more; it is both decent and just to spare his ashes, and to wash his bones. He should be buried with respect; but should never be immortal, and pursue a man into the other world. Our author probably alludes to Prov. xxv. 17, "Rejoice not when thy enemy falleth, and let not thy heart be merry, when he is cast down." Job comforts himself by the thought that "he had never rejoiced at the destruction of him that hated him, nor lifted up himself when evil found him." The spirit of this verse, with that of ver. 29, Many of the Greek copies omit τό δένδρον ἤνεκα, and read in general, "Rejoice not over a dead person;" and so the oriental versions, Nētartion de meo utucalls. According to that of Homer,

"remember that we die all;" i. e. Must all die; and so the oriental versions, Memento nos omnes mortuus. As death is the common lot of all, we are all mortal, as well as all our enemies as whom we triumph over; and we should be very unwilling, could we possibly foresee or know it, that others should rejoice at our deaths. And this I take to be the meaning of the additional clause in the Vulgate, Est in gudium nolnus venio. The expression here is very particular and observable; it is not said that "we shall all die," in the future, but that, "we die," in the present tense, τονος τηρομαῖς, intuitively probable the shortness of life, that death is always present with us, that in the midst of life we are in death, and may be said to die, at every moment. I have here expressed this amiss, when he says, Vita hinc non est vita dicenda, sed mora, in qua momenta singulis mortuarum, per varias mutabilissimae divitas diversior genus mortis. Moro, hoc est, de vita, quam dicemus, sed de morte, quam eosquis dicimus.

Ver. 8. "despite not the discourse of the wise, but acquit thyself with their proverbs: for of them thou shalt learn instruction, and how to serve great men with ease." In all discourse with men of consuit wisdom should be observed, and submit patiently to be heard, and be informed by them. Nor let a vain conceit of your own abilities produce a contempt of their well-grounded maxims and aphorisms, for you may be assured they were not taken up and uttered at random, but were the result of a long and judicious observation, and will be found of the greatest use in life. This discourse and these proverbs do require to be heard by him who is wise or wise man must be φιλοσοφός, φιλόσοφος, γνώμην, "willing to learn, attentive to others, and of an inquisitive disposition." (De Rep.) And for these qualities he highly commends Socrates, in Theophrastus. This advice is repeated in many parts of this book. To as the skill here recommended, of knowing how to please great men, and acting in their service with credit and approbation. (Homer, Iliad, lib. i.) Nobody is so wise or so well-informed as to be proper to advise how to behave in this respect; and to deliver maxims of just conduct, as a person long used to conversation with great men. The great experience which he who has had in the world, must give him in this respect a knowledge which is not to be fetched from books, nor acquired in the schools. The course of his life is long, he has usually conversed with many, and know little of, and have seen it only at a distance; and therefore the direction and countenance of those who have conversed long in it, and who have the art of pleasing and recommending themselves to the great, must be of more service than the most refined speculations, or any rules of general conduct laid down by others.

Ver. 10. "Know the ends of a sinner, lest thou be hearted with the flame of his fire." There is the like metaphor upon the same occasion, xxvii. 11. The Vulgate renders, Non incendes carbones peccatorum, and then adds, by way of explanation, quos omen est, quod est, "You should not easily encend the reasonable reproof of a sinner. For though brotherly reproof is a most necessary duty, yet much prudence and caution must be used in giving it. The most favourable opportunity to do it with success is when circumstances have joined to make him the subject of a most suitable difficulty; he is to have the most weight; we must do it with temper, and take care not to inflame the party reproved by any indiscretion, which will serve only to draw a connection of the sin committed, and delay the end proposed. Sometimes reproof is altogether useless, as when a person is incorrigible, and upon good grounds we foresee that it never will do, or if it is to effect no change. In such a case we may spare ourselves both the pains and hazard; it is only casting pearls before swine, who in requital will turn again and rend us. God approves of all good intentions, but a good will not make the end right. He", and the best things cease to be so when they are done out of season. St. Jerome very wisely remarks, that neither king Hezekiah, nor his people, gave any answer or reproof to the repeated blasphemies of Rabascas, for fear of provoking him to an open war. Some think, in the allusion here, these repetitions are intended; nor always safe, to reprove a person almost in the very instant of sinning, in the hurry of his passion and folly, when he cannot attend to cold reflection or friendly admonition; for he cannot, when once he begins to act, draw back his fleet hand, nor be sensible of the danger it entails, and the loss he suffers by it. It is not easy to utter reproof when he is once made to understand the folly of his sinner, and the great and lare destructions which will follow his obstinacy. And besides, he is always ready to take the sinner upon his own account, and enter into the heinousness of his offence, and imparts to him his message from the Lord. The oriental versions understand the words of keeping company with sinners, and suffering by their evil communication, as if the sense was nearly the same with the Prov. vi. 27, 29, "A man take fire in his bosom, and not be burnt? so he that goeth in company with sinners shall not be unharmed.

Ver. 11. Rise not up in anger at the presence of an injurious person, lest he lie in wait to entrap thee in thy words." This is not accurately translated; the words are翻译: an anger an ungoverned, and make thee to utter foolish words, and thus fall, and bring them, by that stratagem, to condemn his own guilt, in the person of another, before he says to him explicity, Thou art the man. This, as it were a kind of reproofi, he then enters upon the heinousness of his offence, and imparts to him his message from the Lord. The oriental versions understand the words of keeping company with sinners, and suffering by their evil communication, as if the sense was nearly the same with the Prov. vi. 27, 29, "A man take fire in his bosom, and not be burnt? so he that goeth in company with sinners shall not be unharmed.

Ver. 12. "Lend not unto him that is mightier than thyself; for if thou lendest him, cast it but lost." θἀξουντίκς γίνοι, which is well rendered by Junius, Petrine εἰς, inasmuch as every one of us is under a debt, but drawing on you a new and powerful enemy. Les Grands (says Calmet) de siemten choques, lorsque l'on repete ce qu'ils demand. Great men often take it in their head to be affronted when they are asked for what they owe; and if you are necessitated to attempt to recover your own by a course of law, it is often in their power to displease their creditors in their attempt, through their interest, or by insisting on their privilege. Lend not therefore more than what thou canst afford or art willing to lose, for thou hast but little prospect of receiving things again. But if you are disposed to lend money, you should lend it to such as are in particular distress, and under a great necessity of having it. Look upon yourself as the debtor, and consider how most effectually to discharge yourself. Use all diligence and application to make the person you lend to sensible of the importance of his indolence, lest, at the time appointed, he should not be ready or able to make the payment, for you may be assured the creditors will come upon his security, if he himself does not. It is very necessary to have some prudence in many parts of the book of Proverbs, vi. 1. xi. 15, 17, 18. xx. 16. xxii. 26. 27. The last comes nearest this place, and expresses in the strongest manner of all, the importance of such a particular care in a person's estate. Do not thou one of them that strike hands, nor of them that are sureties for debts; if thou hast nothing to pay, they will take thy very bed from under the...

The ancient sages have always looked upon this as a necessary piece of advice to be pursued in life, and are unanimous in their cautions on this head. "йгйгі (д'Ан) was a maxim of such consequence as to be thought worthy of note on the walls of Delphi: To be heedful not to be bowed above one's power, or for one that is mightier than thyself, to make as if one were the consternation, and as if one were the object of that which is beyond."

Ver. 14. Go not to law with a judge, for they will judge for him according to his honor. The Vulgate renders, Non judices contra judeum, quia potestas suae, ut possint ad rei iudicium veniunt. Others understand it in the following sense: To avoid the necessity of a lawsuit; and, if this be the interpretation, it is the advice last given in the margin, with the translation, "Do not contend with law, or have any suit with a judge;" for, according to Calmet, Les autres juges souffrent leurs col leagues, ou leurs confreres, et lui donnerent gain de cause, ou confirment son jugement; the other judges will support and countenance their comrade, and will confirm his decree; they will judge and determine, earh yfй the dйnй, either according to his dignity, or, as the margin has it, according to the opinion which he had in the cause. (Mons. de Bogs, in loc.)

Ver. 10. Open not thy heart to every man, lest he require thee with a shewed term. I. e. We should be cautious and sparing in our intimacies, and of disciples, lest we be concerned in any of their conversations, or in any of their opinions or ten Scrudance, and tenderness to our interest. Our charity indeed should be universal, and extend to all mankind; but if it is by no means convenient our friendship and familiarity should do so likewise. We often find that a person very little known to us, recommended to us perhaps by some accident, and whom, upon too slender an acquaintance, we have unwarily unbaromed ourselves, are the good opinion of the kind of him before, and betrayed the confidence we reposed in him, to our great prejudice. The Vulgate renders, Ne forte instruct tibi gramin falso, cum in curru ait. Not unlike that of Solomon, Prov. xiv. 10, according to the Vulgate, Secretum extraneo non reveles, ne forte insoluet tibi cum audierit, et exprobare non cesset; i. e. do not suffer yourself to be made a prey to the treachery of a treacherous person you have opened your heart to, and intrusted with your secrets. Sacred story informs us how dear it cost Samson for discovering to the Philistines the secret of his strength, and thus gave us this remarkable instance of Pompey's great fidelity and secrecy. "That being sent ambassador by the senate, he unfortunately fell into the hands of king Darius, who made him his prisoner, and exposed him to the contempt of his embassy, but Pompey, instead of answering, put his finger into the flame of a candle, and let it burn there without crying out. The action so expressively described, "The kingdom, instead of being forced to yield, which nothing could force from such a man a secret which regarded his country" (Vialer. Max. lib. iii. cap. 3).

CHAPTER IX.

Ver. 1. Be not jealous over the wife of thy bosom, and teach her not an evil lesson against thyself. "Wife of one household, familiar; a faithful housekeeper." So in the Hebrews (Deut. xiii. 6. xxvii. 54. Mic. vii. 7). There are some certain affections wherein too much circumspection is dangerous; one often suggests and a prudent person should endeavor to prevent it: Quiddam fallere docuunt, dum haud est adpiscere ille, tum illud fallat, et illius pecentu suspicando occasione praeuentur. Disturb often pursues persons upon wicked enterprises by which they are not only the other of the sort is unjust the suspicion of a husband, which has often raised an unclean spirit in the wife, out of mere spite and revenge, to resolve to give him reasons for her suspicion, she must undergo the ignominy. A woman of honour is affronted when she is but suspected of being capable of falsehood, and if she is not one of the party to get them to reason with the manner which the jealous person so much dreaded. A good woman, says a polite writer, wants no bars, and a bad one will not be confided on by them; watching only serves to make her the more odious.

Theophrastus, as I find him quoted by St. Jerome (lib. i. cont. Jovin.), has the like remark: Quid prodest etiam diligens custodia, cum amo servari impuritate, quae est ... alteri ... quidem ... quid impediat, ut patriae est necessitas est necissitas. Such outward restraints rather provoke than do good. A generous confidence in the honour and conduct of the wife, and faithful and open communication in part of the husband's transactions, is the most and most lasting security.

Ver. 2. Give not thy soul unto a woman to set her foot upon thy substance, Ver. 3. Give not thy power of life over her head, and become impious."

The Vulgate has, Non des mulieris postestatem animae tuae, ne immoderat in virtute tua, et confundamur, ut omnes in te Jesu, qui est jussit ut non deserat se curam, quia ... nos, quia ... ab auctore; ... ilia ... et ... per gentes; ... s. f. et ... ibid. ... f. et ... ibid. ... s. f. et ... ibid. ... f. et ... ibid. ... s. f. et ... ibid. ... f. et ... ibid. ...

Ver. 5. Use not much the company of a woman that is a singer, lest then be taken, or by her allurements."

The margin has, With one that playeth upon instruments; the Vulgate, with St. Cyprian, renders, Cum saltatricit ne asseisias sibi, following a copy which read, προ ανθρωπον, which probably may be the better reading; for Calmet, as that the eastern dances were less modest than the modern, less decency observed, and more freedom taken. Herodias's dancing shows the power of that entertainment over an enamoured mind, and her bloody request the abuse of that power. The advice here given is, to avoid all occasions, opportunities, and temptations to imparity, not to induge a wanton eye, or an enticing ear, or run into danger by concerning with pleasing, but yet unsavoury things, such as is here talked of. Pro facie multa vox sua una fuit.

The verb means, to look with attention and earnestness, with a sort of wonder worse than amaze (see Matt. xxviii. 21. Luke xxxii. 7) (Oxf). It expresses in one word what the apocryphal Esdras describes by a long paraphrase, 1 Esdr. iv. 19. Message, xxxv. 2-6. Royal observe with reference to the conclusion that the eastern dances less free upon a prudent reservedness towards women, as he enjoins it in so many particulars, and so remarkably diversifies his discourse about it.—Not to sit, eat, or look upon them, but according to the strictest rules of decency, even though they may be as fair in character, as in person; as such interviews are always attended with danger, open or secret. The world, indeed, esteem gazing, as both inoffensive and indifferent, and that it is a guilty precaution to confine modesty so strictly; but experience confirms the necessity of the advice, and that the remedy is no other, or greater, than what the world of wise persons advise. David was, and have not received more grace from heaven, that we should have that command over us which he was. What and what was it that raised the fear of a beausiness? How were they to get the farthest distance from him? Let us be afraid of a stumbling-block, which the saints would not have been by, if they had been watchful as they ought, and would have been careful that that was not the case.

There is not a greater discretion, than for men to imagine that they, can live in the midst of flames, and not be burnt; such a persuasion is a sign, that they think the devil's work, but it is the work of the greater irregularities, but by guarding against the less, which are the avenues and inlets to them. Discretion as it was the barrier of chastity; these two often support each other, and the neglect of one cannot long keep the other" (Com. in loc.).
That thou fall not by those things that are precious in thee. But thou art involved in her punishment, according to some expositors; or, as St. Austin strongly expresses it, Ne cum perenne deceptur, et infra tua mentem, a CONCEPTUAL division thereof. But if thou fall falsely, then the sins of others shall become to thy account. But I would rather read, ut eis inducti esses in eis injusta. But I would rather read, ut eis inducti esses in eis injusta. But I would rather read, ut eis inducti esses in eis injusta.

Ver. 5. Give not thy soul unto harlots, that thou lose not thine inheritance. The mischief arising from these is prettily couched under the fable of shipwreck, which is common and familiar enough, and so well understood by the translators. The advice is very seasonable in the following verse, to frequent suspected places, or wander about in quest of women of such infamous character; and is agreeable to that using and thinking about the matter, so as to avoid it right on, as they think, and thine eyelids straight before thee. Ponder the path of thy feet, so shall thy ways be ordered aright (Prov. iv, 25, 26). It was a wise appointment of some of the ancient schools, to order the temple of Venus to be built out of the city, where temptations of this sort are more frequent, and inviting, if the man had no other measure of decency, or to freemasonry, might be observed by the younger sort. Ver. 8. Turn away thine eyes from a beautiful woman, for many have been deceived by the beauty of a woman; for herewith love is kindled as a fire. One cannot conceive anything stronger to express the power of beauty, than what is mentioned concerning Holofernes's passion for Judith. "That her beauty took his mind prisoner" (xvi, 9). And his fate shows the danger of being a victim to it. In the contest at Darius's feast, the advocate for beauty finely urges, "I should have been a woman!" and he exhorts him to use his reason, and not to be carried away by his passion. The great was sensible of its power, when he denied himself the pleasure of gazing upon Darius's daughters, his pretty prisoners; alleging, with a resolution agreeable to his character, that he did not want to shade his grace. It is a clear proof that he should not suffer himself to be overcome and captivated by women. None commit matrimony with vipers, a most vicious insect. Murusus gives much the same account of the original of love, with our author: "It begins with the vessel of habitation, in whom it is nourished and set on foot, and covered with all the ornaments and art and fancy that can bestow." Averte faciam tuam a muliere computa. The primitive fathers and ancient sages are on no subject more copious than in condemning a gaudy excess of apparel, or superfluous ornaments ravished upon the person. They looked upon all affection of this sort, not only as an impediment of mind, but as a sign of a loose turn of mind. St. Cyril, accordingly remarks, Ornamentorum ac vestimenti insignia, et lenocinis, fornacibus, non nisi prostitutis et impudicis feminis contexta, quinque deinde cupidus est, quarto praedacious e isto (De Hab. Virg.).

Ver. 9. Nor sit down with her in thine arms. This sentence is wholly omitted in many Greek copies, particularly those of the old Latin and new, and is generally omitted in ancient versions. Such editions as retain it, read very differently. Our translators follow the Complut., which has, ἐν συνώπειᾳ συντικά μετ' αὐτής, and is but imperfectly rendered by them; it means rather to lie in her embraces, in amplexus gremius uxoris dormine, according to Grutius. And thus the Tigrine version, Nec inter ulnas ejus recumbas; and Junius is to the same effect. Grutius has, in' dveµeµeι της κυρίας της κυρίας, and so they are to be read, if κυριακός καὶ κυρίαμετ' αὐτῇ: "Lie not upon the same couch or bed with her at meals!" alluding probably to the ancient posture at entertainments.

Clem. Alex. vulg. 2, 42, "Get thee away from the company of sinners, and with a good man, and he will do good to thee. And in the manner, and explains it manifestly to this sense (Paddag. lib. ii. cap. 7); and thus the Vulgate also renders, Nec cum eccum es super cubilium. It may be proper here to inquir, whether the scandal mentioned, is so connected as to be applicable to one who enters same at table with a married woman. Calmet observes, that at the ancient entertainments the husband sat at the head of the table, and the guests on one side, and the women on the other. The daughters of Midian, they prevented the plague which consumed the chosen men in Israel; and, not to mention David, had the elders, instead of admiring the beauty of the women, so as to look after that way, they had prevented their ignominious execution.

Ver. 6. Through thy inordinate desire or lust, thou wilt be brought into misery and ruin. This is a Hebraism; that language expresses any affected manner by translating, and it is not necessary to carry it so far as to mean that which is becarne a man to offer to engage in, and unseemly in a woman to accept. It is improper also, as seems to be in the ancient versions, to render it, that we are going so often together, that the names are almost synonymous. See Prov. xxxii. 21, where μεθομοσυν, και παροιμοσυν are joined together by the LXX. Lest thou shouldst provoke her, and so through thy desire that fall into destruction. This is not comperable to him: a new friend is as new wine; when it is old, thou shalt drink it with pleasure. Friend of a new time, the friend of a new age, is here, as often in the Vulgate, the friend of the time. As is mei, and it is more mei, and it is of the time. As is mei, and of mei, and it is of the time. The old friend, (say he) is at first like new wine, sweet, but withal unpleasant; but when it has age, it mellowes, and is in its perfection. Which is the common meaning of the word, new friend, and, as it is used here, receives hereafter the reward of their unrighteousness (2 Pet. ii. 12, 13); or, lastly, may not the word be understood in some such impure sense as that of Juvenal—Accepit saepe invidius Sabazianus (Sat. 1). Ver. 10. Forsake not an old friend; for the new is not comparable to him: a new friend is as new wine; when it is old, thou shalt drink it with pleasure. Friend of a new time, the friend of a new age, is here, as often in the Vulgate, the friend of the time. As is mei, and it is more mei, and it is of the time. tion on this place: "Man is too weak to guard against that which flavors his vanity; he is always fond of glory and greatness, and admires and cavils in it; but it is faith alone which discovers that the pride of all this is vanity, and greatness which enables him to despise and resist the temptation. It is for this reason that the wise man so often reminds us not to suffer ourselves to be dazzled with the power, nor to endeavour to carry their own weight in a dishonourable condition; but to assure ourselves, that their elevation portends their ruin, as it occasions a forgetfulness of God and his judgments, and serves only to lay down his own weight and greatness.

Ver. 12. Delight not in the thing that the ungodly have pleasure in: let all evil that you may withal. The Vulgate renders, Non peneat cuius iniuriam injustam, following the Latin copy, propterea ut non obstat, &c. After the advice in the former verse not to envy the glories of sinners, it follows very properly, not to delight in their customs or pleasures, as we are too apt to receive it, which dictates the conduct of such, whose condition we admire, and whose greatness we envy. Besides the common exposition of the words, which at first offers itself, of not approving or joining in the amusements, follies, and vices, of the abandoned and prodigal, the sense may be,

Do not value or pride yourself in having the approbation or good word of sinners, whose praise is an ignominy, and whose condemnation a comfort. And this is the Port-Royal comment. Ne vous reajuez point d'avoir l'approbation des prodigues.

But remember they will not go unpunished unto their greatest and last destruction. Drusius understands the words as our translators do, but the sense of which literally translated may either be, That they shall not be just, or esteemed by the wise; or that they shall not have rewards, or received the false praises of others, men shall at length change their opinion of them, and be convinced of their mistake in esteeming them, and shall not only condemn, but shall reprove the wise man to be true, "That there is a way which seemeth right unto a man, but the end thereof are the ways of death" (Prov. xiv. 12). And this sense serves very well in meaning the end of such people, and the extent of their power and measure of their greatness. Men shall not be found just unto their grave; or, they shall never be justified, shall always continue wicked, and shall never repent so truly and effectually as he, who before he was wicked, but afterwards was justified: for it is covered in the sense: or, lastly, that they shall be so far from being justified or acquitted, that misfortunes shall overtake them in this life, and after death God will punish them with larger vials of his wrath. See note on xvi. 22, where the sense of δικαιοω is enumerated more particularly.

Ver. 13. Keep thee far from the man that hath power to kill, and from the man that is able to destroy. The advice here is to avoid the court of princes, especially of tyrants, who often abuse their power, and sport with the lives of their subjects. The king is the head and undoubted being of a nation, but he has not so much distance with them, is both frequent and dangerous; to keep at a distance therefore is most prudent, so that thou be safe, and out of any apprehension of death. Our word destroy is a Latin translation of the Greek, ὠ而现在, ὁ συνεχεσθή, and thereby obscure; nor is the Vulgate much clearer, Et non subcursus timorem mortis. The meaning is, that by keeping altogether away from the person of such impious and tyrannical persons, as have it in their power, and may have it in their inclination, to ruin us, or by being so wise and circumspect in our conduct, if we do approach them, as shall not give us the power to give an offence, that may expose us to their censure and displeasure; we shall not only be out of the reach, but out of the fear of danger, and need have no doubt or suspicion of any. Coverdale by kill translates it; "So now if any man be not afraid of death;" which is agreeable to the oriental ones, Procul aestiate ab eo, qui hostes terrae habet necis, et terrae mortis ne reformedit. The phrasing of this verse is a lively representation. The sense of which I presume is, Thou shalt walk amidst the arms of enraged enemies, disposed to give no quarter to those that fall into their hands.

Ver. 14. As near as thou canst guess at thy neighbour. Our translation seems here not full enough: for more guessing is not a sufficient foundation of security in the choice of friends. It is a great deal more than the metaphor taken from shooting, and the whole sentence, κακεν το ἐνεχεσθή εἰς κακόν, means, to take good aim, to look steadily upon the mark, and to apply all our skill and spirit to arrive at it. Will therefore be a most essential counsel under it is, that to form a right judgment of our neighbour, we must make all necessary inquiry concerning him, and try him in all possible instances; we must look into his past conduct, and consider of his principles, the views and intentions of others, whether in all respects, such as temper, faithfulness, love, discretion, virtue, &c. he is a proper person to make a friend or confidant, to be satisfied we may safely trust and communicate our most secret affairs to, and be assisted in them by his wisdom and experience.

Ver. 16. And let just men eat and drink with thee. This advice somewhat resembles that of our Saviour, Luke xiv. 12. not to call our rich neighbours to our feast, such as are recommended to us merely by their state and riches. The Ionian copy, σιωπησθαι, is a word which intimates to be silent, to hold the peace, and put the disportment of our good things, to have regard chiefly to merit, and especially men's moral qualifications. To prefer a man of strict sobriety, to an intemperate or noisy companion; and one of an abandoned and prodigal rake. And we have the reason in the former verse for the preference here given, because when thy table is furnished with despising and reviling, and in the wise, shall thy communication in the law of the Most High;" and indeed the Vulgate so transposes the verses. We may also apply this direction to charity in particular, not to be partial to our kin or kinsmen; and recommend every one to the esteem of the most worthy and pure, among such these we have more eminently distinguished themselves, and merely because they have so. Thus Tobit, when he saw abundance of meat prepared, said to him, "Let us have such a man, who is mindful of the Lord" (v. 1, 2). And our Saviour promises a reward to them that receive a prophet, or a just man, or shall give only a cup of cold water to a depository, Elias a viduam, scientia, quod hominem Dei pateretur, et propter hoc pateretur (Aug. Confess. lib. xiii. cap. 26).
Ver. 1. A wise judge will instruct his people; and the goods of judgment will not perish for ever. A wise judge, i.e. such as the Jews have their Josue, Gomorathus, and Esdras. Josue were wise moralists in general; Gomorathus were those that were skilled in the knowledge of the law, and interpreted it to the people; Esdras were those that were skilled in mythical and allegorical interpreters of scripture. We meet with them all together. I Cor. i. 20. The scene, according to Calmet, is, That God puts upon the person or face of the sacred book, a portion of his word, which he has compassed, a portion of that light which shine upon the face of Moses (Exod. xxxv. 33); or, that God gives to the wise all the light which they have occasion for, to fulfil their duty; that is he which crowns their skill, and gives them success and honour to them; that the dignity which a learned man through his merit arrives at, is from the Lord, who has enriched him with learning, and made him wise by his instruction, by which he became so eminent and useful; or if, by scribes, we understand magistrates or public officers of state, whom we read of often under the kings of Judah, both in times of war and peace; the meaning then is, that God has made persons of such a public character, in some sort the representatives of his power upon earth; that they are in this respect the images of God, and, in proportion to their dignity, claim reverence and honour. The oriental versions understand the place in a moral sense, duties common to all men, i.e. Those who honour God to his neighbours, he will not forget them. The Port-Royal comment applies it to the clergy, to whom, when God can observe an honest care of his cause, an upright administration of the public affairs, and an unspoilable spirit of the pastoral office, he gives the spirit of wisdom and understanding at their desire, and the rest of the good gifts of the Holy Spirit. The Vulgate renders it as, To understand the high priest in particular, may refer to the majesty of God upon the dindsay of his head (Wisd. xvi. 24).

Ver. 2. As the judge of the people is himself, so are his officers; and what manner of man the ruler of the city is, such are all they that dwell therein. An wise king destroys his people; but through the presence of them which are in authority the city shall be inhabited. Good kings, such as Josiah, Hezekiah, David, &c. who have themselves a true sense of religion, and a regard for the honour of God, will be zealous in promoting the right worship of him, and encouraging it in others; but such an evil one as Jeroboam, who introduces wrong modes of worship, will occasion the Lord's people to transgress in the like instances of holy. We may make the like reflection with respect to the Roman emperors, whether we instance in Augustus, Trian, or Vespasian, the delight and guardians of their people; or to the Saracens, who, through the blemishes of passion, forebode the pests and scourges of them. Cicero has the like reflection with respect to our author: Ut cupiditatibus principum et vitii infici solut, civitatis, clemens et corrigi continentur. Good and bad princes are of common occurrence; as, on the contrary, by their goodness and regularity, it is amended and improved, so that the vices of princes are not so much to be lamented, though they be so evil, as that their vices were drawn by the contrary of an imitation to them. One may observe in the history of all nations, that such as were, such by degrees was the city itself, out of the part, is the fittest and most profitable. And thus God in due time raised Cyrus, who was prophesied of above a hundred years before his birth, to be a special instrument of his power and pleasure. Princes of sense and spirit, by whom the whole body of the people is governed, must have recourse to its necessary guide and direction (Eccle. de Peccat. et Confess.)

Ver. 4. The power of the earth is in the hand of the Lord, and he directeth all things as he pleaseth. God, as he is the sovereign Lord of the world, disposes of the kingdoms of the earth according to his pleasure; he pulleth down one, and setteth up another (Ps. lxxiv. 7. Dan. iii. 41). As he best saith with the designs of his providence. He rejected Saul from being king over Israel, for not executing his commandments, and promoted David to the kingdom, though chaste out of the people, as the fittest and most profitable. And thus God in due time raised Cyrus, who was prophesied of above a hundred years before his birth, to be a special instrument of his power and pleasure. Princes of sense and spirit, by whom the whole body of the people is governed, must have recourse to its necessary guide and direction (Eccle. de Peccat. et Confess.)

Ver. 5. The Israelites have power over goods; and man may be well for his own good; but the body is not therewith affected, nor its general use obstructed; but if through some calamity the eyes are blinded, or the head dangerously wounded, the whole body suffers. The word of God is the fittest and most profitable. And thus God in due time raised Cyrus, who was prophesied of above a hundred years before his birth, to be a special instrument of his power and pleasure. Princes of sense and spirit, by whom the whole body of the people is governed, must have recourse to its necessary guide and direction (Eccle. de Peccat. et Confess.)

As to the Roman empire in particular, Cato's account of that people's gradual degeneracy and fall is worth transcribing, and is a close comment upon the passage before us; Noli existimare magnos nostras armas Remp. ex parvo magnam fuisse.

CHAPTER II.

Is the reading in all the editions of this place: but I cannot understand, that it is built, constructed: I therefore pointed: I propose it therefore as a conjecture whether the true reading might not have been, ver. 8. Bona &c.

My reasons to support this conjecture are these: 1. In ver. 7, two verses are only mentioned, pride and injustice, as the cause of the fall of Rompers, and this place it seems wrong to insert a new particular in the verse following, which is a continuation of the same subject. 2. That, according to the common reading, there seems to be no sense or connection in ver. 9, whether or not he proceeds from vestibulis, et, &c. as it is done in some editions, or follows after it, as it does in others. 3. If he proceeds be carried forward, and joined to idem vestibulum, the subject of the whole verse is led from its proper subject, and the subject is subjoined to pride upon account of riches, viz., that the vestibulum, or person fond of wealth, who is resolved to go to the vestibulum for all, never salir in the first, and the second sentence: you have the pleasure to find that Messieurs de Port-Royal confirm this conjecture in their comment on that place.

Ver. 9. Why are earth and ashes proud? There is not a more wicked thing than a covetous man: for such an one setteth his own soul to sale: because while he liveth he casteth away his bowels.

That this verse is mangled and imperfect, appears from the different reading of it in most of the printed editions, and from all the ancient versions, none of which agree in placing the sentences, or representing the sense of the whole alike. The Syriac and Arabic say nothing of the covetousness of the wicked, nor are the intermediate sentences in the Vatican and Alexandria. Dr. Grabe, indeed, by a transposition, Ecclus. x. makes him their ninth verse, but from what authority he either transposes or modifies them, Doctor Pearson says, the Vulgate has the whole, but in different order. Our translation follows the Complut. an edition of great authority as to this book (see Grabe's Prolegom. cap. 3. sec. 1.): yet here differs

The subject and the incoherence of the text itself, have induced many to think of a transposition, particularly Jansenius and Mess-

Because, while he liveth, he casteth away his bowels.*] The reading of this passage is very different. Our translators follow a certain passage in Ezek. ch. xvi. where it is stated, that the city of Ador, which the Vulgate seems likewise to have followed.
The sense is that it is perplexed; the best that offers seems to be this, that the covetous man, for the sake of money pawns his soul, or forfeits his salvation, because, from an

Chapter, which the forber becometo see and *be* shed.* To shed a man's bowels, is a Hebrew phrase for an assassination, or sudden slaughter of a man. Thus in the passage of Job and Amos, it is said, He smote him under the fifth rib, a

Such a phrase as this is also to be found in Daniel, ch. iii. 47. *And Pharaoh said, Let me slay all the men of the land of Egypt,* and the reference we should draw from it is, that the most secure state (seemingly from wealth and power) is not exempt from sudden accidents, nor more safe from violence than from natural death; which seems to be a more natural sense than that of Grothus, who understands the place of clivarious readings of this passage likewise; the two principal are, *mepra* kCorrectionis* terapiai, which is followed by our translators, and approved of by Drusius and Grothus; and *mepra* kCorrectionis* terapiai, which is followed by Calmet.

The sense of the former is, that as a physician careth a long and inveterate disease by the application of suitable remedies, so God often takes away suddenly, by the stroke of death, a tyran, although he has been a long and sore evil and plague to the state; which seems to be the sense of the Vulgate rendering. Omnium potentissimae brevi visio, though this probably was a marginal note, and considered as an emendation, is also a common reading. A long disease baffles or puzzles at the physician; and, considered jointly with the following sentence, the king is that to-day, to-morrow shall die. There are two

Hence, if we labor to find a modern instance of a sudden overthrow, of a people or a state, which is not entirely available, it may be found in the sudden and unexpected death of a tyrant, or the sudden and unexpected death of a availability, have taught even tyrants not only a sense of their mortalitv, but of submission and humility. When the

ECCLESIASTICUS.

Ver. 12. The beginning of pride is when one departeth from God, and his heart is turned away from his Maker. scripsi superbiae, abUltra deu creatorem, which the Vulgate manifestly follows; i.e. from God is the beginning of pride, or rather pride is the cause of a man's revolting from the Lord. Thus the Syriac, Intitulatio de unum humanae superbiae, as if the reader was to understand that pride is the cause of man's turning away from God. According to Grotius, the sense is, that it is scripsi superbiae, the height of pride, fastigium superbiæ, to depart from and rebel against one's Maker; and so rash is the sense and knowledge of himself, when wrong reads the man to whom the Lord imputeth no sin, and there is no guilt in the spirit of him; so the Heb. אֶחֱטֵית יִשָּׁהְלָה (yehethit yishahelah) so the LXX.—and yet our rendering is proper, and may be thus rendered; scripsi superbiae is not 'written', as our translators have done in other places. The truth of the observation itself will appear from considering the first and principal instance which is given, that of Sennacherib, the greatest conqueror, and by far the most renowned, and was indeed filled with rage to kill his brother, the protoanomy of the Old Testament.

Ver. 13. For pride is the beginning of sin: i.e. it is the source of all or the greatest sins, or it is itself the chief of all sins; and so Grotius expounds it, Sumnum omnium pecatorum est superbia. Fulgentius says, Pride is properly styled here scripsi superbiae, because sin springeth from it, as from its root (De Virg. et Hamilt.). And this we may either understand, with that writer, of the sin and fall of Lucifer, for so high does he trace the original pride (De Premiet. lib. 1). So does St. Austin (Hylas. De Civit. Dei lib. 1). Thus we may compare to Adam's in the corruption in particular, as others do; or we may take pride in a larger sense here, to signify, in general, a contempt of God. Pride being the root of all manner of sins, many interpreters think that of Proser. Nullum pecatum fieri potest, potius, aut poterit, sine superbia; si quidem nihil aliud est omne pecatum, nisi contemptus Dei (De Vita Contempt. lib. ii. c. 15). Pride is the first of all vices, the experience and observation confirm, for men grow more or less wicked in proportion as this vice of pride gets ground. Some degree of it is to be found in every set of disagreeable persons, and is one of the most common impediments to the contempt of the authority which enacts it; but when pride is grown up to the height, it exalts men into so vain an opinion of themselves, that they lose all sense of duty, lose all sense of those obligations which they owe to their Maker, and the overflowings of their godliness are like a mighty torrent. The psalmist therefore, with great propriety, gives this as the character of an ungodly man, "That he is so proud about himself, and is a mighty high fellow, that it is thought of the whole world" (Ps. x. 4). And as pride was the original of sin, so is it still the promoter and continuator of it, pride being the fountain of most of the heathens and schismatisches which have disturbed the church, and the chief cause of that, as this account the prophets frequently denounced destruction to Nineveh, Babylon, Tyre, and Jerusalem itself. And one end of the ruin brought upon a wicked people, is to show how little the other is, to make them ashamed, and humble before God. And therefore the Lord brought upon them strange calamities. As pride is the root of sin, so God's judgments are upon it. Therefore we see, that there are two readings of the Greek; πορευόμενος ἐνοχὸν τῶν συναγηθέντων, which is followed in our version; and though this expression is somewhat particular, yet it is warranted by a parallel, I Deut. xxviii. 20, so that when they return to the Lord, and have humbled themselves, and humbled themselves, and have, manifestly, expressed,自制其伯父之仇, it is used, xvi. 7, 8. Upon a similar occasion the Vulgate favours this sense, Exonovarit convenit malorum; and so is the reading of the Greek, and the sense of the passages in Coverdale's and the Geneva versions, are to the same effect. In either reading there are memorable instances of the truth of the observation. Thus God brought strange calamities upon the inhabitants of Sodom and Gomorrah (xvi. 7, 8. Pliiso and the Canaanites, which are particularly referred to in the context, Shinmarres, Sennachera, Nebuchadnezzar, Nebucho, and other great monarchs. Some say that pride is so earnestly praised in the habits of those, whose actions are recorded in sacred and profane history—all at whom fell away in the strength of their foolishness, and were abhorred by God for their pride. Ver. 14. His anger is fierce, and his furious anger for them that are born of a woman. Οδικὸς ὁ θυμός καὶ θυμὸς ροταμίων ἐκ τῶν γυναικῶν: scripsi no furious anger for them that are born of a woman, which is well rendered in our version, and with it agree Drusus, Junius, Badwell, and Bosquet, as also the oriental and Coverdale's versions, is strangely misunderstood by Gro- tius, and very badly rendered by him, "for furious anger for the female sex." Had he attended to the use of the phrase, Job xvi. 14, xxxv. 4. 1 Macc. iii. 45. Matt. xi. 11, he might have spared his unhandsome sneer and unjust reflection. Sunt quidem malus neque irae sanci sed justiciae invenies causas. "There are many offenses, and much hatred, in the heart of man, and the eye is in a heavy sort of rage. Neque ira de præteritio nationum mulierum: as do Messieurs of Port-Royal, and the Geneva version, and some other versions. But there is reason to think, that this expression may have been used in the same sense, and seem not to have consulted the Greek, which gives no handle, as there is no foundation in nature, for such an abuse. I shall only set down this criticism about his anger being so much against the sex, even though they were not guilty of evil. Other vices are more open, and strike a sort of horror in the commission; but pride springs from our very virtues, it grows up with them, and lies concealed under the pleasant names of being learned, clever, and sagacious; and corrupts all within, however beautiful the outward appear-ance may be.

It is rendered more clearly in the Geneva version, " My son, get thyseU praise by meekness, and esteem poverty, be not dispirited or dejected, but preserve a constant evenness of temper, and endeavour to act up to the dignity of your nature or there may be, according to Calmet, this fariher meaning, as Tiph often signifies maintenance in this writer. Provide for all the necessary wants of life, by allowing yourself food, and all things convenient, according to your condition and circumstances. In the foregoing verse the wise man condemns those who out of a foolish vanity were ashamed to work, though ready to perish with hunger; see Prov. xii. 9, to which probably he alludes. Hero he attacks those who, out of a shameful principle of avarice, refuse themselves the common necessaries of life, and are afraid to use those good things winch they have in their power and possession. This sense seems countenanced by the following verse. This advice may also be extended to persons succeeding lo great fortunes, or advanced to high posts of honour, to behave with moderation in their new state, nor to be puffed up with pride, nor yet to demean themselves, or act below the dignity of their rank, and thereby forfeit the regard and deference due to it but this is not so agreeable to the context.

Ver. 29. Who will justify him that sinneth against his expectation? Occasionally of the sin of neglection, or defrauding himself even common necessaries, and failing in the duty which he owes to himself, cannot expect that others should justify him, or speak in his behalf, or that he will receive any relief from any part of the verse, "Who will honour him that dishonoureth his own life," is paralleled to that of Horace, Mnevin, cum tu argento post omnia postos, Si nempe prætent quem non meretur semper? (L. D. 1. sat. 1.)

Ver. 31. He that is honoured in poverty, how much more in riches? and he that is dishonourable in riches, how much more so in poverty? for the same man, that behavio in the management of a superior fortune; but he that cannot live upon an overgrown fortune with credit, will be laughed at and despised, when reduced almost to poverty; he has the sense may live, if a poor man; by his skin and merit, acquires honour and esteem, how much more would he have been respected, and his accomplishments extolled, if he had been master of a great fortune. A poor man of real and intrinsic worth is more to be esteemed and valued than one who is simply rich, and has nothing else to recommend him; for the reputation of the former must arise from himself, and his own personal merit, which he has by means of many difficulties and oppositions in the way. Whereas the honour which attends the rich, and the regard paid to him, is founded upon something foreign to himself, the sense may live, what may be, and sometimes is, the lot of the worthless and underserving. Diogenes and Epicetus adhered a very mean condition, as Joseph was an instance of a just conduct in both states.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 2. Commend not a man for his beauty; neither abhor a man for his outward appearance. By which is not meant, that it is no advantage or recommendation to a man to have a fair person, or to be admired in respect of his personal qualifications, but that a man's merit or excellency is not chiefly to be placed in the size or lineaments of the body, since the mind is the true and lasting beauty, in the accomplishments of which consist both the advantage and dignity, and the honor and usefulness of God. As outward beauty therefore does not confer merit, so neither should the want of it in any instances occasion ridicule or contempt. Loveliness of stature, which with some persons for a sort of deformity, is no reason for mercy or reproof; so sometimes great souls inhabit little bodies, and much merit may be concealed under a disagreeable outside. St. Paul's person and appearance was, according to tradition, but ordinary and contemptible; and yet, if we consider his great qualities and attainments, he was rather an angel than a man. Poetry is here called spec, vana, and properly regarded; "the appearance of the external, and so spec is used in many places by this writer (see xxix. 21. xxxix. 26. Ps. cx. 3. Amos vi. 16. which the author pertinently interprets by the example of the bee, which, though little in size, and scarce presentable, by its industry produces fruit of most admirable use and sweetness.

Ver. 4. Beast not of thy clothing and raiment. These are good indeed for the use which God designed them to defend us from the weather, or to cover our nakedness, but it is folly to boast of that as a perfection, which owes its original to our shame, our weakness, or natural necessities (see Chrys. in cap. 3. Gen. Hom. 18. and to this sense what follows may also be explained, "Exult not thyself in the day of honour; for that οὗτος signifies "glorious apparel," see Addit. Esther xv. 1. Luke xii. 27, where is χαλκος, and highly regarded, "the glory of the body," and so χαλκος is used in many places by this writer (see xxix. 21. xxxix. 26. Ps. cx. 3. Amos vi. 16. which the author pertinently interprets by the example of the bee, which, though little in size, and scarce presentable, by its industry produces fruit of most admirable use and sweetness.

Ver. 5. "Neither do I condemn thee" (viii. 11), which we are not to understand as if he thought her innocent, or any way approved of her actions here; not out of any ignorance of what was done, for he should the omniscient God, Odes, yeoceron, be ignorant? but out of his wonderful clemency and unspokeable moderation towards man, and to instreet his credit, after he had proceeded with the same clemency, and not to be precipitate or rash in their censures or rebukes. This is the very inference which St. Chrysostom draws from it, λιθούνθηκεν τὸν οὐκ ἔτοιμον τὸν ἔστω σαφώς, οὐδὲν ἀπώλεσαν οὐκ ἔτοιμος, ἵνα, κατανοῆσαν τὴν ἀνάλογιαν προσφοράν. (Ex. 4. 19.)

Ver. 6. Exalt not thyself in the day of triumph, nor to sit in judgment with sinners. A man may perhaps think to show the readiness and quickness of his parts by a hasty determination, but he will rather make himself ridiculous, and be in danger to pervert judgment. According to that of Solomon, which this writer had certainly in view, "He that answereth a matter before he heareth it, is it shame and folly to him." Hence judges were, for their prudent deliberation in matters that were to be decided, "Wisdom is called to the judgment of princes," Is. xxv. 7. and it is a thing to be mindful of that he knew not, that Job put on righteousness, and it clothed him, and his judgment was as a robe, and a diadem (xxix. 11. 16). From hence also it is evident, that no man is fit for a public office, nor to suffer ourselves to be led away by vague and uncertain reports, or hastily credit accusations to the prejudice of our neighbour, without knowing the truth and foundation of a thing, whether it be good or bad, and the changes of princes and mighty men, deposed, vanished, made prisoners, and led in triumph by the conquerors. Scripture shows us Samson in the hands of the Philistines, and Zedekiah with a rope about his neck; it is just to be sufficient to show the truth of the observation in the two following verses.

Ver. 7. "Behold not before thou hast examined the truth; understand first thyself, and inquire into the doings of thy heart, and into the reason and deliberation, and to examine into the merits of a cause, before sentence is pronounced, is agreeable to what God himself hath done upon many occasions; for with respect to his first parrets, he had given them the liberty of inquiry about the offence, and to examine the fact, before he gives sentence against them. The like behaviour is observable in God with regard to the murder of Abel; he first asks him, says, Genesis, xxxi. 4, "Is there any room to excuse himself, if he could, before he pronounced, "Thou art cursed from the earth. The like compound is, ch. xvi. 5, when he said, "The Lord came down to see the tower," before he would confound their language. And again, Gen. xviii. 20, 21, speaking of Sedom and Gomorrah, he says "He will go down and see, whether they have done altogether according to that which is come unto him." He, from whom no secrets are hid, even he first examines the fact, and will hear first what miserable man can say for himself, before his sentence shall be pronounced. He has, therefore, as the schoolmen say, non auditu solo pecoreos condemnatur nisi, sed etiam una reginae, nisi si dubium, non dubium, nisi si accusationes proximum condemnatum (Conim. in loc. Mede. Disc. 40). This rashness David was guilty of, when he hearing to the false suggestions of Ziba, he condemned his master (Nebuchnehzar) to death (2 Sam. xiv. 4). It was matter of continual grief to Constantine, that he had put his son Crispus to death by a hasty credulity; and for the same reason Eusebius condemns the proceedings of Theodosius the Great, against the people of Thessalonica. "Doth our law judge man before he hear him, and know what he doth?" was Nicodemus' wise answer, to the Pharisees, John v. 31, and from hence we may explain our Saviour's answer to the woman taken in adultery, "Neither do I condemn thee" (vii. 11), which we are not to understand as if he thought her innocent, or any way approved of her actions here; not out of any ignorance of what was done, but that he discharged her at this time, as her accusers through self-consciousness had fled, and she had not been formally convicted of the crime. Ver. 8. Exalt not thyself; nor to sit in judgment with sinners. By hasty proceeding thou wilt probably make the matter; and if thou judgest right, it is but chance; and therefore thou wilt not escape censure, according to that of Seneque, Qui statuit aliquid, parte inaudita uterr, Aequumhic destatur, hancae quis crit. (In Medec.)

The sense may be, Sit not on the bench with corrupt judges; or, applied to private life, associate not nor con- suit with sinners; according to the advice of the psalmist (Ps. xcvii. 11-13) "Judge not, and thou shalt not be judged; condemn not, and thou shalt not be condemned: for whatsoever thy hands have done shall be done unto thee." Nothing is more common, says Na- zianzen, quoting this passage, than for men to interj in things that have no relation to them, and to set up them- selves as judges of things which they are ignorant of. God com- mand us to judge ourselves, and not others, and we al- ways do the contrary. We are at no trouble to know each other's defects, and to correct each other's faults, or their others, whom we know nothing of with certainty. Thus the wise man calls sitting in judgment with sinners, who make themselves such by an unwarrantable way of acting, fear of way of and injustice.

Ver. 10. My soul, meddle not with many matters: In any business or profession, a man should not undertake more than his time, condition, or the nature of his affaires is to be well managed, will admit of: for either they must be performed imperfectly and in haste, or some of them be neglected. Life is too short, our minds too limited, our bodies too weak, even a publican is limited, and must give up many things at once; for the surest way of doing nothing well, is to attempt a multiplicity of things together. It is a very just observation, Imprum quippe inventor ad singulara, dividatur aedificandorum labor, that although many men are proper in spiritual matters; when we are about any part of our duty, we must avoid, as much as possible, the dis- traction of business, and to meddle with the concerns of others, standing, when perplexed with several objects, is intent upon none of them as it ought, so the soul, divided between heaven and earth, and the cares of each, makes slow pro- gress, and is apt to faint; nor can the spirit of a man be used with a variety of worldly interfering cares, it will intrude themselves, and abate the fervour of devotion. We may also hence, as a reason of the same origin, be by God dividitur ab orientibus, the soul, through a multitude of secular business, or a con- tinual round of pleasures succeeding thick one upon an- other, is apt to forget herself, and her true concerns, and, in a manner, is thus the same time the trust reposed in us by others, and the duty which we owe to our own selves. "If thou meddle much (says the wise man), thou shalt not be innocent;" rather, thou shalt not come off harmless or unhurt; or, the reason immediately follows, sa (which I would here, with the oriental versions, render etiam), for if you "follow after;" i. e. attempt them, "thou shalt not obtain," i. e. because thou canst not manage them (being many), "neither shalt thou escape by fleeing," i. e. neither can you clear your hands of them: the consequence is, ye can get no good, but must get trouble, and may get mischief by them; or, as they render it, "Thou shalt not escape hurt." Bossuet's exposition is to the same effect, Multa implicitus negotiis multa pecunia, multa sectators velit capit, multa comites, expendit eo non notarum, sed amicorum, laborans, qui qvem cum sociis, non immunes inimici delecit; following a copy which read ab- ravor, and will it agree the Tigrane, Geneva, and Cover- dale's Vulgate, but the etiam of the other verse according to this reading is, Be not too intent upon getting riches; for it is so always dangerous to pursue them with too much eagerness, so, when gotten, they do not always satisfy, and often injure more than they are worth in their effects. For the providence of God governs all things, and if it is not his will that a man shall be rich, in vain does he run after them, they shall flee from him. If he allure him, then he shall not escape from it by any art or endeavours; but with the blessing of God, riches shall court a man, and shall come to him without his labour or seeking.

Ver. 11. There is one that laboureth, and taketh pains, and medleth haste, and is so much the more behind."

This withal temporum invenit, quod vobis, as a negative instance, is better preferred by the Vulgate, Ex co quod deest ilia; et testimoni et dolentes impius, et tanto negius non abundat. The latter part is but indifferently rendered; for poverty is, as a general rule, the highest blessing in the sight of God, Greek, by want, than by not abounding, and is even more proper and expressive than vanitatem repugnavit in the follow- ing verse. Senece well defines it, "Vapartus non ab eo segete, et co quod deest et tempus temporis labore; Luke xxi. 4, "ab eo foro evangelion abominabat," is evidently well translated by the Vulgate, Ex co quod deest ilia. The Vulgate properly inserts satisse, in the passage before us; for a wicked man's life is not to be ranked with those of the virtuous, "hastes to rise up early, and eat the bread of careful- ness," and employs the most usual and probable means, shall not find success, he proposes in the psalm, for want of the blessing of God going along with him, which alone maketh rich (Prov. x. 2). Messiahs of Port-Royal exposed this in a spiritual sense. The proud pharisae, in the gospel, whose life was irreproachable, who fasted at all the stated seasons, and paid tithes with the greatest exactness, but yet through his spiritual pride was rejected, is an instance of what is mentioned in this verse, as the happiness of God's people; according to many of the psalms fol- lowing, that a sinner like him, under a true poverty of spirit, who has a sense of his guilt, and acknowledges his own wickleness, has the best prospects of the kingdom of heaven, the pharisae did the publican, yet God looks favourably upon him, and will regard him the more for not daring to lift up his eyes to heaven; for the time, and with the same estimation he here excepts the breast he testifies his true penitence, and uses for mercy in the posture and language of the greatest of sinners. Ver. 15. Love, and the way of good works are from hym. The wise man, meditating on these, and seeing how they come from the Lord, such as prosperity, riches, health, long life, proceeds to show that spiritual goods, the endow- ments of the mind and the affections, are superior to the gifts of his bounty and liberality. Not only the knowledge of human hearts, and proficiency in science, but all virtues and good qualities, such as love, both to God and man, and God's success he proposes in the psalm, and good works, their natural fruit, come from the Lord. This verse and the following are omitted in the Vatican, and many other Greek copies, nor do they occur in all the La- tin ones. The Syrac has them, and the Complut, and this last probably our translators follow.

Ver. 16. Error and darkness had their beginning to- gether with sinners: and evil shall war with evil with them that are in error. God made man originally upright with the sense and knowledge of his duty clearly stamped upon his mind; he created him not unto error or sin, his will was perfect as his nature, and could have no better. "Error has been less able both to discern and practise his duty, and darkness and error are as it were natural to the whole species; but in sinners the sad consequences of the fall have more visited them, and the melancholy picture of them more early appear in them, that they may seem to be born with them, according to that of the psalmist, "The ungodly are froward even from their mother's womb, as soon as they are born they go astray and speak lies," Ps. lviii. 3. Though all men are born in sin, it is certain the wicked seem to have brought into the world with them worse dis- positions than others; whether owing to their natural tem- perament and constitution, or to the increasing the evil leaven through their own fault, they have the habit of sin so deeply rooted, as if it was even natural; instead of growing in grace, they pride themselves, and say they are, in their shame, and, through a long continuance in it, strengthen themselves, as the psalmist expresses it, in their wickedness; and so they grow hard in it, Contum- cent in malo. Vulg. and die without repentance or amend- ment. Ver. 17. The gift of the Lord remaineth with the gooly, and his favour is for them that be upright in heart. The gifts, or graces which God gives to pious and good men, are durable and permanent, nor is he easily induced to withdraw his loving-kindness, according to that of St. John, "They are written in heaven, to be fulfilled in due time," Com. xi. 29; i. e. he does not hastily revoke what he has granted, nor recall the favours which he has once vouch- safed, arbitrarily; but without reserving, if these two great truths, that all the good things of this life come from God, and that all the evils of It are many punishments sent by him, he adds here, that the gifts of God to the righteous are attended with happiness. This observation is nearly, and instantly, here his heart shall be renewed, to which the same proffered help, increase unto more ungodliness. This observation is equally true, if applied to spiritual favours. The gifts of the Holy Spirit, received into a heart well disposed, like the seed which fell upon good ground, take root and grow; the feeling mortifying, to be such is always increasing; for the good man is daily improving the talents received, is continually adding to his virtues, and proceeding from grace to grace, till he arrives at that height, which he himself, by the same proffered help, increase unto more ungodliness.

Ver. 18. There is that wasteth rich by his wantonness and pinching, and this is the portion of his reward; whereas he saith, I have abound rest, and now will not contraddle my goods, and yet he knoweth not what time shall come upon him, and that he must leave those things to others, and die: This is not rightly transcribed; it should be rendered, "This is the portion of his reward;" or, "This is all he getts by his pinching;" viz. be vó ἀνόητος abúlo, to say, or flatter himself, that he can now take his ease, and live upon what the hats of God to good men is insowing. Matt. vi. 2. Luke vi. 21. Phil. iv. 8. and by this writer, xiv. 6, upon the same subject. Horace too (epist. 1st. lib. i.), and other pure writers, use pretenia in the like sense. The purpose of life ( Luke xx. 37.) is much as resembles the description of this writer, who said to himself, "Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, take thine ease, eat, drink, and be merry." And the indifferent writer of the ancient sages assures us, "The night shall thy soul be required of thee; and then, whose shall those things be, which thou hast provided?" And it is observed of the rich miser here, that, notwithstanding his laying up great stock for futurity, he knoweth not what may happen, or how long time he shall have to live, or what opportunity of using them; nor considereth how uncertain life is, and that he may soon die, and leave his riches for others. In the Greek there is ἐπιτρέπειν ἰησοῦς ἔρρεσθαι; for death precedeth the leaving our goods to others. We have the like inverted order, Luke x. 15, 31. Solomon well saith, "Wisdom makest rich, and strengtheneth the hearts of the rich."-There is one alone, and there is not a second (ε. ν. no heir); he hath neither child nor brother, yet is there no end of his labour, neither is he satisfied with riches, neither saith he, For whom do I labour, and bereave my soul of good?" (Eccles. iv. 8). The observation of the son of Sirach is a consequence of the former verse, where he saith, the destruction; and blessed with success; here he shows, by way of contrast, that the good things which he sometimes bestows upon the wicked, who please themselves with the hopes of long enjoyment, are taken away in the twinkling of an eye, when from their own hands imagine themselves most at ease, and in the greatest security of the fruits of their labour, God suddenly takes from them what so much set their hearts upon, and takes away their stock, and account of it.

Ver. 20. Be steadfast in thy covenant. In the covenant made with God, in which all the Jewish posterity were included, as well as their forefathers, and each one personally, by undergiving the rule of circumcision, the seal of this covenant. The Israelitish first entered into the person of Abraham, the founder of their race (Gen. xv. 8); next, by that made with their fathers in the wilderness at mount Sinai (Exod. xix. 6—8); after, by the covenant with Joshua upon their entrance into the promised land (Josh. xvi. 3).; and, lastly, at their return from the captivity under Artaxerxes, by promises entered into before the captivity, renewed (Neh. ix. 33. x. 1, 2). The latter part of this verse, "Wax old in thy work," is rendered by the Vulgate, in opere mandatorum tuorum venesteres. This advice may consist in a good report of the Christian order, religious vows, pious promises, orthodox faith, &c. in all which, as an obligation is brought upon persons by their stipulations, so are they in conscience bound according to the good word of order of the government, to be steadfast in their covenant.

Ver. 21. Marvel not at the works of sinners:—for it is an ease of a wicked man, to make a poor man rich. Mt. so γραφεῖν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ ἀπόμειον, ὅσανότων is taken in a different sense here from what it is ver. 13. For besides the common sense of wondering, it may either be a proffered help, increase unto more ungodliness; and in this sense it is used, Job xxxii. 22. Eccles. vii. 31. xxxviii. 3. or, "Do not envy or desire the riches and prosperity of the wicked," or, "Be not offended at the works of sinners;" and thus it is used, Eccles. vi. 8. "When thou hast done eating质量问题，why should not he either exalt, envy, or be offended at the matter?" See also John vii. 21, where ἀνεμοῦ ὑπερηφάνειας is explained, ver. 23, by ἀπαλλαγή. And the repetition of the same observation, why should he not either exalt, envy, or be offended at the matter? because the power of God can immediately alter the state and condition of his creatures, and deal with them as he pleaseth, and in his own time, his will, and wisdom, and pleasure, to give a man wealth and riches, and increase of possessions, to express the swiftness of his dealing. He can suddenly overturn the high estate of a rich sinner, and, as suddenly, make his blood to flourish upon the gods. And the abrupt and abrupt manner of the speech of God, in Numbers xix. 22, 23, and Jacob, for his penity, with the blessings of plenty and abundance, which the law promised to the faithful and obedient.

Ver. 22. Say not, What profit is there of my service? and what good things shall I have hereafter? These seeme to be the words of a poor man in despair, pouring forth his complaint in some such melancholy strain: What reason is there for me to desire to live? Of what use am I in life, what advantage can I propose by a longer stay, or what hopes have I of bettering my condition? After all the care I have taken to give to my duty and satisfaction of God, and an inviolable attachment to his service, what good have I received from him in return? Am I the happier, or more at ease in my condition, have I received any benefit or moral advantage by my conversation and account? In the like strain Job's wife says to subdue his integrity. After all the misfortunes which are come upon thee, the loss of thy goods and children, which with such pain and difficulty thou hast gathered together, as a token of his displeasure, the fire of God falling from heaven, dost thou still retain thy integrity, and continue to serve him? Whence, in an uncertain state of things, can I except taking away your life, as a return for all your fruitless services!" Curse God, and die." The speech of Job's wife is indeed but short in the English version; but the curios, by consulting the LXX, and the Septuagint, show that a great length, may see enough of her outrageous temper. Tobit's wife, too, insults the goodness of her husband in the same scolding manner. Where are thine aims, and thy righteous conduct? If thou hast been, or are now, in trouble and in distress, have the charities which you have exercised all thy life profit you nothing; they have not kept you from blindness, which deprives you of all comfort,—behold, thou and all thy pious works are laughed at, and every one is sensible of, and makes sport with, thy disgrace.—Imitate not, says this pious writer, such idle persons in their profane talk, entertain such evil blasphemy against him, or to murmur at the methods of his providence. He will reprove your service and faithfulness, when in what manner he wills and how he wills and to whom he wills, and you may be assured of a future and better recompense. In the next verse we have a rich, insolent person described, triumphing in his imagined self-sufficiency, as above the reach and account of all his vassals and servants. As the life of present joys, and quite indifferent and unconcerned about what may happen to him hereafter, like the worldling described in the gospel, an equal monument of weakness and folly.

Ver. 25. In the day of prosperity there is a forgetfulness of affliction; and in the day of affliction there is no more remembrance of prosperity. The author here replies to and reproves the usual habits of the rich, who usually attending each extremity. He begins with the last first, that the conduct of the conceited rich man is entirely owing to his forgetfulness, and want of remembering the condition of the poor, and the circumstances of his own case, and the great power and greatness, which God delights to overthrow and confound, when men affect to be independent, and are regardless of his power and providence. On the other hand, the poor have a sense of present enjoyments, and quite indifferent and unconcerned about what may happen to him hereafter, like the worldling described in the gospel, an equal monument of weakness and folly. vice, and it is worthy of remembrance: In die bonorum ne minus amantur quae sequuntur singula, quam etiam eis annis bonis; but thus prudently managing the two different states, by reflecting often that a change may come, we shall avoid pride, and not sink into despair.

Ver. 28. Judge none blessed before his death; for a man shall be known in his children. St. Chrysostom very highly commends the son of Siraach for this fine reflection, in terms of great honour and respect, Hom. 51. in S. Eustath. Antioch, which he expatiates upon after his literal meaning, viz. that, upon the truth that the uncertainty of human happiness, have been almost unanimous in subcribing to this aphorism. That none can be pronounced happy before his death; for the most glorious and happy part of life may be blighted by the concluding stroke, and the last period may sully the beauty and glory of all that went before. This truth Cresens, when his boasted happiness was depopulated, could not bear it, his eyes, quae in hac vita fuit, erat at leavis sensible of; and acknowledged before Cyrus the justice of Solon's judgment, who, from a sense of the event, and before he died, said he had learned that a man's happiness could only be determined truly by the circumstances of his death. This writer rests the verdict of a man's happiness upon the condition of his children, their prosperity, their kind and humane disposition, and making up good or evil dispositions, and moral conduct in life; for the judgment of a man's felicity is not always to be determined by himself; if his children be in want and come to misfortunes, or, which is worse, if they prove extravagant and vicious, we account such a father truly unhappy, and his grave, to which their evil conduct will have contributed, will be attended with deep sorrow. When degenerate and unworthy sons succeed to a father of distinguished merit and character, and by their misconduct or weaknessully the inheritance, and weeps over the monuments of their great progenitors, and is convinced that misery and unhappiness can overtake a man even in his old age. We are equally affected with applause about the education of their children, and to give them, as it were, a second birth by the nurture of their souls, it must doubtless be an uncommon affliction to them, if, in the midst of unbounded hopes and wishes, and their children and family are dishonoured by their evil conduct; especially as the world is generally so ill-versed as to ascribe the misfortunes of children to the negligence of their parents, and to suspect even their virtue on that account. According to the observation of St. Ambrose upon the place, Unusquisque in novissimis suis agnoticiis, et in his suis substantiis, et canis filii, filiae instituit, et disciplinasdamnum esse; si quidem ad neglegientiam patris referatur dissolution illorum (De bono Mortis, cap. 8). Many are the instances, both in sacred and profane history, of children degenerating from the blessing of unceasing parental care. The destruction of their generations, and thereby disturbing their domestic peace, and making their exit less glorious and comfortable. Of the several instances that Moses, the lawgiver, gives, as instances of this great, and the wise Antoninus, gave a check to the great name of his father. These instances are sufficient to show that the measure of our happiness is not always to be taken from the present alone, for we cannot possibly regard their unworthiness, was a great alloy to his honour and comfort. The like may be said of Solomon, whose glory and happiness were much ruffled by the conduct of Rehoboam, as Herodotus's fame was by that of his son Mas- nasses. Amongst the Romans, the Reputation of the brave Germanicus was eclipsed by the succession of an indolent and unmilitary person whom the wise Antoninus, gave a check to the great name of his father. upon families with an air of confidence and respect, but his design is only, as it appears, to pry into their secrets, and to expose them, Scire volunt secreta domus, aequi indole timent. Grotius thinks hic reprobatur a corrupt reading, and puts instead of it supposierit, i.e. perdues, which indeed is applicable to the Vulgate. Ver. 31. And in things worthy praise will be labe upon them. Most editions have in et quos, but the true reading is in quos. Some of their translators follow, or, volunt, with the Vulgate authors. Et in ecclesiis imperat, paulatim, i.e. he will spy out some fault, or lay something to the charge of the elect; the best and most innocent cannot escape him, for he is applied to persons as things (as being generally omitted), though our version renders otherwise. Ver. 34. Receive a stranger into thy house, and he will give thee seven sons. Or, as Vulgata &c., et salubritatem in locis suis, either out of other's house, or thy goods and possessions. In this latter sense the Vulgate takes it, Abalambes te a suis propriis; and the Targum version, Cum perturbatione subiectum, et ex suis possessionibus; διατρεφοντας δε τραπεζιας is badly rendered by the Vulgate, Subverte to in turbine. The meaning rather is, he will open your house, and distract the peace of, i.e. the temple, by the disturbances which he will occasion. The sense is the same with ver. 29. One cannot but observe a remarkable paronomasia in the words ἀνακλασις ἀδελφον.—see Ex. 16.5, Deut. 26.12, Prov. 28.5, and Jer. 16.6. This is an object of frequent occurrence in private life daily, are Massaum, king of Numidi- din, who, receiving the Juraphia into his familiarity and house, occasioned such disturbances as to prove his ruin. The like may happen to those who entertain strangers, when he return, stole his fair wife Helen, and kindled thereby the long war between the Greeks and the Trojans. Herod, too, asked the children of Herod, and the Virgin marriage; of Mariamne, seized their kingdom, and was the ruin of the Asmonean race (see his life in Josephus). CHAP. XII. Ver. 1. When thou wilt do good, know to whom thou dost it; so shalt thou be thanked for thy benefit. This is an object of great importance in our Christian character, wherein we are advised not to receive a stranger into our house; or, for the most part, without knowing it, one admires a worthless, treacherous, designing person, who will either pay into the receiver's hands, or meddle with what is private and secret, or attempt improper and indecent liberties in it, and thereby give much trouble, and occasion great disturbance. The advice here in is, to make a prudent choice of the persons to whom we do the favour of an entertainment, or other good turn, that we may have the pleasure of obliging worthy objects, and such as will have the gratitude to thank us for our kindness, and the ingenuity to be sensible of the obligation. Or the direction here may be, that when there is a contest about disposing of a post of some trust and consequence, or of a gift and benefit of value and weight, the candidate should not be considered exclusively for his worth, or favour,—in such a competition to deliberate on the merit of each, and prefer one that is most worthy, or has merit, as is said here, or, he who is least in misery, if this is extended to charity, as it is most commonly understood, and with which the context seems to favour, it then points out the great discernment and emotion which are necessary to be used, who know who are real and proper objects. The direction does not seem to include common and daily charities, which offer themselves continually, almost in every quarter, wherein one need not be so scrupu- lous as to extenuate strictly into the merit or the particular wants and circumstances of all that apply to us; lest, if we are too nice and exact in our inquiry, we lose fre- quent opportunities of exercising our charity, and, being too wary in the distribution of our alms, draw upon our- selves the murmurs and curses of the poor; but rather to be inquisitive after and assist distressed merit or per- cepted needs more agreeable to the context. Ver. 2. Give to the poor, and out of the fourteenth part. It is of charity done to such worthy objects as these we are to understand our Saviour, when he says, "I was hungry and ye gave me meat;" and not to imitate (says St. Jerome) the custom of many in the world, who are unwilling to distribute to the neces- sities of the saints, and are regardless of the real wants and distress of those around them, rather than to be chearful of their own plenty; which would make many distressed families happy, upon entertainments and diversions. Ver. 3. There is no good come to him that is always oc- cupied with feeding the appetite, which is never sufficient; he will not seem rightly translated. By the disjunction it looks as if two different persons were here spoken of, whereas the fault only of the uncharitable sinner is hinted at. The sense is, the sinner who liveth to no purpose, who cannot do good; charity being an appointed means of procuring God's favour and reconciliation, and an atonement that shall be acceptable in his sight. Ver. 4. The Lord shall give the seventh year to the poor, and he shall not seem to take it. Non est ei bene, qui assiduus est in malis, et elenemosynas non dant. Alms-giving was accounted by the Jewish doctors one of the essential parts of their religion, and the same is observed by the sacred writers, by the name of righteousness. As by this merciful appointment God has shown his tender regard for even the nicest of his creatures, so the Jewish synag-ogue was very careful to execute the orders of God in this respect. We learn from their writers, that in every synagogue there were two treasury chests; one for poor strangers, and the other for their own poor. Those that were charitably inclined put their alms into these chests at their coming into the synagogue to pray, thereby to recom- mend their devotions, and forward the holy work they met about. Or, in cases of desolation of their children, and cases of calamity called for it, they made collections, upon which occasions the ruler of the synagogue gave orders to ask everybody for his charity. And the primitive Chris- tians were so very zealous in the exercise of this work, that they were seen among them, nor did they extend their benevo- lence to their own poor only, but even to those of their enemies. Ver. 5. Give to the godly man, and help not a sinner. Do well unto him that is lowly, but give not to the ungodly: &c. The former part is repeated, ver. 7, not by any mistake, but to inculete, probably, that in the distribution of our charities we should be careful to give to the godly, and never to those objects on whom we bestow it. The godly and lowly man (for they are equivalent terms in scripture), as most deserving of our help, is most entitled to it; and we have this rather comfort and encouragement, that he will not charge our kindness, but be thankful to us for all the good offices which he receives, and to God for every benefactor he thus arises him up. But the sinner will be so far from making any acknowledgment of our kindness, or indeed any good use of it, that probably he may strengthen himself in his wickedness thereby, or abuse our kindness, and apply the means to his own perdition. And therefore, in the following part of the verse, the advice is, 'Hold back thy bread, lest he overmatch thee thereby.' Frollic panes illa dam, Vulg. Which not only recedes from God, but gives him no alms, and does not give any worthless object, in his indigence, as we do others in the same condition, but that we should discourage others from bestowing charity upon him; for charity is a means to make him and his character, and how unworthy he is of their favour and charity, and not suffer one of so little worth to receive what others want as much, and deserve much better. From hence it appears, that the duty of almsgiv- ing, as it was enjoined and practised in the times of this writer, was more restrained than under the gospel. For under the Israelitish person, though he be as odious to us, as a Jew to a Samaritan, is to be esteemed our neighbour, and as such to be relieved by us; nor are our good offices and kindness to be refused even unto sinners, as the merit of persons is to be no rule of charity, and the distinctions of benevolence to those that least deserve it is the very method of the divine goodness, and as such is recommend- ed in scripture to our imitation. I shall only observe, that the case of the rich man and the poor Lazarus was more like this. The sinner, in the scriptures, is often called the im- pious, or παραλληλος, of the parables, &c., of the word εγκοινων, τον μικρον υδρα ουκ ευρεθη, is very singular, but agreeable to the Attic dialect. There are several instances of this wish, viz. Matt. 5.44, 6.19, 18. 20. 22. 23. 25. 31. 34. 35. 36. 44. John ii. 22. iv. 50. i Cor. vi. 19. But Eph. iii. 10, εκατονταυτας ἐκ τοπων ἀνθρωπων ἐπηκοινωνε· ὁ δὲ, ἀλλ' ἐκ νυμφης, comes nearest this passage (see more instances, Glass, Philol. c. 9. 2. 3.). Ver. 6. For the most High hateth sinners, and kerpeth them against the mighty day of their punishment. This last sentence is omitted in the Vatican edition. The Vul- gate transposes it, and joins it to the end of the fourth verse, rendering. Ovidius eis in diem vindicta, without the epitaph. The "mighty day of punishment" is equivalent to ἡ μεγάλη ἡμέρα τῆς δίκης, and is, according to the best MSS, ἡ μεγάλη ἡμέρα τῆς δίκης for ἡ μεγάλη ἡμέρα τῆς δίκης, a perfect passage among the Greek answers to resonari and custodiri among the Latins, and are all of them elegantly used of death. The Psalms in the Vulgate are often instances of the same. Thus Prov. xvi. 4, psalmtáντε ἤ διψανες εἰς τῶν ἁμαρτωλῶν, an expression similar to that of this writer (see also Acts xxv. 21). Ovid too has Prene crucianda reservoir.

Ver. 10. Never trust thy enemy. Nothing thy present nor qondam enemy, because he will not soon forget former injuries received, but will revenge himself when opportunity offers. Nothing is to be done upon the spur and without delay. Only suspending, according to that of Horace:

— Male etc.

Gratia necquaque colit, et resstrictum (Epist. lib. i. ep. 3.). He that is hurt and injured with difficulty forgets it, and he that hath done the wrong cannot easily persuade himself that the other has forgotten it, so always suspects him; he hates him, because the injured person is a constant reproach to him whenever he meets or thinks of himself, and imagining him to resent the first injury, is always ready to return a second. Mr. Pope has excellently described this,

"Forwitness to the injured does belong.

But he ne'er perceives he has done the wrong.

For like a foul match, so is his wickedness." The ancients, speaking of envy, malice, and hatred, often make use of the comparison of dance to display their ill effects. Thus Horace:

Hius exercet submissius, hac est doro ergo men.

And Martial:

— Nonique erugiae captor, qui recid ceptique datum est.

The sense is, that as brass (Xαδός, in the Greek, aramen tum in the Vulgate), though you take so much pains to rub it clean and polish it, will quickly again contract a green so much as a green so commonly called verdigris, and will hide his evil dispositions and lurking intention for a time, but will sooner or later return to his old rancour and wickedness; for though he knows how to assemble to advantage, yet the root of malice and bitterness being still in him, it will be sure to put forth. Ver. 11. Though he humble himself, and go crouching, yet take good heed, and beware of him, i.e., such a designing person will put on a friendly appearance, will look humbly, and act submissively, that the person on whom he intends to seduce and vent his malice may lie more the open to his premeditated assault. He is therefore more the more to be suspected for this piece of artifice, and to be looked upon as concealing some design of mischief under such a crouching behaviour; he only wants an opportunity, when he will stab and poison them, and by so doing, effectually, for the disagreeable submissions he has been obliged to, so much against his inclination. The psalmist describes such a designing and dangerous person in the self-same terms, "he falleth down and bendeth himself, that the poor may fall into the hands of his captains." (Ps. x. 11.) Nor is such a prudent caution inconsistent with the best manners, which call upon us, if we would be preserved from the loss of our friends to know and can judge how far each may be trusted and depended on, and deserves to have a greater or less share in our esteem and confidence: and with respect to our enemies, prudence does not hold us bound to be too near or too great a friend to be observed, whose pretended friendship is only for their own advantage. Ecclesiastical history furnishes us with many instances of the constant, and holy female, being upright and well-meaning themselves, and suspending no harm from others' afflicted vicinity, have been deceived, imposed upon, and ruined, by the artifice of false and hypocritical manners.

"Sich aewon Maximi, the eynlphilosopher, having gained upon by his complaisance, address, and inimiation, the use this subile impostor made of the friendship indulged him was, to devery lye, and to seduce him to their purpose, as it were as his rival, and to endeavour to despise him of his dishonour; concealing his ambitious design under the deceitful veil of being his disciple and admirer (Cave's Lives of the Fathers). As this is often the case when a relation of one of the author's observation in this and the following verse, to take good heed and beware of so infuriating persons, who by their hunting, and pleasing, and seeming innocent, view only to their own gain or promotion; who, however humble they appear, mean to stand up in thy place, to seize upon thy office or dignity, the καθαρισμόν, and hope to rise by thy destruction."

Thou shalt be unto him as if thou hadst wiped a looking-glass, and thou shalt know that his rust hath not been altogether wiped away. The Vulgate and Jerome's bible are thus translated. The present rendered the fire of thy eyes, 'erver, as it is, seems to be corrupt, and yet it is in all the editions: I would either read seriam, or with Gratian, occurit, cognosces non esse pane philum eunnemium, and thus Tacitus, cavendos esse inquisitos comminucatos (Annal. lib. vi.). This writer here alludes to mirrors of metal, generally of brass, which were used in ancient times; of which the was the lever of brass and Exod. viii. 8. The nature of there is such, that when once the rust has eaten into them, though they are wiped carefully, and all endeavours used to remove it, it will be permanently returning, and all the polishing of the mirror is only as a film can never be gotten out, and quite spoils the polish of the mirror, and by that means renders it useless. Such is the concealed hatred of a false friend, reducing the innocent, which is firmly riveted, will soon break out again, and you will perceive and experience his old rancour.

Ver. 12. Yet will pity a charmer that is bitten with a serpent, or any such as come with high words boasts?" (Psalm iv. 1, 2) Vulpis may either mean wild beasts in general, or serpents and vipers, and such like venomous creatures. There was a sort of spiritual physiognomy among the Hebrews, Calmet calls them enchanters, who took upon them to charm serpents, and hinder them from stinging, or to cure those that were stung, by enchantments and spells. It does not appear there was any such office as a serpent charmer, of the sort of the bite of a venomous animal, such as modern times have discovered; and therefore these enchanters often failed of success, and the charmer, however he may profess to charm, and may thank themselves for their ruin; or from the context we may suppose the meaning rather to be, that as one does not pity those who boast of their skill to charm serpents, and have the rashness often to handle them, if they are at last bitten by them, because they voluntarily run into such danger, and vainly thought to escape that harm by art which St. Paul once did by miracle; so neither is any pity due to them who trusts to a seeming and friend, one suddenly taken into favour from an inveterate enemy, that person who one knows not thoroughly, or has reason to know cannot be trusted, to expect any good from him for the future; to adopt such a one, upon whom so little dependence can be fixed, either as a companion or friend, is courting danger, and betraying one's own safety."

Ver. 16. An enemy speaketh sweetly with his lips, but in his heart he imagineth how to throw thee into a pit; he will weep with his eyes, but if he find opportunity, will not be defrauded with a pitiful countenance. A hypocritical enemy, a deceitful, a harmful, a relentless, a cruel enemy, a false pretender, a loathsome parasite, who flattereth with his lips, but imagineth mischief in his heart. The psalmist describes such, when he says: "They give good words in their lips, but dessemble in the heart." They have honey upon their tongue, and the poison of asps under it, which Plautus well expresses,

In melte lingue sunt sine atque eratones Lacteae: corda solius sunt atque acerbo acuto.

(Graec. prescript.)

Believe, therefore, neither their words, looks, nor even their tears; they are false and designing, the tears of a crocodile, which aims to devour its prey the next moment; "Fides a falso lacrimis, esse ante amplexo semen, extraque sub nomine amicitiae, et officii simulacrum oleatutur," says Cicero. It was by her false tears that Samson's wife deceived him, and got from him the secret of the riddle. He solved it, but immediately afterward, "sacrae tur," and by the same artifice Delilah stole the intelligence from him wherein his mighty strength lay. Against such sort of deceivers, who have the art of moving by their tears, Odes, let us be on our guard.

Neque psallamus lacrimas movecre, ecavo;
Ut frero, octo erudiri suos.

(De Remis. Amor.)

It was thus that Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, slew all those Jews who were marching to join Gedaliah, by going in a friendly manner to meet them, by disconcerting freely with them, and treacherously sweeping all along as he went (Jer. xii. 6, 7). By which artful deceit he prevailed to stay numbers of them, and cast their dead bodies into the pit at Gedaliah. Solomon gives the like description of such dangerous disssemblers, "He that sateth, dissemblers with his lips, and layeth up deceit within him; when he speaketh fair, believe him not, for there are seven abominations in his heart; one is against the heavens, and he concealeth that to surprise and ruin thee. The rendering of the LXX. is much stronger and closer to our purpose, ἐν τούτῳ ἀθιαστικὴ, ἐν εὐαγγελίᾳ, καὶ ἐν αἴσθησιν αὐτοῦ, ἐν τῷ ἑαυτῷ ἐναντίον ἐγκακίᾳ ἀλήθειας, αἱ ἀδικίαι αὐτοῦ ἐν τῷ καρδίᾳ αὐτοῦ, καὶ αὐτὸς εἰς τὸν ἐναντίον. Or, as we have before translated it, "if he be the first officiously to intrude himself, even before your friends and acquaintance." Ver. 15. He will shake his head, and clap his hands, and whisper much, and change his countenance: i. e. He will shake his head at thee by way of contempt and insult (see Eccles. xiii. 7): clap his hands, in token of his rejoicing at the ruin and woe which befall thee; whisper many words, that the sense of them may be secret, by insinuations and whispers, and be quite another person from what he appeared to be; or rather, the man will then show himself in his true colours.

CHAP. XIII.

Vers. 2. But enjoin not thyself above thy power—and have no fellowship with one that is mightier and richer than thyself: for how agree the kettle and the earthen pot together or for the one be smitten against the other, it shall be broken.

When thou choosest a friend, choose an equal, one of the like state and condition with thyself. In friendship, as in marriage, too, a great difference of circumstances, age and condition is dangerous, and often the occasion of unhappiness; marriage amis, is the poet's advice in friendship, as in marriage, too. Adverse conditions are, for the most part, in marriage. The friendship and confidence of great folks flatter indeed the ambition of persons of a lower rank, they think it an honour to be distinguished by them and get great advantage to themselves by such an acquaintance, but at length they are convinced of their folly, and have cause to repent of their intimacy. According to that of Horace,

Ducis inesperis cultura potestas amici,

They propose, indeed, to raise themselves, and make their fortunes by paying their court to great men; but they are often disappointed in their pursuit, sacrificing in the mean time to petty fancies, and looking with envy on the great, but splendid slaves. Nuncupum est fideles cum potente societas, in the motto of one of Plautus's fables, which he illustrates also by the instance of the kettle and earthen pot. Odes, gives an illustration too, in Esop, and upon the same occasion, near three hundred years before this writer, to which probably he alludes. The man of wealth and power encourages the weaker vessel in the language of the brazen pot, Ne mutnas, cuorbo enim ego in alius cupidius esse possim, Plautus, expresses the same moral, Collisio certe cum miso fiat petico, decertum mili est a te disjungi; for when either the rich and the poor, the strong and the weak, engage together, the weak are easily overthrown, and the poor are forced to submit to their will, and sometimes their liberty and lives. Plautus illustrates the iniquity of an unequal match by simile of an ass sinking under too great a burden.

Veni mihi in mentem, aenea hominum divisio
Parsica: nam melies simulacrum parum pueriperum Nunc est illius locasene meani vixi, tu mentem venit, Te hevertis in me, columbiae meta, in me necips
Ut ounue neconue ferre pariter, jecasum aeneum in ivo.

Where the poet, like our author, compares an unequal engagement to an over-heavy burden, and makes such a match to be no less a folly, than for a contemptible animal to vie with one of an overgrown size, he gives an instance of the danger of having fellowship with one too mighty, and depending upon such one for safety and protection, in what happened to Ahas, king of Judah; he called the king of Egypt, he was forced to submit to him, and made an alliance with him; the consequence was, he secured himself against Pekah, king of Israel, and Rezin, king of Syria; but he delivered himself into the hand of a more powerful enemy, and his power was so diminished that he expresses it, distressed him, but strengthened him not (2 Kings xvi. 7. 2. Chron. xxviii. 20).

Vers. 3. Be not errant, and, yet he threateneth: the poor is wronged, and he must entertain also.
The rich man adds one injury to another, evil and abusive language to some acts of violence and oppression. A rich man invades the poor man's property, and is so angry as if he was the sufferer. The poor man is forced to submit to, and even ask pardon of, the rich oppressor, and to ask pardon as if he was the aggressor. This passage seems to be an imitation of Prov. xvi. 23, "The poor useth entreaties, but the rich answereth roughly." The reading of the Greek here is very different; that followed by our translators is the true reading, which is confirmed by history and experience. Men are often obliged, in the neighbourhood of the great, and find it to be their best way, to buy their peace by submission, and to compound for and dispense with lesser injuries, to get vent more and greater. One reads of fathers not only disregarding their grief and concern before a merciless tyrant, for the death of some of their children, but even flattering, and commending him to appease his heart, and to prevent him on his spare the rest. Thus Seneca, " Potentiorum injuria bilari vulnus, non putierum taurum ferendae suae" (Epist. xii. 218). Iren. 1. 15. 18. The same thing is well described in the end state of a poor man under the merciless power of an overgrown imperious person, in the following lines:

—Libertas paupertis hee est,
Palatiae uultu, et parum concussa arafort,
Ut in arida et tumida deserta indecet.

Vers. 7. And he will shame thee by his means, until he have drawn thee deep vice or thieve, and at the last he will laugh thee to scorn.

Though you may think it a favour to be invited often to his table, yet by the frequency and magnitude of his entertainments he will at length ruin you; for if you attempt to return his civilities, and treat him in the like manner, with the same elegance that he is used to, as perhaps you will expect two or three such treats, it will occasion much expense, and hurt your circumstances in the end, when he will laugh at your pretension for pre- tending to vie with men of fortune. The author seems to allude to Prov. xxiii. 1, which in the rendering of the LXX. comes near this place, ἐν ταῖς ἐκκλασίαις ἐντείνεται διὰ τοῦτο ἐπομενεῖ: ὡς το σοφιστικὴ συνοικία, ὡς το τοιαύτης κρίσει. Or the sense may be, He will invite you to his entertainments, and make much of you for a little visit; and when he has got what he wants from you, and drawn out of you what he has occasion for; he will afterward laugh at you and pretend not to know you. Vers. 8. Beware that thou be not deceived, and brought down in thy folly. Ἐυ φοβοῦσθαι ὑπὸ τοῦ; i. e. Take heed that thou be not reduced, or suffer in thy fortune by leasing and entertaining false names, and false significes (see Esth. ix. 19). Though a grateful temper, and an endeavours to show civilities to a benefactor, are to be commended; yet the ambition of entertaining great men is so odious to many, as that they will be bought sighted to consider, or the vain eflat of having such grand acquaintance, is to be condemned in one of a private fortune, and is an instance of his imprudence and restless spirit; for that throne be brought down by his simplicity,1 or imprudence, 2
But the Vulgate also follows.
We have in these, and some following pages, a very fine image and explication of the behaviour of the rich and powerful towards such as are beneath them, and depend upon them. One sees the absoluteness of their will, laughting at the power of others, and even at the nature of the things they have reaped to a state of indigence; and then they abandon them in their distress, and make them the subject of their contempt and railing. Those, therefore, says a writer, with much justice, in the case of our first parents, God, pay not men such golden idols; as fast assures them, that in their state of humble they are greater than the lords of the world, and that they degenerate from the nature of their spirit if their ambition carries them to aspire after any thing but heaven.

Ver. 9. If thou be invited of a mighty man, withdraw thyself, and so much the more will be this prudent advice, to not refuse such invitation, which would be looked upon as rudeness and ill-breeding, but to accept it modestly, to behave decently, to go but rarely, and not to make oneself obnoxious. Probably this is Prov.
17. 1. "Withdraw thy feet from thy neighbor's house, lest he be weary of thee, and so hate thee." Where the Interlinear version has, Rum for person; the Adversus auctoritas, that such a conduct is advisable with respect to private persons, our neighbors, much more are reserved and caution to be observed as to frequency of visits, and a proper distance and reserve to be kept in such cases. Experience confirms this advice of the wise man, to retire from rather than run after persons of figure and distinction, because they usually despise such as press upon them too much; they grew tired of them, and though their politeness keeps them from saying so, they esteem such as officious impertinents. We should therefore approach them, says an ancient writer, as we do the sea, the too monstrous and too deep-water, and at a distance, so as to receive no benefit from it. As we should not be too forward and bold in intruding, so neither should we be so negligent of our own interest, as to sacrifice an acquaintance, which may some time or other be beneficial to us; neither offend by our constant presence, and over fondness to be remembered by them, nor yet by so long an absence, as to occasion our being forgotten and overlooked by them. We should be dutiful and respectful to them, but not servile or object; neither too much admire nor too much fear the persons of the great, so as not to appear weak and easy: this has been the case of many eminent persons in the church, and even some of the great lights of it, as appears from ecclesiastical history, who, having received the crown of the laurels, and the crown of the lion, have not been sufficiently upon their guard in treating with persons of great authority and power; but, through promiscuous and unequal favour, have deprived the defence of the truth and been surprised or rather forced into resolutions, which they have reported afterward.

Ver. 11. Afect not to be made equal unto him in talk.
The all printed copies read here, ῥή τον τινα κοινογηνοῦν. The true reading undoubtedly is, ῥή τον τινα κοινογηνοῦν (see Græbe's Proleg. tom. ii. cap. 2). The reason for such a reserved note on such before great persons, follows in the next verse, "Cruelly he will lay up thy words." The copy which our translators follow, I presume, has been corrupted by post-gigantification into ῥή τον τινα κοινογηνοῦν, which, if it has any sense, means, that he that guards not his tongue, watches not over his words in such company, wants pity for himself, and is unmindful of his even interest. And so Calmet expounds it, Cebii qui ne garde pas sa langue, on qui ne veille pas sur son discours, manque de pitie pour soi-meme. But the sense given in conjunction with the following, is most probable, which by Vulgatis, Immittis animus illius conservabit verba tui; i.e., If a prince or person of great power takes occasion, from your words, of jealousy, mistrust, or inference against you, think not that for a time he will afterward show you that he treasured up what was spoken, and give you a proof of his resentment. He will use you here ill, and perhaps imprison you; but whatever treatment you meet with of this sort, ascribe it to your own imprudence, it being too open and unguarded. Thus Tiberius used to do, Verba, vitriis in crinium detorqueas, reconcludas, ut Tacitus observes of him. And Sejanus, According to the same Plutarch, in the Life of Augustus, Olon in longum jacuabat, quae reconderat, nactusque procerem.

Ver. 13. Observe, and take good heed, for thou walkest in perils of thy tongue; things, spoken in the sleep.
The first sentence, as it is in our version, contains a necessary piece of advice and caution as to our general conduct, but the Vulgate confines it hearing and seeing, and as to our on this. But
And indeed some Greek copies have, ἀποκριθεὶς καὶ ἀποκαλύπτεις εἰς τὸν δεκατιτόν; i.e. Listen to a great man when he is talking, with much attention and respect, and you will have with such as are not, for to think, or prying into his affairs; be as watchful and cunning in not being any ways surprised, as one that beguiles him asleep, and is awoke, and finds himself in danger, and this from the Lord, is very insidious and sly. As intimation betrays neglect and contempt, so too much attention in you, and too great a curiosity, may raise jealousy and suspicions; becoming in the way of life, sentiments, princes, and men of great men, the grand secret of behaviour is, says Calmet, to have ears and hear not, eyes and see not, and to anger and not speak. To hear everymighty man nothing to pass over in appearance to be quite absent; to make just reflections on men and things, and seemingly to mind nothing, and he wholly in-curiously as to everything, and not to take any conducts, if thrown into the hands of a man friends, will be sure to to create him no enemies. This masterfully stroke in politics, and many others which might be mentioned, show this writer's nice spirit, his delicate discernment of conduct, and the justness of his observations made on both; and contains a higher sense, and more agreeable to the text, than the common interpretations mentioned by him, and which is very obscure and spoken.

Ver. 17. What fellowship hath the wolf with the lamb? so the sinner with the godly?" The wise man having taken those of the incongruous and improper carriage, the rich, the weak with the powerful, the slavery of courts, and the proper carriage to be observed towards great men, he farther confirms his first thesis, that all persons ought to be equal, and not to think of the rank and condition, by instancing in the godly and the sinner, who can much less than the other maintain friendship, and keep up an intimacy together, because their way of life, sentiments, inclinations, manners, and conduct, are disagreeable to each other, as dissuadant as those of the wolf and the lamb; the one innoctent, gentle, and amiable; the other made dangerous, and sundered into factions, and by the sinner's defects, whose passions are so widely different. Thus, Cicero, Ob nunnam altam causam boni impudis, impoisti bonis amicitia esse non possum, nisi quieta est inter eos, omnino maxime potest, nonum et ordinumque distantia (Do Amicitia). The cension of the wolf and the lamb, whose union is inconsistent in nature, is often made use of by Hippocrates, and other writers, to show the impossibility of a friendship improperly contracted. And when Isaiah, prophetically show to the blessed effects of the gospel, and the great tchange it should produce in men and things, he calls dwelling and feeding of the world, the rest have joined the wolf and the lamb together, he introduces that allusion to intimate, that the true religion should reconcile, and make one, those whom the vices of heathenism, which had so variously divided and divided the world, the most separated in interest, inclination, religion, and climate, should then happily unite, and compose one church (Isa. xi. 9, 10). In scripture, the God of the light and vision, and Believers and their respective natures, is well represented by the metaphor of light and knowledge:"
he adds, that if a man make shoes of the skin, the dogs will not follow them; for it is a standing proverb among the Hebrews, that whoever commits the sin of this irreconcilable hatred between them; he says, that the hyena is a voracious animal, that imitates the voice and vomiting of a man, and by that artifice exhausts the poor man, who is too open, when they approach the very shadow of the hyena: others say, that it stupifies and makes them giddy, and that the flesh of it, when eaten is good against the bite of a mad dog. Bochart enumerates to the devouring, and the poor them, Manus aguie Arabum rugas (Hieron. lib. ii. cap. 56). The Arabic version of this place changes the hyena into another quadr uped, Qua tempore cavi sunt omnes; which he shows to be a mistake. The Vulgate, too, wholly omits the hyena, nor does it substitute any other animal to form the comparison, Quam communicatio sancti homini ad cupiditatem: the text may, however, be thus rendered: the true scriber not understanding what the hyena meant, and therefore changed it for homini, and afterward added sancto, to preserve the opposition between holy and impure persons; and Salm. 12. 4 we find the same. Greek copies all agree in daten, and countenance the literal, rather than a metaphorical sense; which probably was a musing spirit of the translator, a mistake, as this be the author introduces this simile to intimate, that the rich are often great oppressors, that they swallow up the needy, and make the poor of the land to fly' (Amos vii. 9). That what a lion is in the fow, as it is followed in the next verse, is such an over-powering, powerful person, with respect to the helpless and poor.

Ver. 22, 23. When a rich man is fallen, he hath many kindred; But the rich man is caressed and courted: he has instantly all endowments and qualifications, all good qualities both of body and mind. Thus the poet:

Ver. 22. Blessed is he that hath not slipped with his mouth, and is not prickled with the multitude of sins. Our translators for several editions, after the last, and of the most celebrated and approved, have omitted the word queri, the more general reading is, ἐὰν ὁ ἄρσιν, in tristitia deflet; as the Vulgate has it. And so the marginal reading of the American version, which does not mean, as some have interpreted, that a man is happy who is not afflicted with sordidness, and in his distress, and for his sins, for he is so afflicted, and has a true inward compunction on that account, has the heat tido, and prospect of, blessedness; but the sense of the whole verse is, that the man is happy, and highly to be commended, who, when poverty or any outward calamity, or heavy upon him, betrays no impatience, nor charges God falsely by his despondency against him or his dispensations of his providence, nor, by a criminal dejection and sinful despondency, utters any thing reflecting upon his honour or justice. This is the meaning of the text, and the most obvious sense of the word, which gives the neat and proper signification needed by all translators, and the author's sentiments on the occasion, particularly in ver. 21—23, where the antithesis is elegant, and well preserved. I shall not quote the version of the American, which fully expressed the καθὼς λέγοντος λόγον, which means more than that he could have any place; viz. that he was not damned or honoured for his wise reflections: and so ὅπως λέγοντος λόγον is to be understood of the words of the text (Horn. xxvii. 12); whereas if the rich man talks loosely or profanely, speaks δισφράκτως, things not fit to be named or repeated, the speaking in this way is admired, as if it was consistent with inconstancy, or with what reason was doing.
CHAPTER XIV.

Ver. 3. Riches are not costly for a niggard: and what should an envious man do with money? i. e. Riches do not become the sordid person, are of little service to tempus multitudinis, vice cupidio et temere, in the Vulgate, which is hardly expressible, because the commentator has given false hints of using them even upon necessary occasions. Theophrastus well defines μεριμναίαν to be, ἢδη γάρ γίνεται ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ. Solon, though it is often used in such a sense of frugality, as our English language also, yet here is no such notion of it. The word covetousness: and so it is often used in this book (see ver. 6. of this chapter, &c. xviii. xxxv. 11). And so Gro- tinus, who explains δικαιοκρίτης well for justi- fied or staid, as he grudges the use and enjoyment of his wealth both to himself and others. This vice of covetous- ness so blinds the minds and hearts of those that are possessed with it, that they do by some folly and deformity: they are apt to give the name of prudence, fraudul- ency, or of some other virtue to a detestable sordid passion, which makes them enemies to God, to mankind, and even themselves.

Ver. 4. He that getteth by defrauding his own soul, gathereth for others, that shall spend his goods riotously. The Vulgate rendering, qui accipit ex animo suo, probably is a mistake; it would have been better expressed by anima sua. The Greek διαδεχεται διὰ τῆς ψυχῆς αὐτοῦ, literally rendered, is, He that gathereth from his life, i. e. by his purchase of money: but the Vulgate confounds the two, and makes it necessary to enrich himself the more, lays up, lays only for an extravagant heir, who will spend profusely in riot and luxury, and that he had been amassing with so much care and solitude. And thus the Syriac, Qui siluet detrahit, colletq. alias. And the Arabic is to the same effect. Our author has the same observation, xi. 18. "There is that waketh rather to spend, than to gather in wealth; and yet he knoweth not what time shall come upon him, and that he must leave those things to others, and die" (see note on that place). Solomon has many fine thoughts upon the ecology of these things. Here, the author gives, even the poets have with great sharpness expressed this vice in their satires. Juvenal particularly takes notice of the vanity of starving a man's self to raise a family: and calls such a means of gathering wealth, and sordid way of living, in order to die rich, folly and mend- ocess. "Seul qu'a divinités luce per tormenta costat"

Con fueris baud doctus, cum sit manus充足 phrenesis. Ut sequitur moriar, agens vivere fade. (Sat. xiv.)

But nothing can be more just than our author's reflections upon this, and the reasons which he gives against it, which He pursues to the end of the nineteenth verse. If he doeth good, he doeth it unwillingly; and at last he will declare his wickedness. ὑμᾶς εὐγένεια ἐνώπιον ματώ. If he does any good he does it ignorantly, he forgets him- self and his own ends, and accordingly his bene- faction, Scius: Quod si casus beneficentiae, imprudens, nc crerorem facit, with which the Arabic agrees. The copy which our translators follow reads, et sibi εὐγενεία, οἵτινς εὐγενεία. The Vulgate holds in all the descriptions of this character: and other versions retain that word, οἵτινς οἷος ὁ νομιζόμενος et non volens facit. Nor is Drusius's conjecture to be despised, who would read, et hérē, et non volēs, deliberātō. The sense seems to be, that if such a wretched stumbles upon a good action, yet the manner of his doing it in such a grudging way, as if it was extorted from him, quite spoils the grace of it, and takes off from its merit. It is, in the language of Isocrates, τοῖς γεροντῖς, ἐναυγάστας, ταύτας, Some tincture of sordidness will discover itself, and adhere to all he does. And if a good action be accidently done from him, the miser soon again states himself for his own glory. And the end of his life: he that will maintain this niggardly temper to the last, and manifest it in some instances at his death, particularly in that of his friends and preventing the expenses of it. Phaedrus well exposes such a stingy carelessness:

Ver. 5. The envious man hath a wicked eye; he turneth away his face, and despieth men. "Tempeσαν οὐδ' i. e. He is not at all friendly to the wants and misery of other men. The Vulgate has, Dispiciens animam suam: i. e. the covetous man overlooks himself, disregards his own soul or life, and will not concern himself with the provision of good food to keep himself in health, nor proper and convenient keep him warm in his sickness. By a wicked, evil, and envious eye, both in this and the sacred writings, is meant, the covetous man, and by a good eye, the liberal person. Thus Prov. xxii. 6. "Eat not the bread of him that hath an evil eye;" i. e. of one that is greedy and covetous. See also xxviii. 22. Tob. iv. 16. Ecclus. xxxii. 13. xxxv. 10. Matt. vi. 22. Mark vi. 21. which also may probably be opposed to σοφία πολλῆς, "the evil or covetous eye." The reason of applying this epithet more particularly to the eye, seems to be, because the eye is that part of the body which can most easily be perceived by contemplating, and turning it over (Eccles. v. 11). Hence covetousness is called "the lust of the eye," 1 John ii. 16, speaking of that sight which is not willing to come in the inward mind or judgment, as envy, covetousness, evil concupiscence, and the like vices, are said in scripture to proceed from the heart.

Ver. 9. An envious eye is not satisfied with his portion: and the iniquity of the wicked drieth up his soul. Like an invariable guest, he thinks he never has enough, and is not pleased with part, καθ' ἄλλων μικράς the ordinary portion which the master of the feast gives to each of his guests does not content him; he grasps at, and devours in his imagination and wishes, what is helpful to others; and his iniquity, i. e. his envy at what others have, gnaws and consumes his soul. He is just in no other instance but in punishing himself as he deserves; he is ingenious in con- viving ways to torment himself, and by denying himself what is necessary, to render himself not only himself unsuitable to live. The author alludes, says Cal- met, to the ancient custom of dividing the victuals among the guests at a feast. In this usual device, it was not pleased to be put upon the level with others. Or it may mean, that he be portion of good things in this life what it will, he still wishes for and covets more; and this is the wickedness which his unsatisfied desires make him continually uneasy.

Ver. 10. A wicked eye envieth his bread, and he is a niggard at his table. ὑμεῖς εὐγένεια ἐνώπιον ματώ, grudges himself or others their bread, and pines himself and them by his coarse food and sordid entertainment. The Vulgate renders, Oculus mali indigens, et in tristia erit super mon- ens. Groc. ἐνωπίου μὲν καθεῖ ; following some copies of the Vulgate: indeed this circumstance is a true test likewise of the covetous man, who is generally observed to be dull, de- jected, and out of humour at his own table; he is uneasy at the expense, has not the heart to help his guests plentifully, or to make them welcome, but wishes them to be gone, or forces them by his cold reception to depart the sooner. Whereas the person of an open and generous temper invites you by his very looks, thinks he can never entertain his guests enough; and is always happiest when he has his friends about him. St. Chrysostom, enu- merating the several particulars set down by this writer, which make up the covetous man, adds, "Certainly this picture cannot suit any thing in the shape of human nature, it can be neither man nor beast, but a picture made up of both, the absurdity of the one with the greatest degeneracy of the other."
far prevent the extravagance of a spendthrift heir, who perhaps will neither think for us who leave him, nor take care to keep it, and may expose and droll on our menae for better things: possessions and goods, for Ver. 16. Give, and take, and sanctify thy soul; for there is no seeking of dainties in the grave.] Deprive not thyself of the innocent mirth and pleasure which the law permits or decrees, nor yet deny the victuals, feste, and amusements, and rejoice with and entertain your family and friends on such public occasions. Nor at other times deny yourself the enjoyment of such good things as God has blessed you with,
and gives them for the proper use and entertainment, but use them, in the manner which God approves, free from intemperance and luxury, free from covetousness, and a criminal attachment to them, as things to be the subject of the Godly philosopher, which is the reading in ms. Greek copies, and of διοίκησεν της ψυχής, which obtains in others. The Vatican edition has άδύνατω της ψυχής της; i. e. live an agreeable life, deceive your cares, and let innocuous pleasures and amusements divert any thing that may lie heavy upon your spirits. But possibly the true reading may be ἀδύνατον της ψυχῆς, hilariter excipite animam; which seems confirmed by the context, particularly from the reflection that all dainties, in the Greek γλωσσε, cease in the grave. The advice here given of living freely, and at large, on account of the shortness of life, is not, says Calmet, to be extended to all persons, or to be practiced by all classes of society.
Deprive not yourself of the innocent pleasures of life, and give no occasion to be said of you, that you live Exx. 23. 20. for the dreariest life, and have done all your work, and have also been wise in your own happiness, and have so lived, that you have not left an evil name behind you. (II. vi.)

Ver. 17. For the covenant from the beginning is, Thou shall die the death.] ἐναπόκειται κατακλασις. This refers to Gen. ii. where the rendering of the Hebrew is, Dying thou shall die; which, though spoken to Adam personally, yet indicates the general condition of man, and expresses the law of mortality was, that all flesh should, by the transgression, see corruption. Πάντα ἐκδέχεται κατακλασις. The Valg night this to the end of the wealth of Calmet, which thinking it would come in better.
The comparison of leaves, by which the succession and mortality of man is expressed in the following verse, is very ancient and true. The leaves of all plants, and the leaves of many ancient and wise men, are of the same kind. They were celebrated sages of Greece, has occasionally borrowed from them some of their sentiments, of which this among others is an instance. There is exactly the same thought in Horace:

"Omnem the mollum ventre, nasi et cruribus."

Ver. 18. He that doth lodge near his house, shall also fasten a pin in her walls. He shall pitch his tent nigh unto her, and shall lodge in a lodging where good things are.
The translation should rather be as before, "Blessed is the man who hath his abode within his own house, who knows his habitation to her, who will pitch his tent nigh unto her, and partake of the advantages of so commodious a situation. By 'fastening a pin in her walls' is meant, that such a one is disposed to hold his immortal soul shall have a constant and sure abode with her, his dwelling shall be as secure, and his tent as unmovable, as if by pins or nails fastened to the ground. We have the like expression, Ezra ix. 8, where, speaking of God's giving him a little reviving in their bondage, and an opportunity of setting up and repairing the house of God, he expresses this advantage and security, by God's giving them a nail in his holy place; which the margin expounds to the same sense (see also Isa. xxii. 23). The sense of the whole is, Blessed or happy is the man that is not content to follow after worldly goods, who pitcheth his tent only, and turneth to her en passant, and as it were by accident; but is desirous of a long continuance with her, to be known to and conversant in the same place; as indeed he doth, for he that is ambitious of his abode and dwelling near her, will find there a lodging stocked with all conveniences and goods: for so advantageous is her neighbourhood, that a little hut near to the heart of the city is equivalent to the most magnificent palaces in the superfluous magnificence of kings. This was holy David's opinion, who says, "I had rather be a door-keeper," even the meanest servant, "in the house of God, than to dwell in the palace of David, among the praises of the daughters of Solomon."" (Ps. xxv. 11; see also Ezek. xxxiv. 14. John x. 9.)

Ver. 26. 27. He shall set his children under her shelter, and shall lodge under her branches. By her he shall be to hunger and thirst after righteousness. The rabbins observe, that wherever mention is made in the book of Proverbs of eating and drinking, there is meant principally wisdom, and not any thing else: the term here expressed is in the ancient versions, ἀληθινῆς τριφής, which signifies a genuine or real nourishment; but for the true meaning of the word, ἄλειψις, see on ver. 7.

Ver. 5. She shall call him above his neighbors, and in the midst of the congregation shall she open his mouth. Thus the psalmist describes this happy success and advancement of the grace of God’s laws, “Thou through thy commandments hast made me wiser than mine enemies; for they are ever with me: I have more understanding than my teachers; for thy testimonies are my gotten inheritance.” (Ps. cxlii. 8, 9.)

Exod. may either signify the church or the senate; in both which she produces her fruits. And it was truly for her to ‘be compared to the Shechinah, or the radiant presence of God in the sanctuary. The representing wisdom under the image of a spreading tree, is common in this and the other sapiential books of the Old Testament. The same metaphor is used, 2 Cor. ii. 2, γυνὴ πρεσβύτερη is the same with γυνὴ προφήτισσα (see Deut. xxii. 23). Instances of this construction, which is called apposition, may be seen in Glass. This meaning is therefore best used here as (see Gen. xv. 18, Ezek. iii. 15, Amos v. 2, Matt. xii. 39, xxiv. 30, Acts vii. 5, Rom. iv. 11). I make no doubt that the original had נשה מנן “a woman,” or כהן מנן; and the Syriac version has it, and it is included in the same sense suggested in the Arabic and Syriac versions. One has it more præcie; the other, nusa adolescentem, "a young wife," or "the wife of her youth. And if the original Hebrew included a woman of youths, a young woman, or wife, or the wife of his youth, as רעפ, it is certain, signifies all these, then those versions (supposing them taken from the original) may be justly interpreted, as well as γυνὴ προφήτισσα; but πρεσβύτερη is to be taken in the same sense, and yet most natural. Messieurs of Port-Royal observe, that this writer makes use of the image of a mother and a spouse, to denote that wisdom loves children with the most tender affection, and is the source of justice, holiness, and understanding in them, and is the parent of all good things to them. She is represented here as going out to meet her son, or husband, and the denotive, that wisdom doth not come to God till he first comes to us, and that it is his goodness that conducts us to himself, and puts us in possession of happiness.

Ver. 3. With the head of understanding shall she feed him, and give him the water of wisdom to drink. (see xxiv. 21. As divine grace is often represented under the emblem of springs and streams of water; so wisdom or divine knowledge, the food and support of the soul, is expressed by the metaphor of meat and drink, which sustains the body. Expressions very familiar to the eastern nations, and frequent in the Jewish writings, are here used by the writer of these hie i advises to make use of those means of instruction which wisdom offers, from the certain advantages she has to bestow. Solomon uses the like, Prov. ix. 5, where wisdom is represented as seeking the physician, and saying, “Come, eat of the bread, and drink of the wine which I have mingled.” And that we may know what is meant by this metaphor, it follows, “For sake of the father, and live a life of understanding.” There is the same comparison Isa. lv. 1; and when God in his anger threatens to deprive his people of the comfort and benefit of his word and ordinances, then they are styled by the blessedness a fatness, Amos viii. 11, pursuing the same metaphor taken from the ordinary refreshment of meat and drink; because when we want the support of God’s word, we may be said to live without meat; and, in the same sense, to live without life, and without which it dies with spiritual hunger. The gospel too uses the same comparison, and advises
ECCLESIASTICUS.

Ver. 11. Say not then, It is through the Lord that I fell away: Some copies read, psalmist, says our Lead. But our Lead, and other versions, and the Vulgate, have the proper, t. Thus the Lord imparted necessary knowledge, and these things he did in due order, Wisdeo, Moses's, and other commanders of sacred hymns and thanksgivings. Or it may refer to the performance of religious duties, which sinners disgrace, who either publicly, - or, as it is said, secretly, conduct or commit the sacrifice of the Lord contemptible: according to that of the psalmist, "Unto the ungodly, says God, Why dost thou preach my laws, and take my covenant in thy mouth? with what right doest thou refuse to me, and hast cast my words behind thee?" (Ps. 1. 16, 17.)

Ver. 11. Say not then, It is through the Lord that I fell away: Some copies read, psalmist, says our Lead. But our Lead, and other versions, and the Vulgate, have the proper, t. Thus the Lord imparted necessary knowledge, and these things he did in due order, Wisdeo, Moses's, and other commanders of sacred hymns and thanksgivings. Or it may refer to the performance of religious duties, which sinners disgrace, who either publicly, - or, as it is said, secretly, conduct or commit the sacrifice of the Lord contemptible: according to that of the psalmist, "Unto the ungodly, says God, Why dost thou preach my laws, and take my covenant in thy mouth? with what right doest thou refuse to me, and hast cast my words behind thee?" (Ps. 1. 16, 17.)
do good, though he is always ready with his preventing grace to assist them towards doing well. In the business of religion, and matters of salvation, free-will is as evidently exercised, as in any thing else, wherein one man chooses for himself, to be pleased with the wise, or ignorant. The soul are not the fault of nature, but of the will, which, being free, uses its liberty to choose either good or evil. The author's design here is to take from the wicked all the excuses which they may take to delude con- science, to hide from their own eyes the errors of their vice and irregularities, pretending, that God has given them strong and even invincible inclinations towards sin; that he has chosen them as his offspring, and therefore of which they are not the cause or authors. To this plea the wise man replies, that God cannot be justly charged with the leaven of wickedness, because he abhors it, forbids it, commands against it, and dis figures them actually placed in men such evil inclinations; neither is such a corruption invincible, as he has created men free, and at their own disposal, capable of either following what is good, and adorning them his assisting grace for that purpose, in order to make them happy; or of choosing evil, through the sway of their own corrupt will, and thereby making themselves miserable. St. Chrysostom, as if he had been directly commenting upon the place, hath well observed, șũ έπειτά κακαί οὑ έπειτά τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, εἰ. τ. τ. Δυσείς non est autor malorum quasi inferores, sed nos ipsi. Radix causae est libertatem nostram, et voluntatem nostram, libertas. Ver. 15. If there will, to keep the commandments, and to per- form the works of the law. The meaning in all the Greek copies is, τῶν Ἰσραήλ, τῶν Ἰσραήλ οὐκ ἐπιθυμεῖται, οὐκ ἔπειτά τοῖς ἀνθρώποις. But would not the reading be better, τῶν Ἰσραήλ, τοῖς ἠλθόντες σε καὶ πηδωμένοις; i. e. He originally made many converts to the faith by his preaching, but was not able to restrain God's people from sin, which is a Hebrewism; i. e. in his own power, and to his own choice, to keep God's commandments, and to perform πιστεύειν εὐσεβείαν, faithfulness of acceptance, or acceptable faith- fulness, as the Hebrew is rightly rendered in our version; i. e. faithfully to discharge his duty, if he be not his fault; τῶν Ἰσραήλ, if he wills, or pleases. A farther proof of man's free-will has also the effect of making giving commandments to mankind to follow and obey; which necessarily supposes a choice, and indeed the very nature of a covenant between God and man implies it, nor without it can the neglect of the conditions of it justly punishable. A right direction of the will is indeed to be asked of God, whose grace is compatible with human liberty. Certum est (says St. Austin, committing upon this place) nos servare mandamus, in unum volumines, sed qua praeparatur voluntas a Domino, ab illo petendum est, ut tantum vehemens, quantum sufficit ut veloendo facerim. Certum est nosovere cum faciemus, sed ille facit ut faciemus bonum, praebendo vires efficacissimam voluntati? (De Grat. et Lib. Arbitr. cap. 16). But τουτον κατά τας ἀνθράκτας: before these.) Some hereby understand, that God hath given man the free use of the things of this life, and hath placed him to a sort of sovereignty in the world, entirely free himself, and lord of the world, which is a vast difference from the giving by the two principal ones, that may make life happy and easy, which God has put in his power, and under his command; as earth and water were wont to be given to the kings of Persia anciently (Judith ii. 7), to acknowledge that they were lords of land and sea. But more seems here intended than barely man's prerogative and dominion; it contains the test of man's obedience, a proposal of happiness or misery to him, according to a wise or indiscrimate choice. It is observable, that the Vulgate changes the order of ideas, and puts the power upon man to do and let us judge, and so indeed the opposition is in the following verse, “Before man are life and death,” giving the prece- dence to what is best and most useful, and so water is here most fitly taken in contradistinction to fire, which is generally more dangerous and destructive. But in xxii. 26, this writer places them both among the principal re- cipients of God's especial care, by these elements is denoted a state of taste and passions, and a state of fire and the former by fire, the latter by water. Ver. 19—20. For the wisdom of the Lord is great, and his power is power unsearchable. The Lord has com- manded no man to do wickedly, neither hath he given any man license to sin? ἵνα καὶ ἐπηρεάση. This is a strong and vigorous expression: the Hebrews often style the passage of a writer he wove ἴνα πάσα ἁγγεία δανίζω, δανιζέται. God is also called δανίζω, 1 Mac. xx. 3. and δανιζόμενος. φίλος τοῦ Θεοῦ καὶ λογοτέρης τοῦ θρόνου. This writer also has, δανιζόμενος, δανίζω, δανιζόμενος and δανίζω Tho- xi. 16. 19. But ἵναι γε τοι εὐρισκοῖν, exceeds all these, and must express the superlativeness of God's power. The impossibility of that which will make him happy, if he does not obstruct his own happiness; and by his shabby power is able also to render him as he desires, he displays to us, as our sovereign judge, examines every work of man, and will make a proportionable difference in their state accord- ing to their actions. He hates, he forbids, he threatens, he punishes, all without a prerogative which cannot with reason promise himself impunity, or think to excuse himself by any pretended necessity laid on him to that end: he cannot plead the law, nor liberty to get otherwise, or that God has given him, or others any license or indulgence for committing evil. CHAP. XVI. Ver. 1. 2. Desire not a multitude of unprospitious children, neither delight in untimely sons. Though they multiply, rejoice not in them, except the fear of the Lord be with them. The Vulgate joins the first verse to the former chapter, and renders, Non enim cunctas multitudinem infantium in- fidelum et iuvenum, excepto aliquo, in utroque applicando. In the latter part of ver. 12 of that chapter. In the second verse, the wise man teaches parents the great importance of a good education, to bring them up, and settle them in the way whereunto they are called by God. What number of children, nor their beauty, shape, or strength, or any bodily accomplishment, can give any true delight and enjoyment, but that education, which, if it has the moral conduct only: it is that better to have only one that is virtuous and well inclined, than a number of loose and profligate ones, who will bring certain ruin and disgrace into the family, and that even the having none at all is far preferable to bad ones. Aristotle, therefore, with great judgment requires τεκνοφθένια, as well as νοστάρια, i. e. "a number of children, and the remembrance of their content and happiness. For one child of bad morals and scandalous behaviour is enough to take away all satisfac- tion from a parent, however happy he may be in the rest of his children; such a one will give more real plague and vexation than the others can administer comfort, and few families are there, where there is a number of children, but have some domestic evil of this sort. Messieurs de Port-Royal apply what is here said, and in the context, to the children of our spiritual mother, the church, the go- vernors whereof ought not to rejoice at merely seeing great numbers making profession of the faith, except they are in reality what they appear to be, and their life answers to the holiness of their calling. If they truly fear God, and make a visible progress in the ways of godliness, they are then a past blessing; but if not, he will not judge them, nor render conduct and wickedness of life, some of her members dis- honour God, and disgrace their profession, they are then the occasion of much real concern and affliction to him, which increases the opposition to them, with every step in the disciples, and the power which they have to seduce others also. St. Chrysostom, therefore, wishes that such as dis- honour God by their immanities, would in earnest leave the church, and those only who devoutly serve him, and are a credit to their religion, would continue in it; that a few so disposed are more to be valued than a vast mixed multitude of nominal professors only, whose affectation is not right, and their attachment to her service indifferent and insincere. Ver. 3. That not those in their life, neither respect their multitude; i. e. Flatter not thyself that children of such vicious dispositions shall live long, and carry thy name to any distant time, for life at best is uncertain, its conti- nuanee depends upon God's blessing, which the wicked have the least reason to expect, and by their own immoralities they often shorten its period, and hasten their miser- able end. Nor boast thyself in a numerous race, if that was a sort of glory to thy race, that shall not to thine. Ahab had seventy sons, and none of them succeeded him, but Jehu put them all to death (2 Kings x. 1). Gideon had none to take his place, and applied to the Lord for the youngest, who hid himself (Judg. ix. 5). Abraham, on the contrary, had but one son, and his posterity was as nume- rous as the stars of heaven for multitude. The Vatican edition reads τοιαύτα, which expresses the sense more forcibly. Depend not upon their place, or commencement, for, according to that of the psalmist, "Thou shalt look after

If wicked the rebellious' was The but length to "Whom copy Qui They attempting may is will these and cannot And Lightning will incredibly the powerful, Abraham, such generation There will of the latterizers thus he heaven, defied to waters of many fell away, of the wickedness of the company raised the hand, the city will be replenished: the kindred of the wicked shall specifically become desolate." i.e. By wise men cities and empires were founded, as anciently Rome and Athens, and owed their greatness to the policy and sagacity of their legislators. Such by their knowledge of learning were meet for the people, and being wise and eloquent, profited them by their instructions: "Their seed stood fast, and their children for a long time, and their name was innumerable; and in their country's ruin: thus Praxia, through the ill conduct of his son Paras, saw his capital and numerous family in the utmost circumstances of distress, and fell himself a victim to the merciless enemy. By ofh shekut we may not only understand the company or society, the kindred or tribe, of the wicked, as the margin has it, but the very place or land where they dwell, which shall suffer with them.

And so Calmet understands it, Le pays de mecanas de dieuenda desert, according to the observation of the psalmist, "A fruitful land maketh be barren, for the wickedness of the wicked is therein." (Psalm xxvii. 12) Jonathan as he was historically the people of the Jews, which sprung from one, even Abraham, increased so incredibly as to be at least six hundred thousand at their going out of Egypt; and on the other hand it is the several tribes, though powerful, were destroyed and overthrown, and their land, the type of heaven, given to God's own people. Many such instances are recorded. Thus, he had numbered of; of multitudes springing from one good and pious root, and large and rich families dwindling through their wickedness, and in time entirely forgot.

Lightly of the ungodly shall a fire be kindled; and in a rebellious nation wrath is set on fire. There is much the same sentiment, xxii. 9. "The congregation of the wicked is like tow wrapped together, and the enmity of the fire to destroy them. By which we may understand the divine vengeance, as when God says, "A fire is kindled in my anger, and shall burn unto the lowest hell, and shall consume the earth with burning, and it afterward follows, by way of explanation, "I will heap mischief upon them, they shall be burned with hanger, and devoured with bitter destruction" (Deut. xxxiii. 23); or fire may be understood literally, that is sometimes the effect of God's displeasure: thus it was when the company raised by Korah were smitten with lightning, "The fire was kindled among them, and the flame burnt up the multitude of the Lord; the fire of the Lord fell among them, calling the fire of the Lord, as being a known instrument of his vengeance. By fire also is sometimes meant war, and so the sense may be,—That war or destruction shall be among the wicked and their territories, of a wicked and disobedient people; that God will permit the enemy from without, or civil discord and division to ravage them; and thus the margin understands it, and turn to the subject at the end of the last chapter; viz. to show that God will certainly punish the wicked, and is not backward to proceed against them with severity, upon account of their number or power, which he proves by many memorable instances in the following verses. Ver. 7. He was not pacified toward the old giants, who fell away in the strength of their foulness. Our translators follow by way which is not at all good, translated by ἀπορρίσονται αὐτὸν, though the generality of editions omit the latter words. It is a Hebrewism, and means rather that the fire of the Lord was not extinguished, through failure of their own strength, and a vain dependence upon it. And thus Calmet, Qui se sont revoltés par une folie continue en leur forces. These mighty giants of the old world trusted in their strength, and their extrinsic strength; the Lord extinguished them for their insolence, and drowned them in the waters of the deluge (Gen. vi. 1. Wisd. xiv. 6). They were, says Macrobius, a wicked generation of men, who durst not be pacified toward the Lord: the old giants were made to understand the reason of the Lord's being angry with his subject, if this writer had instanced in what he could not be unacquainted with, and his design naturally led him to the apostasy and punishment of the rebel angels! The prophet's description of it is truly sublime, "How art thou fallen from heaven, O Lucifer, son of the morning! For the Lord hath cast thee down from heaven. I will exalt above the stars of God, I will ascend above the clouds, I will be like the Most High. Yet thou shalt be brought down to hell" (Isa. xiv. 12, 13). And the places of destruction, which might have been, as the world exactly have suited this place,—If God spared not the angels of heaven, how much less will he spare us, the last disobedience, and the proud, the rich, and the pride of Sodom, in the next verse, Ezekiel confirms. "Behold, this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom, pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness; these occa-

Ver. 9. He pitied not the people of perdition, who were taken away? For all these let Other advisors. As to the Sodomitse, they, I think, must be excluded from being intened here, because they are mentioned just before, and as the two former verses relate to two different subjects, it is natural, and also the antithesis is so called? These, it is "a son of death," 2 Sam. xii. 5, is one worthy of it: and the like may be observed of ὅ τι ἱδνησ, Matt. xxii. 15. Almost all the interpreters understand by the "people of perdition," the inhabitants of Jericho, which was an accursed city, and all that were therein were accursed, and therefore were destroyed last by the people of perdition? Shall we fix on the Sodomitse, or Israelites, or Egyptians, or the people of this world? The Syriac version furnishes still another answer, viz. the last manner of eleavation, mature and minimatized. This is favoured by Corn. a Lapide, who under- stands by the "people of perdition" the inhabitants of Jericho, which was an accursed city, and all that were therein were accursed, and therefore were destroyed last by the people of perdition. Shall we fix on the Sodomitse, or Israelites, or Egyptians, or the people of the earth? and therefore this verse is a suspense to the next, for the inhabitants of Jericho, the Sodomitse, the Israelites, the Egyptians, and the people of the world are here meant, who were a nation worthy of destruction, were also devoted to it, and at length ἔσχον, actually taken away in their sins, as our translation rightly has it; or, if we render ἔσχον, proud, or elated, as both Grotius and Drusinus translate it, agreeably to the Vulgate and Targumine versions (which avoids something of a tautology, and answers better to the latter part of the next verse) thus sensu taja, sausus the Canaanites, for they defied the Lord, persecuted his chosen, were an idolatrous and savage people, were at the very height of wickedness, and gloried in their stones, and their heaven, and their punishment, which was inadequate to their brutal vices, came after that the Jews in the next verse, and therefore may seem less proper to be mentioned before it; yet perhaps it may be considered as the general example, if at least the Sodomitse and the Canaanites, before he proceeded to one of his own nation.

Ver. 11. And if there be one stifledncked among the people, it is marked if he escape unpunished? The argument proceeds a new step, and deserts from the subject of the examples before, to the punishment of the people for their iniquity, as the Sodomitse, the Canaanites, &c., if he spared not even his own people, but slew six hundred thousand in one day (Wisd. Ch. iii. 19, 20), who gathered together in the hardness of their hearts, nor even the whole world itself for its universal corruption, how shall any private person, any single sinner, inconsiderable in all respects, in comparison of the former examples, dare to rebel against his Maker, or promise himself impunity, either for the error of his conscience, or because he is as one to infinity, to lie concealed, and escape unpunished, amongst so many thousand transgressors? It is proper and pleasing to observe, in what strong terms the narrative is couched, that he should not be a bad part of the verse; he is represented there not only as pliable, but as mighty to forgive; an expression very singular, and raising comfort from an attribute that usually carried not a like degree of power. For God is infinitely just, as well as good; he neither sacrifices his justice to his goodness, nor his goodness to his justice; these attributes are so compatible in the Deity, as human understanding cannot form a notion of either other. He pardons those who are truly contrite and penitent, as he is a sincere lover of souls; but he deals not so graciously with them, who are self-willed and hard to be reformed: in them he punishes the obduracy of sin with rigour, because they detest his continuance in it, and is as inflexible in the execution of his judgments, as they were in pursuing the execution of their own.

Ver. 12. As his mercy is great, so is his correction also: he judgeth a man according to his works. This follows very properly after what was said of his mercy in the foregoing verse, lest any should be encouraged to sin by a relaxation of the rule of right and compunction for sin. For God is infinitely just, as well as good; he neither sacrifices his justice to his goodness, nor his goodness to his justice; these attributes are so compatible in the Deity, as human understanding cannot form a notion of either other. He pardons those who are truly contrite and penitent, as he is a sincere lover of souls; but he deals not so graciously with them, who are self-willed and hard to be reformed: in them he punishes the obduracy of sin with rigour, because they detest his continuance in it, and is as inflexible in the execution of his judgments, as they were in pursuing the execution of their own.

Ver. 13. But the Lord doth restore the soul of the contrite in all his works. This verse gives the reason of what he spoke of in the last verse. For God is infinitely just, as well as good; he neither sacrifices his justice to his goodness, nor his goodness to his justice; these attributes are so compatible in the Deity, as human understanding cannot form a notion of either other. He pardons those who are truly contrite and penitent, as he is a sincere lover of souls; but he deals not so graciously with them, who are self-willed and hard to be reformed: in them he punishes the obduracy of sin with rigour, because they detest his continuance in it, and is as inflexible in the execution of his judgments, as they were in pursuing the execution of their own.

Ver. 14. For the Lord restoreth the soul of the contrite in all his works. This verse gives the reason of what he spoke of in the last verse. For God is infinitely just, as well as good; he neither sacrifices his justice to his goodness, nor his goodness to his justice; these attributes are so compatible in the Deity, as human understanding cannot form a notion of either other. He pardons those who are truly contrite and penitent, as he is a sincere lover of souls; but he deals not so graciously with them, who are self-willed and hard to be reformed: in them he punishes the obduracy of sin with rigour, because they detest his continuance in it, and is as inflexible in the execution of his judgments, as they were in pursuing the execution of their own.

Ver. 15. The Lord hardened Pharaoh, that he should not know him, that his powerful works might be known to the world. See Exod. vii. 13, from whence this seems to be taken, where the like motion of the word is, and the same word, "Pharaoh's heart;" which, according to the Hebrew, should have been, "Pharaoh's heart became firm, or was hardened," as the same Hebrew words are rendered, ver. 22 of that chapter. See also the Hebrew word, "יִתְהַלְכוּת וְיִכְרְבּוּ בְּלַעַד חָרָרְךָ," and ver. 22, יִכְרְבּוּ בְּלַעַד חָרָרְךָ, and by Ar. Mont. Corboravat se cor Pharaon; and by the Vulgate, Induxit in cursum eos, Pharaonus. The same reason which is here assigned for the hardening Pharaoh's heart, we likewise meet with, Exod. ix. 17, Rom. ix. 16, "For this cause have I raised thee up," or, "According to the secret counsel of his heart," which, (not my mercy, but) my power in thee, and that my name might be declared throughout all the earth. For the re-admonishing of Pharaoh's heart upon the removal of any plague, occasioned the showing so many more signs and wonders to God's greater glory; each respite renewed his obstinacy, whereas the continuance of any one plague would have made him relent; and dismiss the Israelitish, etc.

Ver. 16. He both separated his light from the darkness with an adamant. The meaning either is, that the ways, counsels, and decrees of God are above our understanding and computation; or that to the understanding of these secrets is presumption; or, that God dwells in a light which no man can approach unto (1 Tim. vi. 16); or the sense may be, that God has placed a strong partition, as the margin has it, between the great glory, and the world, which is also the meaning of those words, "as the scripture expresseth it, he has fixed a great gulf (Luke xvi. 26), between the seat of the blessed and the abode of the wicked, at such an infinite distance from each other, as to render all communication impossible; or, according to others, that he has made the vaunties of day and night constant and unalterable. He may judge of us, when we have sinned, as he has divided "a law shall not be broken; accordingly abasuras, καινά, mon, "letters which cannot be broken; and to express something unalterable, the epigrammatists say, νόερον πάντα λαμπρόν. I say these are both sentiments, and yet both the verses seem to have no relation to the context; "Revera hac non pertinent," says Grotius. And indeed they are wholly omitted in the Vulg. Rom. Ad. Bas, and most of the Greek editions, etc.

Ver. 17. Say not thou, I will hide myself from the Lord: shall any remember me from above? I shall not be remembered among so many people: for what is my soul among such an infinite number of creatures? Quanta est anima mea inter spiritus omnium hominum? Syr. It is strange to observe, how vain man, who, when fired with ambition, and public spirit, and the view of greatness, is not seduced, and durst even aspire to an equality with his maker, can degrade and despise himself upon occasion, when fear of punishment is in the case, and comfort himself in his resemblance to the Deity, or conceive of an immortal soul, lost among the infinity of creatures, and too incomprehensible to be looked upon, or even remembered, and is happy if he can deceive himself with so many unphilosophical false reasons: Does God take cognisance of everything that passes below? can he enter into an examination of all the thoughts, words, and actions of each man in particular throughout the world? He extends his care indeed over the fortune of the great, determines the fate of princes, and the revolutions of states and empires; he directs and guides the particular eras and occurrences of remote time; but it is below his grandeur to descend to mean persons, and to extend his care to trifling matters, and the infinity of human concerns; kings do not condescend to take account or cognizance themselves of petty and diminutive transactions that pass in their kingdom; these would disturb their quiet, and detract from the sovereign dignity. We meet with a like instance of a wicked and shallow reasoner, Job xxii. 12-14, "—for he doth not consider from the height of the stars, how high they are! and thou sayest therefore, How doth God know? can he judge through the dark cloud? The thick clouds are a covering to him that he see not the earth, or the birds of heaven, etc." Juvenal introduces an old sinner talking in the like manner:

read otho lucrav.; I. God gave him a sovereignty resembling his own, Imperium qualem sum, says Grotius, and so the Turgenev version. Immutat ipse virtute sua. And in this dominion, as well as in the perfection of his intellectual nature, his licentiousness to God consisted: the subject of the brute creation to man was a consequence of his authority, or of a dread impressed upon him from their great Creator. Seneca has well expressed man's great prerogative in this particular, Quisquis es, iminus assumitur sortis humanae, cogita quanta nobis tribuerit parsens noster, quanta velut nympha non sub jugum ministratur quae se secutius consequam; quam nihil sit mortale non sub ipsi nostro possum (De Benefic. ii. 20). And after it follows (which will serve to illustrate the sixth verse), tot virtutes accipit: total hominem deducunt tristiam poenas. And so it intends momento, perversum est, &c. Its bene assumita nature indulgentia, conterias necesse est, te illius facere.

Ver. 5. They received the use of the five operations of the Lord, and in the sixth place he imparted them understanding, and in the seventh speech, an interpreter of the cogitations thereof. Many editions have not this verse at all, and some few only the latter part. It may properly be interpreted what are "the five operations," as they are here called. Are we to understand by them the five senses, sensa animae? the Arabic so takes it, enumerating them severally. Philo resembles this writer upon the subject; αυτα του γνωσεως, κ. &c. Potestimorum, quos nobis insunt, sex indecimer iterar maris quiescetem esse contumacem quique senex, et senio qui profutur. How much of this view of the senses has in it a resemblance of the apprehensions of the ancients, is a question. The non putrefactum is to be understood of the sense of smelling, of the other senses, hic est per os inane multa silenda citissimae. At septima potestas est Mena Rector, quos, quando in potentate sex illas retinat, vitum serene tranquille amplitudem annihilat (De Abrahamo). And in another place he has the like division, only instead of the understanding he inserts generation, and makes the whole seven, which he calls ἑκατοστὸν τῶν σεπτήμων, or "the understanding." Grotius also intimates as much; but thanks this latter part to be a gloss crept into the text from the margin, by some fonder of the ancient poems; cut who, besides the five ordinary senses, acknowledged three other, viz. το ἀντιγραφή, or "generation, speech, and understanding." But the first of these is now dropped and omitted. Corn. a Lapide andCalmet reckon the five ἑκατοστὴ προσωπος here to be the powers or privileges given to man at the creation, which are mentioned in the foregoing verses, viz. 1. Life. 2. Sovereignty over the earth. 3. Force or strength suitable and proportionate to his nature. 4. Likeness to God's image. 5. Domination over all manner of living things. Others transpose this verse in the Septuagint, and by the seventh operation, put them after the particulars mentioned in the verse following, where indeed they seem to come in better. Thus the Turgenev version arranges the he, Judicium, linguam, omn. and sees, and so Grotius. Thus the writer apposes his operation to be and by their praise most effectually declare and set forth the excellency of his works and ways; and in particular

CHAP. XVI.

Ver. 20. Ká iot àtovp o diávniēthmēh enppi, No heart there begin the sentiments of (ọtairgnsias énges of whom it is said, ver. 23, that he ἐκάθισεν ἐκ τοῦ αὐτοῦ no heart can think upon these things; as the ká has idi the átovp ài éntovp τοῦ èkamēthmēh; Who shall be able to understand or conceive his ways?

Ver. 21. Ká éntovp, ἵνα δένηται άνθρωποι. It is even like a sudden gust of wind (Drusius and Junius both understand this expression, comparatively), which e r man cannot see or know whence it cometh, and whither it goeth.

Ver. 22. Ἡμέρα ἐν παρθένων ἡ ἁγιασμός. The most part of his works are hid. Omnes pane veteres nihil cognoscri, nihil percipi, nihil sciri; posse dixisse, in profundo veritatem demens, nihil verum etiam in omnibus circumcisus esse dixisse (Cit. Acad. Quest. lib. i.).

This then, it is manifest, was an old objection; and why might not Jesus in Egypt learn this objection from the gentle philosophers?

Ver. 23. Ὁρισμόν δει τοῦ ἄνθρωπος; Who shall declare the works of his righteousness? Who can find, or who can set some value upon his moral rectitude or beauty in his ways or proceedings?
ECCLESIASTICUS.

"If ye tempt; Or who shall wait for the declaration of proof of his righteousness in his works? people ye be taught, for his covenant is ever after. If there be any such thing as a covenant of righteousness and mercy with man, there appear no tokens of it; and why should we wait in expectation of its being fulfilled?"

Here end the objections; for ἑως ἄνων εἰς ἀνων, i.e. "The trial of all things is in the end," according to our version, is not in the Vatican, and some other editions. And it is observable in both columns, that in the order of sentiments (and phrases too) there is a likeness and relation between the verses cited from the former chapter, and those produced as concerning with them in this; and therefore, though this author's manner of writing, in general, is rather surreptitious than argumentative, yet it is an improbable conjecture, that a formal answer is here designed to some sceptical objections before advanced, and it is continued under a little difference of expression, ver. 15, 19, 20. It is observable also, that the argument, in this place, is transposed, that the Israelites were under is more plainly spoken of.

Ver. 13, 14. Their eyes saw the majesty of his glory, and their ears heard his glorious voice. And he said unto them, Beware of me, and be not evil disposed, for thy God is a jealous God; and there is none else his portion concerning his neighbour. God manifested his glory, when he appeared on mount Sinai at the delivery of his law, when his people saw the lightnings and heard the thunders, called here "his glorious voice," as the Hebrews ordinarily expressed it, Ps. xxix. 4. By giving the law, God did not only provide for the establishment of his own worship and the decent performance of it, but it was promulgated likewise for the good of man and of society in general. He therein orders every man to love his neighbour, to live in peace and on terms of friendship with him, to abstain from theft, and do not act of violence and injustice; to be tender of his reputation, to beware of slander and false witness, and to be aiding and assisting to him under any calamity or distress, as may be seen at large, Exod. xx.—xxiii. By giving the law, God did not think not of any of the instances of wrong, here enumerated, to be meant; but the worship of false gods, and the sin of idolatry, which was supposed to be the occasion of the misfortunes which the Israelites expressly engaged to avoid. Josh. xxiv. 15. If this law be sense be admitted, the author may be supposed here to refer to both tables of the decalogue.

"He spake unto him, and shall not be hid from his eyes." This observation is true with regard to the actions of all mankind, but it rather respects the Israelites in particular, who are spoken of before and after, and means, that as God gave them a law, so he took notice how they observed it; his eyes were over them for that purpose. He took cognisance of their whole conduct, as a legislator tender of his rights and jealous of his honour, in order to punish or reward them, as they should respectively deserve. His eye was not so intent upon the behaviour of other nations, who were not favoured with a like knowledge of his laws, nor bound by any positive covenant to the observance of them, nor were they, in his government so immediately; or, the meaning may be that during the long march of the Israelites in the wilderness, God went along thereof, as the xxi. directed their way, and led them as their guide, in the daytime by a cloudy pillar, and all the night by a light of fire. This sense Grotius prefers: the next verse is not in the Vatican, nor in the Vulgate, it is, however, taken from Exch. xxxvi. 36. And as God distributed the earth among the several nations, and appointed kings and rulers over the principal parts of it, the people of Israel he reserved for his own peculiun; he chose the heritage of Jacob out of all nations to be under his more especial care and to enjoy great and singular privileges: for he only put them into possession of a fruitful Canaan, but did them the particular honour of being their king; by him they were directed in all cases which concerned their state, and by him were led forth to battle, so that their form of government was properly a theocracy; till the times of the Kings. And like all other nations, they have a temporal king over them, to their great detriment and disgrace. Josephus gives the like account of the original foundation of their empire, and says, that the kings were chosen by a sort of election, when the princes, some monarchy, others aristocracy or democracy, their legislator overlooked all these, and appointed οἰκονομοί τοῦ ναοῦ, δια τὸν ναὸν καὶ τὸ πνευματικὸν, ναὸς εν αὐτῷ Λαόν τε καὶ Πατρίς. "To have an everlasting covenant with them, and showed them σφυνικά αἰολοφορίαν καί νειπτήμας ἀφικνήσεως τῆς ἰσιριτικῆς ἀμοιβής," (Cont. Ap. lib. ii.) Our author here alludes to Deut. xxxii. 8, 9. "When the Most High divided to the nations their inheritance, when he separated the sons of Adam, he set the bounds of the peoples according to the number of the children of Israel; for the Lord's portion is his people; Jacob is the lot of his inheritance." Both ancient and modern historians have thought, that the son of Sichem here, and also the sons of Ephraim just after, as appears, was the person which was pretty common, that every nation has its tutelary angel, an ἁγγέλιον, or ministering angel, to preside over it, but that God himself was such in a more eminent degree to the people of Israel. The version of the LXX., seems to have given rise to this opinion, for the rendering of Deut. xxxii. 8. is τινες ἄνω οίκονομοί οἱ ναοῦ, τινες ... ἐκ τῶν ἱδών οὖν ηερείων ἀνδρῶν ἀνδρῶν ἀνθρωποῖς. Indeed, this opinion of the kingdoms of the world being subject to the government of angels, is not only a part of the primitive, especially the Greek fathers; but it is not only from thence, these who followed the Septuagint translation, borrowed their notion. Bochart and De Muus agree, that these interpretations were not generally employed, but through a copy, and that the omission of some letters therein led them into this error (Phaleg, lib. i. cap. 15).

Ver. 15. Whom being his first-born, he nourisheth with discipline, and giving him the light of his love doth forshoke him. Φύειν γενετηρίου is a particular expression; there is a parallel one, ver. 26, φανερώθη φως. Out of the whole race of mankind did God select the Jews, among whom he dwelt in a particular and extraordinary manner, the divine majesty residing over the mercy-seat. These he singled out to be a holy nation, and marked them as his own people by certain peculiar marks. He was a vengeful God, but of a tender mercy, and of great sanctity, and by instituting the passover, which federally united them to him, and among one another. This seed of Jacob, so dear and beloved by God, was as much blessed should be the light of his countenance, and of his saving truth. He gave signal proofs of his affection for them, by continually watching over them for good; he intended their happiness and prosperity in all his actions, and by all his corrections and severest dispensations towards them, recalling them to their duty, and inviting them, in the tenderest manner, to return to the right way, - that their hearts may be moved by their sense of the favour up- on their repentance and amendment. This whole verse is omitted in the Vatican and in the Vulgate.

Ver. 17. The Lord being gracious, and knowing his workmanship, neither left nor forsaken them, but spared them. As the sense of the foregoing verse is well expressed by the psalmist, "He set their misdeeds before him, and their sins before all men." (Ps. cx. 8); so this seems to allude to Ps. lxviii. 39—40, where, speaking of the same Israelites, he says, "That though their heart was not wholly with God, neither conceived that which he did, yet he was very careful, that he forgave their misdeeds, and destroyed them not; yet, many a time turned he his wrath away, and would not suffer their sins to continue to an established state, because they were but flesh." הַנַשַּׂרֹת הַנָּשֶׂרֶת לְאַשְׂרֵי אֲשֶׁר, which is more expressly, Ps. cni. 13, 14, of the faithful in general; "As a father pities his own children, even so hath the Lord mercy on them that fear him, because we are made, he remembereth that we are but dust." אָבִי גוֹד יְנוּנָא גוֹד. the very expression used by this writer.

Ver. 18. The aim of a man is as a signet with him, and he shall keep the good repentance upon his head. By aim we may here understand all the good which a man does his neighbour, every action of pity and mercy performed by him, which he does for God's sake and his neighbour's; and lay it among his precious treasures, to reward and compensate it to the beneficent man and his posterity. The value God sets upon acts of mercy and kindness is not expressed here by "the apple of the eye," and the "signet on the right hand;" see Jer. xxx. 24, Haggai ii. 23. Cant. viii. 6, where the zeal or signet denotes what is near and dear to a man, and, as such, is therefore esteemed most precious. Messengers of Port-Royal, from this last comparison, apply what is here said of aims of acts of charity done in secret, which are as a valuable thing sealed up, till they are laid open by God, and by him publicly rewarded. The connection of this verse with what precedes is not very clear; Calmet and Bossuet give the following.—That as men condignly perform duties are always considered as so many good deeds likewise, and particularly acts of charity and loving-kindness, which, though unobserved of others, and for a time perhaps unanswered to the giver, yet are not fruitless or lost to God, deposits them among his treasures; and when he maketh up his precious jewels will remember them.

Ver. 19. Afterwards he will rise up and reward them, and render their repentance upon their head. If we join the words in the latter end of the former verse, viz., "He will give repentance to his sons and daughters," to this, we may perhaps be as well able to understand the whole than before the time will arise to reward them, and fill such beneficent souls with peculiar marks of his favour; like a kind master, who recompenses the faithfulness of his servants, or a general, who rewards the good repute as is proportionate to their merit. And this God will do either in this life, by outward blessings and prosperity, or hereafter, by receiving them into everlasting habitations.

Ver. 20. But unto them that repent, he granted them return, and comforted those that failed in patience. This is but inexpressibly rendered; it should either be, "Unto them that repent, he granted them return into his favour, and comforted them that failed in patience." The Geneva version has it; or, "Unto them that repented, he granted them a return into his favour, was willing to receive every penitent, and to comfort the broken-hearted." In the beginning of the kingdom of God, when a man repents with reason blame God who uses all methods to reclaim him; he illuminates him by his grace, he instructs him by his word, he admonishes, he threatens, he corrects, he recalls, such as wander from their duty, he waits their return and then gives them upon their repentance, and thereby comforts such as would otherwise be discouraged, and despair. But if we take it in the latter sense, we may then, with Grotius, understand this and the foregoing verse of the repentance more of the sins being before the Lord, and obstinately continued in, he will, after waiting some time for their amendment, proceed to punish them; and then it follows, by way of repentance, as repentance of sins, in order thereby done away from before the Lord, whether Israelites or others, he was disposed to be merciful and gracious, and to be kind for his grace upon them, to keep them again from failing.

Ver. 21. The Lord that shall praise the most High in the grave, instead of them which live and give thanks i.e. that they who are not living can alone have the ability to praise God; for, as the same inspired writer goes on, such as go down into the pit cannot hope for his truth, Ps. cxliv. 13, "his mercy." To death says the psalmist, vi. 5, there is no remembrance of the dead, "their sins and their righteous- ness are perished into the grave in the pit it." And so the Ps. cxv. 17, "The dead praise not thee, O Lord, neither all they that go down into silence, but we will praise the Lord," which the LXX. renders, ἔασμεν ἐν καταστροφῇ ἀλλ’ ἐμφανίζεται τὸ Κράνιον. Thus also, Ps. cxvii. 10. "lest thou shew wonders among the dead, or the dead rise up and praise thee." For the sense of the Hebrew word יְיָשָׁה, and signifies giants or mortals: they fell into this error by mistaking the radix, and deriving the word from יָשָׁה, to wander, and ñ1, 00, 10, implicitly following this version, retains the same mistake.

Ver. 22. Thanksgiving pertaineth from the dead, as from one that is not; the living and sound in heart shall praise the Lord. i.e. The duties of religion cannot be performed by one who is not in a state of existence, nor by one that is taken away from the land of the living. נֵפְרֵדָא וַחֲדָא אוֹמֶר, means not one that is annihilated, or quite ceased to be, or become nothing, as is the Vulgate exceptable rendering, Artue mortem confiteor, a mortuo quasi nihil, perit confessionis. Josephus, in the very chapter in which he acknowledgeth the truths delivered in the time of the Maccabees, says, "Our duty, to pay thanks to God from our being, εἰς τοῦ δὲ γένεσθαι εἶναι τὸν θεάν θείον ἐπιτρέπεται ἡ λατρεία, i.e. to him we render again, or owe our being, by the return of that soul which he had given us." (De Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap. 22. ver. 7). So Ps. cxlvi. 14, "The Lord is nigh unto all them that call upon him, to such as understand his commandments, and to such as seek him, who are ready to understand such only as are alive and in health, or who are easy in their minds, and flourishing in their circumstances; but such as are alive unto righteousness, and turn unto the Lord in holiness; who are contrite, and even broken-hearted, who have experienced, or hope to taste of God's mercy to them under a lively sense of their guilt, or the smart of some great calamity and affliction, and so the sense will be nearly the same with Baruch, ii. 17. "The dead who are in their graves, whose souls are taken from their bodies, will give unto the Lord neither praise nor righteousness; but the soul that is greatly vexed, which goeth stopping and feeble, shall give praise and righteousness, O Lord.'

Ver. 23. For all things cannot be in men, because the son of man is of the earth. Great as is the Paradise, God should be so meriful to his creatures, and condescend to pardon their weakness and follies, for men are neither impecable nor perfect. They are such that are surrounded with infirmities, that perfection is not to be expected from them; they are, as Abraham in great humility says of himself, sinful dust and ashes, and their days are few, as well as seen; their reason is naturally feeble, and learned, gracious, knowing his workmanship, of what perishable, corrupt, and frail materials it is made. The author enlarges here upon God's mercy, as a further argument to invite men to return and repent, and to the blessedness of life, as a powerful motive to set about it speedily.

Ver. 31. What is brighter than the sun? yet the light thereof shall fail: and flesh and blood will imagine evil

Our translators seem to have understood the sentiment expressed here, as Ver. 5, and yet I should have thought the passage in question (Job xxv. 4, 5, which is to the very same sense in other words), but they have not rendered it so accurately as they might have done. "What is brighter than the sun?" (R. V.) - If he had said that the sun cannot be referred to 限时, I answer, neither is it necessary that it should, but may be referred to "the greatest of powers." As God works through the sun, so he must have created it; and our translators have not omitted it, because it is confirmed by the Alexandrian copy, but because the other powers of heaven are either less, or only limited to good men, whereas the sun is a power to all men, which is naturally more subject to fallings than the sun is to eclipses, and the defects of both cannot be concealed.

Ver. 32. We are the power of the bright of heaven; and all men are but earth and ashes &c. דְּמוֹנָר יתָאְשָּׁו יָאֵשׁ אָבָּי הוֹנָא וְיַחֲדֶשׁ. It should rather be rendered here, "he visiteth, visiteth, finding fault with the powers of heaven." Syriac; Virtutes coeli judicata; as before, xiv. 18. "Behold the heaven, and the heaven of heavens shall be moved," and יָאֵשׁ יָאֵשׁ אָבָּי, when he shall visit or anamn¬ est upon them. דְּמוֹנָר יתָאְשָּׁו יָאֵשׁ אָבָּי is either the sun men¬ tioned, or the comparison of the proximity of things in strength like a giant, &c., or the whole host of heaven; viz., the stars, the powers of heaven that shall be shaken at his coming. דְּמוֹנָר יתָאְשָּׁו יָאֵשׁ אָבָּי is only the earth, for the only the sun is made all men are but dust and ashes; viz., greatly abused in God's sight, in comparison of some of his other works. So in Job, "The stars are not pure in his sight, how much less than that is a worm?" That which shine so bright to our view, are but as darkness to his all-piercing eye, and in comparison of the infinite purity of his nature; whom, if God considers and looks down upon as infinitely beneath him, of how small consider¬

ence and account is the race of men who are earth in their principle, and ashes at their dissolution! When our author thus beautifully sets forth the greatness of God, and the weakness of men, he affects some very surprising contrast, and how the just! How does it enlarge our ideas, and exalt our sentiments of the Deity, and at the same time shame and confound all human pride and greatness. The sense given of this passage is confirmed by the true rendering of the first verse of the next chapter.

CHAP. XVIII.

Ver. 1. He that liveth for ever created all things in gen¬ eral ילָאֶשׁ פָּלָא דָּשִׁי. Creavit omnia simul, Vulgate, which means, according to some, that without him was not created, the universe which is the same as saying, he would have God to be an idle spectator, not minding or concerning himself with the world, especially the lesser, and seemingly more insignificant parts of it, whatsoever may be produced, were all created in the infinite wise for God himself, who held the part only of the world were created by God, and not the whole. Others, and particularly St. Austin, have from hence maintained, that all things were created by God, not in the interval of six days, as is the Mosaic account, but in "eodem mo¬ mento, seu in codem eadem," that the heavens, and the earth, and the future seizes from whence all other things were to be produced, were all created in the same infinite instant. Others have held, that God created at once all the matter of the universe, a chaos, to serve as the basis upon which all things were to be built, and from whence all other things was produced, in the definite work of the six days, to have their rise and materials. But none of these opinions give so just an account of the crea¬ tion as that of Moses, for neither of all the things created together, nor the shapeless mass of matter by itself, nor were they all made at once in point of time. יהָעָבָּי in this place does not respect the time of the creation, but rather the universality of it (as of Poesel, Psal. cxv. 5). And that all things in general were made by God without ex¬ ception or distinction; that they were created by him, not merely set in order by intervals, and degrees of time, and periods of long duration, but over and above that, and in six days. Junius understands by יהָעָבָּי that God created all things upon a level, community, subject to one com¬ mon law, both of production and dissolution (Com. in loc.); but the Vulgate renders it, "in the sense of profanum. יהָעָבָּי is the same as die ἀκέραυνος, and by it the IXX. generally, if not always express it. It occurs in this sense, under the form of profanum, in St. Peter's vision, is common or unclean; and תָּאָמֶּס הָאֵרֶא הָאָרֶא אָבָּי כָּרְפְּאֵל, therefore, means here, that God hath created all things (uniquely) unclean, and the universe shall be judged; or found just, where he is judged (Ps. lii.). The Arabic version hath glanced upon this sense, totus mundus conrumpuerat. But indeed our translators have themselves confirmed it (ver. 3). "He is king of the whole power of heaven, and of all holy things among them from profane." Almost all the editions have מֹלָכָּל הָאֵרֶא מֹלָכָּל, which Junius and most of the Latin interpreters here follow; but the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the early fathers Hoseachius and Graive have it. Our translators have wrongly placed the comma after "king of all," it should be, "he is the king of all by his power," which is agreed by all the ancient copies, and is more agreeable to the Septuagint. Hpxcrai ἀκέραυνος ἡσσερίον φίλον. And it suits this better than the following sentence, "dividing holy things among them from profane," which was rather an act of wisdom than of power, for it made some days, and places; and the weighty reasons more holy than others, as some parts of the sacrifices also were more so than the rest: the like may be observed with respect to persons, for the peculiar rights and effects of the whole world, to be a holy nation to him, and, among those, the tribe of Levi to be a more peculiar manner his own. And in general it may be said, that ver. 15 is a continuation of the sub¬ ject of the last chapter, viz. the majesty and power of God and the weakness and frailty of man. And in the sense which is now offered, the connection is certainly more visible, and the comparison or contrast better preserved (see the last note).

Ver. 3. If a governor the world with the palm of his hand, and all things obey his will: for he is the King of all, by his holy power of heaven, and of all holy things among them from profane. אַלֹּה יַתֵּאָשָּׁו הָאֵרֶא שַׁבְיָא אָבָּי הָאֵרֶא הָאֵרֶא שַׁבְיָא תָּאָמֶּס. Almost all the editions have מֹלָכָּל הָאֵרֶא מֹלָכָּל, which Junius and most of the Latin interpreters here follow; but the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the early fathers Hoseachius and Graive have it. Our translators have wrongly placed the comma after "king of all," it should be, "he is the king of all by his power," which is agreed by all the ancient copies, and is more agreeable to the Septuagint. And in general it may be said, that ver. 15 is a continuation of the sub¬ ject of the last chapter, viz. the majesty and power of God and the weakness and frailty of man. And in the sense which is now offered, the connection is certainly more visible, and the comparison or contrast better preserved (see the last note). that can come near or resemble what he is. And when he thinks that he has made a good progress towards a discovery, he will acknowledge, with profound astonishment, that he knows nothing. One is very properly convinced that he is ignorant of God, that he cannot understand all or any of his secrets, the causes of his will, or the design of his operations, till he has well considered all the circumstances on which his mind and thoughts upon him, the more he will find him out of reach, that his counsels are deep, his dispensions mysterious, and his nature as impenetrable as his glory is inaccessible.

Every man has himself in the condition of Samuel, who, being asked what God was, demanded first two days, then four, afterwards a longer time, to deliberate, and then what such a long time of study would have made, the less he found himself able to satisfy the inquiry. The attempt to comprehend God, and to account for all his works and proceedings, is, to use the comparison of an ancient writer, this is son of man (Ps. 89. 7). Of the sea; by going about it, you are confounded, and by doing something of it, you find it impossible to do the rest (Naziianz. Orat. i.). Our author speaks of God in the same sublime manner, Mal. 1: 11.

Ver. 8. What is man, and where is his secret? what is his good, and what is his evil? Grotius understands this in a sense diametrical to that of the text. What is the secret of the Lord, there is God from man, what is his (God's) good or advantage from him, and what is his evil or hurt that can come from man? What can he do or render to God by his knowledge? and what can he do against God? If he attempt against God; if he is good, what can he do for him, that is of any great moment? See Ps. xvi. 2, where the old translation has, My goodness is nothing unto the inception of thy thoughts. But God is good, but it is for our profit not his own, that he requires it; according to that of Eleazar, Job xxii. 2, 3, Can a man be profitable unto himself? and who may be proud unto himself? Is it any pleasure to the Almighty that thou art righteous, or is it gain to him, that thou makest thy ways perfect? And again, xxxv. 6, 7, *If thou hastest what is good, and comest not to the waters, what multiple doth thou unto him? If thou be righteous, what givest thou him; or what receiveth he of thine hand? Thou wickedness may hurt a man as thou art, and thy care as thou art, and the son of man's consciousness of human imperfection, and the nothingness of our best service to profit God, very justly inquires, Quid tibi sal, ut amare te julesca me, et nisi faciam, inaniri mundi, et minera ingentes aminent? (Confes. lib. i. cap. 5.)

Ver. 9. The number of man's days are at an hundred years. The author of the nineteenth Psalm, composed, as it appears, soon after the death of the elephant, plausibly notes the ordinary term of man's life at seventy, or at most eighty years; in this writer's time men sometimes lived to a hundred, but that was the longest term. Macrob. cites with wonder the life of a certain man who was about a hundred years old, a Sudaq, but the story seems almost legendary. Caremon comitans antiquo, hoc a physica eruditus meta vi-veni, et hoc vitro humanae perfecta spatium termaturat; and Seneque with the latter, Provenesse te ad ultimum humani tempus, teque, mortem, quin dicam, mihi aeternum an anus (De Brit. Vita, cap. 3). Some Greek copies point the verse thus, ἀνρήστῳ ἔχωμεν ἀνθρώπῳ τι, εἶ δέλτωμα τι, i.e. the number of man's days are many years, even a hundred.

But this seems not to agree with what this writer says, xvii. 2, and πάντα should rather be taken here adversatively, as our translators and the Vulgate understand it: in some copies also at the end of the verse is added, ὡς τιμήζων καὶ δικαιομένων, i.e. the time of each man's death is unknown, and cannot certainly be fixed; or, as the Ge-exversa version has it, No man hath certain knowledge of his own life: the number of days is unknown to him that he cannot by art or calculation be determined. Cuyque prafilium odborne indiendi tempus, rationi nostrum potest computatur, ut Demus renders.

Ver. 10. As a drop of water unto the sea, and a great stone in comparison of the sand, so are thousand years to the days of eternity. The sense of this verse, as connected with the nine preceding, must be this, that man is but a drop in comparison to God. A man should live a thousand years, yet is that term nothing to eternity. The poetist has a thought not unlike this, A thousand years in thy sight are but as a watch in the night (Ps. xc. 4). And St. Peter, One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day (2 Pet. iii. 8.). And so the Lord is to be viewed as God, and in sancto presenti non sunt comparandi uni dies secularis justorum. Also is used in the sense it is here taken by Philo, who distinguishes between αἰώνα and χρόνος; the former belongs to incorporeal beings, as the latter is the measure of all substantial things and persons. Nazianzen says, θυμίαμα μετατρέπων, τοῖς ταῖς διάτοις αἰώνα (Orat. xxxvii.). The Vatican omits τίλιον and reads τίλιον διά τοῦ ὁμοίου, which very much weakens the comparison. Possibly both may have been written τίλιον, but some originally transposed the two letters. That a thousand years are but as few, compared unto the days of eternity. The author endeavours to illustrate this difference by the dimmitive of a mountain, and the height of a grave-stone to the sand on its shore; but these images do but faintly represent it, for there is a greater disproportion between time and eternity, than between the mountain and the grave-stone, in quantity whatsoever. But if a thousand years are as nothing with respect to eternity, how short must we account the longest term of a man's life, if compared to it? And by the mountain he means the high mountains, and by the grave-stone, that of a grave. Ver. 11, 12. Therefore is God patient with them, and lenient toward his own judgment, in the case of their end to be evil; therefore he multiplied his compassion. As God knows the weakness of man, and his propensity to evil, the shortness of his life, and the many infinities of his greatness, therefore, by his infinite compassion, he is not averse to take upon himself upon every offence, but bears with him for a time, waits for his amendment, and shows his great tenderness towards him, by giving him many gracious calls and occasions to return; and he is always as much willing to put him upon a speedy repentance, in order to prevent his ruin. Katharos את is thus taken, ix. 11 Timi. ii. 21. 2 Pet. iii. 12. A very strong word, extreme rigoir, he makes man's misery and infirmities rather a motive for his mercy towards him. Hence mercy is said to rejoice over judgment, and by Philo to be older than justice, and even the punishment of the best, of their own accord, to as a shepherd his flock.* The compassion which a man shows his neighbour, and the inclination which carries him to do good to others; and as God has promised to reward acts of charity and benevolence done to others, he may have a respect unto the recompense of the reward. Besides, the liberal act is a duty unto God, and not simply to do good to another, but to consider himself as subject to accidents, and under the like power of fortune with others, and therefore may one day fall into misfortunes, and stand in the same case, which in other times, he did not expect to serve others may be the most likely means to procure. But the love and compassion of God is entirely gratuitous, and free from my selfish views: he neither needs nor requires any return, but of duty; he has no view of providing against a day of calamity, as not being liable to be affected by any change or vicissitude of things: he is superior to all accidents, and out of the reach and power of them. Philo has very justly observed the bound of beauty of God, that he alone gives freely, μόνος δὲ και oμην κατά τὴν ἀνίκητην κατά, whilst all his creatures are to one another no better than cunning hucksters. Ἐρατήματος: ἐρατήματος, ἐρατήματος, προσωπικόν, ἐρατήματος, ἐρατήματος, ἐρατήματος, ἐρατήματος ἐρατήματος ἐρατήματος ἐρατήματος προσωπικόν ἐρατήματος (Πολ. Ναυτίλιον). The wise man here extols God's mercy from the universality of it, that it extends not to all, but only to such only as serve him, and them that serve him not: nay, these last seem to have a greater share of it, as indeed they stand more in need of it. These he admires, reproves, and commands. But with regard to the godly, he adds kind and wholesome corrections, that receive and profit by his discipline, he hath mercy on them, and receiveth as his own aught that to any he shall pronounce to be due, and he will bring them home on his shoulders reproving. Here the author finishes his answer to the objections brought, xv. 11, 12. xvii. 20—22.

Ver. 15. The truth of thy good deeds is either uncomfortable words when thou givest any thing. Ἐνεδρία Νοισώ Non des tristium verbi mult, Vulg. The author begins

here a new subject, which regards principally the manner of doing a kindness: he recommends not only doing good to one another, but doing it with a good grace, to give willingly and cheerfully, without delay or excuses, with kind words, and affectionate and winning looks: for the manner of doing a kindness is often beyond the act itself. True charity does not consist in either the one or the other of these; for the liberality of the former is spoiled by his burliness and great show; for the latter's is affected with pretence; but both these meet in a truly good man. He gives liberally to the poor, and is so far from exalting himself above them, and from being vaingloriously contumacious to them, that he learns humility from such an object.

Ver. 18. A fool will upbraid charitably, and a gift of a courteous manner the eyes. i.e. the gift of a courteous man, who grudges and even seems to envy what others receive from him, is the occasion of great grief and concern to the poor, who is rebuked and reproached by him for what he cannot help. A civil denial would be preferable to charity so extorted and ill-conditioned. The advice here to give in an obliging manner, not only respects our behaviour to such as are poor, but, according to St. Austin, to all others. If we give in a taunting and contemptuous manner is sure to give offence; instead of obliging, it grives the eyes of the receivers, and does not raise them. To prevent especially such a disposition I commend the using liberality into a sort of tyranny; and he that upbraids others with favours done them, and expects a servile compliance in return, makes his gifts as so many chains to entangle them, and either perverts the good purposes or exposes them refused than to have bought them so dearly. It is therefore a wise remark of an ancient philosopher, that he that receives a favour should never forget it; and he that confers one should not do it in an obnoxious manner. A polite man is more obnoxious and commended for the complaisant and obliging manner in which he does a favour, which graces more upon the hearts of men than the favour itself (see xx. 15–19, xii. 22).

Ver. 19. Learn before thou speak, and be not hasty when thou be sick. This advice respects the body, and includes diet, exercise, evacuations, and other suchlike preservatives of health. In diet stands last. It is a well known maxim, that in the case of any disease which is not a result of ignorance or a violent passion, the best mode of preserving health is the observance of certain general rules, and the supposition of others. In practice it regards the soul likewise. It relates to disease—confused, or against those whom we are justly disposed to regard as enemies. If we give in such a manner to the poor, as to bring them to a state of wretchedness, we may reasonably expect a similar treatment in return; whereas, if we help them with a cheerful countenance, and in a way that shews we are moved with compassion, we shall be sure to meet with the same kind and tenderly returns. This is the advice given by Spicileg. (vii.), which, though it seems to be a mere gloss, is yet the more likely to be true, as it is confirmed by the received tradition, and the following notices in the marches, &c.

But both are with a gracious man. ἄνθρωπος πολλά ἄσκειν εἰσίν ἐν τῷ ὑπάρχοντι, ἐν ὑπάρχοντι. To add words to good deeds is he will not content himself with kind salutations, with saying. Go in peace, be thou washed, and be thou restored again. The Lord will be willing to forgive the ignorance of those that are not able to express their gratitude with thankfulness. Verses 21, Capellus prefers εἰσίν ἐν τῷ ὑπάρχοντι here (Spicileg. p. 29, note 22). I. e. Both gifts and kind speeches are agreeable to men. And handsomely worded, pleasant speeches. These he says are the true gifts, and pleasant. Vulgate both oppose, I think they should have been dædæor iis, and ἀσκέται, for the plural seems fittest to express all men, or mankind. Besides, I think the common reading gives the sense, that he recommends the use of fair speech, not only to women, but to all good words and gifts. But that one who would be acceptable must be ready to give both, is an observation of some importance; because there may be persons apt to think either that liberality without affability, or affability without liberality, is a kind of corruptions, which are neither able nor popular. The Port-Royal comment has a fine reflection here: There are some who give liberally to the poor, and at the same time speak roughly or reproachfully to them; and there are others who speak to them with great humanity and tenderness, but give them nothing. True charity does not consist in either the one or the other of these; for the liberality of the former is spoiled by his burliness and great show, or his burliness and great show; but both these meet in a truly good man. He gives liberally to the poor, and is so far from exalting himself above them, and from being vaingloriously contumacious to them, that he learns humility from such an object. height by diet and abstinence, use the like circumcunction and care as to the diseases of your soul; let an early application prevent all danger, that so you may find favour before God. A wise man is the treasure of his own visitation. If pride be the sin that most easily beets those who learn to practise humility; if intemperance, subdue thyself by fasting; lie in sackcloth and ashes, and take away the flesh from the eyes.

And if thou hast at any time fallen into sin, restore thyself by a speedy repentance, and let a thorough reformation effect the cure.

Ver. 23. Before thou prayer, prepare thyself; and be as one that tempteth the Lord. Before we presume to address ourselves to God in prayer, we should remove the impurities of the heart, the grossness of the flesh, and wandering thoughts; we should purify our hearts by faith, contrition, and repentance, and endeavour to possess our souls with the idea of the presence and infinite majesty of the Most High, and to bring them to an attitude of holy readiness. We shall have no preparation or respect, without fear and trembling, with a soul taken up with trifles and impertinences, is an affront to him, and betrays a mean opinion of him, as if God was obliged to hear our prayers, and to grant what we ask of him with so much carelessness and indifference. God expects that we should prepare our own hearts, and also pray to him in suitable manner, in a spirit of holy work. There may also another sense be given of this place, viz. engage not lightly or rashly in vows, consider first whether you are resolved, and are likely to be able to fulfill them; for God lays a heavy charge, and will hold us accountable for the vows we make in the absence of prayer and consideration, where there is no intention of making them good. This seems to be intimated by the following verse.

Ver. 27. A wise man will fear in every thing, and in the doing of every thing pious and circumspect. He shall be careful to keep from sinning in every thing he says or does, or will in all times and places be upon his guard, as a prudent man.

"Happy is the man that feareth always" (Prov. xxviii. 14). And especially in times of general corruption and degeneracy, and when evil examples are many and powerful, he will be more circumspect, will not lead away the multitude to do evil, nor be infected with the reigning and popular contagion. As connected with the former verse the sense may be, that a wise man, careful of his own conduct, when he saw the uncertain, will in every condition of life expect and prepare for a change; he will not be dejected in adversity, nor too close in prosperity, but will demean himself agreeably under either state of fortune, as a prudent man, or soon easily be effect by God; but a fool, who attends not to such revolutions, provides not against accidents, nor in any respect acts in that holy work. There may also another sense be given of this place, viz. engage not lightly or rashly in vows, consider first whether you are resolved, and are likely to be able to fulfill them; for God lays a heavy charge, and will hold us accountable for the vows we make in the absence of prayer and consideration, where there is no intention of making them good. This seems to be intimated by the following verse.

Ver. 28. Every man of understanding knoweth wisdom, and will give praise unto him that found her. To understand mankind, is a piece of useful knowledge, but the most difficult thing to come to an exact and well acquainted with, persons of the most worth; and after having discovered true merit, to do justice to it, to set it before the world; this is the right, to commend and speak of it without jealousy, envy, and partiality, will be certain, will in every condition of life expect and prepare for a change; he will not be dejected in adversity, nor too close in prosperity, but will demean himself agreeably under either state of fortune, as a prudent man, or soon easily be effect by God; but a fool, who attends not to such revolutions, provides not against accidents, nor in any respect acts in that holy work. There may also another sense be given of this place, viz. men of understanding are wise in their talk, they know when and what to speak: this is Drusius's exposition, who points the Greek thus, eccei, to λαός καὶ τῶν τιμωρομένων. There may be several senses given of this passage; viz. Men of understanding are wise in their talk, they know when and what to speak: this is Drusius's exposition, who points the Greek thus, eccei, to λαός καὶ τῶν τιμωρομένων. Or the meaning may be, of their talk and of understanding in discourse, will then have a distinct and peculiar, or in some of their conduct, for wisdom is best displayed by an exactness in both; and, according to this sense, the Greek should be translated to λαός καὶ τῶν τιμωρομένων. And thus the Syriac understands it, Scientes doctrinam, ipsi quoque sapienter se gerent. There may be also a third sense, That such as have attained unto great skill and understanding, may be justly accounted for frequent meetings, assemblies, or entertainments, where great expenses are incurred, especially if a man's circumstances are but indifferent, and his business or way of life does not comport with such extravagance. It is spending money foolishly, in fashionable, perhaps, but not good company, and is the ruin of private persons especially, without any real necessity or obligation. What this writer says of the labourer, is applicable to all other men and women. Wise men are to use their fortune, and their work, and to claim all the former gains by their labour; as their expense is too great for their income, every sum that goes out unnecessarily, the want of it, and the want of what might be done with it industriously, will be felt in our families; and it is generally seen, that poverty is the lot of such as neglect business, and the advantages of a good calling, to pursue diversions and join the worldly folly of their less wise neighbours. He that carefully circumvents all small things shall fall by little and little. This maxim, which is of consequence in economy and politics, is more so when applied to morality. A man should be careful of and negligent in no part of his conduct, should continually make a fresh progress in goodness; not to advance is to go back. One should carefully avoid the very least faults, for fear of falling into greater; and what the world calls venial sins are perhaps more carefully scrutinized than what seems an mortal only, as the latter are more shocking in their own nature, and inspire a sort of horror in the committing them; but the other, through their smallness, are generally overlooked, and their reproofs are commonly given in small degrees, if questioned, or started at: as a man is shocked at jumping down a precipice, but scruples not to attempt the same by gentle approaches, and to descend insensibly by small steps. (Hos. viii. 9.)

In every instance of an ancient writer, μη καὶ μὴν ἐνάγεται, a small sin to cease so when it leads to a great sin; but such a scruple is never so often recurring, that these little indiscretions, to say no worse of them, combine and cluster to such a degree, that, like the grapes mentioned Numb. xii. 3, they become too great a load for the soul. (2 Cor. x. 12.)

Ver. 2. Wise and women will make men of understanding to fall away; and he that cleave to harlots will become impudent. The prophet Hosea accordingly observes that "whoso will walk by the way of the flesh, he shall die in it." (Hos. x. 7.) i.e. from God; they incline men to renounce him, to rebel against him, and even turn apostates. These are the two rocks upon which there is so much danger of splitting, that he that is not converted must not make use of the example. For there has the like observation in some of his writings, and was himself a melancholy instance of the truth of one part; and to him we may add Samuel, and the whole people of Israel, who gave themselves up, to the occasions of the Midianitish women. The consequence of such a company is here very justly observed to be effrontery and impudence, which is read reprobation of the sense, and is more proper; for he that cleaves to harlots, is not only in danger of becoming impudent, but has already given proofs of his boldness and want of modesty; it means that such loose company will make a man grow more hardened and profligate, and will strip him of all sense of decency; the abandoned rake in time scruples no more, and often out of an air adopts some which he was inwardly possessed of, but which persons of a better disposition do at wickedness.

Ver. 3. Moths and worms shall have him to heritage, and a bold man shall be taken away. i.e. His lewdness and immorality will throw him into many diseases; corruption and rottenness, and all the dreadful consequences of a vicious life, appear upon his body; he is emaciated and consumptive, his health deserted himself, and the oblorescence of others, he dies a sad spectacle, and a dreadful monument and warning to men of pleasure; ἠπίστους ἐκ νηπίων μικρῶν παιδίων, as some copies have it, his death shall be a standing reproach and ignominy to others. Solomon, speaking of the strange woman, lays open her artifices, and the dangers which attend the company of such as enchantress, Prov. v. 3-5, 9. 11. "Her lips drop as a balsam, her mouth and teeth are of burnished gold; her end is bitter as wormwood, sharp as a two-edged sword; her feet go down to death, and her steps take hold of hell. Remove thy way from her, and come not near the paths of her house. For she is a harlot, and altogether a seduc- ther at the last, when thy flesh and thy body are consumed." (4. He that is hasty to give credit is light-minded.) Some interpreters understand this of credulity in general, as a sign of a weak mind; Præstis takes the place in this sense, and refers to Prov. xiv. 15. "The simple believeth every word," as a parallel passage; and so the oriental versions. Others expand it of a faulty prominence both to believe and speak ill of our neighbours, the crediting and spreading evil reports to his disadvantage, instead of letting the good man, who is cautious, and suspends his assent, be the more exposed. Innumerable persons, filters, and false accusers, and the like, false reports even what he knows or believes to be true, to the prejudice of another. But Calmet says, the author is here speaking, de ceux qui se livrent inconsiderément aux pla- teurs de bavard, of such who give themselves up in esamnelement and forbidden pleasures, who rashly go after and weakly listen to women of infamous characters, and are drawn into their plots and artifices. And Grotius prefers this sense, and indeed the context manifestly leads to it. It follows "He that sineth," by acts of uncleanness, "offsends against his own soul," i.e. sin- niteth himself, and as God may either despise and trample on his soul, and then the sense will be the same with Prov. vi. 32, "Whoso committeth adultery, lacketh under- standing, that he doth destroies his own soul;" or it is well understood, that he is a kind of a cause and occasion of sin, by such irregularities, and offers a sort of violence to himself; like that of St. Paul, "Fiee fornication: every sin that a man doth is without the body; but he that commiteth fornication sinneth against his own body." (1 Cor. vii. 31.)

Ver. 5. Whose tothple pleasure in wickedness shall be condemned: There are two senses given of this place (πεπληροφόρητος εἰς κοιμασίαν, παραγωγὴς εἰς κοιμασίαν, "παραγωγὴς εἰς κοιμασίαν, παραγωγὴς εἰς κοιμασίαν."") the other is, ἐν κοιμασίαν, ἐν κοιμασίαν καταγωγής εἰς κοιμασίαν, the man of pleasure shall be punished with wickedness, and that wickedness is the loss of, or the taking away of, the habit of body: κοιμασία, in this sense, means what the physicians call καταγωγή, but the virtuous and chaste man, that restraineth such unlawful (venereal) pleasures, as he doth not follow his lust, and as a consequence of his life sound and healthful. "Ἀντιπῆγαί δὲ ἀναπήγα, is a most beautiful figurative expression, which the versions but maintain; and he understandeth that the expression in Josephus, παραγωγὴ τοῦ ἀναπήγα (Amic. lib. iii. in Luc- tuas, "Cupidinum responsare," in Horace, comes not very short of it (see Acts xxvii. 15.).

Ver. 6. He that can rule his tongue shall live without strife: and he that hath babbling shall have less evil. The first part of this is clear enough, reading ἄριστος μικρῶν, and not ἄριστος, as most copies have it. The latter has two senses given, as follows: first, to speak well, to be much, and good, to have credit. Such is the sense, for nocey or babbling, as our translators render it, then he that hath it, ἄριστος μικρῶν, is devoid of ma- ny faults, is indulgent, of little or no evil-heartedness, and escape for the other, be it evil, or sin; which seems to mean in this writer, what St. Paul means by οὐκ ὀνάστη ὁ παῖς, children in understanding, and ἀναπήγα τοῦ ἀναπήγα what he means by τὸ καλὸν ἀναπήγα (1 Cor. xiv. 20). And this seems to be a better sense of ἄριστος μικρῶν, than that which our translators give, "He shall have less evil;" for ἀναπήγα is more properly a vice, a personal fault, than an evil, or misfortune. After the first sentence, "He that can rule his tongue shall live without strife;" then the sense follows, "and he that hath babbling," shows he hath not a malicious or contentious disposition, though that followed by our translators is good sense, and ἄριστος is so used, Matt. vi. 34, and by the LXX. sometimes: Rehearse not unto another that which is told unto thee, and thou shalt have no evil words. In Latin, κατα- signifies in general to use replications, as it is taken, vi. 14, and in the sense it is, Be not troublesome by tedious and unnecessary repetitions, which will not make you better understood, nor get you any credit or advantage. Or it may mean, let him have not one but another, and so, with any one, with assensation and positiveness, which exchanging of words begats quareille, and often ends in real hurt and mischief. The Latine use commutare verba, when they mean to make one word change into another; that is, to make what one hears, which is the sense of our translators here, and xil. 23, and of the Tigrum version. The Vulgate rendering, Ne feceris verba nequam et daram, furnishes us with an exact translation of the sense, let not the things you hear, or unjust thing of any man, do not stand in it, or repeat it, and so make the fault worse; but be silent for the future on that head, or rather endeavour to recall it, and take pains to excuse it. Or it may mean, lastly, if you have heard any thing to the disadvantage of your neighbour, do not repeat it again, or spread the report, and you will gain esteem: Nepos a criminaris, Syr., and have the character of a discreet and friendly person. He is that it thus cautious of his conduct with respect to others, taketh the surest way to live peaceably with all men, and not to offend through any cause or other.

Ver. 7. Rehearse not unto another that which is told unto thee, and thou shalt have no evil words. Inquired not into other persons' affairs, which no ways concern thee, for such a curiosity is imper- fection, and a sure way to fall into the greatest inconveniences and dangers, lest thou bring not ill report of any man, neither friend nor foe, as the margin has it, nor say any thing to affect his character, un- less thou are under a regular duty to say it, and in that case, to a friend or enemy. The Vulgate ren- ders Amico et inimico noli narrare sensum tum, which may furnish another sense; viz. not to reveal or trust with any person a secret or betrayal, either friends or enemies, or unjust thing of any man, do not stand in it, or repeat it, and so make the fault worse; but be silent for the future on that head, or rather endeavour to recall it, and take pains to excuse it. Or it may mean, lastly, if you have heard any thing to the disadvantage of your neighbour, do not repeat it again, or spread the report, and you will gain esteem: Nepos a criminaris, Syr., and have the character of a discreet and friendly person. He is that it thus cautious of his conduct with respect to others, taketh the surest way to live peaceably with all men, and not to offend through any cause or other. to us in confidence. These even our friends have no right to know, much less our enemies, who will make an ill use of such intelligence, and turn the discovery we have made to our damage and disadvantage.

Ver. 9. (The voice saith,) Fear, reveal them not. The Geneva version has, "If the sin appear not unto thee, reveal it not:" and Coverdale's, "If thou hast offended, tell not thy sin to any other." But that which is eternally (etiam) nti eti eri angapor: i.e. Though there be no sin in thee, reveal not the sins of others, on account of the consequences after-mentioned; or, talk not of nor censure others' faults, unless you be free from transgressing yourself, in the same sense that our Saviour said, "He that is without sin among you, let him throw the first stone" (John xix. 10).

Ver. 10. If thou hast heard a word, let it die with thee; and be bold, it will not burst thee. i.e. Says St. Chrysostom, suppress it, forget, extinguish, bury it, be as though thou hadst not heard it, or as one to be, do not reveal it. (Hom. 3. ad Pop.) Some copies have τεκμήριαν ταυτένα, "let it die in thee." The Vulgate properly adds, Audisti sermonem adversum prosum tuum? which makes the sense more determinate and clear. The suppressing or concealing within our breasts what we have heard of moment, the wise man elegantly compares to liquor in a cask without any vent. There is a like comparison applied to speech by the apostle, "For it is a shame even to speak of such matters" (Col. iv. 6) answer and show his opinion, says, "I am full of matter, the spirit within me constraineth me. Behold, my belly is as one who hath drunk too much wine; I cannot speak, and refrain myself, I may perhaps be taken from poison, which a person unhealthily swallowing, is in danger of swelling to that degree, as to be even burst, unless it be speedily thrown out." (Matt. xvi. 24.)

Ver. 11. A fool speaketh a word, and a woman in labour of a child. ἄνδρι προδότον λόγον ἐν φόβω εἰσίν ταῖς. The sake of the wise, from an idle person, or a busybody, when he has been told a secret, or has picked up a piece of scandal, is so big with it, that he has no ease or quiet, through a certain levity of mind, or malignity of spirit, which he has brought forth; or perhaps it may perhaps be taken from poison, which a person unhealthily swallowing, is in danger of swelling to that degree, as to be even burst, unless it be speedily thrown out." (Matt. xvi. 24.)

Ver. 12. A fool speaketh a word, and a woman in labour of a child. ἄνδρι προδότον λόγον ἐν φόβω εἰσίν ταῖς. The sake of the wise, from an idle person, or a busybody, when he has been told a secret, or has picked up a piece of scandal, is so big with it, that he has no ease or quiet, through a certain levity of mind, or malignity of spirit, which he has brought forth; or perhaps it may perhaps be taken from poison, which a person unhealthily swallowing, is in danger of swelling to that degree, as to be even burst, unless it be speedily thrown out." (Matt. xvi. 24.)

Ver. 13. Jachin speaketh a word, and Boaz knoweth not what is over his tongue; and a woman in labour of a child. "But of whom he saith, He speaketh not with his tongue, but is silent, and that he that speaketh not with his tongue may be silent an hundred years, it is no sin; but that he speaketh not with his tongue, it is a sin. "(1 Cor. xiv. 19.)

Ver. 14. A fool speaketh a word, and a woman in labour of a child. ἄνδρι προδότον λόγον ἐν φόβω εἰσίν ταῖς. The sake of the wise, from an idle person, or a busybody, when he has been told a secret, or has picked up a piece of scandal, is so big with it, that he has no ease or quiet, through a certain levity of mind, or malignity of spirit, which he has brought forth; or perhaps it may perhaps be taken from poison, which a person unhealthily swallowing, is in danger of swelling to that degree, as to be even burst, unless it be speedily thrown out." (Matt. xvi. 24.)

Ver. 16. My heart was as it were a hidden spring, and my voice as the echo of the sounding bow. This is a comparison of the heart and voice, with a particular of the string which is used in the bow, and the sound which is made by it. A bow is a kind of instrument made of strong wood, a string of gut or hemp, and is held in the hand. A spring is a kind of instrument made of elastic wood, or other elastic substance, and is used in many machines. A spring can be compared to the voice, because it is made to produce sound by its action, and produce it with a diversity of qualities, and according to the degree of spring of the instrument, and the nature and length of the string which is placed in it. Ver. 30. A man's attire, and excessive laughter, and great vanity of dress, and a profuse expenditure of money, and a taste for finery, and a fondness for fine clothes and costly apparel. The like may be said of immoderate laughter, which is no recommendation to friendship (1 Cor. 13:2), and of those who spend so much of their time and means upon their dressing, that the meaning we are assured from xx. 30, where it is observed of the fool, that "he lifteth up his voice with laughter" that a wise man doth scarce smile a little."—Scrid. 6, "interdum demonstrant, quaeruntur se curiosa, etiam sapientiae."

Ver. 31. This verse appears to be the same as Matthew 22:13-14, and the parallel passage in Luke 12:20. The meaning is that time is a precious commodity, and we should not waste it on worldly things. "Sic vero, he or she who has considered the matter of leisure in the seventh, as some copies have it; the Vatican and Syriac wholly omit it."—Ver. 4. As is the last of a poem to/diversity of the mind; as he is the last of the poetry with violence.

Ver. 5. Just as in this verse, by this writer, as it is also by the poets and philosophers, compared to a chaste and beautiful virgin; and a corrupt lady to a pregnant whore, with the latter considering her chastity, though he has the charge of her, and has encouraged to watch over her with strictness, to preserve her with faithfulness.

Ver. 6. This verse appears to be the same as Matthew 23:28, as a confirmation of this sense. But the former seems preferable.

Ver. 8. As he that wrouth many words shall be observed; and he that taketh to himself authority therein shall be hated.]—O irope, sapequic. Which means one who assumes such a sway in company and conversation, as is attended with an overbearing, authority, arrogance, and a teasing, with a siding to, and lording it over them. This affected superiority is contrary to that equality and freedom which are the life of conversation, and the right of each person engaged in it. Grotius has well determined this passage to be genuine; "sermo lenis, minusque pertinax, nec vero, tanquam in possessionem suam venerit, exclusa alio; sed cum in rebus rebus, turba, tuque commune, vicissiduo non immane fidem Office lib. i."

Ver. 9. There is a sinner that hath good success in evil things; and there is a gain that turneth to loss.

Ver. 10. Some editions omit "quarto saeculo," and thus Bossuet renders, Est Felix successus qui malo vertat; and Grotius, Intendum in malis hominum prosperitas sit est: and the Vulgate, Prosp. xxvii. 1. The benefactors, as it is usual to translate the word, have by far the best sense of the word. Instances of this observation are Haman, Jehu, Abah, &c., who made a miserable exit. See Ps. xxxviii. 29, where the Septuagint translation is very full to this purpose. Other copies have "fero eum saeculo quinto saeculo"; i.e., "There are some men, sinners particularly, that take pleasure in evil, or wickedness." And thus Junius, Placent. mala vicino pectori; eum saeculo is badly rendered by the Vulgate and other interpreters, "invenire," signifies gain, as it is well translated here, and the antithesis is better preserved.

Ver. 11. Ver. 11. "And in a gift whose recompense is double;" The Vulgate has, "dicat ille "He that giveth to the rich shall surely want" (Prov. xxii. 16): and by the "gift whose 4 P. recompense is double," that which is given to the poor (Prov. xxvi. 27).

Ver. 11. There is an abatement because of glory; and there is that lifteth up his head from a low estate. There are many who have been lifted up with ambition, which have in the end proved their ruin; through tyranny, pride, oppression, or some mismanagement, they have been deprived of their power and dignity, and have been forced to retire. So a sudden advancement to some piece of good fortune or preferment turns to his disgrace, as his elevation makes his faults more discoverable, or in private speech were not so easily dismissed. Galba, before he succeeded to the empire, was thought the most worthy of it, Ommum consensus ex parcius imperum, si non imperasset (Tac. Hist. lib. i.) but upon his promotion to the dignity and with the elevation which the emperor had conceived of him. Every man before he aspires to a dignity ought to consider what he is, and how far his capacity and abilities will reach; but few are impartial to themselves in the estimate of their own merit, which they are apt to think is greater than it really is, and thereby deceive themselves and disappoint the expectation of others. Haman and Nebuchadnezzar are instances of abatement from a high station, as Joseph, David, Job remarkable an elevation from a mean one. In like manner, he who aspires to seat himself in the highest place at the wedding, is threatened to be removed with shame to the lowest place at a feast, and the meanest room, the reward is, 'Friend, go up higher.' (Luke xiv. 16).

Ver. 12. There is that layeth much for a little, and repayeth it sevenfold. The covetous man is here meant, who always purchases what is cheapest, and generally what is worst, and therefore is never a gainer by his bargains. He therefore lays a greater premium on the lowliness of the price, but in effect he is a loser, because that which is worth little or nothing must always be bought too dear. We see the truth of this observation in those that have had good by chance, or by which they have been enriched, for the same reason; in those likewise who purchase houses badly built, or estates with bad titles, containing themselves with the thought of having bought them at a lower and easier rate on that account, the bargain is cheap, and they prove dear bargains to them; the house is crazy, and must be speedily rebuilt; and the estate must be parted with at a still lower rate, to pay the expenses in clearing and defending the title.

Ver. 13. A wise man by his words maketh himself beloved; but the groves of foods shall be poured out. 1.) Speras verum in indicium sit, curum in rebus quae sunt, id est, quae in ordine est, but which do not suit with the character of a fool (see xxi. 16). In the next verse it is more plainly expressed, and called the "gift of a fool;" and so φυλλὸς is used xvi. 23, and φύλλοι the garden of God, and it is frequently used in the New Testament, particularly in St. Paul's writings. The sense is, A wise man recommends his kindness by his words, and the agreeable manner in which he deals, is his most certain and surest way of securing himself; he confers all the merit of it, by his dissembling way and improper behaviour. His benevolence is lost and disregarded, because it is not meet. His freedom to him, as the garden, will be hateful. What is here said of the fool, may also be observed of the ensues or covetous man mentioned in the next verse, who gives unwillingly, ἀλλα ἐκλαυρίζειν αὐτός, as it were through force, or a necessary laid upon him, and expects to receive as much or more in return, ἀλλὰ ἀποτελεῖται. Some copies read ἀλλὰ ὑπερβαίνειν ἀλλαὶ as the margin also has it. The Vulgate well expresses his greediness, when it renders or voces copias sumit; i.e. he hoardeth to receive seven times as much from thee.

Ver. 14. He giveth little, and upbraideth much; he openeth his mouth like a crier. See xviii. 18. This is a farther description of the foolish person, who spoils all his favours by his imperfect behaviour and discourse. If he makes you a present, he is sure to reproach you with it; so that all the merit, if there be any in so small an act of kindness, as is here mentioned, is taken away by his uppriasing temper. Is thine commensitio ex qua equestri immembrance beneficiti. It is a wise observer, that he distinguishes the high, the rich, who do, and never forget those which we receive. Seneca observes, that it took off from the grace of Dido's hospitality, when she reproachfully told θαλάσσας.

Ejectum litterae, egressum Excepta, et regni dominas in partes locavit.

How contrary is such a selfish, churlish temper, to that of the all-sufficient and bountiful God, whose peculiar charge is it, that he giveth liberally and upbraideth not: he has nothing in view but the good and happiness of his creatures, and neither wants nor expects any return, but that all be done in his name. He neither fills a man's hand with a sin, nor gives him, ἔνα ἀνάθημα ἡμῖν αἰνεῖν ψευδώς (De Cherubim).

Another character of the covetous man we have in the latter part of the verse,—that if he lendeth his money, his interest is twenty per cent; and he presses of it. It is extravagant, and doth not call it in, his credit, honesty, or circumstances; it is depriving him of the advantage which he proposed by longer use of it, and, so, is not done by distress, and from the interest he is to have more injury than he received kindness from first advancing it.

Ver. 17. He knoweth not what it is to have, and it is all one unto him as if he had it not. This is not in the Roman edition, after quam egressus est, de opprimere exspectans. I.e. He has not the art, or gift, or blessing, of using what he has, and it is the same thing to a fool, or a covetous person, to be poor or rich, as to any use of their good; for either the one or the other knows what it is to have, i.e. to enjoy or employ their riches. The Vulgate gives another sense of the place, that the fool knows not either to give or to keep his goods; he gives improperly that which he holds not fast enough to keep, and which he ought to have; he gives to such as ought to have none of his favours, and refuses to give to such as he ought to give to. The Vulgate renders according to this reading, Lapsus de teeto tolerabilior est quam lingua. In the next verse ἐκλαυρίζεσθαι, in all the editions, makes a part of the text, though undoubtedly it was either some marginal annotation, or which seems more probable, the title only to what follows, of which there are many instances in this book; and in some copies they are in larger letters, to distinguish them. Our translators have made, it is of this opinion of him flagging the words into the margin.

Ver. 21. There is that is hindered from sinning through merit: and when he taketh rest, he shall not be troubled. There are many who are ready, with zeal and desire, to do those things who would have done as others did, and taken the same liberties, if they had had the means, the opportunity, and power. Such persons are not the proper object of their self-denial or moderation, since their virtue is wholly involuntary, a man who, through a bad constitution, or a weak habit of body, is hindered from temperance, def discordancy, or wantonness, has no merit on that account, since not the will was wanting, but the power of sinning.

Non sit equo egeo, neque in fucinum,
Non sit equo egeo, neque in fucinum.

Faremens. (Ter. in Andrel. v. 104.)

There is, however, this advantage in wanting a power or opportunity to do what one wills, to do the sinning, and to admit of conscience attending it. If a man has no merit on that account, he has likewise no after-reflections to torment him; though the will indeed cannot be pronounced innocent if the inclinations were counselling, and nothing hindered the opportunity.

Ver. 22. There is that destroyeth his own soul through backsliding, and by accepting of persons. This is a piece of wisdom, that there is no remorse of conscience attending it. If a man has no merit on that account, he has likewise no after-reflections to torment him; though the will indeed cannot be pronounced innocent if the inclinations were counselling, and nothing hindered the opportunity. to do or oppose any evil action pressed upon, or recommended to him, the owner, for the company, or being thought precise and singular; whereas, in the exercise of religious duties, or where the cause of truth calls for our testimony and denunciation, we should rather despise and laugh at the advantage which the world can derive from us, or the advantage of others, as well as of himself, through a false modesty. The man who knows how to be silent, and to profess the like ignorance of himself, may, by the weight of his prudence and judgment; but he that ingloriously buries

his parts in sulliances or retirement, and deprives his neighbours, or the public, of the advantages which they might hope from him, or from the gifts given him by God, in not employing that gift which was given him for the use of edifying and assisting others; and desibleng

men for want of kindness, and a public spirit. Here the

Vulgate, on the different versions, Vulgate, and some of the other editions, conclude the chapter; but others add, which our translators follow. " Necessary patience in seeking the Lord, is better than he that leadeth his life without a guide." The sense of which seems to be, that it is far better for a man to live in an humble dependence upon God, in a painful and conscientious search to know his will, and combat the nature of his hindrances; and to be guided by himself only, and be under his own conduct, without any further help than the feeble light of his own reason. The Greek of this place is very remarkable,

{omniscor-} but of the Greek version of the Church of St. Clement, and of St. John Chrysostom, he who, as the priest governor abdique Domini, one who lives without God in the world, and seeks not the guidance of his Spirit, nor values and regards the light of his revelation, nor sets up his own prudential and arbitrary restraint, but is guided by himself only, and is under his own action, whereby all his acts are directed by the several impulses

which consists rather in liveness than in a blue true liberty, is very properly here compared to a chariot run away with by unruly horses, without a skilful driver to manage them.

But this is not all. Such ungovernable force of nature, such lust and passions; so helpless is reason itself unsubstituted!""}

CHAP. XXI.

Ver. 1. Hast thou sinned? do so no more, but ask pardon for thy former sins.] The most wise and cautious find themselves frail, and are often falling into sin, but they do not persevere or continue long in it, but they rise again by comparing their present action with the evil of their former actions; and observing how God has been merciful to them, and avoiding them for the future. Whereas the wicked are continually relapsing, and by repeated acts strengthen themselves in their iniquities. They are rolling down, as it were,

from one precipice to another, and have neither grace nor strength to recover themselves. St. Chrysostom well observes, ελκά χαίνον τα τηρεύον την ἐλεοντιάς ἢ τα τηρούμενα θρησκείας ηδονήν, that it is not a question of the fall into sin, but of going on in sin; the first implies a fall; the latter proceeds from an habitual will. It appears from this instance of Noah, whom we may infer, from the silence of scripture, to have fallen into the sin of drunkenness but once, and that this was recorded in the sacred text, that all men that are under a voluntary control should be more cautious for the future, and not wallow again in the mire (Hom. 29. in iex. Gen.). The advice of a wise man is most lenient and mild; it is as a father urging his children to avoid sin; it is like a wise shepherd, warning his flock not to enter the first door of sense, either eye or ear, nor the second of fancy, nor the third of understanding, nor the fourth of will, lest it break out into act; and one act will produce more, and so it will increase infinitely, till the heart is made hard and insensible, and the very principles of nature and grace are obliterated "(Jackson's Works, tom. iii.)

Ver. 2. flee from sin as from the face of a serpent : for if thou comest too near it, it will bite thee :] The Vulgate renders, Si accesseris ad ilium, suscipient te, following a faulty copy, probably, which had δαρείαν, instead of οἴκλαν drown, which whoever either im-providently throw themselves into its paws, or whom it finds asleep, and off their guard. It is also well compared in the next verse to a two-edged sword, as it attacks both God and man; the majesty of the former, and the safety of the Pudicit libus qui in studia so abiderunt, ut ad vivam columbam cum suis. (Columba, etc.)

Ver. 31. Better is he that hideth his folly than a man that hideth his wisdom.] The former doth it out of a principle of humility, as conscious of his own weaknesses and insufficiencies; the latter, to hide his ignorance, vanity, and the advantage of others, as well as of himself, through a false modesty. The man who knows how to be silent, and to profess the like ignorance of himself, may, by the weight of

his prudence and judgment; but he that ingloriously buries

his parts in sulliances or retirement, and deprives his

neighbours, or the public, of the advantages which they

might hope from him, or from the gifts given him by God, in not employing that gift which was given him for the use of edifying and assisting others; and desibleng

men for want of kindness, and a public spirit. Here the

Vulgate, on the different versions, Vulgate, and some of the other editions, conclude the chapter; but others add, which our

translators follow. " Necessary patience in seeking the Lord, is better than he that leadeth his life without a guide." The sense of which seems to be, that it is far better for a man to live in an humble dependence upon God,

in a painful and conscientious search to know his will, and

combat the nature of his hindrances; and to be guided by himself only, and be under his own conduct, without any further help than the feeble light of his own

reason. The Greek of this place is very remarkable,

of St. Clement, and of St. John Chrysostom, he who, as the priest governor abdique Domini, one who lives without God in the world, and seeks not the guidance of his

Spirit, nor values and regards the light of his revelation,

nor sets up his own prudential and arbitrary restraint, but

is guided by himself only, and is under his own action,

whereby all his acts are directed by the several impulses

which consists rather in liveness than in a blue

true liberty, is very properly here compared to a chariot run away with by unruly horses, without a skilful driver to manage them.

But this is not all. Such ungovernable force of nature, such lust and pas-

latter; and its wounds are mortal, and only the sovereign physician can cure them. The wise man did not without reason mention that man whom he compared with the unicorn, because if we join together all the ideas that can any ways create fear, they are few, and little enough to possess a man with that dread and horror which he ought to have of sin.

Ver. 5. He that buildeth his house with other men's money, is like one that gathereth stones for the tomb of his burial. i.e. is heaping up ruin to himself. Calmet thinks that this refers to Solomon, who caused the precious stones which covered the graves or dead bodies of persons remarkable for some crime (see Josh. vii. 36. 2 Sam. xviii. 17, 18). This they did to perpetuate the memory of the victims, and to show the public ghastliness of such crimes. In like manner, he that builds his house at the cost and expense of another, by making use of his money, and defrauding him of his right, is like one that buildeth his house on his own hart and shame, and erects a monument to his folly and injustice, as long as it is in being, and, instead of being a house to shelter him in, will bury him under its foundations. This he accordingly enunciates, and the throne of Judah, for building his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong; and acquaints him, that by his oppression he was hastening his own ruin, and instead of long enjoying his properly built, built with the wages of the poor and hireling, he should be 'burieth with the burial of an ass, and be cast forth in the most indirect and contemptible manner,' xvii. 13 (see Lev. xix. 14. Deut. xxi. 14. Isa. v. 8. Hab. ii. 10-11). Some copies have φησὶν ὡς σκάφος ἐν τῇ πόλει κτισθής εἰς ταφήν, as if he that gathereth stones against winter, which is the Vulgate and Coverdale's reading. The word, however, is the root of the idea, of doing something useless, 'Lapidis pro inutilibus' (see Erasm. Adag.). And in this sense we may understand that of our Saviour. 'If thy sun shall rise upon thee, and the sun goeth down, and thou shalt look neither east nor west, and thy house shall be built on the ruins; and if the door be shut, and the fire be not put out, and the vessels thereof be not broken, and whether the doors be shut or not, by day or by night, shall burn seven years, and shall not be burned; and the door shall be held, the day cometh that shall burn as an oven; and all the proud, yea, and all that do wickedly, shall be stubble: and the day that cometh shall burn them up, that it shall leave them neither root nor branch' (iv. 11); and in the gospel, they are compared to a bundle of ties intended to be burn (Matt. xiii. 30).

Ver. 6. That scaffold is an easy way of sinners; but he that heareth the Lord will repent from his heart. i.e. he treadeth in his steps, and will go on in the way of sinners, and become incorrigible; for if he will not listen to the sensible and sound advice given him by his good heavens, he will go on with the lust of his heart, and rejects his salutary prescriptions, how shall he be cured? If he throws aside or breaks the means which the Lord gives him for his delinquents, he cannot be reclaimed or corrected. But he that heareth the Lord, evangel & ev aapil, will sincerely repent, or be converted thoroughly. Clemens Alexandrinus reads, εὐφραίνω τοι ἐκ τῆς κατάθλιψεώς σου. The Vulgate, 'Evangelum vertamur vertamur. Convertatur et cor suum, i.e. will return to himself, like the penitent prodigal, will change his way of life, acknowledge with contrition his past faults, and keep his heart with all diligence for the future.'
23. where "the gall of bitterness" and "the heart of iniquity" are synonymous; and Jer. iv. 18. Heb. xiii. 15. where falling from the grace of God, and the root of bitterness by which many are deferred, are joined together. See also Deut. xxxii. 21. "The Lord is expressed by a root thatareth gall and wormwood." The rendering of the Vulgate confirms likewise this sense. Est authem sapiens quis abudant in malo. Some think this a sort of wisdom from the root of wickedness, or in the mischief which it doth to others, is sensual, earthly, devilish. The prophet describes such as delight in it, when he says, They are wise to do evil, but to do good they have no knowledge. (Jer. iv. 21.) Such shall multiply bitterness, properly so called, and shall inherit misery and sorrow.

Ver. 16—18. "The root of a fool is like a burden in the way; but grace shall be found in the lips of the wise." A house that is destroyed, so is wisdom to a fool; and the knowledge of the unwise is as talk without sense. There is such an engaging sweetness in the discourse and conversation of a truly good and wise man, and so much useful knowledge is to be learned from him, that such as are desirous of improvement listen to him with eagerness and interest, and treasure up his observations for their use and conduct. Job beautifully describes this, speaking of himself. "When the ear heard me, then it blessed me. Unto me men gave ear, and waited, and kept silence at my words." (Job xxx. 1.) Hence the ancients assigned Mercury, their god of eloquence, to be attended by the Graces. But the person who is devoid of wisdom, or who has a smattering in knowledge, and a small sacrifice of learning, is here aptly compared to being without knowledge. He is not able to excite others by discourse, the wise man expresses by grace or sweetness. Thus it is said of our Saviour \\

Ver. 19. Doctor unto fools is as letters on the feet, and like cataracts on the right hand. The fool hates discipline and instruction, he considers them as letters and shackles. He looks upon learning and study as a weariness of the flesh, as an intricate, troublesome thing, a hinderance to the pursuit of his inclinations, and an obstacle to his pleasures. Whereas learning adds a grace to the wise man, and a beauty, and a gold of beauty to the wise. He is upon wisdom, prudence, regularity, moderation of lusts and passions, and the observance of strict rules of morality, as the glory and improvement of the soul. It is a measure in the use of it, and thinks himself not abridged of true liberty, by being forbid licentiousness, or denying himself sinful enjoyments. This and the twain foregoing verses should be considered together, they set off one another; placed thus by way of contrast, the intermediate verse spoils the connection and beauty, and agrees in sense with xiii. 30 (see note on that place).

Ver. 22. A foolish man's foot is in room in his neighbour's house: but a man of experience is ashamed of him. Of whom is the fool, or his neighbor? Gr. τους φθανους ἐν τοις φίλοις μου. Gr. ἰδιαίτερα το συναντήσωσιν. "He who is a fool in his neighbour's house, will pay a regard to him when he is before him. \\

Ver. 23. "A foolish man of the flock, or his neighbour — he has no regard for the father's presence, will be ashamed to look in." The Vulgate understands this of a proper carriage towards a great and powerful man. Homo periti contundetur a persona potentissima, when before an eing before or visiting a person of such distinction. Est forte renau a visit one personne puissante, says Calmet: and according to him the sense is, That as a wise man will be ashamed to go

And so may every parent, with reason, who has the great misfortune of undutiful or wicked children, whether they are sons or daughters.

Ver. 4. A daughter shall bring an inheritance to her husband: i.e. Solomon, in the picture which he has drawn of a good wife, one who openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in whose tongue is the law of kindness, represents her as wholly employed in household cares and business, as looking well to the ways of her household, and eating not the bread of idleness.

Ver. 2. A sluggard will have no portion. If he not only waste his own inheritance, but also injure his parents, who in effect curse themselves, as the blessings and cursings, according to the Jewish notions, affected also the children, and descended to posterity. In this sense, also, and in no other, was it possible that Satan, begotten by sin, the child of Satan, earned his father, in effect cursed also himself. Or if we understand Satan in the sense of Şemâlû, to mean an adversary, or an opponent, as in the context, we come to the same sense; the meaning then may be, That when a wicked man, or slacker, blames or curses another for censurableness, he condemns himself, for the calamities are a mirror, a bosom, as it were, a insecreto deshurne mìn. Cotermelis also so expounds it: and says, "This is a proverb of the wise, that a sluggard is as a mirror, etc." (Prov. 22. 29).

Ver. 7. All that thy hands have done to thee is for thy own good. If they endure the fruit of their own doings, they are not to be blamed.

CHAP. XXII.

Ver. 5. A slothful man is compared to a filthy stone, and even his wife will hate him in his heart. According to the Vulgate, the sense is—That a slothful person is so disagreeable, that men pursue him with stones and dirt, as a shame to the species, or with representations and special reproaches, and all their misapplied forms, so many filthy stones, Omnium scmittatis, velut, injicet libidinoso, conspurcabilitur. But that followed by our translators seems better; for by a slothful man we are here to understand, one who will apply himself to nothing, who has neither industry, application, capacity, nor understanding, who will not vouchsafe to stir, or exert himself, either for his friends, or even himself. He is like to a stone which falls into the net, nobody will foul his hands to draw it from thence; and if this slothful person comes to disgrace or misfortune, as is natural to expect, nobody will interfere to help or undo the harm. If he will not work, will not even try, let re dumbio adhibe, will his disgrace. Whoever comes near him will hasten from him, as from some disagreeable filthy stone, in which he will wash their hands, and have nothing more to do with him. Such a sluggard is so offensive, that, according to Solomon, "He is as vinegar to the teeth, and as smoke to the eyes" (Prov. 26. 24).

Ver. 8. And a foolish daughter is born to his loss. The Greek has only Ἰδρυσθή μὴ ἐπί "Inquam Iudas, i.e. a daughter is to loss. Some copies have γυνάκιν, is born to loss, or to the loss of any other than himself. It seems to bear hard upon the sex without reason; and therefore the Geneva version of this place is much less to be admitted. And the context, as always, is a statement, "Or translators have added foolish, to make the sense more complete. Ambiguos, or some such epithet, seems to be understood, for a wise daughter follows, by way of antithesis, in the next verse. We have an instance of the like usage in Is. 57. 17. Be gone, thou that art called Fair Branch, though thou believest not but art wisdom, "i.e. she is not a wise woman.

Ver. 27. When the ungodly curseth Satan, he curseth his own soul: i.e. Whenever an ungodly man condemneth ungodliness, he condemneth himself: or, whenever he worketh iniquity, which he accuse him as their temper and betray, when they complain of his snares and wiles, they ought rather to blame themselves. The devil induceth them that solicit them for sin, and make them fall into it, to blazon and foot from thy neighbour's house;" or, as the margin more properly has it, "Let thy foot be seldom in thy neighbour's house, lest he be weary of thee, and hate thee!" (Prov. xxi. 7).
CHAPTER XXII.

Nor will the difference be great if we read; for such a man's name in his 97th year. The sense of the two verses taken together is, briefly, Virtue with a sufficient competency makes amends for a descent from a mean and low parentage; and vice versa, vice without a sufficient amount of moral usefulness removes a noble birth. Or thus, that the good life of one in ordinary circumstances is more honourable than a high extraction or great fortune with a bad and scandalous life.

Ver. 11. Do we need crowns for life, and worship? And weep for the fool, for he understandeth not: make little weeping for the dead, for he is at rest; but the life of a fool is worse than death.

Seven days do no man mourn for, lest he do a foolish thing in the days of his life.] Abraham lamented his dead, and mourned for his beloved Sarah, and did Christ sorrow for his friend Lazarus? We too and no one else ever allowed it, to pay a decent tribute of tears, observing always a proper moderation. As for the precise time, it is nowhere peremptorily fixed; the scripture sometimes occasionally that a year was the time for great days, without particularizing always the number: but this of seven days was the most usual time of mourning among the Jews appears from many instances. The solemn three days' mourning was used as a mourning for Jacob seven days (Gen. i. 10). The seventy days, mentioned ver. 3, were preparatory to the funeral, and while the body was embalming (see also 1 Sam. xxxi. 13. 1 Kings xxxi. 12) for seven days. The marriage of this was so settled and fixed among them, that it was a common proverb, Septem dies ad convictum, at septem ad lacem. It was an obscure name for the novena. It appeared that the seven days were not then thought of in the ninth day, but the third day. At least for, although they were not observed in the Jewish law, they had their novena! or, solemn sacrifices in honour of the dead, nine days, yet there is no instance of above seven days' mourning for any of the holy men in scripture; as good reason, therefore, that seven days' mourning for great persons might be necessary in the seven probably, he thinks, might be pitched upon in allusion to the sabbath, which was a time of rest, and therefore was applied to the dead, as being at rest. But, indeed, the seven days of mourning (Quint. treatise 1.) Josephus, speaking of Archeimius appointing seven days' mourning in honour of his father, adds, έτερον παντοθεν δεδοθες παντοθεν κηδεμων μετονομασθε, εκ της δε θανατου, ευθυς ως των μετονομασθαι των ιερων και εκ της δε αποθανουσας των ιερων. Ver. 12. The, which is to be rather understood, is the same as Father, a name given to God in the Christian dispensation. It was said of him, that "he that heareth me shall hear my Father also," (John xi. 27.) It was given to Jesus; and hence from him to his disciples. It was given to Abraham; and hence from him to his seed. It was given to Capernaum; and hence from him to all faithfull spiritual Israel. Hence to "the seven stars, which is the angel; and the seven lampstands, which is the seven churches;" and to "the seven golden lampstands, which is the seven churches." And hence to the "golden candlesticks which stand before the throne." Grace is not to be given only to one, but to the whole church. Grace is to be given to all, that the whole church may be a light shining in the world; that the light of grace may shine in the world; and that the light of grace may shine in the world.

Ver. 13. Talk not much with a fool,—and thou shalt never be defiled with his fœdilities,—and never be disgusted with rudeness.] "Say not that the fool is wise;" or, "thou shalt not be defiled with his fœdilities," or, "equally with his fœdilities, or with his folly." "With his fœdilitas, or with his foolishness," or, "with his spittle, or opprobrious language," as Croesus.

understands it. *Ko aly avvpoXa\ov to7j 7jJiiia a\ov, "with instances of his folly and madness." Stultitius illius. The Vulgate understands it of the contagion of sin, through his evil companions, and of the corruption and corruption of illus. Castellio renders, Caeve ne ex essaco contaminentis. "Beware lest he defile thee by shaking himself, like a sow after wallowing in the mire;" and thus the Syriac, Cunctus enim etiam ut sine aequorum, and the same sense exceptus, is which likewise the marginal reading.

Ver. 15-18.] The first of these verses seems an imitation of Prov. xxvii. 4-10, or excelsior, in beauty, and the same weight of a far heavier than they both" (see Exclus. xxi. 10). The several comparisons here made use of are intended to show the difference between the action of the wise man and the man of bad character, and to define the stable, and even that which attend them. The scripture in like manner compares the wise man, whose thoughts, and the actions proceeding them, are well grounded, to a house founded on a rock, against which neither wind, nor rain had any power. A fool, on the contrary, is like a house built on high without a good foundation, exposed to every assault of weather. The Vulgate compares him to a wall built without mortar, which wants cement to keep it together, or to one daubed with untempered mortar (Ezek. xiii. 10). As he acts without any fixed principle, nothing but uncertainty and irresolution can proceed from him; for want of a bond or a principle, his acts are without direction. He is not guided by principles, that is, he is not governed by religious or religious principles. This is the common principle of all bad men, and of all men that are not governed by a principle of religion, whether good or bad. It is the common principle of all bad men, and of all men that are not governed by a principle of religion, whether good or bad. Is. 28:17, "a terrorsome wound or stroke," is which the last and worst species of unfaithfulness that can happen in friendship; the rights of which it not only infringes, but even though it is against, and for, its own interest, it is unworthy of our confidence, but unfit for human society. He is a public enemy, will attempt the like against any other, and all the world should be aware of such an assassin. When thou enterest into friendship then, lest be alienated, and that the injuries are wilful and premeditated. Mr. Norris has a fine reflection upon this passage: "It is the union of two friends as with the union of two bodies; there are two which perhaps, that, although they weaken and disturb the union, yet however are consistent with it; but then there are others again that quite destroy the vital congruity, and then follows a separation that is altogether permanent. The union of friendship, it can be no other; that is, contrary to the very design and essence of friendship, cannot be so perfectly and so effectually for though the friend be gone, yet still the man remains; and though he has forfeited my friendship, yet still I owe him an obligation;" (Tracts, Lect. iv. 108.)

Ver. 21. 22. Though thou devour a sword at thy friend, ye shall not be a waster nor a comrade to be so esteemed. If thou hast opened thy mouth against thy friend, fear not; for there may be a recompense: except for upbraiding, or pride, or disclosing of secrets, or a treacherous wound: for the mouth is a breach of a sword, and a weapon of destruction. A friend by word or deed may be passed over which are occasioned by passion, or some sudden or violent emotion, as a hasty word or rash expression, which comes from a man in a heat, vented perhaps in the warmth of a debate, and arising from a contiguity of sentiments on the subject, nay, threats, and even an assault upon a friend in a fit of anger, may be forgiven; for these, though they indeed proceed, and many occasion a shyness, or even a rupture between friends for a time, yet are not always attended with that bad consequence as wholly to dissolve friendship. For some imitation or example of open reproach he says, that he himself is subject to failings; that the fit of passion might be sudden and transient, and proceeded not from any settled rancour in the heart; and therefore, upon the length of time, the act of reproach may be disposed to pass it over, and receive his penitent friend into his bosom and confidence again. But such injuries as are done on purpose, premeditatedly, and on deliberation, and so have no other end but the wounding rather from malice and an ill-disposed heart, than from surprise or passion, are not so easily forgot or forgiven by a man of a yielding disposition. For a man reckons four sorts: serovx, malicious slander, the speaking things to the detriment or disparagement of a friend's credit and character,—reflecting upon his birth, his family, his habits, his manners, or his unfeigned honesty; or upbraiding a friend with favours received, accusing him of baseness and ingratitude on that account, or for not making any or unsuitable returns. 2 Tim. iii. 9, pride or insolence, which is so much the more improper and disgraceful, that a man must be very desirous of attaining equality, likeness of sentiments, inclinations, interests, and even of state and condition. And though friendship may sometimes be between persons of different rank and condition, yet it is to be observed, that they might have to suffer, and fortune must confound and abate something, to proportion himself to the level and standard of his friend, or that he may be no sweet union, agreeable familiarity, and confidence, true friendship, nor even a show of liberty itself, kept up and preserved. St. Ambrose therefor well advises, "Defer amico ut requili, amicitia tua puellae, et errandam etiam ab eo, "the revealing of secrets," which is an instance of perfidiosity. He that is capable of such baseness, especially if he does it coolly and with deliberation, is unfit for friends and unworthy of any confidence. It is possible indeed a man, through inadvertence, heedlessness, levi, or weakness, may by accident drop a secret, without any thought or intention to injure his friend; but in general it may be affirmed, that no one should be more invariable, as it is as dear to a man as his honour, and cannot be disclosed for the most part without a sensible pain, done to it our heart, and also more unmeet and unwise are the prudent man, and do not easily yield to the request. Prov. i. 27, 28. A study thus, "a terrorsome wound or stroke," is which the last and worst species of unfaithfulness that can happen in friendship; the rights of which it not only infringes, but even though it is against, and for, its own interest, it is unworthy of our confidence, but unfit for human society. He is a public enemy, will attempt the like against any other, and all the world should be aware of such an assassin. When thou enterest into friendship then, lest be alienated, and that the injuries are wilful and premeditated. Mr. Norris has a fine reflection upon this passage: "It is the union of two friends as with the union of two bodies; there are two which perhaps, that, although they weaken and disturb the union, yet however are consistent with it; but then there are others again that quite destroy the vital congruity, and then follows a separation that is altogether permanent. The union of friendship, it can be no other; that is, contrary to the very design and essence of friendship, cannot be so perfectly and so effectually for though the friend be gone, yet still the man remains; and though he has forfeited my friendship, yet still I owe him an obligation;" (Tracts, Lect. iv. 108.)

Ver. 23. 24. As the vapour and smoke of a furnace goeth before the fire, so revolting by blood. The observation of Messieurs of Port-Royal upon this place is well worth inserting as a warning of the danger that lies in the very act of shame to shun the least approach to it, for there are some small and inconsiderable things in appearance, which nevertheless are as so many sparks, to occasion in the end a great fire and combustion. As man is naturally proud, so he is of course fond of his own opinion, even in things the most indifferent: not because his is the best or truest, but because it is his own. Another equally loves his own sentiments too, that can be the same reason, and is much attached to them. From this contrariety arise jealousy and disputes, which are inflamed by the heat of words, and the warmth and inflammation of passion. And so much it is that often arises from affronts to injuries, from injuries to threats, which often terminate in bloodshed and murder. The tongue executes what pride of heart dictates, and the hard at heart and the obstinate, who is it that is a better man, I may suffer inconveniences or evils. I will not be influenced by the example of others who may keep from them, nor so far consult my own repose as not to assist them and contribute my share to their interest, and even my goods; nay, for his sake, will expose myself, if necessary, to hardships, ill-will, detraction, and the opposition of such as would oppose me under similar circumstances. Thus the Latin Vulgate takes it, and the Vulgate in the sense of most commentators, a face illius non me abscendam, et si multis milii plurimae erronei, sustinebo: et hi here is the same as if: and so the Vulgate and other versions understand it. Hence wee observe.—" Absentem quod redit amicum, qui non dedicato est culpante, hic niger est." (Sat. lib. 1.)

And accordingly he defends the character of Virgil, to whom some trifling objections had been made in point of dress and style, and speaks thus:

"At post bonus, ut melius vir Non aliis quiescim, ita in gentibus ingentes Incati late lacri sub corpore."

Ver. 27. Who shall set a watch before my mouth, and a seal upon my lips, that I fall not suddenly by them? Calmet refers this to the last sentence of the foregoing verse, and makes the sense to be, He that hears another speaking, may guard against any thing evil that he says, by stopping his ears, or dying from him, eternitatem dei, for so some copies read. But who will give me a proper guard for my own mouth, a seal upon my lips, that I fall not suddenly by that I offend not with my tongue? Or perhaps it may be an introduction to the prayer immediately following, that of Ps. clxxi. 3.; "Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips."

CHAP. XXIII.

Ver. 1. O Lord, Father and Governor of all my whole life, leave me not to their counsels, and let me not fall by them.

If this is connected with the last verse of the former chapter, which seems proper and necessary, and indeed some copies begin this chapter with it, the sense will be,—O thou Father of my life, and ruler of it; or, as some copyists render it, O thou Father of all that have life, all of living, whatever, give me not up to the indiscretion of my own lips, permit me not to be carried away by their rashness and volubility of talking, so that they shall prove the occasion of my falling; and so Lusig.,”Non me derelinquas in consilio lingue et laborum.”

The generality of interpreters suppose sinners, or fools, or adversaries, of some worthless and dangerous persons, to be understood, to the mischief of whose counsel the wise man here prays not to be abandoned; but the former sense seems preferable. If we consider well that Solomon says, "Life and death are in the power of the tongue," that Job says, "I will not speak as the heathen, nor as the people of the earth; for their speech is vain and empty words; and the words of the wicked are as a breath that is past;" (Job 31:6; Ps. 119:13-16;) we shall not wonder that the wise man here asks of God the guidance of his Spirit, to keep him from this evil, that he will continue to guard against the transgression of his tongue, or the multiplying transgressions by a habit of evil speaking, or speaking too much.

Ver. 2. Who will set scourgcs over my thoughts, and the discipline of wisdom over mine heart? that they spare me not for mine ignorances, and it pass not by my sins! The variety of readings of this place show it to be corrupt; our version of it is obscure, so it is worse of it. As the wise man before begs of God a bridle for his tongue, he here asks the like for his thoughts and heart, that they may not wander nor betray him into wickedness, that God would enlighten his mind and curb his heart, that he would guard against his own folly.

Ver. 3. Let mine ignorances increase, and my sins abound to my destruction; and I fall before mine adversaries, and my enemies shall prevail over me, whose hope is far from thy mercy; i.e. Lest the abuse of speech should make me fall into sin frequently, and my sins should draw upon me the wrath of God, and he should deliver me over into the will of mine enemies. There is a tincture of Judaism, says Calmet, in this verse, not because the Jews were so far attended with punishment, but because it is displeasing to God. But though conscience, and the sincere love of God are, it must be confessed, more noble and pure, yet the Lord availed himself, and thus the Hebrew version, in speaking of the things which should be done to speak hereafter, alwayse, as the reasons which set upon our hopes and fears make the liveliest impressions, and affect the mind most powerfully. The latter part, "whose hope is far from thy mercy," is the Vulgate, and has indeed a strong tincture of Jewish pre-judice in it; for they were a nation full of spiritual pre-judgment, and expect a return upon all others, and those almost concern-ter's will, and makes light of his sacred name, shall be beaten with many stripes. St. Austin's observation, if rightly taken, is very just. False jurato or extora est, vera jurato, or oath, in the sense in which the word is used, is swearing is scene and safe; a false oath is mischievous and destructive, and even a true one is attended with danger, as we have just seen. "I will give my right hand, and the right hand of my father, and the right hand without being called or compelled to it. Such a rash forwardness among so many of the wiser heathens was not unpunished by the gods. It has been observed by the learned, that in the last times of the world, when every truth and every moral precept is perverted, and vice is the admission, as if no swearing was allowable but what is in a judicial way, and when authority requires it.

Ver. 11. A man that wrath much swearing shall be filled with vanity, like a heathen. From home to house, if he shall offend, his sin shall be upon him: and if he acknowledge not his sin, he makes a double offence; and if he swear in vain he shall not be inuex, but his house shall be full of curses (Ver. 11, 14). This Bossuet makes it. If thing more is meant than what the words seem to carry in them in our version, but by considering and examining well the Greek we shall be furnished with a proper Gratu-tion. For what our translators render in general and in determinately offend, is δείνησις; if he swear any rash oath, and sin inadvertently, not rightly understanding, or considering that which is said, he shall be guilty, which is in his power, for instance, to do it, or whether he could lawfully do it, he shall then be guilty; and thus the Synec. δι᾽ or errorum dejectum, pecatum in ipsum in respect of the end of the oath, as this occurrence in the book of Leviticus (see v. 1. x. xv. xvii. xiv. 8. x. 7. &c.), and means, that he shall be punished either by the judges, if he be convicted, or by God, if he be guilty; and thus occurs in the book of St. Cyprian. Virgil mutum juramenti rapturatus inequitat: et si vane juraverit, non justitiae; ne si frustra juraverit, dupliciter punie-tur (Test. lib. ii. cap. 3). This Bossuet makes it. If two species to be, 1. Swearing to a thing, and not doing it afterward. 2. Swearing originally with an evil intention of not fulfilling it. 3. Light and common oaths, which makes them to be. 1. Swearing, and not remembering it; the Hebrew word being capable of being rendered by both απελευθήσεσθαι καὶ απελευθησεσθαι. 2. Remembering the oath, and yet being guilty, without being convicted of it. Slighting in jest, without any serious intention of making it good, or thinking to escape by some mental equivocation, like "Juravi linguam, mement iniquarn teneres". That God is the witness of such a guilt, we know, and the public and sacredness of an oath, see Deut. xlviii. 59. Zech. v. 4.
Herod. lib. iii.

Ver. 12. There is word that is clothed about with death: from the beginning it was not found to be in the heritage of Jacob; for all such things shall be far from the guilty, and they shall not dwell in their sins.] The crime, which the wise man does not mention here, and which he wishes may not of found in the heritage of Jacob, I presume, is blasphemy, which was so odious, that it shocked him even to mention it, but he has distinguished it sufficiently by saying, that it was clothed about with death, i.e. this sin was puished with death among the Jews; for, according to the law of Moses, the blasphemer was ordered to be stoned (Lev. xxvi. 16. John x. 31) instantly by those that heard the blasphemy. Nor is there any formal punishment, though understand here by the words, "clothed with death," such discourses as tended to seduce the people to apostasy and blasphemy: for this crime was likewise punished with death.

This was an utmost limit of the law, as a limit of the crime, from a copy probably which has διαπερολεθήσεσθαι, and not διαπερεχεθεν, which is the better reading, and followed in all good copies. The same manner of dividing between blasphemy and common swearing, and the one is so far counter to the other, that, in swearing, the name of God, as being the most holy name, is made use of to give soundness. But blasphemy attacks the dreadful majesty ries with it; but blasphemy attacks the dreadful majesty of God, and the impious wretch only makes use of its adorable name to revile and abuse it. This crime was an curiously had in such detestation, that, as Messiahs of Port-Royal observe, even Job's wife said to him, according to the original, מנהנה יב: bless God; though she meant to persuade him to curse him, she durst not mention the thing, because it was the word of God (Job xxxi. 27). As the one or other reading is followed, this verse will either end or begin a subject. Bossuet understands this place as distinct item what we have before, that which is outside of the moral and religious version, of calumny and opprobrious words, which seems confirmed by the Vulgate, and from Lev. xix. where, after the prohibition against swearing (ver. 12), it follows, "Thou shalt not go about to render the eyes of men blind, neither shall you take life from the vessels of the Lord." If we look to other instances of calumny are mentioned, so that the rendering here probably should be. "Use not thy mouth to tempt, or slander, in all which is λόγος ψευδων, which is a Hebrew, and signifies the sin itself, it is certain that a person so accustomed is with great difficulty returned, and though he is a custom to become heathens, to use customary, or slander, in all which is λόγος ψευδων, which is a Hebrew, and signifies the sin itself, it is certain that a person so accustomed is with great difficulty returned,
and though he is a custom to become heathens, to use outside of the moral and religious sense of the word.
This is the case with men become so wedded to their favourite rites, that they will not be persuaded that they tend to their destruction.

Ver. 14. Remember thy father and mother, when you sittest among the congregation of the Lord your god, propter eum verba sanctae verbi, quae omnes episcopi proferunt: for thou sittest among the greatest great people. And thus the Vulgate, In medio enim magnum conspectum; intimating, perhaps, that father and mother are to be reverenced and observed, whose instructions are to be remembered (Prov. i. vi. v. 20). of the government of the tongue may well be supposed. υγιεις signifies either for or when;
our version follows the latter, as also the English, according to the sense, is. "Remember thy father and mother, and speak not evil of them, for thou wilt be in danger of the judgment," following the Vulgate Latin to closely and carefully; because in order to have understands consists of a consistory court, which is not at all ne-necessary. Some suppose the persons here commended to be of low degree, and that the advice is, Remember those own original when thou art with great men, affect not to be their equal, nor put thyself upon the level with them. Or if, with some copies, we read σειρορεις, the sense may then be, Remember who thou art, and wherein thou standest, as a servant-master. When they have learnt how to behave thyself always, for that scit or mayest at one time or other have occasion to be among great persons. According to this method to be learned to behave in the right manner, is to remember thy father and mother with respect and reverence: thou shalt be admitted to and intimate with great persons, and be thyself also in a high station, do not thou, in thy ignorance, and become a public disgrace to them; but, thou though thou wast ashamed of them, and wish that thou wert born of other parents, and cause the place of thy nativity, and by such a behaviour or usage γνωστευε es to be reckoned a fool or a dunce. Καὶ τιμηθήσεται i μην παραβαλεσθαι to be often used for ἐστι, and so it is to be taken here: it is the same as καὶ τιμηθίσας μην παραβαλεσθαι, which way of expressing it by the infinitive is more usual and clear. The Vulgate so translates, Males non natus est, the Synne English in the seme of unicum, Est diex, unicae creaturum non fuisse
So and indeed it is sometimes taken as in Homer:
"Έλεοι ἐστιν ἀλλ' ἐστιν ἃ καὶ τιμηθίσας παραβαλεσθαι. (Odys. γ.)"
And that of Virgil,
νυνιοί σε οὐκ ἔσται ἀδελφοί σε καὶ οὐ μεταμιμήσεις. (Odysseis. ἔ.)"
And that of Virgil,
νυνιοί σε οὐκ ἔσται ἀδελφοί σε καὶ οὐ μεταμιμήσεις. (Odysseis. ἔ.)"
And that of Virgil,
νυνιοί σε οὐκ ἔσται ἀδελφοί σε καὶ οὐ μεταμιμήσεις. (Odysseis. ἔ.)"
And that of Virgil,
νυνιοί σε οὐκ ἔσται ἀδελφοί σε καὶ οὐ μεταμιμήσεις. (Odysseis. ἔ.)" CHAPTER XXIII.

1007

passionate person, the fornicator, and the adulterer. But some by θυσιν θυσίων understand the ambitious or covetous, as Varialis in particular; but the context seems rather to direct the sense to the lascivious person. As it went before regarded the vices of the tongue, so what follows respects those of the flesh.

I. The sin of the body of his flesh will never cease till he have killed a fornicator. The Vulgate renders, Homo necunam in oris carnis sum; following a corrupt copy which had with instead of γόνας, and γυναικός instead of γυνής. And I am of opinion that none of the signs were intended to be transposed; and if I might attempt an alteration without the alteration of MSS. would place the words thus, ἄνδρος ἡν ἐν τῇ γυναικί, e. c. a fornicator will not cease from sinning, till he has killed a fornicator in the body of his flesh; which seems confirmed from Prov. vi. 11, "Remove thy way far from her (this strange woman), and come not nigh her doorway, lest thou see her at the last, when thy flesh and thy body (σώματος καὶ σύνεσις τῆς φυλής) is consumed." Caius too commentators make this conjecture, Celcius et alibi a copiæ passionibus, ne sònon teneant quip, qu'il n'iutulcit dans son corps un feu qui le consumeur (in loc.). And by this bodily punishment they receive in themselves, et ipsis, that recompense of their error which has been seen (see Josh xxvi. 28). Paul speaks of another species of defilers of the flesh. And indeed some of the fathers understand here, by the fornication of her body, the world's immorality, because of the likeness of man, καταφημία, who disannihiyls his body by unnatural lusts.

Ver. 17. All bread is sweet to a wandering man, he will not consider the price of it. The interest of this, and the habit of the ancient writers to take in a constant thing as in the like luminous manner till he die, for enjoyment rather provokes than extinguishes his fire, adding fresh combustible matter as it were, to his passions; but lest such might be supposed to be the consequence of his destruction, and hasten it, Solomon has the same comparison upon the occasion, "Stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant; but he knoweth not that the earth is full of him that seeth in the depths of hell." The Greek is much stronger, and concludes with a fine piece of instruction, Ωθεν γαρ σεθη τον γινεμάτα του ανθρώπου και το μετάτηθα αμέλειαν; εκαύς τί ποιμανόται μετά το κρύον διά γόνων πεφορτώντας ανθρώπους και εκ θάλασσας αλληλοτριοφορίαν και εκ αυτικών αλληλοτριών, με τον χρηματικόν αυτήν τινα, τον μετάτηθα τῆς τυφλώσεως, προσέθεν τινα ἡμῖν (Pro. ix. 18).

Ver. 18. A man that breaketh a wickeder, saith Scripture, Who seeth me? I am compassed about with darkness, the walls cover me, what need I to fear the most High which will not remember my sins? This seems to be literally, that the sin that violates the faith of the invariable-bed, and passes from his own to that of another's." The Vulgate adds. Contemnans animam suam; which makes it again absolute, and throws the guilt not upon himself to all the consequences of adultery to disgrace, and the loss of his own honour, to the resentment of the injured party, and to death itself, which among the Hebrews was considered as a great punishment. What the wise man here observes of the adulterer, that he confines, or rather deceives himself with groundless reasons and fruitless pretences, to hush his conscience, is very just and true of sinners in general (see xv. 17). After a course of wickedness they take up and entertain a set of new principles, apply their minds and often force them to believe a lie, and begin to argue with themselves in the following, or some such like manner,—Opportunity invites, the object is alluring, no eye seeth me, I shall go undiscovered, or, however, unpunished; the man of taste, and the man of spirit, the man of reason, is justly described as so severe and mortified in his life, as to deny myself the gratification of my passions; this sin is necessary and constitutional to me, and I cannot avoid it; it is questionable whether the pleasure of the passage is so great as its danger; and flesh and blood are always present with me, and I cannot shoke it off. There have been good men, as they have been reckoned very, very many, and they have not seen their example; the bulk of mankind allow such actions, and declare them truly pardonable, and reconcilable with the hopes of heaven; the scriptures are not rightly understood, and those that take it for granted do but see it in an old, this sin will leave me, it is my lossm, and God is very pitiful to the infirmities of mankind.—Thus sinners please themselves with such false reasoning; they feel the guilt of their actions, and feel their security, the reflection is equally beautiful; what follows in the next verse is omitted in some Greek copies, and in the Arabic and Syriac.

CHAP. XXIV.

Ver. 1.] Most of the commentators agree in interpreting this chapter of the Logos personally, though it will be difficult, if we pursue this application quite through, to make all the particulars in the description suit with the Logos, in all respects. The context, however, though giving the sense of the verse may seem to favour and countenance it. Some few understand it of wisdom derivatively, as displayed in God's works at the creation. Calmet says, that the wise man being, without the wisdom of the Hebrews, or the study, knowledge, and practice of the Jewish law, to the pagan learning, and gives the preference to the former, as more ancient and extant, and noble, than the Greek philosophy, on any branch of profane science; that God communicated wisdom, or the knowledge of his law, more particularly to Moses, their great lawgiver, and afterward to David, Solomon, in the prophets, &c. But this appears to be quite new and unfitted to all people indifferently, but he chose Jacob for his heritance and Jerusalem for her habitation; that its temple was her palace, its ark her throne, from whence were issuable all his promises and statutes. And no wonder that this writer, who has on many occasions shown a tincture of Jewish prejudice, should be strongly attached to the law of Moses, and say very excellent things in commendation of it, by representing the law like a true schoolmaster (as St. Paul calls it on another occasion), preferring his own learning and wisdom to that of all others. However Christian doctrines are not always begotten by comparison of the light of the gospel, yet every zealous disciple of Moses was big with the praises of it, and glored in the pentateuch, as the chief book of wisdom, certainly. If this is the case, how do the explanations of Prov. vii. or Wisd. vii. or of both, as some would have it, and its intent to show the eternity, excellence, power, use, and desirability of wisdom, it is so far in a new dress as to differ in circumstances, and is not merely a description of them in the same way that those other descriptions are. Upon the whole, though I did not exclude any application that can be fairly made of this chapter of the Logos, I have not under any of the Logos' characters, as if he were to be the Jew in the time of this writer, and which the Jews at that time may be supposed to have understood, or to have had any probable notions of, yet we may suppose such a divine novelty, if it is to comprehend, that there is a strong appearance that the principal thing represented in this chapter, under the personage and character of wisdom, is God's covenant with the Israelites, or the law of Moses. And though some things in the progress of the description are justly enough applicable to the Son as angel of the covenant, and to the Spirit, as dictator of it, yet the fixed object of the author seems to be that of a new law.

The reasons inducing me to think so are these:

1. The wisdom here extolled is confined to the Jewish nation as its proper inheritance; as taking upon itself without the rest with the rest of mankind, vers. 1, 2, &c., therefore distinguished from the rest of mankind, vers. 1, 2, 8, 10—12.

2. The author seems to say as much himself, at the end of wisdom's exordium, vers. 23, and says, it is very key to the whole, and says, as if it were a truth, "All these things (says he) are the book of the covenant, even the law which Moses commanded," &c. And when he adds immediately, "Fain not to be strong in the Lord," &c. (vers. 24), he seems only to paraphrase on the words πᾶν, or sometimes πᾶν, which were commonly put at the end of the copies of the law by the Jewish transcribers of it, and likewise are in all the printed editions.

3. All the other versions concur in this interpretation. Hebra omn. libri viti, &c. Vulgate. Res infra omnes scripta sunt in libro Testamenti Dei, Leage selectit, quam praecepta Dei, legem selectam, &c. Arische. Hebra omn. in libro Frederici Domini scripta sunt. Lex quam praecipuit Moses—pleru quasi flamen Phisn sapientiæ, &c. Syriac. Now how are these passages to be understood otherwise than that the books of Moses, and the law, or the pentateuch, is, or contains the whole of the wisdom extolled in the foregoing description? The twenty-third verse, therefore, seems to me just such another addition, to the law, "written for our instruction, &c." (Gal. iv. 24), who, after representing the different states of Hagar and Sarah, resolves the allegory thus, "Alia vita eni at the licentia or that, Rom. vii. 9, which is a key likewise to this other chapter.

So that as vii. Sap. Sol. wisdom is described as essential in God, and derivative in mankind in general, she is here described as essential indeed in him; but derivative in a peculiar manner by the law of Moses to the Israelites as their proper inheritance or possession.

Thus much being premised, it will be easier to point out how the whole description lies in this view of its principal drift. First observe, that I prefer the verse 1. λόγος Ιωσήφ to the other λόγος Ιωσήφ, because he introduces her as her own encomium.

Ver. 1. Wisdom shall praise herself.] This she properly doth in a way which the spirit of God reveals his will or his knowledge to man.

Herself, ἕκτινα ἐπίκειται. May not this be understood of the spirit of the law, as distinguished from the letter or body of it? The writer says, that the Logos made not his own observation; the law indeed could glory nowhere else but among them; but wisdom, in any other construction of it, might glory elsewhere, as well as among them.

Ver. 2. In the congregation of the most High shall she open her mouth.] By Moses being read in the synagogues every Sabbath day; or, if we understand ecclesia, or con- cilium, of larger and more solemn assemblies at Jerusalem, the place may still be well interpreted of the law read and expounded in them (see Deut. xxxi. 10, 11). "Andú triumph before his power." Syriac. "And in execution of my power," his hosts, i.e. congregation of Israelites: Ab omnis amicus ejus, Arabic. The Vulgate indeed hath it, In conspectu virtutis ejus. But this then is immediately explained of the other parts of the verse. In medio populi exultabit. In plenitudine sancta administrat, et in multitudo electum hatitabit laudem, &c. It is worth nothing however that υπὸ τοῦ πόλεμου, ἵναι &c. doth also signify (taken without point) congregati coriæ et, and after, all why may not signify the ark of the covenant, called otherwise "the ark of his strength?" Ps. xxxii. 8. Chron. vi. 1. Without doubt the law never triumphed so publicly, as in these assemblies, as at the passage over Jordan, the siege of Jericho, and on other occasions, whence it might be called υπὸ τῆς ἀρχῆς τῆς ἀρχῆς; or on more ordinary occasions, at the great assemblies of the tabernacle and temple, when all the congregations appeared before the Lord.

Ver. 3. I came out of the mouth of the most High.] This, though generally understood of the almighty seat (as Bishop Hall's Defens. Fid. Nic. cap. 2), yet is also true of the Logos or angel of the covenant, who, as the Vulgate adds, was primogenitus ante omnem creaturam, true of the Holy Spirit, and with great propriety, from his being, &c. (vers. 4, 5, 6), the truest and most literal true of the law given at mount Sinai, "God spake these words and said." And indeed all the law was delivered to Moses orally, "God spoke to him face to face, and took no key to his friend;" Exod. xxxiii. 9—11, and elsewhere.

2. And covered the earth as a cloud.] viz. When God uttered the law, either at mount Sinai, which was covered with a cloud, which is a symbol of the law, or when the law was delivered to Moses, or afterward to Moses from the pillar of the cloud, from whence God always spake to him.

Ver. 4. I dwell in high places, and my throne was (may as well be supplied as) in the cloudy pillar.] True of the angel of the covenant, but true of the covenant itself too. The law was espoused, ministered by angels in the hands of a mediator. Not only the morality of it is eternal and immutable, but even the external apparatus of it had its "pattern in the mount;" viz. the being and shadow of things to come, as says of heaven and earth, the whole law of the tabernacle was exhibited in the mount. And possibly me ἐπιφάνεια ερμηνεία, may relate principally to the divine model, and he taken in this sense, "I pitched my tent in the cloudy pillar." My throne is in the cloudy pillar.] Or, with the cloudy pillar, viz. the ark of the testimony, wherein first, the two tables of stone, then the roll of the law, were deposited; wherein the cloud rested or sat. It is expressly called σημείως ἐνέπεμπε by Josephus, agreeably to the scripture expression of God's "sitting between the cherubim." Also he called the ark, the "crown of his throne upon the cloudy pillar;" and it is called scripture ἐν ἔμπροσθεν τοῦ θεοῦ, the glory, from the Shechinah reading over it. It is true, it hath been much doubted whether the whole law, as well as the tables of the commandments, were included in the ark. But it is enough for the interpretation of this
In the first chapter of this book τοιοῦτο is twice used in speaking of wisdom, yet in neither place, to my apprehension, in the sense of creating, as our translators have rendered it.

The first place is this, Πορεία τοιοῦτον ἐρωτήσας Ὀρθά, which probably means no more than τοιοῦτον ὲν τοίον, she is preferable to all things in point of excellence.—Praemacy is ordained to her, she is appointed or constituted first of things. (Gen. xliii. 2.) The second is this, Οὗτος, which is also mulctica est sapientia. The Syrnic. Omnibus his abundancest is sapientia. Hence I conjecture the original word might be τιοῦτον, which signifies both excellent and unique. (Gen. xxvii. 15.) Again, i. 9, "He created her," Ἀπὸ τοιοῦτον λέγετο Συριακος, patreth, the Jews. And of the Hebrew, Arabic, recte est. Probably the Syrnic. also was谟use by the Greek tereia, viz; he produced, brought forth, exhibited her, as a law to his creatures. And in this sense I take tereia in the Syrnic. and in the Arabic, viz he exhibited the laws of morality, which were eternally in his own mind, as the public rule of his own, and all his creatures' actions.

And I shall never fail. Though this was not true of the ceremonial law, as it was of the moral precepts, yet the Jews thought both eternal, and to abide for ever.

Ver. 10. In his holy tabernacle I served before him.) As having appointed him as the service of his temple was being fulfilled in the punctional observance of the same. Αριστος, or the acceptable service (Rom. ix. 4), as well as εὐκάτιστος, was only among the Jews. And the punction itself consisted in the observance of the laws of sacrifice, expiation, &c. was the principal branch of the ritual law, (and in reality fuller of wisdom than the Jews imagined;) and in this, as by the text, by the phrase, οὐκ ὑπὲρ τοθ, the law is so far interpreted, wholesale, what we who do that is justly execute it do.

And so was I established in Sion.) Fixed there at last, as being the appointed seat of worship. If the interpretation of Κωνσταντινουπολις here appears something strained, what construction is there that will suit this place that is not so?

The reference in the margin to Exod. xxvi. 3, sends us to the divinely-gifted operators that made the tabernacle. And the same word, Μὴμέν, which signifies to be denied or supposed to be resisted and exercised more conspicuously at the building of the temple of Solomon, and so to be established in Sion. But though I readily admit this kind of wisdom to be a part of the description of S. Ap. xli. yet how such a talent in workmanship can be said to serve Κωνσταντινουπολις, before him, I cannot readily see. As I take it, the spirit of wisdom given to the temple of Solomon serves only the tabernacle itself, to make it the perfect copy of the pattern in the mount, and therefore was necessarily inspired for that end, and has no just relation to the subject that we are now upon. Neither can we say that it was an essential part of the tabernacle, as of the temple, as it is possible that he is rather the person to whom the service was made, as being supposed the object of worship in the Shechinah. I greatly mistake, if the tabernacle and first temple-service be supposed to have been the essential and divine glory resident there; and therefore the service itself could not be performed, but only in that place where the visible presence dwelt, which likewise made the Jews to pray towards the temple from all quarters of the world. I say, if the Logos was in the pillar of cloud and glory, the service of the tabernacle cannot be ascribed to him as agent, but as recipient.

Ver. 11. Likewise in the beloved city he gave me rest.) When Solomon dedicated his temple, he said, "Arise, 0 God, into thy resting-place, thou and the ark of thy strength." The temple law has omniony pretended to subdue and remove all opposition, and among them the divinest glory resident there; and therefore the service itself could not be performed, but only in that place where the visible presence dwelt, which likewise made the Jews to pray towards the temple from all quarters of the world. I say, if the Logos was in the pillar of cloud and glory, the service of the tabernacle cannot be ascribed to him as agent, but as recipient.

Ver. 12. And he put me in an assembly of his people.)-τοιοῦτον, or they who are honoured with God's visible residence among them, by the Shechinah, of κύριος (Rom. ix.).

Even in the portion of the Lord's inheritance.) True of the people of God, which consisted of the Israelites, and of them the law took root, and nowhere else; being the national religion of no country or people but their own. I shall only add, that from this figure of taking root in the ground, coming up, and producing fruit, we are to compare his personage, to compare to the most stately trees, bearing choicest fruits; which still bears a better construction from the law and books of Moses, than from any thing else that occurred to me at present. Ver. 30, doth particularly accord with what the psalmist writes of the rain (Ps. xix. 7—11).

Ver. 15. Like aspaghala. The Vulgate translates it, balanum aromaticum, i.e. belum, but it is not in the Greek text. Alternative renderings are suggested. It was mixed with cinnamon and aspaghala, and I yielded a pleasant odour like the best myrrh." This probably respects the composition of the second perfume. Ver. 16. The Greek has it, "as the fame of the frankincense which is burnt in the tabernacle." It is certain, the incense, or second sort, was compounded of all these spices, and this perfume was to be used by burning it upon the altar, which the Greek version and Vulgate often call the altar of perfumes, or of thummion. The Vulgate here calls that unguent, which is called on the margin of the Greek, "what is there called stigmata, here called gatto." For stigmata, according to the Greek, is a sort of myrrh which come naturally from the tree by cutting it; so that both these words signify the same thing (see Lampe's Apology, p. 485, note).

Ver. 18. I am the mother of fair love, and fear and knowledge, and holy hope: I therefore, being eternal, am given to all my children which are named of him. This is not in the Alex. MS. or Vatican, nor in the oriental versions. Such copies as have it very greatly, and in the most correct it is much perplexed. From whence the latter part, as it stands in the Vulgate, came, does not appear, as that which is uncertain what copy it was; but it is remarkable that St. Cyriacus is said by Fl. Nub. to have one half of it. The sense of the former part of the verse seems to be, Those that possess me are loved of God, they shall be filled with his love and fear, and with the knowledge of his truths and mysteries, and have the pleasing hope of being happy with him, and enjoying him perfectly. As to the latter part, which indeed seems corrupt, Hosea's and Grabe agree with our translators. Grotius conjectures the true reading to be, ἐγώ ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ ἔχω τὸ γένος ἵππου, ὑπὸ τὸ ὅρθρον τοῦ θεοῦ ἔχω τὸ γένος ζώων, who is his elect, immortality." Calmet reads, with the light of after correction, ἐγώ ἀπὸ τοῦ θεοῦ ἔχω τὸ γένος ἵππου, τοῦ θεοῦ ἐν τοῖς καθιστήριοι, κ. τ. λ. (ver. 17), connecting it with the foregoing verse: "I am the mother of fair love, and knowledge, and holy hope: I therefore, being eternal, am given to all my children which are named of him."

Ver. 20. For my memorial is sweeter than honey, and mine inheritance than the honeycomb. This verse has been so alterious, and so altered, by all the translators, and by Bochart and others, that it is as much a question, whether it is in the text, or whether it is derived from it. Ezechiel and John have an idea of it, but whether they use the word, and in what sense μελισσες, occurs in Theocritus.

Ver. 21. That ye eat shall be yet be hungry, and they that drink, shall thirst. The thought, that all the enjoyment rising from wisdom is often set forth under the notion of a feast; whereby is expressed the high satisfaction, joy, and pleasure, which the principles of wisdom and virtue fill the heart with. The word ψωμί here has a double meaning: it is used by the ancients, and is chaotically and far above the surfeiting and guilty ones which the world offers, which have a strong accompaniment of sorrows. Ver. 22, recommends to the study of the law, and the practice of the ordinances of God, use the same comparison, Ps. xix. 11. exil. 103.

Ver. 23. That I may be your bread and water. And to, my brother be a river, and my river become a sea. If this be a continuation of wisdom's speech, as Calvin thinks, it was given in the former part of the chapter, for thus she proceeds:—I am a never-failing source, a fountain of living waters; I am an emanation from, or one of the four rivers which watered Paradise; as their streams enriched... the proposed, and make it fruitful, the same I do likewise in the hearts of men. I distribute my influence universally, and am assisting to all by the light of nature; but my favor is bestowed most liberally to my chosen in Judea, so that when it is spoken of in the Rabbis as an angelic light and pleasing with them; for so the Greek will admit, and the other versions render. What follows next, "and stood up beautiful both before God and man," is, I think, more just than any of the versions, is very obscure, and scarce intelligible. The present Greek text seems to be faulty here; probably the true reading is, εύτους βραδυνύμνων ουδεστέρα, that the Vineyard seems to have followed. In transitions proper nouns are often used, and their proper meanings are therefore not always apparent, but in this case, that which he also allowed before God and men. And thus the Syriac and Arabic take it.

10. And as I already observe, it seems to be equally yoked. Homer uses marriage as a convenient image for the union of individuals. When two are yoked together they cannot distaste. A very strong and particular expression, referring to Dent. xxii. 5. The union of the vineyard, and the yoke which their family, and their religious duties, and their natural desires, all had of a man, a fruitless and large, not yet under the yoke of the apostles, is a very profitable connection. There must, I think, be a yoke which their family, and their religious duties, and their natural desires, all had of a man, a fruitless and large, not yet under the yoke of the apostles, is a very profitable connection. There must be a new and fresh instance to show the great love of God for his servants. But in the very next verse the love of God is not so nicely distinguished in the Old Testament times, as by St. John in his first epistle; since Syriac and Arabic, as well as Complut., have this distinction here. It may however be observed, that after saying ver. 10, there is none above him that feared the Lord, it seems strange (ver. 11) to make love the Lord above all things, that is, to make the Lord love all things, rather different from his fear. And it seems yet stranger to do this without some particle of connection. The translation indeed adds but, which should be put in italics; the doing this is much neglected in the apocryphal book.

And be that lifeeth to the fall of his enemy. This is according to the narrowness of the Jewish notions. The Jews thought hatred and revenge were permitted, or however tolerable, under such pretense, that it was the means of delivering their own, and they increased God's glory, which is displayed by such instances of his justice.

Ver. 11. The love of the Lord prompteth all things for illumination: i. e. We have to enter fasting into the school of knowledge and virtue, will sooner learn and improve by the love of God, than by his own study or inquiry; God's blessing will best forward his endeavours, and his obedience is the surest of mean things that have been brought into any principle of revenge or rancour against them, but proceeds rather from a commendable zeal, and a thirst for God's glory, which is displayed by such instances of his justice.

their perfection; neither dulness, children, a prudent wife, a sincere friend, nor even wisdom itself, can make a man happy, but he that hath it is rather an angel than a man. St. Paul is here paralogizing upon the love of God, 1 Cor. xii. Drusius and some others think the words διὰ φαραγεῖον to be an interpolation; and indeed they are not in some Greek copies, nor in the Vulgate. The fuller explanation of the meaning of which seems to be, The fear of the Lord is, the cause or principle of the love of him, and faith is the cause of the love of God. Ver. 13. Give me any plague, but the plague of the heart; and any wickedness, but the wickedness of a woman. The Greek is elliptical here, which our translators have supplied from the Septuagint. From words the Father in heaven from the mouth of God; as Calmet, Grotius, and Junius, help this defect. The sense of the first part is like that of Solomon, The spirit of a man will sustain his infirmity; but a wounded spirit who can bear? (Prov. xviii. 11.) This author hath been condemned for his moroseness to children, and his reflections upon the female sex; as to the former, I have shown that his precepts of correction are to be taken in a restrained sense; and with respect to the latter, Lassusius and other writers observe, that he is no professed enemy to the sex, nor intends any reflection upon them in general, as being the most beautiful part of the species, and designed, in their formation, as helpmeet and comforts to man. He fails not to give merit due praise, and where an opportunity offers, as in the beginning of the next chapter, to express the esteem of the author for the female sex. The second part of the verse does it in terms of the highest respect. What is said to the disadvantage of them in this and the next chapter, is only to expose the failings of some few degenerate and perverse ones, and with regard to the want of respect for them, to recommend the worthier part of the sex the more. And though he may not seem quite complaisant, his intention is honest and well intentioned; viz. to instruct youth what circumstance and prudence are necessary in the choice of the contrary sort, and the conduct to be observed to prevent faults and differences in the married state. Phoeidyles, among the fragmentaries which are preserved, has some very remarkable verses upon the sex. What is particular and worth observing is, that he derives their good and ill qualities from some animals which pertain of them, and whom in that respect resembles them. I shall mention only the two following: 1 Ili 6 15 χαλκος τε και δακτυλος και μπονζος, ΟΛοραμους τυ νυθυ νι λιπατωμα πρεπειθαι. 1 e. She that is cross and snarling hath something of the nature and temper of the dog; but the good housewife, the prudent economist, the careful manager, resembles the laborious bee, with her collection of treasure. 2 1 Sam. ii. 13. και δια αυτην, δια της αφετερωσεως των που θατρευονται, και των παραβασεων των. The sense of the whole seems to be, I would have any afflication other than that which may endear me to you. Or, I will compound for any suffering so my enemy knows nothing of it, and has not the ill-intended pleasure of triumphing over me in it, and rejoicing at what has happened to me for this reason, or of seeing me in the state of Seneca's death. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Ashkelon; lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph. (2 Sam. i. 20.) A piece of ill news an enemy hugely inwardly, and would purchase at any rate, Hosefibas velit, et margo mercantur Atride. Or the sense may be that of holy David, who was never put over to want of many enemies, which often made a part of his passion. In the next verse it is said, There is no wrath above the wrath of an enemy, δια αυτην δαιμονιον, which differs from the former; for it seems more agreeable to the context to read, There is no wrath above the wrath of a woman, or at least above the wrath of a woman. Accordingly the Syriac renders, No est inimicia maior ec que multis est. And St. Chrysostom renders it in like manner. And so the Vulgate it has, and the margin of the Genean bible. Juvencus confirms the observation, Vindicta nemo magis gaudet, quam inimicia maiora. Ver. 15. There is no head above the head of a serpent; The Hebrew word hevav principally signifies the head, and is properly used for poison, because the venom of those that are venomous is more agreeable, and serpents, lies chiefly in their head and teeth. Thus the Hebrew words of profession renders hevab, is hevah in the Hebrew. The Interlinear version has here indeed caput; but Pagnin has ex- plained it well, by inserting venenum in the margin. For what shall we understand by caput, or a head simply, except something be understood or supplied, as in the Chal- lal, instead of the head. Perhaps the author is speaking of some others, the reading is—As the head of horrible serpent, do- noting thereby either poison, or some noxious poisonous thing. As דבכ doth primarily signify a head, so it is no less manifest, and so translated by Basil, Matthew, and others, for poison itself, probably deduced from the first signification, as the serpent's poison is in its head. There are many instances in which it is used in such a sense, as Deut. xxxiii. 7. And I shall here observe, that there seems a plain sense or meaning. But though, according to the scope of the place where it occurs, and as the words with which it is joined suggest, it has different significations, yet for a serpent part is required to be derived from, one notion; viz. poison, and the qualities of noisiness and bitterness usually ascribed to it. And thus Calmet understands this place, and Boccal, in the word hevah; and in the margin of his last, Omnis too is often taken in the sense of poison (see not on Wiss, xvi. 5.) Ver. 16. I had rather dwell with a lion and a dragon, than to sit with women. This verse is a strong vindication of the text of the Vulgate, which Vulgate has been accused, and the scripture has informed us of Eve, the first woman, by whom sin entered into the world; of Potiphar's wife, who tempted the chastity of Joseph, and because she could not reduce him to her will, showed him the fruit of his labors, the body of Deliah, who was the cause of Samson's death; of So- lonom's fall, through the power of beauty; of Jehubeal, who took off righteousness Naboth's vineyard, to destroy the whole race of Naboth, to place herself upon the throne; of Job's wife, who was such a scourge to him, and herself the greatest of his plagues and misfortunes; and many other examples. I can find no more, and I only conjure our history, for their resentment and cruelty, which Calmet furnishes us with,—one wonders the less at what the author here says against the sex, I should rather say, the head and abandoned part of it, for it is of these only he is to be understood. Though he seems concerned at the fall and misconduct of part of a species, lovely in itself, and expresses himself in terms of sharpness and reproach, yet for a serpent part is required to be derived from, one notion; viz. poison, and the qualities of noisiness and bitterness usually ascribed to it. But though, according to the scope of the place where it occurs, and as the words with which it is joined suggest, it has different significations, yet for a serpent part is required to be derived from, one notion; viz. poison, and the qualities of noisiness and bitterness usually ascribed to it. And thus Calmet understands this place, and Boccal, in the word hevah; and in the margin of his last, Omnis too is often taken in the sense of poison (see not on Wiss, xvi. 5.) Ver. 17. The wickedness of a woman changeth her face. As a good conscience gives life and vigour to the body, and has a powerful operation upon the heart; so a good conscience will display itself even in the face of a good man, as was particularly verified in the glory of Moses's countenance, and the angelic face of St. Stephen, so inward guilt is gloomy and melancholy, and gives a sort of horror and despondency to the countenance; and so strong is the impression, that one may sometimes read guilt in a person's face. Calmet understands this of a cliritable, passionate woman in particu- lar, whose anger appears in her face, and spoils and disfigures her countenance, and when it comes to any outrageous expression gives her a resemblance to one of the hares. And in that case, or that when she doth render so, the word here used, chalcothit, xili. 4. And darkenth her countenance like unclothed. Ρα άγοντα. The Syrian and Arabic versions apply this, and indeed the whole verse to the same; and in this case his happy husbandfulness and contented frame of life, and make the charge and gloominess to appear in his countenance, who from the relation that is betwixt them cannot help being greatly concerned for her, and becomes the more of it in his behavior at her behaviour. Male multiers improbates pallidam reddat faciem marit, famaque nigrum efficti, quasi nigrocinerei citii. Besides this, we are not without an instance in which the best woman, though least countenance, there is another simile in the margin, as a bear, be fer, which boochart prefers (Hieroz. lib. iii. cap. 9), and thinks the other to be formed from; and that the same is expressed in the margin of the Latin; and this is well expressed by the sarcozic ertrnfn of a bear. Both these readings have their advocates, and are supported by the authority of good copies; and it is very observable and particular, that the Vulgate and Jerome's Bible have both these comparisons together. Obeccretat vultum tamquam suppellectile sacerum eam.

Ver. 18. Her husband shall sit among his neighbours; Aquamvis. If we understand this sense of discipiurare or surround, and so establish the sense of the 16th edition, it shall be continually uneasy, even in places and among company where he might expect to have been agreeably entertained and merry; or perhaps a better sense may be, Her husband shall sit among his neighbours, and probably was inserted from the beginning of the next verse. The Syriac and Arabic render, invitus longa trauta suspircia, from a copy which had dissois, instead of dessois, which Camerarius also follows. This reading too is capable of a good sense, viz, though her husband in company would gladly conceal his grief, for fear of being taken notice of, or perhaps laughed at, which is the way of the world, yet his sighs break from him unwillingly, when he perceives them not, and stirs from him unperceived, as if he were on a heavy sigh; the last verse, Because our her she sigheth sore, or he bewaare.

Ver. 19. All wickedness is but little to the wickedness of a woman; let the purity of Phaethon serve for a pattern. See xliii. 9, and particularly Eccles. vi. 7, 8, where Solomon, speaking on this subject, says, One (good) man among a thousand, but a woman among all these have I found none; which is so similar, and so well observed, as not to be looked upon as the just character of women in general in all ages and countries, but of such loose ones as Solomon was once acquainted with, or some of that stamp in that and the neighbouring nations (Bishop Park- rick, in loc.). The sense of the latter part is, Let a woman of such bad qualities fall to the share of a sinner; for one cannot with a greater plague to any man, even an enemv, than to be bed-fellows with a bad woman; and thus Calmet, Qu'elle tombe en parage a pecheur, and Junes Sorte pecator accident illi; which seems also the sense of the Vulgate. Such wishes were not unusual; there is an instance of the like in Virgil —

( 绘, lib. iii.)

This sense seems confirmed from xxvi. 23. A wicked woman is given as a portion to a wicked man; but a good wife is like a frame, that feareth not the face of death. The same, that of Solomon is parallel; The woman, whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands, I find more than death, whose pleasure God shall escape from her, and he shall be taken from her for ever. (ver. 26.) The sense, according to some is: May God deal with her as the greatest of sinners; and, according to others, May God give her such a husband, as may either raise or reform her.

Ver. 20. As the climbing of a Randy way is to the feet of the aged, so is a wife full of words to a quiet man. i.e. She is a constant clog and plague to him. Matrimony hath formerly been the common-place for trial, as well as now. Ovid and Juvenal make very free with it; the latter takes more at poetic license, when he makes all matches unenteraining; but they are writing to be the entertainment of even the marriage-bed.

_Scumper laltet illes, alternaque jurgia lectus
In sectos insidias victimis, anctus.*

( ver. vi.)

This probably is true, where a person has the misfortune of a scold. the margin here has it, for his partner; one who will fill his house with rage and ridicule, and his bed with cares and restlessness; and especially if she has a strong temper, she will attend her husband with compli- ment, and imperious, she will take advantage of his meek- ness to make herself absolute, and her husband ridiculous. But a loving and silent woman (xxvi. 14), i.e. one who keeps her passions, and the like he is the woman that cometh of the Lord; her character is amiable, and her person desirable. She will not cross her husband's inclinations through prescenes, but comply with her own disposition. They are easy and obliging, and the greater reason she gives him to continue so.

Ver. 21. Stainde not at the beauty of a woman, Some understand it thus; Cast not thyself down at the feet of a beautiful woman, being captivated with her charms; and she will fall upon thee like that xx. 9; The thine eye from a beautiful woman, for many have been deceived by the beauty of a woman, for herewith love is kindled as a fire. Or the meaning may be like that in ver. 3, Gaze not on a maid, lest the fall not by those things that are precious in her. If, with the Syrac and Arabic versions, we understand it of an evil and loose woman, it will then be the same with ver. 6, Give not thy soul unto harlots, that thou lose not the fruit of the house.

And desire her not for pleasure. Eia gynon. The Go- nova version has, for thy pleasure; but many copies omit this word. The Antwerp Greek has, for the pleasure and the beauty of a woman, lest itkindle a criminal passion in thee, and thou be tempted to lust after her; or it may be considered as matter of advice to a lover, not to choose a wife merely for her beauty, or for any sensual satisfac- tion proposed, but rather for her good qualities and accom- plishments. As a wise man principally aims at society in a wise, he ought to choose one with such good sense as to form the agree of her husband, Malagis such a temper as not only to share his good or evil fortune with equanimity, but with sufficiency and credit; one not merely to increase, but capable and willing to govern his family, bring up his children, and to make a competent man to the best advantage. Euripides has exactly the same sentiment with our author (Pressey's edition, vol. vii. p. 537) —

Ver. 22. A woman, if she maintain her husband, is full of anger, impatience, and much reproach. The wise man having given his sentiments about beauty and presence, next to show that a fortune, as such, should not be chosen, be- cause such a one is apt to be assuming, and to reproach her husband with what she brought him, and that his sub- sidence and the ruin of the family is the wife. In his impiety, and inconstancy, and forthe inconstancy of her husband, and the beauty, ingenuity, inconstancy and insupportable, even in a person of worth and merit, and much more so where only a family or riches is the pretense. What Juvenal has observed, is, I believe, the sentiment of most people; —

Mala Venustiam, quam te, Cornelia, mater Gracchorum, sic cum magnis victatibus edera Grandi superstition.

(Nat. vi.)

There may also another sense be given of this place; if a woman will not maintain her husband, Malagis such a temper as not only to share his good or evil fortune with equanimity, contraria est vivo suo, Vulgat; which Calmet expounds, Si la lemna a la principale autorite, elle eleve contre son mari. The rendering of the oriental versions is remark- able. Serrinjer, *if she maintain her husband in his affec- tions in maritus suum. The poor man in Plautus made but an indifferent bargain, who says, Uxorum accept, dote imperialis avec. Plautus renders from a such a match, wherein money is the only ingredient.

Mora ducatunc aliquo parum dicere lectus Lugens d' olivis cura cibos etes quasi exiguum.

Ver. 23. A woman that will not comfort her husband in distress, maketh weak hands and feeble knees. *Nil se- perent, et volo plena parum, lexv, e. r. l. Besides the sense of our version, there is another favoured by Goodenough; that the woman who contributes not all in her power to make her husband happy, who will not be assisting in his distress, and is indifferent about his welfare, as that of a stranger, will not be unkind, and without charity, nor strive to gain others to promote his interest, is lazy, brutish, and good for nothing. Or rather, says Calmet, the meaning is, that an idle, and unprofitable woman, without either zeal or ability, will not stir herself to look into her family affairs, nor contribute to the management of the common interest, can never make a husband truly happy, or be a proper companion to him.

Ver. 21. Give the water no passage; neither a wicked woman liberty to go abroad. Some Greek copies have only Librant, power simply, which a wicked woman is sure to abuse even in marriage, both at home, and abroad, and as necessary to curb and restrain a designing, heaful, aspiring woman, as to confine a swelling water within its banks. Power in bad hands is dangerous, and, if not watched and preserved, will be the means of some great mischief, to and the more strength it gains, the wider will be the deselation and rain. Other copies have ἤ τιμή τίμην, which our translation follows (see xxvi. 10). This seems to refer to the presence of wicked and evil women, who are teaching many women, and keeping them closely shut up. The apostle, among other directions given to young women, particularly advises them to "be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands" (Tit. ii. 5). Calmet says the sense of this place is the same with that of Solomon; "Drink water out of thine own cistern, and rivers of own kind of thing over" (Prov. v. 19); and that the advice is directed to married women who had fallen after strange women, nor to cover the sweets of stolen waters; see xxvi. 12, where the like simile is applied to a lost sheep.

Ver. 36. If she go not as thou wouldst have her, cut her off from thy flesh, and give her a bill of divorce, and let her go. This is more severe than the advice to follow, viz. to give her what her hand brings. By some a wife has been considered as a man's right hand; and then the sense will be, "if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off," though our Saviour by that expression intended not to authorize any such liberty of divorce. A wife, however, has always been esteemed as part of a man's own flesh; for by matrimony they become ἐς ἐκαίνια μια, and to this the wise man refers when he says, "The woman is a deceitful creature," but God divided him into two; and no sooner were there two, but he united them into one; so that marriage is almost as old as nature, and its union the most close and intimate affair of the two last classes; the best course is to be only a marginal explanation of the former sentence, and at length erect into the text; and indeed it is omitted in many copies. By ὀλίγος some understand, besides the sense given, the word as a diminutive of ὀλοκλήρωσις, viz. according to the scholar, that a man must sit down contented with his wife, whether she prove good or bad, regarding the advice to view her in all manner of parts from her if her behaviour is not according to a man's liking. Either, says he, they are different persons, or our author changed his sentiments (Com. in loc. see Bartholocci Biblioth. Rabbin. vol. i. p. 219).

CHAP. XXVI.

Ver. 3. A good wife is a good portion, which shall be given in the portion of them that fear the Lord. By ἐν ἑαυτῷ or ἐν αὐτῇ here, and Prov. xii. 4. xxvi. 10, is meant one that is pleasing and delightful. This character Solomon describes, Prov. xxix. 10. &c. In the former chapter, ver. 19, a wicked woman is mentioned as the portion of a sinner; here it is said, that a good and virtuous woman is a delight, and the portion and comfort of her, a reward of his goodness; and thus the Syrie. Malcher bona daisi turo vinent Dominum, proper bona ipsius opera (see ver. 23. Prov. xix. 14. Tob. vii. 12). As a prudent wife is from the Lord, holy men in scripture accordingly regarded the direction of God and his blessing in the choice of a wife: for as God first instituted marriage, so he still preserves it, and all marriages ought to be concluded in his name, and entered up with a petition for his blessing. Abraham comforts himself that the Lord God of heaven would send his angel to choose a wife for his son Isaac (Gen. xxiv. 62). The same thing is implied in the story of his master Abraham to send him good success in the undertaking he went about, and to show kindness unto his master Abraham in a particular which so nearly concerned them both. (Gen. xiv. 12. 13.) Drusus and some other expositors, differing herein from our translators, make the next verse a continuation of the same subject; viz. that he that is so highly favoured as to have the blessing of a good wife, whether he be poor or rich, and have or have not, and his satisfaction will appear in his very countenance; for where the married parties are happy in and pleased with each other, grace and harmony are triumphant; as where all is well composed, they will of course succeed, and a never-failing spring of delights. The Syrie and Arabic connect the verses in the same manner.

Ver. 5. There be three things that mine heart feareth, and for the fourth I was sore afraid: the slander of a city, the gathering together of an unruly multitude, and a false accusation: all these are worse than death; Job 5:7 (Korh. 5:11: Bib. hex. 5:4). The city means rather country, as Grotius observes, signifies xlvii. 9, and so it occurs often in the LXX. And hence Bochart answers to Satan, an adversary, in the Hebrew. For the evil of one's city, the incurring the displeasure of the public, or of an extensive neighbourhood. History furnishes us with many examples of persons who have been fined, and that for a single word, and for the sake of following after strange women, nor to cover the sweets of stolen waters; see xxvi. 12, where the like simile is applied to a lost sheep.

Ver. 36. If she go not as thou wouldst have her, cut her off from thy flesh, and give her a bill of divorce, and let her go. This is more severe than the advice to follow, viz. to give her what her hand brings. By some a wife has been considered as a man's right hand; and then the sense will be, "if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off," though our Saviour by that expression intended not to authorize any such liberty of divorce. A wife, however, has always been esteemed as part of a man's own flesh; for by matrimony they become ἐς ἐκαίνια μια, and to this the wise man refers when he says, "The woman is a deceitful creature," but God divided him into two; and no sooner were there two, but he united them into one; so that marriage is almost as old as nature, and its union the most close and intimate affair of the two last classes; the best course is to be only a marginal explanation of the former sentence, and at length erect into the text; and indeed it is omitted in many copies. By ὀλίγος some understand, besides the sense given, the word as a diminutive of ὀλοκλήρωσις, viz. according to the scholar, that a man must sit down contented with his wife, whether she prove good or bad, regarding the advice to view her in all manner of parts from her if her behaviour is not according to a man's liking. Either, says he, they are different persons, or our author changed his sentiments (Com. in loc. see Bartholocci Biblioth. Rabbin. vol. i. p. 219).

Ver. 3. A good wife is a good portion, which shall be given in the portion of them that fear the Lord. By ἐν ἑαυτῷ or ἐν αὐτῇ here, and Prov. xii. 4. xxvi. 10, is meant one that is pleasing and delightful. This character Solomon describes, Prov. xxix. 10. &c. In the former chapter, ver. 19, a wicked woman is mentioned as the portion of a sinner; here it is said, that a good and virtuous woman is a delight, and the portion and comfort of her, a reward of his goodness; and thus the Syrie. Malcher bona daisi turo vinent Dominum, proper bona ipsius opera (see ver. 23. Prov. xix. 14. Tob. vii. 12). As a prudent wife is from the Lord, holy men in scripture accordingly regarded the direction of God and his blessing in the choice of a wife: for as God first instituted marriage, so he still preserves it, and all marriages ought to be concluded in his name, and entered up with a petition for his blessing. Abraham comforts himself that the Lord God of heaven would send his angel to choose a wife for his son Isaac (Gen. xxiv. 62). The same thing is implied in the story of his master Abraham to send him good success in the undertaking he went about, and to show kindness unto his master Abraham in a particular which so nearly concerned them both. (Gen. xiv. 12. 13.) Drusus and some other expositors, differing herein from our translators, make the next verse a continuation of the same subject; viz. that he that is so highly favoured as to have the blessing of a good wife, whether he be poor or rich, and have or have not, and his satisfaction will appear in his very countenance; for where the married parties are happy in and pleased with each other, grace and harmony are triumphant; as where all is well composed, they will of course succeed, and a never-failing spring of delights. The Syrie and Arabic connect the verses in the same manner.
marriage, or the uneasy state of a man with a wife, is in the disagreement of her having access to those, who draw different conclusions and do without doing any good, are a clog, hinderance, and vexation to each other, instead of being assisting like true yokefellows, by concurrence, and joint project. If a wife to a scorpion in the sentence following, is parallel to xx. 13, and strongly expresses the danger of such a union; and that the very touch of her is deadly, or would be, or, as it were, a vise to the same body; if both go together and look one way, be it upwards or downwards, to the right or to the left, all is well and comely in the face; but if it be crossed, and she makes haste to get the other another, there is then a manifest blemish and a disgraceable distortion" (Bishop Balington’s Works, p. 316).

Ver. 8. A drunken woman and a giddy youth. This great and important caution, prevents the woman from doing that which is not her own shame. A woman that is addicted to drinking influences her passions thereby, and has little or no regard to modesty and decorum.

Curritius’s description of the Babylonish women will suit all such (and I hope, are few) who drown their reason and endanger their virtue, by intemperance and debauch. Permission to women to wear modestest clothes, deicide summa quimica eximia, paula, tamque pudorem profanant; ad ultimum honos annullus habitis situ iana corporum velamim profligant; innulla opusculorum, et huic vis et aeque adornationibus videtur; sine hiberna, thereupon. Thus, the husband is not only prevented without wine, but if he should be found, he and all admittance to such anode: a side (Plin. lib. xiv, Val. Max. lib. vii. Pliny. Augustus causes_great, and his wife to the whipped to death, according to Armobians, for her intemperance. Many copies have not the words, "giddy abroad!" nor do the oriental versions or Vulgate take any notice of them. But it may perhaps be observed, that alcohol is a modest way among the Hebrews of expressing nakedness, and what nature and decency command to be concealed. As her reason is impaired, and for a time loses its usual off, and on, as it were, to due to her excessive character. Omnis muter quia vindicta et comets-saxil, cadem quaque meretriz est (Aul. Opit imperfect, in Matth). Though this may seem too much an exaggeration, yet it is certain, that what is then often thus dispaguis great lack if she escape being debauched. Her talk, looks, and motions encourage an attempt, and there are libertines always ready to improve upon them, thus availing themselves of the immodesty to which she sacrifices the last of her honor. Ver. 9. "If a man be dead, and a woman is married unto a dead man, in that case, they shall be free: the widow can marry whom she pleases, and the dead man’s brother shall not marry her" (ver. 14). He is not here considered a son of her, or husband, but as a member of the family, and himself dead. It is not, however, concluded, that she should marry a dead man; but her right is secured in the event of such a marriage. The woman may then marry whom she pleases, and the man’s brother may marry her. If such a one is as has a wanton eye or an immodest look. The Syrinx expresses this very strongly: Post canque inviduentes est oculis eurum, i.e. Watch, close, or at the heels of! of such a one, whose look is intolerable, and that the danger is imminent of her doing amiss if not narrowly watched. Grotius says oh! here is to be taken in the sense of "ought," Watch over such a one, or, be not surprised if she be too cunning for you and deceive thee, and by transgressing lose her honour and stain the credit of your family. But he may as well be delivered, in the same way, to love, and by its motions betray the inward disposition, the eyes being as it were the wine man properly directs the sentiment to be placed there. Ver. 13. The grace of a wife delighteth her husband, and her discretion will fit his bones. For a wife well understood, and by intregrity, discretion and skill, chiefly in household affairs, in doing and ordering the necessary works for her family (see ver. 11), to whom management and economy in providing for it, both which qualities must be agreeable to the person who has the happiness of such a partner. Thus Solomon describes a good wife. Prov. xxxi. "She openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness; she looketh well and in the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness. The heart of her husband doth trust in her, and she will do him good, and not evil, all the days of her life." (ver. 11). Not that I would hereby so far restrict the love of life, that it be confined to wife, as to exclude prudence in other affairs, which is necessary towards a regular and prudent understanding (see much less good sense and discretion Ver. 13, to the husband the concur in this with, and for the marriage, the marriage, the good man, for life, and for the marriage, the marriage, the very countenance. The LXX. rendering of Prov. xvii. 22, somewhat resembles this. The Lat. vulg. Vulgate, Leander, Oros. saec. "et multa vacillantia, " et multa vacillantia, " et multa vacillantia, " but the Hebrew expresses only a wife indefinitely, and our translation follows it here. See instances of such omission in LXX. Philol. Soc. de anitise. Ver. 14. 7. Shammai and faithfull women is a double grace, and her continent mind cannot be valued." Shamo facedness may either mean bashfulness or modesty, and so may regard both virgins and married women; both of which should avoid a forwardness of showing themselves, and not take a pride in being followed and admired, and appearing before the faces of the people for renowning their beauty. Tertullian, exponet libidinis est videri et videre; and in the same work he says, Tam sancti viri est suffundii, si virgini, nimirum, quod etiam a Deo sit enat (Ver. xxii. 19). By faithfulness we are not only to understand that fidelity which she owes to her husband, but that religious service and constancy which she owes to him, and which can be only sufficiently set out (Ver. xxii. 20). By knowledge, we are not only to understand that fidelity which she owes to her husband, but that religious service and constancy which she owes to him, and which can be only sufficiently set out (Ver. xxii. 20).

Ver. 18. As the golden pillars are upon the sockets of silver; so are the fair feet upon a comely head, trusting in the goodness of the stock. Elx^ivos tiv^ivos eidoi, τοις υπό των λίθων μοιχων. The possession of any field, τοις υπό των λίθων μοιχων, is frequently so used by this writer (see ver. 19); πεπαφάσαι is a metaphor often used for a woman who has made an improper choice of husband. Coopers use the phrase like σεμπληγασμένος δίκαιος (Phen. ver. 18). He calls a husband, κατευθυνόμενος, παραδίδοντας δόξαν. Theodorus has the same comparison. Geffcken, Ver. 18. Virgil, with his usual modern, exaggerated, and sometimes unfortunate style, follows ver. 20, and properly after that in the former verse, of not giving one's strength to strange women; it is like that of St. Paul. "His wife let every man have his own wife, and let the maiden have her own woman" (1 Cor. vii. 2). For marriage is the proper as well as settled remedy of incontinency. And as an encouragement to it, the wise man mentions one particular advantage arising from it; viz. a certain and legitimate issue, which shall not after be reflected on for baseness of birth, but, triumphing in an honest and lawful descent, shall prosper and grow great. Or, as Drusius takes it, Men, παραδίδοντας, shall appear favourably of and excel thy family and posterity for the goodness of their stock and the unblemished honour of their descent.

Ver. 19. A harlot shall be accounted as spiteful; but a married woman is a tower against death to her husband. The marginal reading, "as a swine," I think preferable, as coming nearer Solomon's description, "A handsomely worned widow is a tower of gold in a swine's snout." Prov. xi. 22, where γυνὴ κεφαλήν in the LXX. may be rendered a woman of an evil turn of mind, as well as of a weak one; and in the essential sense, that the image of such a one is the image of a base and disorderly person. There is much greater difficulty in the latter part of the verse; the Greek of which is, θείακος ἡ γυναῖκα τῶν ἀδελφῶν, "A good woman is a treasure of every family." Geffcken, interpreting the translators, observing an opposition in the parts of some verses following, have fancied that there must be one here; as to χαρακτήρας, which all the copies have, at the first hearing, one would think that the woman here meant communisit to herself more than one, and that it should be χαρακτήρας, if the husband only be meant as our translators confine it; but upon further examen this will be found allowable: for Prov. xxv. 13, where the Hebrew has χαρακτήρας, the version of the Septuagint is, θείακος ἡ γυναῖκα τῶν ἀδελφῶν. As both these, therefore, in the plural number, signify only one person, and may properly signify a husband, so it may be a husband who is a tower against death, to his family. The same word is used in Drusus shows from Prov. vi. 24, 25, 26, γυνὴ κεφαλήν may well signify, γυνὴ κεφαλήν then must either be a dowltown tower, in the sense of the Arabie, Marotta cum adulterii comitatu, similis est turri, corrumpit super eum qui profusus accedit ad ipsum, or a prison, in which persons were kept for execution, and suffered often to die there. And as prisons had pits or dungeons in them (Jer. xxvi. 6), so a woman is called a deep pit, Prov. xxii. 14, xxix. 27, and an adulteress is the most dangerous sort. That towers are often prisons is well known (Neh. ii. 25). There was a place near Jerusalem called "the house of the pit," 2 Sam. xiv. 2. The Vulgate translates the word, "fort of death," but to what use it was put does not appear. Now as the punishment of the adulterer was death (Lev. xx. 10), the adulteress might well be called the tower or prison of death, as she is in scripture represented, under other figures, as the cause of death; see Prov. vii. 21, 23, but above all, Prov. viii. 25, where in the LXX. just the same sort of distinction is made between a common whore and an adulteress, as, according to this interpretation, is made here, and γυνὴ κεφαλήν there comes very near γυνὴ κεφαλήν in this place. And thus there is still some opposition between these two parts of the verse, though not so great a one as in the sense which our translators have chosen. I shall only add, that if persons are disposed to change the meaning of the word here, if they understand it of a bad woman; nor would ἀναγίνω, ἀναγίνω, ἀναγίνω, or ἀναγίνω, be either of them amis, if applied to a good one.

Ver. 20. A woman that honoureth her husband shall be grudged wise of all; but she that dishonoureth him in her pride shall be counted ungodly of all. This seems not so well translated; the Greek of the latter part is, ἀνεγίνω, woman &c. &c. "He that despiseth and dishonoureth her husband, shall be accounted wicked and ungodly for her pride by all." Thus the Geneva version, "She that despiseth him shall be blazed for her pride." And the meaning is, that if any woman be disposed to dishonour her husband, she shall be accounted wicked by all, as in the other sense also a woman to whom she is accounted by her husband to be godly who shall be accounted wise of all. Shaub's translation is, "A woman that honoureth her husband shall be no grudge wise of all; whereas she that dishonoureth him in her pride shall be accounted ungodly of all." This seems rather just, and is more suitable to the sense of the passage. For the meaning seems to be, not that such a woman is accounted ungodly by all, but that she is accounted such to all. This seems to me to be the true meaning. A prudent woman gains the ascendancy by her condescension and engaging sweetness; she obtains easily what the other commands by violence. She needs no tricks to win over any, but through her own good nature and good conduct. She needs no tricks to win over any, but through her own good nature and good conduct. She needs no tricks to win over any, but through her own good nature and good conduct.
puts one in mind of what Homer says of the god of war on another occasion, "Mars belows with the pain; Loud as the roar encanting arms yield. When shooting nations shake the thundering field, Loud as the thunders in a tempest, and trembling earth ne'er slopes, And earth and heaven rebellow to the sound." (I. v.)

After this some Greek copies have an entire verse omitted in our version, the sense of which, according to the Syriac, is, "And as the fowl of the air doth not sow, nor reap, neither hath he power to gather into his barn; but his seed is of him." (Ver. 30.) Solomon mentions this as a poor wise man's employer of the time, and his fear and anxiety of the way in which his suffering affects his mind, "Thine own wickedness and thy backslidings shall rebuke thee: thou shalt know and see that it is an evil and bitter thing to forsake the Lord thy God." (Ver. 18.)

Ver. 29. A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong; and he that hatcheth shall not be freed from sin. The Vulgate has, Dux spei, laboris et parvis minis ap- paruerunt; but there are no words in any of the Greek copies to answer them. One particular is wanting here, except in the Have hester, but this is a distinct instance. According to Calvin, the same person is meant under different names, or, as concerned in two different branches of the same business. The wise man's observation will hold as to merchants, whose trade being large and extensive, they have the more temptations and opportunities to sin, if they content not themselves with a moderate profit; but such are most liable to exact, who aim at engrossing any branch of business, and, by es- tablishing a monopoly, set an unreasonable price upon their goods.

Tully has made the like observation upon huck- stea, and describes it as a trade distinct from the rest, to which he ascribes electricity and the like; he does not signify merely a publican, as Grotius understands it), as exposed by their sort of business particularly to lying. Sordidi etiam putam, infamia mercan., WECH. (Ver. 29.) Yet Tully contains this more particularly to the sins of the tongue, Non justificat, etiam corrupts, ductus laborum. Through a desire of gain they have such power, that they may exact what is not right, and thus corrupt the opinions of others; but are tempted to us- ing cunning and artifice, and sometimes falsehood itself, to dispose of their commodities, not as justice directs but as avarice prompts them.

CHAP. XXVII.

Ver. 1. Many have sinned for a small matter; it was not, for the sake of anything indifferent, as the margin has it; for money was one of those things which the stoics put into the number of things indifferent, of which a man might make a use and a profit, without doing either good conscience to richers, and was more happy and inno- cent than the ambitious or covetous, amidst their great wealth and honour. Alas, notwithstanding his wealth, and grandeur, and aye, he now trembles for the sake of Naboth's vineyard, and to obtain so small a matter was guilty of murder. According to the learned Calvanius, the true reading is "The wrath of God," (1 Tim. vi. 9.) The Vulgate renders, proper impium multu delinquaturum, a quo deo, as some copies have it; and so the Genera version, "Be- cause of poverty have many sinned." And indeed poverty has forced many to steal, to hold to what is not their own, forsworn, &c. (see Prov. xx. 9.) Tully takes in both these motives, and makes avarice and poverty the two grand occasions of committing wickedness, of men's turning away their eyes from God, and neglecting their duty.

Ver. 2. As a wall sticketh fast between the joinings of the stones; so doth sin stich close between buying and selling. That sin, signifies here a wooden pin, or piece of wood, as this when firmly wedged in a wall cannot easily be taken out or repaired, so it is equally difficult to prevent and cure the sin and want of communications between the buyer and sale, of which the other one would sell too dear; the other would buy too cheap; the seller is apt to exact, and to ask too much, and to cry up his goods extravagantly; according to this he has inquired of all the good and rarest things which one valet undere merces; and the buyer is inclined to decry the commodity, to find fault with its price or goodness, that he may have it the cheaper. According to this sentiment of Solomon, the apostle orders them first to search out the seller and buyer; but when he is gone his way, he loseth them" (Prov. xx. 14.) Anarcharhis therefore called the market, where most trade is carried on, the mint of lies (Apud Laert. l. b. i.)

Ver. 3. Unless a man hold himself diligently in the fear of the Lord, his house shall soon be overthrown. This ad- vice is addressed principally to such who are in business and commerce, which usually tempted more others to overreach and defraud, are here cautioned against the acts of injustice and oppression, lest they draw upon them- selves God's indignation and forswear his blessing, which alone gives riches and prosperity. Jeremiah expresses the disappointment of such by a beautiful simile, "As the partridge sitteth upon eggs and hatcheth them not, so he that geteth riches, and he that gains, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and be a fool" (xvii. 11.) It is ob- servable, that in all the printed editions there is an ellipsis of the person who in the Hebrew and Greek text (see Glass. Philol. Sac. lib. iii.) which Heschelius has sup- plied from an ancient MS. in his notes upon the place; according to a new reading and a most learned man's authority, it should be as it is here printed: Iheris קירא קירא יתנור שזוכו, הקensored אתו וסב עָבְלָה; i. e. That he is used to enhance and raise the price of his goods beyond what is reasonable, so that for the word is taken Prov. xi. 26, unless he confines him- self to what is fair and honest, shall very speedily come to ruin. The reduplication intinuates the certainty and speedi- ness of the vengeance. Instances of which pleemass we have, xi. 21, xxx. 25.

Ver. 4. As when one fifteth with a siv, the refuse re- maineth; so the filth of man in his talk, i. e. The faults of men appear, and discover themselves in their discourse. It is very difficult, even if a person is cautious, not to let some foible or other intermix and appear in his talk, by which you may discover his temper and inclination, who he is most fond of, or hates; who is most wise, sober, and regular, or loose, corrupt, and impudent. If, when there are so many noble subjects of conversation to enter- tain or improve company with a man delights to vulgarize and overspill his words and words into every possible obscenity, blasphemy, profanities, &c. which are the refuse and filth of discourse; such a one betrays a corrupt heart, and an evil treasure lodged there, and you may judge of his intentions and intentions. For a man's talk is a kind of mirror of his soul, and dis- covers all its secrets. When a youth was presented to Socrates, that he might judge of his character, he ordered him to make a speech to me before him, by which he could form a better judgment of him than by his counte- nance, or any other symptom. Tully has well observed, Qualis homo, talis etiam erit ejus oratio, oratione aut the brightest shines only by reflection, and with a borrowed lustre. As his meditation is in the law of the Most High, his conversation is with the angels, and he is exalted above the beauty of location; the rule of his conduct is the revealed will of that Being, 'with whom is no variableness neither shadow of turning,' and a firm trust in his goodness keeps him alive and preserved in the troubled times of his reign. The sun of the morning is always unequal and variable, and when it shines the Yea, sayest thou: His words were smoother than oil, yet and ye shall try them. But he shall change his note, or, as the margin has it, he will alter his speech, and in thy absence find fault with what was spoken. Of course it will make good men shun their acquaintance endeavour to do thee some mischief, or bring thee into disgrace. Such a concealed enemy, according to Homer, is the most abominable as much as deceit. The following passage resembles our nation in the description of him: "He had his hands upon such as he at peace with him, and he brake his covenant; the words of his mouth were softer than butter at first, but waywardly.

Ver. 25. Whoso casteth a stone on high casteth it on his own head; and a deceitful stroke shall make wounds. The whole of the last verse is enlarged, the absence of treachery and perfidiousness in friendship, he now sets down the punishment of it; viz. that the mischief which a false friend is meditating and designing against him, will fall back upon himself. This follows his words on his treachery; the stroke levelled in the dark shall return upon himself. This seems to be the sense of the Vulgate, that the bed is broken, or entered; but the Syriac is explicit and clear, Obodrator qui percutiit in occulto, perditionem tradet. See Ps. vii. 15, 16. Prov. vi. 13, where it is said of the wicked person, who pretendeth friendship, and at the same time is devoting snares continually, uterque sibi secus evacuerunt et (the very expression of our author) and is always ready to raise an unenlightened multitude in the last sentence, "he knoweth that he will depart from him," has with the Vatertian and some other copies, has, and and and of Ledebour and Heschelius, de evangelio. Ver. 32. Mockery and reproach are from the proud; but vengeance, as a last, shall lie in wait for them. There may be two senses given of this place; viz. mockery, reproach, and vengeance, shall fall upon the proud or wicked; thus Calmet. Les insultes et les outrages sont reservees pour les superbes, et la vengeance fondra sur eux. Or the Vulgate gives the matter of reproach, and reproach behoveth the proud; they are vices which they are particularly guilty of, and therefore vengeance shall pursue them. The reproaching at the mouth of the righteous person in the presence of their instance of their mockery, and their insult shall be repaid them by grievous torments inflicted on them in this life. This was verified in Antichius and other persecutors (2 Thess. ii. 12). Ver. 33. Notice and wrath, even these are abominations; and the sinful man shall have both. As the wise man hath been vigilant and treasured his words, so does he likewise here his resentment and wrath, both of which are to be detested; Utrque execerabilis sunt, Vulg. The manner of expression in our version seems to soften these words; thee shall he bless them, and will not entertain the other is. That the sinner shall feel the resentment of God, and the terrible effects of his fury: which sense seems confirmed by the context. The verse is a proper introduction to what is to follow, in that it would not be amiss to begin the next chapter with it.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Ver. 1. He that revegeth shall find vengeance from the Lord, and he will surely keep his sins in remembrance. But he that doth good shall be credited, and the Lord shall show him kindness, and yet he will do it deceitfully, and is the more dangerous energy, as he has the appearance of goodwill; and in the case of the supreme person, that he is fulsomely, bow and graces to effect his purpose, uterque sibi secus evacuerunt et (the very expression of our author) and is always ready to raise an unenlightened multitude in the last sentence, "he knoweth that he will depart from him," has with the Vatertian and some other copies, has, and and and of Ledebour and Heschelius, de evangelio. Ver. 23. When thou art present, he will speak sweetly, and will allure thy words; but at the last he will write his mouth, and enwrath thy sayings. Yea, sayest thou: His words were smoother than oil, yet and ye shall try them. But he shall change his note, or, as the margin has it, he will alter his speech, and in thy absence find fault with what was spoken. donim king to humble his pride. And perhaps that custom among the Egyptians, of placing at their most sum-tuous feast a skull in some conspicuous part of the room, might be as much designed to prevent quarrels and pro-months as to exhibit a sign of their most luxurious taste.
The following sentence, viz. "Remember corruption and death," is (says a learned writer) the shortest comprehend of holy living that ever was given; it is as if the author had made a choice of the best words and best arranged them by wise and good men for the moral conduct of life; but would you have a short and infallible directory of living well, remember corruption and death. Do but remember that you are to be consumed and committed to the dust, if you can ... for the consideration of death is the greatest security of a good life... of so vast consequence is the consideration of death above all, that the ancients have within the compass even of useful and practical meditation, that Moses, with great reason, places the wisdom of man in the sole consideration of his latter end" (Norriss on the Conduct of Human Life, p. 138-160).

Ver. 7. Remember the commandments, and hear no notice to thy neighbour: remember the covenant of the Highest, and wink at ignorance. Malice may be considered as a breach of the sixth commandment, which besides actual murder forbi d also revenge, and the very intention of doing mis Malice also, as it contains not itself with think or devising evil, itself often in ill-natured speech and goadings, is a breach of the ninth commandment, which forbids false witness, slandering, and evil speaking. By the "covenant of the highest" in the 6th and 7th verses, we may understand God's law which forbids all malice and revenge, and en-joints the forgiveness of injuries; or his adopting all men, especially the faithful, into one body and communion, to even and forgive all, by love and charity, a reconditional regard and tenderness for each other. Or by the "c ovenant of the highest" may be meant God's promise, or his conditional covenant, that he will forgive men their trespasses if they desist from it, and forsake their Trespasses. By ignorance here we may understand not only sins of ignorance, as they are called, but transgressions of other kinds, and so ignorance is often used; see xii. 30. "He that loveth his neighbour hath alwa-Eccles. xxii. 3, 30, and διψευτα and διψασθαι are synonymous in the Hellenic writings (see note on v. 15). Probably the wise man here may artfully call an offence a slip of ignorance, to extenuate the greatness or odiousness of it, and thereby induce the party injured to pass it over the sooner.

Ver. 10. As the matter of the fire is, so it burneth; and as a man's strength is, so is his wrath. ] ἢ τὸ νόημα τοῦ πυρὸς, ἢ τὸ καρδιῶς τοῦ ἄνθρωπος. A learned commentator reads the Greek in the following manner, ἢ τὸ νόημα τοῦ ἄνθρωπου ἢ τὸ καρδιῶς τοῦ ἄνθρωπου. But there is no necessity of making any alteration, it is a Hebraism, and there are frequent instances of this construction (see Glass. Philol. Sac. ill. iii. De Pronom.). ἢ ἐστὶν τῶν ἐν καρδιᾷ τῶν ἄνθρωπων, ἢ ἐστὶν τῶν ἐν ὑπερήφανοι). There is an instance of this construction in point of fortune and circumstances; see iii. 13. xiv. 13. xiv. 6. Prov. xv. 6. "In the house of the righteous man there is no lack of wisdom; there is no lack of understanding in the house of the righteous." For the force of the 10th and 12th verses, and the sentences from which they are translated, is properly rendered "multitude of all kinds of ignorance." I should prefer this sense here, but for the next sentence, which is to the same purpose, though it may be taken literally for strength, there will be the same tauntol ty with respect to the last sentence of the verse.

According to his riches his anger riseth; and the stronger they are which contend, the more they will be inflamed. ] ἢ τὸ καλλίτηρ πολλῆς ἐννοιῶν ἢ τὸ ἀρπαγῆς ἐννοιῶν. Literally, According to the force and spirit of the strife, battle, combat, so is it increased, and becomes more fierce and bloody.
The sense is, that a man's pride and haughtiness (this is so we are to understand anger and wrath in this place), arising from power or wealth, will increase proportionably to it. See Ps. x. 4, where there is a description of a similar spirit in the case of the Lord. The observation on the passage is, that while account is so great, that he is represented not as caring for God, neither is God in all his thoughts. Where the LXX. rendering is observable, and resembles that before us: see 1 Cor. iv. 11. "Let none esteem himself above another, in iron iron, Vulgate. But of these two are absolutely indif versions of the Hebrew here: it would be better expressed by elation, or alitative man sui i. e. Carrying his head high, and looking to the sky with insolent and arrogance spiritus sui (see De Muis, in loc.): or we may understand anger literally here; viz. that a person who thinks himself injured or affronted will resentment the usage, and his anger will rise in proportion to the opinion which,

be entertainers of his own worth or greatness, either with respect to rank, merit, or outward qualities and accomplishments. It is on this account that the lernity and meekness of our Saviour is so justly admired; the forgiveness of so mighty a king, of so mean and abusive a subject, who had hardly insulted his honour, was no less glorious to him than his victory ever Caius." (Syr. ii. 11, 12.)

Ver. 11, 12. An hotly contention kindleth a fire: and an hotly fighting sheddeth blood. If thou blow the spark, it shall burn: if blow snap upon it, it shall be quenched: and kindle not the wrath of man in his breast: for wrath doth not.
setment before spoken to, the wise man properly proceeds to mention quarrels and disputes which generally are the fruits of this passion. "If you have an enemy, do not mischiefs. At first they arise from some inconsiderable cause or trifling accident, perhaps only from a hasty or wrong word, which a person resents growing angry, proceeds thence to reproach and calumny; and by the same, and in fine to blows and blood-shedding. This dreadful process is properly compared here to a spark of fire, which is of little consequence or danger in itself, and may be extinguished by a moment, by trendy or spitting upon it; or by letting it full to the ground, and taking no notice of it, it will go out of itself. In like manner the heat and fury of an adversary may be assuaged by patience and morality, and thus a spark of anger which may kindle to a shark and keep it alve, if you add fuel to dying embers, by taking the part of the quarrelsome person or contradictor, instead of being patient, and restraining your vocation, you will kindle such a fire as you will not be able to extinguish. Solomon has the same comparison upon the like occasion, "Where no wood is, there the fire goeth not: where no snare is, the man is not in ceaseth. As coals are to burning coals, and wood to fire. so is a contentious man to kindle strife" (Prov. xxii. 20.
21). The moral of which observation is, to stop passion, and restraining your mouth, in such circumstances to turn its torrent, and remove whatever may add to the swelling of it; or, in the words of the same wise writer,"to leave off contention before it be meddled with, for the beginning of contention is like the letting of water," one knoweth not where it will stop (prov. xiv. 13).

Ver. 13. Curse the whisperer and double-tongued: for such have destroyed many that were at peace. Solomon, or the whisperer, is one who speaks ill of his neighbour privately, and does him some mischief by a secret and sly insinuation to his prejudice (see note on v. 14). A whisper, the double-tongued, is one who speaks differently of the same thing or person, in public approving and extolling what he secretly decries and vilifies; one who makes a show of harmless intentions, and professes an outward respect for the person he derides, while in his heart he is secretly St.
Bernard's description, when he intends the most mis-chide and disgrace to any one, he begins first to contrive, to introduce some ill-natured asperion the better; which is not done without some craft and device, by Tantō plusnullio, quōtus credìtur ab is qui audīt, condit in rin. Monast. viii. 141). "They are the whisperers, with their lips, but dissemble with their double heart." (Ps. xii.

23,) to wrestlers. Qui autotogistae luctantes alius tollant quos vehementissim fideunt (Ephes. 2); i. e. "who lift their antagonist the higher to give him the greater fall." Solomon calls such malicious underhand practices stabs, which give the most deadly wounds (Prov. xxvi. 22). With great reason, therefore, the wise man here advises to set a mark upon and abhor such a detestable person, who proba-ably is the meaning of cursing in the place. The common sense of mankind, even in the times of paganism, has had such an abhorrence of these things, that great punishment has been inflicted upon such offenders many in civil societies. Lipsius says, that the Athenians imposed a pecuniary mullet upon them, and that the ancient Romans set their crimes among the public and private, under the title of this crime, intimating a calumniator, de columnar. This was a public declaration that the whisperer or slanderer deserved to be openly stigmatized and branded for an infamous practice, as malicious, and a malefactor.

Ver. 14. A backbiting tongue hath disquited many. ] Thoma vitru. Lingua tertia, Vulgate; i. e. says Mr. Le Clerc, Media inter auditores, aem eum de gente, et his-
tur. It was the whisperer's business to be met with in the Chaldee paraphrase; it means a busy intermeddling tongue, which says discord among neighbours, and sets one against another by evil insinuations and groundless reports, perverting and envenoming things the most harmless and innocent, and giving them a wrong turn and an evil meaning. This is also called ligita tri-sules, or slanderous tongues; it is carried on by three stings, or through its swiftness and volatility had the appearance of it. And indeed the backbiter has so much of the serpent in him, that, as if he had really three stings, besides a venomous tongue, he will sting the person slandered, and to his own soul. The Apostolical Constitutions call such backbiters perjovs tovq, τριτον γιλινων λαχανικον, topho6 [a] λαχανικον, be. copie have here γιλινων τρεις, τος στεργον, perforated, or full of holes, as if the backbiters tongue was like that of the servants comedy, who says of himself, Plaus rima of the two volition errors and the heart, the person who can keep nothing, he has no secrets properly, he hears only with a malicious intent to retail again, and what he occasionally picks up comes instantly forth with additions.

Strong, because it is guilt in all men, and serves to unhouses of great men.] The wise man probably means here speaking evil of dignities, the blackening and aspersing kings and persons in authority, which lessen them in the opinion and esteem of the people, and renders them suspected by them, which often begets tumults, and kindles those hearts which put things into a ferment and a flame. Lipsius, and other ancient writers, apply the evil and slanderous tongue to the evil tongue of the prophet who foretells events, another, divides intimate friends, and sets princes and people at variance, adds Dolela barsere in repugnancia, visceribus, cabees, thereby, Proverbs, ch. 1, ec. 28, (lib. de Calunna, (Orat. de Calunniis. Var. 15. A backbiting tongue hath cost out virtues committed by great men, especially by the great kings. An evil tongue hath raised groundless suspicions, and made men jealous even of good and virtuous wives, and sometimes occasioned their divorce, to the manifest disgrace and sin of the husband. And for the poison of an evil and false tongue can effect the credit and safety of a good and chaste woman, appears from the history of Susanna, who was condemned through the unjust accusation of the two wicked women. In the same vein of slanderous tongues, shall forfeit her husbands love and opinion, be expelled his house, lose the fruit of her labour, and be deprived of her part of the common stock. See Ec. vii. 7. and 8. It is for this reason that Daniel raised up the spirit of Daniel to detect the falsehood, and rescue oppressed innocence. The like may be said of the mother of the Machabees, whose words, (Zechariah, i. 12,) are as follows. And the righteous, and the tongue. They persuade that what they are acting is allowable, neither contrary to justice, charity, nor religion, and so are under no concern to break the yoke, thinking themselves delivered free and at liberty from the sentence of slavery, and while they are scattering firebrands and death, please themselves with the innocency of their sport. The loss of reparations, through the venom of the tongue, is here called a death, and one more grievous than that of nature. The Greeks, in like manner, apply σπέλια to charity or friendship violated, or to a character destroyed and gone. And among the Latins, a woman, who has lost her honour is called, Interfecta pudicitia femina. Var. 22. It shall not have rule over them that fear God, neither shall they be burned with the flame thereof.] A slanderous tongue shall not have rule, nor burnt with the flame thereof, and probably for that reason, because they are such, yet it shall not overwhelm them, nor shall its rage, however it may blacken, quite eclipse them. God will not permit that justice and charity, and all the virtue in the time oppressed; "He will make their righteousness as clear as the light, and their just dealing as the noon-day." (Ps. xxiii. 6.) The psalmist, who had been for a long time troubled, raises up his prayer, that the lying lips might be put to silence, and which cruelly, disdainfully, and despitefully speak against the righteous, gives this instance of God's goodness laid up for them that fear him, and prepared for them that put their trust in him, that he will hide them privately by his own presence from the provoking of all men, and will keep them secretly in his tabernacle from the strife of tongues." (Ps. xxxi. 20—23.) Or the sense may be, That good men shall not, like others, indulge themselves in slander and censurous words: it shall not prevail in Israel; neither shall the whole land be filled with the advice of Jacob, for such vice shall be far from God, and is far from God, which they accustom themselves to opprobrious words." (xxiii. 12—15.) The psalmist's description of the happy person who shall be filled with the knowledge of God, is that which is right, and speaketh the truth from his heart, that hath used no deceit in his tongue, nor done evil to his neighbour, and hath not slandered his neighbour "(Ps. xxv. 2, 3.) Var. 23. Such as forsake the Lord shall fall into it; and it shall burn in them, and not be quenched: it shall be laid open upon the earth, and shall not be covered. As the providence of God will preserve the righteous that are calamified or falsely accused, so their enemies and accusers shall suffer in their stead; as the fire slew those men that came against them, so the fire wasifer to them, but over their bodies the fire had no power, neither had the smell of it passed upon them (Dan. iii,); and the lions slow instantly the accusers of Daniel; whilst God sent his angel and shut their mouths that they might not hurt him, forasmuch as innocence was found in him (ch. vii. 10). Corn. a Lapide thinks the author expressly refers to these instances; for he says, "The Lord God is jealous of men; they were wicked to fall into this vice, to which they are remarkably addicted, and in their turn shall be evil spoken of, and fall into shame and disgrace. Or, may we not understand this as also to speak of the inhabitants of the world, who were peculiarly affected with pain and misery, as he had offended chiefly with his mouth: Inter omnes corporis partis magis or ejus et linguam potius, dat, qua plura seclent linguæ sat or portcepssevirat (Pss. viii. 53).

Ver. 24. Look, that thouighest thy possession about with thorns, and bind up thy silver and gold. And weigh thy words in a balance, and make a door a bar for the mouth. See xxxvi. 35. As it is a commendable piece of prudence to fence a field or a vineyard with a strong hedge, that the wild boar out of the wood may not root it out, nor the wild beasts of the field destroy it; and so it is both safe and to put money into a purse or bag, or in a place of security to prevent losing of it; so no less care is required to guard the mouth, and keep the door of the lips, that no words may be spoken which would be a great sorrow to be considered. The binding up of silver and gold, here mentioned, is a particular expression, and answers to the bundles of silver and gold which Ligeas presents Vulg. (Gen. xxxvii. 26. Prov. viii. 20. Hos. xii. 11). Calvin thinks this phrase, besides the usual way of securing money in a linen cloth, purse, or girdle, may denote small rods, or spoils of silver, bound together. Plutarch described the obol, a handful of which made a drachma. *The ancient Greek money (says he) was like so many spits or rods of iron or brass; and hence it is that our smallest money is termed a spit (spus), or heap of silver, that the ancient Greek, a spus), and that the piece worth six obols is termed a drachma, or a handful, so many of these rods being required to fill the hand" (Plut. in Lysander, Calm. Discor. on the drachma). It is certainly also that the Jews carried with them at their girdle a balance to weigh all the money which they either gave or received, as the Chinese and Armenian merchants do even to this day; and their carrying different weights with them in a bag (Deut. xxv. 15), implies having the balance too. The Canaanites likewise carried balances with them, but deceitful ones, as they are described, Hos. xi. 7. Instead of hedging the possession, the Vulgate has Scepi suae ursus spinas, t. c. fence or stop your ears, that, since slander is so dangerous, you may not listen to it, or seem to encourage it, that so the mouth of him who shall speak of such disgraceful things shall be disagreeable to you, and may be hindered from proceeding farther: Ut discat detractor (says St. Jerome) dume te violet non libenter audire, non ultra dubrebe: non enim invite auditori liberenter referit (Equit. 2. ad Rustic.).

CIAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. He that is merciful will lend unto his neighbour: I 60 suo Deus honet 76猫咪species. See the like, Ps. xxxvii. 5. The sense, both there and here, is, that a merciful man will not only lend unto his neighbour, but he will require no usury; he will lend freely to one in necessity, without taking or making any use of him. Here the dittany form is as the former in which the latter attended with him. Plautus very plainly distinguishes them in the following verse: St matuto non potero, etc. (Plautus, Menaechm., Act ii. sc. 3). That is, the Jews by this verse do not badly explain foramen a consequit fortuna, and so properly styled by the Greeks ρεκαν, as being the issue or produce of a sin lent. Ver. 6. If he prevail, he shall hardly receive the half, and he will count as if he had found it: if he, not he hath deprived him of his money, and he hath gotten him an enemy. Some read, he shall hardly receive the half of what he hath lost, by paying half, that he has given it, as a part or share in something that he had found; and that you are under an obligation to him, as if he had done you a favour, by lending you his money. But if he cannot pay at all, the creditor loses his whole debt, and all he gets he is ill-will and abusive language. But if he cannot pay in the way agreed on, if we understand it of the creditor,—that if he be able to get any thing, he will scarcely receive half, and that which he recovers must look upon as much gain and good fortune as he has received, and accept as very good.

And if the creditor does not prevail to get any part of his money, he hath deprived himself of it (vobis for iis, as Grabe understands it), he must be content to lose it, and, in that case, the debtor turns round, and, instead of owing, as he be able, yet gives him the half again, and reckoning the other half unpaid as a thing found; i.e., as so much gain to him. Altman dimitium libertatem patuit, says Gratian. Or, according to Calvin, that thou shalt not lend, by paying half, that he has given it, as a part or share in something that he had found; and that you are under an obligation to him, as if he had done you a favour, by lending you his money. But if he cannot pay at all, the creditor loses his whole debt, and all he gets he is ill-will and abusive language. Ver. 7-9. Let the creditor have patience with a man in poor estate, and delay not to show him mercy. Help the poor for the commandment's sake, and turn him not away because of his poverty. Notwithstanding what is before said of the treachery and deeds of darkness, the wise man does not intend here to discountenance any from lending altogether, and doing good to a neighbour in that particular. His advice is, to be quick and ready in lending, and slow in receiving again; or, to lend freely, but to exact delays longer than you would if you could pay at all. What follows must be understood of the debtor in either sense; and the treatment there mentioned, for favour or reluctant, who the great bounteous and ingratitude of the borrower. See xxvii. 17.

Lent at a rate not more agreeable to the context. The sense of the passage, according to our translation, is, Let not thy storerooms or granaries be for thy own use, but let them have some provision there for thee; nourish, feed, clothe him. succour him in his necessity, and by that means you will lay up your treasure in a place of safety and security. The meaning of the word here will be, you will provide an entrance for thee. Salvin says, the good and charitable provide in this manner for an easier passage thither: Expeditero ne non putaret ad sequendum me suavissime discessisse. See Seneca De domo, iii. 6. And Plut. De Tobuli, lib. i. cap. 3. And if, being poor, he asks for longer time of indulgence, wait with patience, and press him not to pay instantly, if he is not in a condition to; nor obliged to him to any severity, nor exact any thing for forbearance. To enforce the duty of doing good to the poor, by a free and gratuitous loan, he derives the obligation from the reward of God, and the precept referred to is probably Deut. xv. 11. If there be among you a poor man, thou shalt open thine hand wide unto him, and shalt surely lend him sufficient for his need. St. Ambrose reasons well upon this passage. He says, that the Lord secures that our brother, but for some advantage only you propose to yourself; if you do not lend to him but on the prospect or promise of usury and interest, what merit is there in the account of a sort of this kindness? or is it of more value than any instance of humanity to exact and draw from the poor, when thou wouldest be thought to relieve him? Or does it become a son of charity, when your only view in lending is to raise some profit to yourself? For to complain of some usurers in his time, who took advantage of the necessities of the poor, he adds, Fracundus etiam vocos enarrat: quae Christus in casibus subventionis habet. (Hdb.)

Ver. 10. Lose thy money for thy brother and thy friend, and let it not rust under a stone to be lost. Ver. 12. Shut up alms in thy storeroom: and it shall deliver thee from all affliction. Mercy or charity shall be a friend to man when he himself stands most in need of help: and, when there is little hope of safety elsewhere, the good turn comes at the most unexpected time, and in the most unexpected manner. And thus are the blessings of charity and kindness accompaniments with it, that in the time of public danger shall be his shield and buckler. There is the like observation, xi. 24. "Brethren and help are against the time of mischief and trouble, but a good man is my friend in the midst of affliction, and the foregoing verse are of the same import with, and perhaps taken from, Prov. vi. 4. "Rixes profit not in the day of wrath, but righteous (as Menandros do says St. Jerome) me legiessi mala mortem defunctum, qui libenter opera caritatis exhibuit; habetem multis intercessores, et impossibile est multorum praecipua monstrosa."

The psalmist confirms the same from his own observation, Ps. xxxvii. 25. The Vulgate renders, Concluecleemosynas in corde pauperis, et faste pro te exorbitab ommine male. And St. Cyran has, Ps. xxi. 9. The sum is, not to lend more than the poor require, but to lend more than he wants.

religion, or, however, of humanity, are too strong with a tender-hearted, charitable man, to suffer him to see one of his friends or brethren, who are put to the death by the unmerited and ungodly hand of the unjust, be driven out of their country, imprisoned, and perhaps against his own judgment in point of prudence.

15. Forget not the friendship of thy sore; for he hath given his life for thee." There are securities of both of two sorts; the one is personal, body for body, life for life, such as that mentioned, 1 Kings xx. 39, and that of life for life, which is a very valuable act. And perhaps such like may be observed of some prisoners and condemned persons, upon whose escape there is an obligation, according to the laws of some states, upon their keepers, who engaged for their appearance, to undergo the punishment in their stead. This sort of security the author probably may mean, from that expression, "he hath given his life for thee;" the one time given, the other won. The other concerns money matters, and is the engaging for another's debt in a limited time, and thereby, in effect, taking it upon ourselves. This sort of bail may also be intended here; for by life, in this writer, is often meant vitia, or that sustenance which is chiefly necessary to it (see ver. 21, 22). And so of the poor widow in the gospel it is said, "that she flung into the treasury," δῶρον ἐπὶ ὁμοίως, τετομά τιμίως, Luke xvii. 29. And though it may be, that the sponsor, by engaging in another's cause, pledges his own fortunes and substance, and makes them liable to the penalty of the debt. The formula fidei jurisdictionis is taken from the author, and the word of another's procure fide, or case in hand, and the assurance, procure fide ma. And the answer of fore, fide ma. jubeb. The sincerity in this case was called fore, fide ma. jubeb. The sincerity in this case was called true, quasi pro teo ad tribunal vadens (see Verro de Ling. Lat.) The two expressions and the enumeration and explanations and explains both these in the following verses: "Quis subit in peram capitata judicii? Vas. Quis, cum lex fecit humana, quis abitur? Præs." Ver. 19. A wicked man transgressing the commandments of the Lord shall fall into suretyships; and he that under-taketh and follows after men's business for gain shall fall into suits. It is so great a misfortune and misfortune to be bound for a thoughtless, ungrateful, and perhaps trickling debtor, who, when himself is secured, thinks no more of his creditor, than the house of his first creditor; and as such Grotius understands ayydγyovn, ver. 10, that the author may be excused for wishing this may be the portion of a sinner only to chastise him. The words may be considered by Iesus in the Vulgate; Cælinus, or Clement, or the pronouncing of God's judgments, as Grotius and our translators understand them. According to the former receptio, the sense is, May the plague of an ill-placed suretyship not fall to the lot of the friendly and well-meaning; but such as are themselves knavishly inclined, have it for their scourge: may observant informers, restless promoters of lawsuits, and busy intermeddlers in other affairs, betrayers, and such as encourage and undertake scandalous causes, and infamous sorts of business for mere filthy lucre, lose their ends, and suffer by such dishonest under-takers, as here mentioned. It may also be understood of a particular villain, who are sent upon them, and themselves be made public examples of disgrace and infamy; Let this particularly be the punishment of such as sureties for and engage to conduct any unlawful methods of luxury and vices, such as are honest in their intention, and mean only the good and service of their neighbour, in what they undertake or promise for, may fall into ill-natured, nor suffer for their good intentions. The passage expresses the conclusion of all that is here said about suretyship, and the advice at last is briefly this: Help your neighbor, as far as possible, and if it be needful, be surety; but be ware that you be not ruined yourself by any rash engage- ment, or fall into the same circumstances, by endeavouring to oblige or rescue him. Neither pity nor friendship do account for, and yet a man, in divine consideration, you relieve, and, in order to make another easy, to make one's self and family miserable. Such compliances as are inconsistent with self-preservation may well be dispensed with, and a denial in this case is the voice of nature and reason.

Ver. 21. The chief things for life is water, and bread, and clothing, and a house to cover shame.] The wise man here shows, that nature is content with a very little. The whole of the life of a man consists of food, sleep, and the company of such persons, as the person himself may please; he needs not more. would be employed, and a lodging to cover shame. These may perhaps seem to be transposed, as clothing more properly covers shame; but if we attend to the context, the present subject (see the next verse) and a thing is of such importance, as the want of a certain fixed dwelling exposes a man to disgrace: lodging too is as necessary to the home as guard, and as clothing is to cover shame.

Jansenius observes, that vitia in the greek is described by water and bread, so vestitas includes raiment and lodging, both of which are necessary coverings; that as the simplicity of the former is designed to restrain luxury, so the bare mention of house and clothes was intended to prevent pride in apparel, or in stately and magnificent buildings. Grotius does not consider ἐστίν καὶ ὁ λόγος, as distinct particulars, but makes the latter expresser of the former, as if the reading were, ἐστίν καὶ ὁ λόγος, καὶ καλείτως ἀνατύπωσει, vestimentum vero est domus (portantia) obtingeta eæ quæ nuda deceptæ. This exposition, it must be confessed, seems somewhat forced; it is more natural, that the context has in view the enumeration of the necessaries of life (xxxix. 26), omits this of lodging, as does St. Paul, 1 Tim. vi. 8. and Juvenal determines a sufficiency to be in quantum admodum sufficit, and adduces a plenty of quotations. Terence includes all the three particulars here mentioned, Victor, vestitus, quo in tectum (receptæ, Heauton. v. 2); and Juvenal determines a sufficiency to be in quantum admodum sufficit, and adduces a plenty of quotations.

Ver. 23. Be it little or much, hold thee contented, that thou hear not the reproach of thy house.] Quos esto acceperit adhuc. The sense is, whoever observes the above preceding section, is contented with his present condition, though it be but a mean one, he will not through murmuring at it disoblige his parents or relations, as if he was ashamed of them; nor are they by any means affected with the least murmuring at it; nor are they watchful or peevish, as Drausius understands it, to be the occasion that the meanness of his family and circumstances be known and reflected on. The Vulgate renders, Et improperius peregrinatus, which does not signify to be discontented with; which, if we are to understand him as discontented with, we mean speak of in the prospect of the next verse, that if he be discontented, it is only because he finds the portion of his family so poor and mean, and that he is of an unsettled temper and dissatisfied with his own condition, though it be but ordinary and mean, will be a slave all his life, Serviet aperit, qui parvo nescit uti, qui non convenit sua res (Hor.). Grotius understands by ἐστίν καὶ ὁ λόγος, travelling abroad, and leaving one's own country, and meeting with such naeers and afflictions, tempted with foreigners; but the former sense seems preferable. Solomon gives the like advice, and for the same reason, "Withdraw thy foot from thine own house, and leave thy native land, and so hate thee" (Prov. xxx. 17). Phocylides gives the like caution:

Ver. 21. It is a miserable life to go from house to house: for where thou art a stranger dost not own thy name (Proverbs. xlix. 19.) It is a mortal woe to hang about from house to house, asking for bread, or, as they say, from house to house, lodging. It is a miserable life; for it exactly speaks a variety of wretchedness. It is observable that the psalmist, among other imprecations against the wicked and ungodly, adds this instance of it, "Let his children be vagabonds, and beg their bread; let them seek it also out of desolate places" (Ps. cx. 9). According to this
When the wise man here says, that "he that loveth his son," (σὺν οὗλοις μιλησαίοις οὖν, a due abatement must be made; for the meaning cannot be, that a loving father should be continually bonefiting his son. Our translators are too strong. The better interpretation therefore holds, than that which is most commonly admitted. But I would rather understand this observation of the wise man's of retainers to great families, leave-hunters, and such as either have no house of their own, or else are forced to share that of others. How then could they find slavery to content and freedom within their own walls. Solomon aptly compares such to a bird that deserts its nest: "As a bird that wanderers from her nest, so is a man that is wandered from his place." The Greek is much stronger and closer to our purpose: "Τὸν ἤρετα ἄργα ἐνεστώτα τῷ ὑπὸ τοῦ νομοῦ, ὄπιστον ἐξισοδενώντος, ὅπως ἐνεπι- δεῦσαν." Ver. 23. Thou shalt entertain, and feast, and have no thanks: moreover thou shalt hear bitter words; (σὺν οὗλοις μιλησαίοις οὖν, which the Vulgate follows, and it affords a good sense; i.e., after all your trouble and expense, you will find you have entertained such as will prove ungrateful, and shall hear something unhandsome or disagreeable from them; viz., what follows in the two next verses, or some such expression, which, indeed, is the interpretation.) Thou shalt lodge and feed unthankful men, and after shall have bitter words for the same, saying, &c. And so to the second verse of the preceding verse. Here we read with the Vulgate in the third person, and understand this and the two following verses of the impious master of the house, that he will entertain you, and give your money to the renowned, and you will have reproach on you in the same, and the whole family will reproach you in some bitter and affronting manner. Ver. 26. Come, thou stranger, and furnish a table, and feed me of that thou hast ready.] Probably this is spoken by the steward, who was the cook. It may be much nearer, as knowing the incapacity of the stranger, called such by way of reproach, to give an entertainment; or it may contain a real demand, to provide an entertainment for the stranger. The Vulgate is more generally received. Sept. xxix. 1, 2, in the LXX., where the wise man reminds the guest at some great table to observe what is set before him, and to give place to make the like in return. τοῦ ἀντιπροσώπου, σύν οὗλοις μιλησαίοις οὖν, ἀριστον εἰς τα παρακάτω ἄρωμας, τόδε ἢ πάρατον ἄρωμα νόμος. The Arabic indeed takes it otherwise, Recede à nobis at mensam apponamus, to verb inter manus tuae comedite, intimating that his presence will troublesome, that he stood in the way, to content himself with some fragments and be gone, as not worthy to make one among such company; but this comes too near the letter of the passage, and the gleaning of this verse may be considered as an expostulate, rather than an ornament of speech, than of any real significations. See instances of this, Josh. xviii. 17. Luke xii. 37. xviii. 7. Ver. 27. Give place, thou stranger, to an honourable man; my brother cometh to be lodged, and I have need of mine house.] Τοῦ ἀντιπροσώπου, σύν οὗλοις μιλησαίοις οὖν, εἰς τὰ παρακάτω ἄρωμας, τόδε ἢ πάρατον ἄρωμα νόμος. I shall be ashamed to have such a one of low birth and mean appearance seen at my table, among guests of great distinction and nice taste. Grosius fancies an allusion here, and makes the sense to lie, Depart from my house, thou stranger, and profane it not by thy presence; then shouldst no more be seen there than the king himself, which Strachan and J. S. Peishus and the Jewish writers, had no admittance. The opposition in this light is beautiful. The sense of the first part is plain, that the word apostates, who were so highly civil, and real worth, who is neither fond to intrude himself like other impertinents, nor ignorant of the devours due to his superiority; the name however is not ascribed to the stranger, but to the householders, who are not thought unworthy by persons who esteem merit, that they may not disgrace, or unmentionable, and so admitted, to be admitted into the best company.

But such as are present, and are big with death, which are dreaded, and may never happen; and if real ones, the anticipating misfortunes is making them double. The poet says, that it is an important matter to know the mis- ness which religion authorizes, and is of service, and that is contrition and sorrow for sin. To be sorry after a godly manner, or, as the margin has it, according to God, is profitable in the highest degree, for such a pious sorrow "worketh repentance to salvation not to be repented of" (2 Cor. vii. 9, 10), but the sorrow of the world, arising from accidents and misfortunes, past, present, or future, is not only useless, but very injurious; and, according to the same inspired writer, "worketh death." CHAP. XXXI.

Ver. 1. Watching for riches consumeth the flesh; and the care thereof drieth the spirit. The first chapter of this section, which is the last in the book, the author mentions several causes which injure health, such as sadness, anger, envy, cares, &c. Here he continues in the same subject, and instances in carelessness, gluttony, and drunkenness. These things injure the health, and oppose them to temperance and a prudent and discreet use of the good things of this life, which are the proper things of which we are here speaking. They drive health away; and cast us into weakness, and impotence, and a shorter duration. The observation of this writer upon the care and solicitude which attend the getting and keeping of riches, is very just. See James v. 3, where the apostle says, that God is able to make you rich, and to keep you rich. It is a witness against rich men, and shall eat their flesh as it were fire, &c. (Ps. 109. 6.) Here, in the following verses, the author speaks of poor men, and of the necessity of their being saved from want. And thus aurgus is used by Horace.

Animos aurgus, et cura pocull cim somel immutat. And so our translators render it, which is a mistake.

In St. Matthew, the deceitfulness of riches is compared to thorns which tear the flesh.

Ver. 2. Hatching care will not let a man slumber, as a sore disease breaketh sleep. So Luke xii. 20, the Alexandrian εκεραθάσθαι, εχεριαθασθαι, literally, and more properly rendered, according to Calvin, Jounas, and Grotius, Care and watchfulness will de make a man idle. Grotius gives a good reason for this reading; the true one he says, is ἀμφιβαλλον, perplexed (Proleptom. tom. ii. cap. 4). According to the sense of our version, the reader will not be perplexed as to the probability of what shall be, εἰκονία ἑαυτοῦ ἀμφιβαλλόν. And so Horsley gives it in his MS. actually, has it. The oriental versions likewise confirm this, אגריתס ו ║ גאראס סימאו סומיא. And the Vulgate favorably, Neb.

CHAPTER XXXI

To be poor in spirit amidst a flow of riches, to be humble in a high estate, to be in the midst of fire without burning, in the midst of fritters without being exalted with pride, and to be poor in spirit amidst the mirth of the multitude; to have the power of doing evil with impunity, and not to make use of it to any bad purpose; of such a behaviour a man may justly glory, iustam si se nomen, let him have his due praise; but the true and only road to the noble and superior virtue are very rarely to be met with, in an overgrown fortune, well may the wise man ask in the next verse, who or where is the unblemished rich man? And we are tellingly reminded, for he is a sort of miracle, and has performed wonders.

Ver. 10. Who had been tried thereby, and found perfect? the pure in heart, i.e. who, like a good eye, perceived and saw, and done evil, and hath not done it? This is not spoken of human frailty in general, but of men's propensity to sin in money matters only; and so St. Austin confines it: he interprets this passage of contempt with the supposition that he is another man's right. "If you have (says he) restore to your neighbour his owne, when nobody but you two were together at the delivery of it, and God only was witnesse;—if you have restored to the same after the death of his father what he had deposited with you, and the son knew nothing of it;—or if you have met with a purse of money accidentally upon the road, and nobody saw you take it, tho' when you came to the right may God give you grace, you would never discover it, then this eulogium of the honest and perfect man belongs to you:" (Com. in Tit.). We are thus carried near to the great standard of the churche's saints; and sheathers of malice; and several instances occur of heathens, whom no law bound but that of natural conscience, whose have acted disinterestedly upon such occasions; and, from a point of view quite different, we have seen how ancient princes, and kings, and emperors, and others besides, would never have been known to act vice versa, or implicate their names in the most noble of actions.

Ver. 12. If thou sit at a bountifull table, be not greedy upon it, and say not, There is much meat on it.] Literally the table is of good bountiful provision. As such instances of a just carnage are very rare, and as always are ere the appetite will close, the man serveth his master; and the anxiety to exterius, or rather, to the appetitio, but this is that appetite which is personal and natural sense; viz. what is more wicked than an eye which lusteth so to gratify a gluttonous appetite in eating of every dainty which is set before it, that it will not let it alone, or be contented with what is amply sufficient? It is justly said, the sense seems confirmed from Prov. xxi. 1, where voluntas est, i.e. "what is set before thee," as our version has it, in the Hebrew, is, עינן תּה, quod ad facias tuae, as the rendering of the Bishops' bible. But this might be nothing, or every thing that thine eye seeth, probably following a copy which had in the text, which may seem to be countenanced by o 직 in the next sentence. Covetousness, however, was upon the word then, and so it is in the Bishops' version; and is here as "coveteth," and Syrie also has it, but to be squeezed or pressed; or, taking it in the middle voice, to squeeze or press. Perhaps the author means, that persons should not be so eager on one subject as to be ready to give up another, whether they eat too much or too little, are free or too sparing, too merry or too sad. Covetousness likewise expounds it of a covetous entertainer, we are weepeth not for his own purse, as by the reference to the master of the feast himself,—that being a covenient, jealous, and suspicious person, he is so affected with the countenance and behaviour of the guests, that he laments itself to his anxietae; and the sense seems to point to some fatal time, and what time have we so much cause to remember?

Ver. 11. Heretofore I was not thine hand whithersoever it looketh, and thrust it not with him into the dish. Of the emtakē, μὴ ὄντως τὰ ὑπό, καί μὴ συμβαίνων ἐτοι ἐν τῇ τραπέζῃ. The rendering of the Bishops' bible is, weepeth not for his own purse, or for every occasion; but weepeth not for his own purse, as weepeth not for his own purse; and then the sense will be, Do not scramble or crowd hands in the very dish, which shows not only great rudeness, but voraciousness. The advice, as contained in the whole verse, is, Do not desire that which is not yours. Covetousness, perhaps, the author means, that persons should not be so eager on one subject as to be ready to give up another, whether they eat too much or too little, are free or too sparing, too merry or too sad. Covetousness likewise expounds it of a covetous entertainer, we are weepeth not for his own purse, as by the reference to the master of the feast himself,—that being a covenient, jealous, and suspicious person, he is so affected with the countenance and behaviour of the guests, that he laments itself to his anxietae; and the sense seems to point to some fatal time, and what time have we so much cause to remember?

Ver. 15. Judge of thy neighbour by thyself, and be discreet in every point.] Νεκρο τινά Μαυρικοισίν ἐκ τοῦ ἐν τῇ παροιμίᾳ, καί τὰ πληθον πλῆθος έτοι, τοι τοι τοι τοι συμβαίνων, τοι τοι τοι νεκρο ναυτος, in every thing, or upon all occasions, and of great moment in the conduct of life, so it is no less servicable when applied to eating, of which, with regard to the context, it must be observed, that to eat the sense, As you would not like to see another greedy and vor-cious, and seating at your own table is the most decent, or at least the most agreeable, and therefore form your own a conduct, not to offend in the like particular, nor take the same inordinate liberty; as you do not approve of such freedoms in others, so imagine they will condemn the like in your persons. Let Josua, for instance, have his table full of feasts, and the signs of public entertainment, and he shall not be guilty of any thing unmeet or improper. And the Arablic, Sciss portionem sociorum tuorum carnem esse tibi, idemque eos velle ac te. If he should thus be guilty of an impropriety in the party in his company, I suppose such an impropriety in you itself, I should not snatch at any rarity from another's plate. And if I should be displeased at another's taking before me, or from me, what pleases his taste, I should subdue, or be self-sufficient, and as well as that which is most nice for mine own palate.

Ver. 16. Eat, as it becometh a man, those things which are set before thee: and devour not, lest thou be hated.

This is but a common sentiment, and is so often taught, that it is almost to be considered as a proverb. But I am apprehensive it may be understood still in a more philosophical sense, and be applied to all the produce of the earth, whether of the earthy or vegetable kingdom. And this is the sense the prelate (says a pious prelate) ever repeated that he rose from the table sober, healthful, and with his wits about him; but many have repeated that they sat so long, and continued so late, that the victuals went to the head in them, and that they set the value of their virtue, and their God, departed from them. (Bishop Taylor's Sermon.) And, to finish the character, the epicure, after his full meal, domus, pants for breath, a prelude of what a little later he will do in a sudden obversion with a stroke of an apoplexy, or found dead in his bed.

Yet 21. And if thou hast been forced to eat, arise, go forth, vomit, and then shalt have no hatred.

If you have been constrained or over-persuaded to eat, and through the importunity of others have overcharged your stomach, and find it out of order, take a draught of a medicine recommended to you by opportunity you can with decency. The wise man in the foregoing verses had in the strongest manner recommended sobriety and temperance; but as it may sometimes happen, to retire from the midst of the company too soon, he has therefore, it is better to prevent them altogether by abstaining from that excess, which cannot be indulged without danger, nor curbed but by a remedy which carries something of the disease along with it. As a man, who, after a dinner made of the most exquisite things, found a piece of earth, which if he had swallowed, (symbro) would have been in the Vatican, the condition of the soil of the quietest, and least agreeable of all places. He, therefore, it is better to prevent them altogether by abstaining from such excess, which cannot be indulged without danger, nor curbed but by a remedy which carries something of the disease along with it. As a man, who, after a dinner made of the most exquisite things, found a piece of earth, which if he had swallowed, (symbro) would have been in the Vatican, the condition of the soil of the quietest, and least agreeable of all places. Ver. 17. Leave off first, for man's sake; and be not unsavourable, lest thou offend. Either the master of the feast or the master of the house has a right to require that you should cease eating as soon as you are set down, which is a sort of silent rebuke to the rest of the company. But I am much more, in this, apprehensive you do not express it in a manner that may be reasonably expected; or required that you should cease eating as soon as you are set down, which is a sort of silent rebuke to the rest of the company. Ver. 20. Sound sleep cometh of moderate eating: he riseth early, and his wits are with him: but the pain of watchings, and choler, and pains of the belly, are with the unstable man. Yeons, sonia, the sleep of health, somnis salubris, as the Syriac has it. Horace's description of the temperament of men, that, seen in being performed by sleep, is modus; and such as betrays a want of this virtue through self-indulgence, and a contempt of others, can never be thought perfectly well-bred or thoroughly accomplished. Cleanliness is next to godliness, and a word in a very few rules for temperance and sobriety, and has intermixed some which regard decency and politeness, and particularly instances in intemperance, as a breach both of duty and good manners (Fishing lib. ii. cap. 2). Ovid's advice is not very unlike that of this wise man's: Neve dii praesum dapes sed dines circulo; Et capias pauli, quam capis esse, minime.

Ver. 29. Who is liberal of his meat, men shall speak well of the meat, and the worship of his good works perchance shall be believed. The Psalmist says, 'So long as thou dost well unto thyself, men will speak well of thee;' but it is no less true, what the wise man here observes, that he who is liberal of his meat, not only is of a liberal mind, but of a liberal heart; and that such might be accounted a very merit, and a very commendation (Ps. aix. 16). As the liberal man is called λαστίς, εις όμοιον, so the same metaphor is continued in κόλλα, which means beneficence, and by St. Ambrose is understood great largeness of mind and heart. The following verse, which means sordidness and covetousness as it does, ver. 13, above. By όπου, here rendered bread simply, we are to understand what is set down on the table, or brought to the table, no longer. It is often used, as in that description of Joseph's entertainment of his brethren, it is said, 'He ordered to set on bread' (Gen. xxxii. 31); and in that petition of the Lord's prayer, 'Give us this day cel daily bread." Solomon expresses himself in the same manner, and upon the like occasion, "He that hath a bountiful eye shall be blessed, for he giveth of his bread to the poor" (Prov. xxii. 9). The sense of the whole verse is: That he that is generous and profuse, and dealeth his bread to the hungry, and takes all opportunities of helping and obliging others, will have many advocates; men will always be disposed to believe, and report every good action, according to the goodness, and so many known proofs of his generosity, and kindness, that his credit is firmly established, and his name will be always mentioned with honour. We have shown before, as certainly disperse a person's hard heart and mean actions shall raise him many enemies; nothing can be so of the miser so bad, but will be returned to him with an equal tenfold score of wrong. But many things shall be aggravated or invented to make him appear still worse, and more pinching than he really is.

Ver. 25. Shew not thy kindness in wrath; Value not thyself, but from indulging and concerning in a known infirmity, and not prudently guarding the weak part, where he is sensible his failing lies, and thereby is often exposed to disgrace and sin. The hard drinker, on the contrary, is often seeking and drinks deep; he hopes for the account of temperance is not to be taken from the strength of a man's head, but from the measures of religion; and the hard drinker, in this verse, is represented as they receive themselves by very plentiful draughts, and, by a particular strength, I will not call it happiness, of constitution, be able to talk still, and transmit business and the affairs of state. This is a usual thing with those who are immersed in drinking, as not being fitted for the things of the Spirit, nor the work and business of God; and though they offend not in the mere act, they are devoid of the spirit of sobriety. We have shown before, that the hard drinkers often are the greater part of the drunkards; the former drons his sense in his cup, and desires often it; he loses all that distinguishes the man, his speech, his reason and often his sense of duty and charity. This indeed may sometimes happen through a head naturally weak, or made so by repeated debauches, but still it is drunkenness; for it is not a temporary light, but permanent disorder, and the habit and custom of it, that denominates the drunkard; he is not such merely from an accidental slip, for even good men, such as Noah, have been so surprised; and, as the drunkard is the greater part of the drunkards, he may easily be the greater part of the hard drinkers.

Ver. 26. The furnace proveth the edge by dripping; so dish wine the hearts of the proud by drunkenness. According to Jeremiah, the sense is, that as the blade is proved by dripping, and contracts more toughness thereby, so the hearts of men, by being drenched in liquor, find new and constant promotion, become more quarrelsome, and increase in their impatience. But as the fire proveth the temper of the blade, and the smith easily distinguishes upon trial the goodness of the steel, so does wine, immediately taken, lay open men's hearts, and discover their temper and humour without disguise. The common reading of the Greek in almost all the copies is, κόρνιον τομαμίν στρώμα αν μιαύ, στός αυτάς κληρονομισμένος τόνα κίνησιν τον αναφυλακτικόν τόνα κράτος, κόρνιον ἄνθροπος στρώμα αν μιαύ, στός αυτάς κληρονομισμένος τόνα κίνησιν τον αναφυλακτικόν τόνα κράτος, for (besides that Clem. Alex. quoting this passage omits the words πρὸς προάκτον, which certain attendant uncials have mentioned ver. 26. 7. 18.), the Vulgate seems to have followed a copy that read in this manner, Vinum corum superborum arguit in choriasticum potinum, which Junius and our translators follow, and thus Calmet takes it, Le forgeron disengage

The wise man seems to continue here the subject of feasts and entertainments, and alludes to a very ancient custom among the Greeks, and Romans; and, as it is the best interpreter of that spirit, and by all the guests likewise that partake of it, being present at a father and physician to such occasions, and was the most agreeable and fitting sentiment of that spiritual repast, and by all the guests likewise that partake of it, being present at a father and physician to such occasions, and was the most agreeable and fitting sentiment of that spiritual repast, and by all the guests likewise that partake of it, being present at a father and physician to such occasions, and was the most agreeable and fitting sentiment of that spiritual repast, and by all the guests likewise that partake of it, being present at a father and physician to such occasions, and was the most agreeable and fitting sentiment of that spiritual repast, and by all the guests likewise that partake of it, being present at a father and physician to such occasions, and was the most agreeable and fitting sentiment of that spiritual repast, and by all the guests likewise that partake of it, being present at a father and physician to such occasions.

unto, but renders it very accurately, which means only speaking succinctly and briefly. The whole of the advice given to young men, necessary, to suppress their impatience, and to guard against occasions with persons of age, merit, and distinction, to speak little, and only when they are asked or pressed to it, and then to choose their words with care. For as his faith makes none, so little talk makes the fewer slips. I shall hence take occasion to correct the rendering in Ps. lxii. 11, where our version is, "God spake once, and twice, I have also heard the voice of his speech; and his word was not in vain, but the word of the Lord is sure, he is a God of truth." But the Vulgate has it, "God spake; once or twice I have heard it!" nor is Coverdale's more correct: the true rendering is,—God spake once, viz., at the delivery of the law; and I have heard his voice, viz., the voice of Prophets, viz. his omnipotence and mercy, that power belongeth unto God, and that he is also merciful. And thus the Vulgate: Sinele locutus est Deus, et duo haec audivi, quia potuit Deus est, et tibi, Domine, misericordia; which Jansonius has well paraphrased, Duo ab eo audivi, tempore quod solus Dei sit potens, quia possit omnem quae vult; et quod tibi, Domine, misericordia, et Tegunt quaerant populos, tuae reveland. And thus the LXX. Ἐν ἀληθείᾳ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἐν τῷ τὰύτῳ διαβολεῖ, ἐτοὶ πρὸς τὰ ἐκκ., καὶ Ἐκ δέ, καὶ Ἐκ τῶν, κ. τ. λ. And so the Tar- gums, Legem unam locutus est, et haec duo audivi, Deo credam: 'Tegunt, quod populos tuae reveland. Ver. 9. If thou be among great men, make not thyself equal with them; and, when ancient men are in place, use not many words. Have a deference to great men, and address thyself as a servant to them. This is the first rule; the quality of the former demands the one, and the wisdom of the latter the other. Think yourself happy in having the company of men of worth, and of persons of great learning. And see note on vii. 14, where there is the like advice.

Ver. 10. Before the thunder go lightling, and before a great man, fall down, and be humble. Go not before the thunder of Lightning hasteneth or fleeth before the thunder; and so Junius, Ante tonitrum celebrat fulgur. Our version does not reach the force of the Greek. The sense is, As lightning doth not wait to shew its brightness to men, but whilst it is in the air it goes to destination in a person before he begins to speak recommends him the more to the favour and good opinion of others. When the speaker appears in some sort of confusion at first setting out, it shows a dislike of himself and a regard for the audience, which generally engage them in his favour, and will help to excuse some accidental faults; but when a confident person begins to open, who sees by his air and looks to demand attention and to be secure of applause, his conceit raises a prejudice against him, and takes off his merit, if real. The like is true of carousing: a man should not have the habit to drink wine; for the company of gravity and figure, recommends young persons greatly to their esteem and notice; it propesses them in their interest, and is often more successful than a forward instruction.

Ver. 11, 12. Rise up betimes, and be not the last, but get thee home without delay. Take thy pasture, and go not to the sowing. Ver. 11.Icon. Ecce ego ir도 고 would be better rendered, Rise up in good time before the rest of the company, or before you have drunk too much, for sobriety and temperance are as great recommendations as modesty: and when you return home, use some diversion or moderate exercise for health's sake, and to digest a full meal, and be not disputatious or querulous, angry or touchy with thy family, or any acquaintance with whom thou art associated by the names of wine. As reserve before superiors do what is right, and their good deeds shall be as a burning light, that shall shine far and near; or, in the words of the psalmist, "They shall bring forth righteousness as the light of the dawn; they shall be as a shining light in the morning" (Ps. 112:4) and "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day; but the way of the wicked is as darkness; they know not at what they stumble."

Ver. 17. A sinful man will not be reproved, but findeth an excuse according to his will; i.e. they hate to be reformed, and so interpose some plea or excuse in order to excuse their sins. So according to Calmet, the sense is, "They shall be enlightened by God, and shall receive from him justice and judgment, which shall shine as a glory round them. According to that of Solomon, which this writer [Grotius] understands to mean that they will not be enlightened at all; they shall not be reproved, but do not repent of their sins; they will not repent of their sins, nor be enlightened by God, but they will be deceptions of their faults; thus David wishes, according to the old translation, "Let the righteous smite me, it shall be a kindness; and let him reprove me, it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head." Ps. 119. 7.

The wise man adds, as a farther instance of the perverseness of the wicked, καθεν το εὐδοκεῖται εὐθύμου i.e. he will find some pretext, or excuse, or example, or pretext, which he may use as a cloak of his sins, or to excuse his deceptions, or to soften, or to evade, or to escape, the law, according to his mind. Or, as Calmet expounds it, the sinner is so willful and obstinate, that he will not repent of his sins, when he will do it by none but himself; Τς ευς αντιμα σω το προτον συναντεται σαπροσθετικα (Arabic). And as he chose to pursue death in the ways of his own seeking, like the hypocrite, so he will be exposed to the sanctions of the law, and receive the punishment, and be condemned as one that is to be deposed from the grace of God, which he will reprove, and set before him the things which he has done, seeks out such as agree with him in opinion, who are of his mind, and for his purpose, and will flatter him much. As one says, St. Austin, hates the truth because it condemns him, he flies from true physicians and useful remedies, because he loves his sickness. Wherein he stood; he was full to be dejected, and there are enough to do it. He cares not to be told that his soul is dangerously sick and wounded, and he finds persons who assure him that it is quite well and safe, though he is more and more full of sickness, and has no remedy. Ver. 19. Do nothing without advice; and when thou hast once done, repent not.] There is no one precept which this wise man has delivered so often, and pressed so strongly, as not to do anything without advice. When he has trusted himself to his own understanding, but consult others who are able to advise him, and give him their opinion and assistance; that none but a proud and self-opinionated person, or one that is too full of himself, will think to do anything without consulting with that virtue, would venture to act otherwise, καθεν το εὐδοκεῖται εὐθύμου, as it is expressed, ver. 18. But Grosius adds an interesting caution arising from some of the like words in this verse. The advice here given is like that of Sullust, Frasquain, Alciatus, consultus; ubi consulutus, mater esse opus est: If thou actest in this prudent and cautious manner, repent not; i.e. thou shalt not repent, like that, "This do and live." i.e. thou shalt live. And thus the Vulg. Single alicui facias, consulta; ubi consulutus, mater esse opus est: If thou actest in this prudent and cautious manner, repent not; i.e. thou shalt not repent, like that, "This do and live." i.e. Be not rash or attempt such things as are attended with danger, lest you come to some harm or mischief, as those are most likely to get those who choose to walk in rugged and stony ways; and, on the other hand, be not over-confident in things or persons which seem to promise most security, it is as possible, even though you are prudent and smooth, or in a straight way, or slip or hurt, or some unforeseen mischief from persons one least suspects. Beware and guard against both these extremes. The Greek is, εὐθυμου προνυμον. The wisest, as the case follows read, εὐθυμου. Grosius disliketh both these, and proposes a third, viz. ἐνδυναμος, even bene expressit; i.e. trust not thyself in a way that is unknown to thee, or that thou hast not tried, nor incurred after.

Ver. 22. And beware of thine own children.] This is a consequence of the former verse, as expounded of not being too confident in things or persons, which seem to promise most security, it is as possible, even though you are prudent and smooth, or in a straight way, or slip or hurt, or some unforeseen mischief from persons one least suspects. Beware and guard against both these extremes. The Greek is, εὐθυμου προνυμον. The wisest, as the case follows read, εὐθυμου. Grosius disliketh both these, and proposes a third, viz. ἐνδυναμος, even bene expressit; i.e. trust not thyself in a way that is unknown to thee, or that thou hast not tried, nor incurred after.

Ver. 23. In every good work trust thy own soul; for this is the keeping of the commandments.] As καθεθεν το εὐδοκεῖται εὐθύμου, is explained in the preceding verse, so καθεν το εὐδοκεῖται εὐθύμου is explained in this verse. In every good work trust thy own soul; for this is the keeping of the commandments; i.e. do nothing without advice, and when thou hast once done, repent not.

CHAP. XXXIII.

Ver. 1. There shall no evil happen to him that feareth the Lord; but in temptation even again he will deliver him.] Providence takes a particular care of good men to preserve them from evil, especially to avert the harm which wicked men intend against them. But, Grosius observes, "there may be supernatural treachery, and a man's "worse foes may be those of his own household," as the Vulgate here inserts, from Matt. x. 36. Grosius understands the phrase in the sense of God's commandments, i.e. that they do not rain him by extravgance; but this is pardonable where it happens, in comparison of what others have done, who, though obliged by the ties of nature, and those of duty and gratitude, to please, honour, and preserve, their enemies, have, notwithstanding, been their betrayers, and, through ambition or some resentment, been the instruments of their ruin; and by those he least suspected, even by his own sons, when he was worshipping in the house of his false god (2 Kings xix. 37). Very remarkable to this purpose is the advice of Bossuet, "Let not ye be in a friend, nor have confidence in a guide; keep the doors of thy mouth from her that lieth in thy bosom. For the son dishonoureth the father, the daughter riseth up against her mother, the daughter-in-law against the mother-in-law; a man's enemies are the men of his own house." And much to the same effect is that of Jer. ix. 4, "Take ye heed every one of his neighbour, and trust ye not in any brother; for every brother will walk in the corruption of his brother, and no man will help his neighbour." This verse was no idle advice; it was of such a nature as to cause much and mighty revenge; and by the next verse, it will walk with slanders (see Exclus. xxxii. 19). The wise man's advice here seems very important and abrupt, without any reason assigned, used in some such manner, and illustrated by the context.

Ver. 2. In every good work trust thy own soul; for this is the keeping of the commandments.] As καθεθεν το εὐδοκεῖται εὐθύμου, is explained in the preceding verse, so καθεν το εὐδοκεῖται εὐθύμου is explained in this verse. In every good work trust thy own soul; for this is the keeping of the commandments; i.e. do nothing without advice, and when thou hast once done, repent not.

\textit{Ver. 2. A wise man hateth not the law; but he that is a hypocrite therein is as a ship in a storm.} See xvii. 15. The good man, if affections or temptations assault him, is steadfast and unmovable, and not tossed to and fro in his thoughts and uncertainty, nor halves it with divided affections betwixt God and mammon, his heart is fixed, trysting in the Lord. He is like the house built upon a rock, against which the floods and tempests beat, but to no purpose. Whereas the hypocrite is the feather with God, who serveth him not in sincerity and truth, or the wicked man, as the Sibylic and Arabic render, hath no hope nor comfort, is under perpetu \textit{Ver. 3. A man of understanding trusteth in the law; and the law is faithful unto him as an oracle.} I conceive it would be better rendered, as the oracle i. e. of Urim, for all oracles were not to be depended upon. He seems pleased with his rider, whoever he be, but is thinking on his own business, and not on his service, content to express his own satisfaction and wantonness. In like manner the false friend who imposes upon all those who put any confidence in him, is always obliging and complaisant to such as entertain him, or advise with him, not out of respect to them, or to do them any real service, but to the better serve himself, and to carry on his own selfish views. He forms his speech and answers according to the humours and dispositions of those that he meets, as they chuse to vary. Like the pariah in Terence, Negat quis, necp; alium, alio. Calmet understands by "a mocking friend," one, who capitibus nimine equalis, it is indifferent what he does, so that comes in his way, and will sacrifice even his friend to his joke, as Horace truly describes him (Sat. lib. 2). Clemens Alex. uses the same simile, and calls a noted adulterer, "a most faithful friend." Ps. \textit{vii. 5.} \textit{et vinformis(Mocking friend), &c.} The word is freely used of sin, and of the more, years, and years of jubilee, with respect to common years; for so the Vulgate, Quare dies dixit superat, et iterum laxa, et annus marmi, has not the same God equally established them all, does not the same sun enlighten all, and every day in common enjoy the privilege and benefit of his light; whence then the observable difference? one can give no just distinction and difference, and yet one and the same light may be observable for so Groinis understands \textit{yersa, here}, and the wisdom of God, who has so appointed it. There is now in nature for the difference both of time and place particular which shall be the instrument of their separate, distinct, and individual merit of their own, antecedently to positive appointment. The choice and distinction which God has made seems purely arbitrary, and to be resolved into no more than the reasons which he, as he will, assigns to his just and necessary purposes, such as seasons, so may be presumed not without reason to have established festivals, and made them different from other days; for so I choose to render \textit{other days,} in the following verse, and understand the words by our translators, ver. 11, upon an occasion not very unlike.

Ver. 9. Some of them hath he made high days, and holidays, and some of them hath he made ordinary days: \textit{Ps. xcvii. 11.} They are put into the number of common days, and others he has set apart for his own use, as peculiar days, and of greater solemnity. He appointed religious festivals as an exponent for the more regular, uniform, and solemn performance of his worship; and to affect the minds of men with a greater awe and reverence for his divine majesty, by setting peculiar marks of distinction upon special and appointed times for his service. Hence the original of the institution of the Jewish sabbath, which he appointed to be observed in memory of his resting from the works of the creation: it was his rest, and therefore he commanded his disciples to rest also. But such, in the Christian church, are the days of our Saviour's nativity, passion, resurrection, ascension, and the descent of the Holy Ghost, which have been hallowed from the earliest times of the church; and it is remarkable, that during these days nothing is done, or even said, that could be observed. Seneca has assigned a civil reason for the distinction of days, Legum condiures festos dic insipientium, ut ad hicristiarnum homines pubescentium temporis. The days of the Christian church, as fast days and weekly days, are as seasons, so may be presumed not without reason to have established festivals, and made them different from other days; for so I choose to render \textit{other days,} in the following verse, and understand the words by our translators, ver. 11, upon an occasion not very unlike.

Ver. 10-12. And all men are from the ground, and Adam was created of earth. In much knowledge the Lord hath divided them, and made their ways diverse. Some of them hath he blessed and exalted, and some of them hath he sanctifi cated, and set near himself: but some of them hath he cursed, and driven them to be fruitful, and turned out of their places. This is a fine clue of reasoning from ver. 7 to ver. 15, the argument proceeds in the following manner: As amongst days, though all are enlightened by the same sun, and all are alike in the number of hours, some are nevertheless preferred before others, God by his knowledge and decree having separated them, and has himself made the distinction, by consecrating some of them as festivals, and others as ordinary days only: so all men by nature, and the condition of their creation, are equal; all were created of earth, and taken from the same matter or clay from whence Adam himself was taken. Others have virtues exalted, called \\

In like manner the false friend who imposes upon all those who put any confidence in him, is always obliging and complaisant to such as entertain him, or advise with him, not out of respect to them, or to do them any real service, but to the better serve himself, and to carry on his own selfish views. Clemens Alex. uses the same simile, and calls a noted adulterer, "a most faithful friend." Ps. \textit{vii. 5.} \textit{et vinformis(Mocking friend), &c.} The word is freely used of sin, and of the more
Seth and his posterity; at the deluge, Noah and his family; from the descendants of Shem, Abraham and his family; among the children of Abraham, Isaac; and among those of Isaac, Jacob; and out of Jacob’s family, Leviticus, Aaron, and their posterity; on the contrary he essayed the race of Canaan, and east them out of the holy land, whilst he poured his favours with great profusion on the Israelites: he was at the same time active in the edification of Elyth, he translated it from Armin to Zadoc (1 Kings ii. 27, 35); he rejected the family of Saul, and exalted and glorified the house of David; as he drove Shebna from his station and dignity, and called Elisha in his stead, whom he clothed with his robe, and strengthened with his girdle (Isa. xxii. 19—31). Again, God graciously conducts and leads some in the ways of goodness, and permits others to wander in ignorance and wickedness; he makes the former blesses and sanctifies, and keeps always steady in his service, through the mighty succour of his grace: the other he leaves to follow their own corrupt will, and continues them under the curse. They may each of them be considered as clay in the hand of the potter; he makes the former vessels unto honour, and the other vessels unto dishonour, to display his mercy in the one, and his justice in the other. And God is equally worthy to be revered, both by men and angels, whether his bounty is pleased to remit, or his justice to demand, his due. There is nothing in the world, which is more exalted, or more commendable, than the doctrine of predetermination, or reprobation, as some interpreters would represent them. It seems more proper to understand the wise man, as speaking of God’s universal providence, and the eternal decree, without descending to particulars; or of the absolute power which he exercises over his creatures, tempered, at the same time, with infinite wisdom and justice.

Ver. 19. Give not thy son and wife, thy brother and friend, power over thee while thou livest; and give not thy goods to thy beggar, lest he say, Behold, I am rich (ver. 20, 21).

The advice here, and in the following verses, may either respect parents or rulers, and persons in authority. To the former the advice is, not to strip themselves of the advantage of others, or to leave them to suffer without any assistance; but, on the contrary, to favour them in all their wants. To the latter, it is, not to allow others to partake of what they have, leave themselves so bare, through an inclination to gratify them, they hereafter be necessitated to ask and entreat for that again which they parted with too soon and hastily, or for be deprived of the advantage, that they have, by others; and further, not to give too great a confidence in them, which is often abused, and forwarding their power and authority. It is preposterous, as well as unjust, for others to be supposed to supply to his children, or to cringe and crouch to their wishes. Therefore (ver. 23), the advice is, not to part with so much of their fortunes and in their lifetime such as to reduce themselves, but to dispose of their effects by will, and appoint a distribution at their death. The like may be observed of the other relations here mentioned, viz. a wife, brother, or friend, who, though dear, are not to be complimented at the expense of a master’s authority, characters, and fortunes: nor ought such grants to be expected, or engagements insisted on, as to hurt a man’s circumstances, or to endanger his own freedom and liberty. As addressed to magistrates, it is also proper, and a very good advice; the advice is, to govern freely and independently, not to be swayed by interest or affection, nor to give too much power and authority to relations, friends, or dependents, that none may be able to represent their master in any degree their honour or abusing their power, through partiality or any servile compliance; nor themselves be exposed to the encroachments of others; but to give the disposal and direction of favourites: for thereby a person in authority is liable to be made the tool of their ambition, avarice, or resentment; to have all faults and grievances charged upon him, whilst others have the credit of doing all the service, and the advantage of gaining themselves friends or fortunes.

For, as Calmet very justly observes, it is generally believed that more is owing to the person that procures the favour to be done than to that person that interested it; but it is, that actually confers the favour; the former does the business in reality, the other only lends his name.

Ver. 20. A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches; and good report rather than to be spoken (Deut. iii. 22; Ps. ciii. 1; Prov. xix. 11, 12: Par.)

This advice in the matter of names it is, in general, very just: but, when any man has a name and credit in another’s eyes, he may be tempted to imitate the According to the context, the advice is, to govern freely and independently, not to be swayed by interest or affection, and not to give too much power and authority to relations, friends, or dependents. For, as the context suggests, it is generally believed that more is owed to the person who procures the favor to be done than to the person who interested it, but it is the one who actually confers the favor; the former does the business in reality, the other only lends his name.

The advice is, to resist the temptation to imitate the Earl of arline, rather than to have a great name and great riches. A good name is more valuable than great riches, and good report is more valuable than to be spoken of.

Ver. 16. I awaked up last of all, as one that goeth after the grape-gatherers: by the blessing of the Lord I pro-fitted, and filled my wine-press like a gatherer of grapes.

The wise man does not say that he was the last of all the prophets, or that prophecy was intermitted for a long time, and revived again in him, as some have weakly and indiscreetly inferred from his complaint, but that he was the last of all those of his nation that had made collections of moral sentences or proverbs: or, the least of all that had expressed himself in this sort of undertaking, as St. Paul calls himself the least of all the apostles, and of all the apostles, upon another occasion; that he only cleaned after them, as his design was not an original or wholly new work, but rather a collection of scattered and fugitive pieces, which being too few to fill a book of themselves, and so liable to be lost, were incorporated with his own, and together composed this larger work of the same kind (Deut. xxxiv. 2). It was expounded from Genesis to three thousand proverbs (1 Kings iv. 32); out of which were either collected such as were most useful by the men of Hebrew, which seems most probable, or they added some of their own, which passed under the name of Solomon, which are comprised from Prov. xxiv. to the end of xxvii. Out of the works also of Agur, who wrote many memorable sayings, were those weighty sentences which occur Prov. xxiv. to the end of the book. In like manner this writer compiled his work from some valuable materials and collections of others; nor is it at all improbable, that many others besides himself were employed in it, which has led to his translation of his grandfather’s works (see Pref.).

The advice here, and in the following verses, may either respect parents or rulers, and persons in authority. and capable of building their hopes, or fixing a deposit upon them. And therefore nothing is more ridiculous than the art of necrocrates, which pretends to interpret dreams and predict future events, and dispose of the precarious gifts of fortune from thence. Such pretenders can have no to rules to proceed by, as there are in other sciences;

nor such as go to and confide in them any reasonable grounds for their belief. It is the malice of slaves to selves to the subject like our author, and give the same directions. Aristotle enjoins the very same particulars, ἐπειδὰ, etc.Ν αὐτῷ, and observes, that if they are well fed, without work or seasonable correction, they will grow insolent and unruly; and if hard worked, and often corrected, and not fed and maintained, it is not only an instance of cruelty, and a great discouragement to them, but that such severe treatment not only puts them upon making their escape, but even sets them at liberty.

Ver. 35. If thou have a servant, let him be not idle as the

to be wise. He will do the work which he has, if he shows himself so to be, and shall have part of the inheritance among the brethren. (Prov. xvii. 2.) The Romans, by a terms of respect, called servants, or slaves, aliquem servum that a slave does his master's service, and makes it the study and business of his life to consult his good and promote his interest, how can such a beast be too much encouraged, or rather, how can it be made to do less? As a slave can have no vant has been by some writers considered in the next degree to a child, and even before a child that was unfruitful.

And this probably is Solomon's meaning, for service which he has rule over a son that causeth shame, and shall have part of the inheritance among the brethren.

(Prov. xvii. 2.) The Romans, by a term of respect, called such servants, or slaves, aliquem servum

The slave, whom his master teaches, he will do the work of his slave who proves faithful and deserving, regard such a one as a treasure. Consider that you might have been his captive as he is now yours, for nothing is more easy to change the heart of a slave, than to fore him as you would have wished and expected yourself, upon an exchange of conditions. Castalia renders, Quoniam consanguinem eum comparabili, as he had read le alpam, in the sense of Q. leq e quam, Acts xv. 26.

The Syriac, too, No pugnes in sanguinum tui ipsius, seems also to favour this sense. Druicius's conjecture is very ingenious, and probably right, that the Greek translates mock the meaning of the original word παρα, which is commonly mocks; but in the Targumists, as well as rabbins, it signifies also a price, as our version rightly has it; perhaps, originally, "the price at which you are sold, and thence, more generally, any price; and, making this, he might as probably translate it alpam as alpam, the true rendering.

For the leal sometimes signifies by Chrys., Cyprian, xxii. 8, and elsewhere. παρα also signifies likeness. May it not therefore be translated, Thou possessest one in thy likeness, and, as such he deserveth to be used mercifully, though he may not be he, who spake of the likeness of tuned before ab uti, so he does here from the rights and ties of humanity. Messieurs of Port-Royal conclude this chapter with the following useful reflection: If the slave who is thus to be compared were not to be treated as our life, and to be respected as a brother, how much more ought we to express our tenderness and kindness towards those who serve us with faithfulness and affection, and who have disposed of their own time and labour to serve us, than we who have disposed of our time and lives for the benefit of our countrymen?

and they had no want of their own experience in their credulous countrymen, with much strength of re-soning, and great humour and facetiousness (De Divin. lib. i. 26. §19). The Hebrews are thus described by one of their most approved critics:—

Ver. 6. If they be not sent from the most High in thy visitation, set not thy heart upon them. They are like to the heathens acknowledged in like manner two sorts of dreams: the one true, proceeding from God; the other false and deceitful. Homer observes, "Every art is attended with some true ones that claimed a regard, as being supernatural indications of some great event to be fulfilled in its season. Such were those prophetical ones in scripture, whose communication was announced by religious signs and tokens, as were manifested to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and were observable, and in some things discernible, and consequently occasioned great fear and horrid amazement among the princes of the nation: and thus it is acknowledged by the heathens in like manner as a sort of divination, certain events from which these issued: the first came from Jupiter, through the port or corona; the other through that of ivory (Odyss. lib. xix.). Lastensius has the same observation (De Opif. Div. lib. ii. §15). The dream theory is thus considered as the means by which God conveys to men his will, if they be not deceived on a just occasion. The two passages refer to save the same thing: For the interpretation of a dream, the interpretation of dreams, and the interpretation of such dreams as it is discernible, differs which they have been associated with. And thus the Geneva version, and that of Coverdale, "The law shall be fulfilled without lies." If you desire to know the truth, and the best rules for your conduct respecting men and affairs, then you will find it wise and holy men, who are conversant and well-versed in the law of God; they will teach you in sincerity the word of truth, and conduct you in the right path; and wisdom in a frame of spirit, is a strength and beauty in the eyes of the Lord. If the Vulgate, I would render the Greek, is perfection, or may be depended upon as an oracle, or as the oracle, then I know of what, or in what manner to proceed in many cases, or how to distinguish a true from a false dream, and act with safety, and to my content and satisfaction? God's law, says this sense, is the beacon light for your conduct; it is alone sufficient to satisfy all proper and reasonable inquirers; and you will find among the teachers and interpreters of it many persons of great knowledge, as well as of known fame and sincerity, who will give you better and more certain instruction than you can possibly draw from wizards and diviners. To the law and to the testimony: I must here observe, that as we may speak not according to this word, are deceivers; there is no light in them, nor illumination, or comfort to be expected from them.

Ver. 7. He that hath travelled knoweth many things; and he that hath much experience will declare wisdom.] If with some copies we read τινος philosophers, which the oriental versions favour, the sense then is like that of Matt. xiii. 22. "Everyone who hath ears to hear, let him hear."

The word wisdom (σοφία, τότος σοφίας) was generally esteemed as a thing that could never be comprehended in human intelligence; it was the property of the gods, of the angels in heaven, and was well bestowed, as it was to be brought forth "out of his treasure things new and old;" and this will consequently be the case with the whole upon earth, even if the Christian religion, to which we are to look, should be forgotten by all upon earth, and thereby have an opportunity of knowing mankind, knows nothing in comparison. A more speculative knowledge, such as is acquired by reading, is but a little above the common sort; to form an accomplished person, one capable of shining in public business, the knowledge of men is requisite, as well as of books, and nothing is of more service in this respect than the knowledge of men, which is a subject not quite rendered themselves so famous, and gained their learning and improvement. It was thus Ulysses obtained the character of a philosopher by his conversation with the wise men of the world; and Pythagoras and Plato arrived at such a pitch of knowledge, which so justly recommended them. The like may be observed of Socrates, who, out of his conversation, was declared by the Athenians, a person of most excellent knowledge, and yet he can, in a sort of spirit of improvement, submitted to learn of every great master he could hear of at a distance. Nor need we after the wonder that a renowned queen, who had a thirst for knowledge, should herself travel as far as from Sheba to Jerusalem, to hear the wisdom of Solomon, and be improved by it (Matt. xii. 42).

Ver. 12. I was often in danger of death: yet I was delivered because of these things.] τῶν τοπίων, ο, ι, e, by means of the experience which I acquired in my travels. And thus the Arabic very expressly, Pares pares experimenta. The verb παρευάσθημι (παραφύταιτο) to be delivered or rescued, is a frequent expression of the Israelites, and is a word of greater dignity. Such who have the weaknesses to believe or trust in dreams, will proceed to more ingenuity, their temper will incline them to apply to forbidden arts, to consult with wizards, seers, and diviners, in order to their vanities, which are the invention and artifice of the spirit of darkness and error.

Ver. 9. The law shall be found perfect without blemish: and the commandment a light to the eyes. The law was given at Mount Sinai, as Deut. x. 19. God thought those threats which he had brought upon Abraham to be a faithful token. But he delivered them in a faithful manner. As the law threatened those who entered, he would send such magical arts (Jev. xiv. 36. Deut. xiii. 1. xiv. 28. 10), so we may be assured that those threats will be executed in their utmost rigour. The law shall be fulfilled, ενετελεισθήσεται, in all its predictions and declarations, without any equivocation, as the word to which they are adhered. And thus the Geneva version, and that of Coverdale, "The law shall be fulfilled without lies." If you desire to know the truth, and the best rules for your conduct respecting men and affairs, then you will find it wise and holy men, who are conversant and well-versed in the law of God; they will teach you in sincerity the word of truth, and conduct you in the right path; and wisdom in a frame of spirit, is a strength and beauty in the eyes of the Lord. If the Vulgate, I would render the Greek, is perfection, or may be depended upon as an oracle, or as the oracle, then I know of what, or in what manner to proceed in many cases, or how to distinguish a true from a false dream, and act with safety, and to my content and satisfaction? God's law, says this sense, is the beacon light for your conduct; it is alone sufficient to satisfy all proper and reasonable inquirers; and you will find among the teachers and interpreters of it many persons of great knowledge, as well as of known fame and sincerity, who will give you better and more certain instruction than you can possibly draw from wizards and diviners. To the law and to the testimony: I must here observe, that as we may speak not according to this word, are deceivers; there is no light in them, nor illumination, or comfort to be expected from them. the Lord. For the fear of the Lord includes in it a well-grounded hope and confidence in him. Solomon, according-ly, represents the truly trust in God, as naturally flowing from this religious fear (Prov. xiv. 26).

Ver. 18. He that sacrificeth of a thing wrongfully gotten, his offering is abomination unto the Lord, and his prayer shall be not accepted.” The wise man expresses here the great abomination of gifts or sacrifices accompanied with injustice, and the dislike which God has to them, according to his own words, “for whatsoever the Lord loveth, is abhorred of his people” (Prov. vi. 16). “I have not offered burnt-offerings for burnt-offering” (Isa. lxix. 5), i. e. such as are so presumptuous and wicked as to think that they can propitiate Almighty God, by offering him part of what they got, by means of which they have swindled and mone-keried, than any real tokens of regard or duty, as the Vulg. ate and marginal reading have it, from a copy, probably, that was used in the family of God, who do not cherish the burnt-offerings, which is followed by our translators. Liberality and charity, to be acceptable to God, and have their perfect work, must be done without the least violation of equity and justice; for a man cannot in any sense be said to be be-good, or perform a good action, when it is accompanied with some evil at the same time. Good actions, with respect to both God and man, are at all times seasonable, and instances of love to our fellow creatures, and of performed to either at the expense of what is just and right.
This cannot be better explained than by the instance of Saul, which happened before he received the anointing of the Amalekites, and the chief of the things which should have been utterly destroyed, to sacrifice unto the Lord in Gilgal, which was sin unto him, and severely punished as such, because where there was a will, there was a way done, or forbidden any act of injustice, the rejecting the word of the Lord, or the disobeying him in that instance, under the pretence of serving him in another, is styled stubbornness and rebellion, (Deut. xx. 9, 10.) The case was well considered when he says, “Hath the Lord as great delight in offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord?” Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and hearken unto the voice of the Lord, and they shall not perform a good action that they might not offer a burnt-offering of that which only cost him nothing, until he had made it by his own a valuable thing, to be acceptable in his sight. If a man be blind, and the lame, and the sick, for sacrifice, because it ought to be perfect, and without blemish (Mal. i. 6), how much more are goods unjustly gotten, the wages and fruit of injustice, looked upon as filth and desecrations, if offered unto the Lord. It is, in the language of the same prophet, offering polluted bread upon the altar (ver. 7), and cursed is that deceiver which hath in his flock a male, i. e. something that is right against which there is abdection, and yet voweth and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing (ver. 11), which is sure to displease him.

Ver. 19. If he offer a sacrifice, let him do that of his own poor (lower). As one that killeth the son before the father’s eyes.” God is the father and protector of the poor, whose bread in the next verse is said to be his life; to take this away, or to rob him of it, without his consent, is a thing that is in some sort to take away his life. To offer to God, or to his use and service, what has been by oppression, and an unwarrantable stretch of power, taken from the needy, is here, by a most apt and beautiful metaphor, compared to that shocking instance of inhumanity and cruelty, the spilling the blood of a son in the sight of a fond and tender father. The best actions, even though intended for God’s honour, yet if they are founded in injuries, in wrong and robbery, are but such sacrifices as were offered in Tophet, where murder was the obligation. They are a sort of Thieves’ sacrifices, and inconsiderate, as the father to pauch of an unnatural requital upon his own son. Or it may not unjustly be illustrated by the ewelamb in sacred history, which the poor man had brought up, and which was given to God by the rich man in ten pieces, to express for, that it lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter; and yet, dear as this was to him, the rich oppressor could spare his own numerous flocks and herds to secure his right, and hisson, which was the man’s intainment (2 Sam. xii. 3, 4). In the primitive church neither the unjust publican nor the usurer, nor the extortioner, nor the deceiver, nor the rapacious, nor the murderer, nor the enormities of the house of bondage, or the offerings to the offering, though permitted to enjoy the other priileges of religion (Apost. Consit. lib. iv. cap. 5); nor would they accept of an estate given to pious uses, which were afterwards sold in the same manner as the poor was sold to enrich the corban, or even to endow a church, with the spoils of the poor. This desecrated the good design; it was, in the language of the prophet, “to build up Zion with blood, and Jerusalem with iniquity” (Mic. had, 3).}
ECCLESIASTICUS.

Ver. 25, 26. He that washeth himself (vif, as the Greek ος τοις καθαρισμοις τας ικανας τιαν αχθαντιαν εαν χρωει) so it is with a man that fasteth for his sins, and giveth again, and doeth the same: who will hear his prayer? or what doth his humbling profit him? With respect to the dead also, it is very material: "Out of sacrifices, washing the dead corpse itself (Acts xvi. 37)." But the-body is not actually washed, a washing from the sight of God is the term, it is washed by the touch of the dead father corpse. Some carried this farther, and maintained that even going among the sepulchres of the dead, or sitting upon them, or being in the house of the temple that were breathing their last, was such a pollution as was to be washed away by a legal and ceremonial lustration. The force of the author's reasoning is to the following effect.—As the water of purification, and the ashes of the heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctify to very little purpose towards purifying the flesh, if the person so purified contracted a fresh defilement, by going near to or touching another dead body; so it is equally fruitless for a man to hope by any outward and formal repentance to expiate his sins, if he is not circumcised and careful not to offend in the like particular again. For then the unclean spirit spirit returns, as it were, into the sinner himself, and inflicts with him "seven other spirits more wicked than himself, and his last state will be worse than the first" (Matt. xii. 45). It is therefore manifestly impossible for the outward rites to be applicable to national sins, which cannot be expiated by the mere appointment of solemn days of humiliation and fasting, except a general reformation succeeds, and the whole heaven of wickedness be purged away.

CHAP. XXXV.

Ver. 1. He that keepeth the law, bringeth offerings enough; he that taketh heed to the commandment offereth a peace-offering. i. e. He that is mindful of the commandments of God, and careful to perform them, serveth God more acceptably than he that offers to him the unutterable vain obligations. For it is not the number of men's offerings, but the integrity of their lives; nor their abundance, but the nobleness of their hearts that is regarded. Yet outward sacrifices are only holy, when they are joined with the inward sacrifice of the heart; and he be no otherwise regarded the outward religious works of piety, than as they are visible marks of that spiritual and invisible worship, which he claims as his due, and is the very essence of true religion (John iv. 23). It is evident that the Old Testament gives two different representations of religion, the one outward and ceremonial, the other the spiritual design of the law. The holy patriarchs and prophets, and other eminent persons among the heathens, were generally taught and led by the holy and spiritual sense of the law. The true meaning and spirit of the law, was so understood by the patriarchs and prophets, and from many passages in the law and the prophets, it is evident that the moral law was chiefly regarded and insisted upon in their answers and expositions. From what was given a value to the other positive rites, and was indeed the substance of those Mosaical shadows.

Ver. 2. He that requisiteth a good turn offereth fine flour; and he that groweth alms sacrificeth praise. The sense generally given of the first part of this verse is, that the sacrifice of a grateful heart is more acceptable to God than that of beasts, or any oblation; and thus Junius and our translators understand it: but, I think, charity may here be meant as well as gratitude, and ὑγιασθῆναι is one that returns charity for the blessings himself hath received of God, after the true parts of the law will agree; for in those especial books the latter clause in general refers to the ethical or practical, rather than to the legal, of the former. ὑγιεῖς seems to be taken in this sense, Acts ii. 46, 47, where, according to some critics, the apostles did not require the same thing of them, as they did of others, that the liberty and openness of heart, ὑγιασθῆναι, doing acts of charity unto all the people. And when the apostle bids the judging Christians to offer the sacrifice of praise to God (Heb. xii. 15), the word prototype is very well learned prelate, is, that they should make their offering of alms (instead of the fruits of their herds and flocks), joined with praises and thanksgivings to God in token of the same. They are to be as joint exertors of God with such sacrifice, by which they will be well pleased, as it follows in the next verse. This seems exactly answerable to that of the psalmist, "Offer unto God the sacrifice of praise, and the fruit of lips the sacrifice of a right heart" (Ps. I. 14). i. e. A truly thankful heart, gratefully acknowledging God's benefits, is the most acceptable sacrifice to him, and above all the peace-offerings thou canst bring.

Bishop Patrick's Mem. Myst. p. 307, and De Muis, in the Vulgate, Immola Dei sacrificium laudis, which are agreeable to the phrase, τοις καθαρισμοις τιαν αχθαντιαν, in this writer. And in this sense we are to understand the prophet, when he says, "If the Son make men glad, they will offer thee the sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, which is the fruit of the lips, σειρανον ἱερον, as the LXX. have it (Hos. xi. 10)." The ground of this expectation is, that he shall rend and such like expressions, though spoken simply, are to be understood comparatively, and when we say, "That God shall be under obligation to respect the inward disposition of the heart, we must beware that we do not hereupon so worship him in spirit only, as to take away all outward worship and honour from him" (Hooker's Ecc. Pol. b. vii.). The grounds here given of the necessity of sacrifices, and the things these shall consist of, may be said to sacrifice praise, as, in doing alms, he offers a tribute of thanksgiving; for alms are to be considered under the notion of a lord's rent, which God justly challenges from men, as their acknowledgment to him, as their great Lord and proprietary.

Ver. 4. Thou shalt not appear empty before the Lord. For all these things (are to be done) because of the commandments. Thou shalt not appear empty in the sight of God, or to have no offerings, or any observance to make, to be maintained or observed (Acts xxvii. 25, 26). We are to note several things here, which the man here explains the precept, and gives the true design and meaning of it. The worship of God is commonly represented in Scripture, as being such as were in ordinary circumstances, excused from bringing gifts, and making their offerings. God indeed respects chiefly the moral proofs of men's love and regard for him, and this is what God was looking for in his seeing the man to have "the outward service and offerings to be made in his temple by all the people as well as the rich, and wherein has condensed to their persons for the quantity or value of them; that if any was unable to sacrifice a sheep, he might bring a lamb, and if a lamb was too precious, the man might offer a turtle-dove, or two young pigeons; that if any were wanting, God was pleased with vows of obedience and adoration solely. These were never to be dispensed with; but the other, the ritual part, was not to be left undone, where there was an ability and power, because of God's appointment and command. These gifts and oblations were continued in the Christian church, and called sacrifices; among St. Cyprian chides some of the rich, that they threw not to the eunuch, and came to rent God's house sine sacrificio, or empty (De Op. Ecc.). These always made a part of the eucharist, and a perfect communion was called μεσήμερα πρεσβυτευμα, and as it was acceded of as a part of the sacrament, it is termed by the Chaldee, or the Samaritan. Was it a punishment to communicate τοις κτισθησιν; Virtue and goodness are the best recommendations of any sacrifice; the mere outward performance is intellectual to reconciliation, and the obtaining the favour of God. As expiation, atonement, and propitiating the offended Deity, was the end of all material sacrifices, so were they more or less acceptable and effectual, according to the inward sense, qualifications, and dispositions of those who offered them. Or the meaning may be, that he that is truly good man will always give to God the best. It appears from many instances and precedents under the old law, that such as had the most unfeigned regard to God and religion, offered the sacrifices which required the greatest portion of his substance, but with the very cheapest thereof; of Cain it is only said, that he brought simply an offering. We see herein the difference between a true and a false, or one who was a sincere worshipper of God, and one who brought his gift of the fattest and best which he hath, and in the zeal of his soul wishes it much better; the other thinking anything good enough, the blind or the lame, of no account, who with such offerings do not present a representative and father of all such sacrilegious ones in later times, who either rob God of his offerings, or serve him (as Bishop Hall, in his very just observations on the sumptuous and proud governor (Mal. i. 8). From this behaviour of Cain, St. Chrysostom raises this fine reflection : ει δεσινον τον θεον οπλα στηνελτοι οι ημερων υπερτερον, και ε.α. Σημεια ενιαυξαι.] CHAPTER XXXV.

quos veneramus, prius et precipue damns, illaque offere maximi volumae, que praem omnibus illis digne vindicant; quomodo bonum offerentem Deo non operatib Deo praeter tamen quod constituta est, non genuin, in praesente aliquod vel aliud in praesenti.

Ver. 8. Give the Lord his honour with a good eye, and diminish not the first-fruits of thine hands. Gifts, sacrifices, and offerings, were of an honorary nature. For as it was said, the firstborn of man and beast were the Lord's, as a token of dedication to his service (Exod. xxi. 1-5), so hereby do we understand the law approach unto a king without some present, especially when any favour was asked or expected, so was it counted dishonourable to God for the Israelites to give him less than he had a right to, as the Lord's workmen. The sense here is, That we are not only to worship God with our lips, and give him praises with our tongues, but he has further required, that we should give him an active honour, e. worship in spirit and in truth. The psalmist describes this plainly (Ps. xvi. 8), "Give unto the Lord the honour due unto his name;" and what that honour is the next words shew, "Bring your presents," or an offering, and come into his courts. This too must be done with a good eye; i. e. generously, without any mixture of covetousness, and uprightly, without any diminution of the substance. If it be said, God is exalted in his excellency in its kind (Exod. xxi. 29. 30. Num. xxvii. 26. 29. Prov. iii. 9), "An eye, or the first-fruits, was commanded to be given of the very best, hence it became a token of dedication, and the text shows us he that builds the temple, and makes all the substance he uses it. The Jews distinguished offerings into two sorts, one of which they called righteousness, or what was strictly and exactly according to the proportion required; and the other, as they called it, the general offering, or being above the proportion fixed. According to which notion he that performed the first sort was named a just man, and he that the second was called a good man. And therefore of this verse may be, Do not only what is necessary and strictly legal, but make some free-will offering, as a voluntary oblation to the honour of God; or more briefly, give God the best of his, or that which he gives thee, in giving thy first-fruits to God, or his receiver, the priest.

Ver. 9. In all thy gifts show a cheerful countenance, and dedicate thy tithes with gladness. — Ego hortatus hinc cedebam. According to the Jewish sense of it, means to apply or appropriate to some religious use; as the first-fruits and tithes were set apart for the maintenance of the priests and Levites, the repairs of the temple, and for providing the daily sacrifice. The vowing or dedicating tithes was very ancient. Jacob promises, that of all which God should give him, he would give the tenth unto him. Gen. xxi. 30. And this the Christians, in the days of the heathen nations, to dedicate tithes to the deity whom they adored. Among the Jews the payment of them was established, the priests lived upon them, as God's alms, and as thus the rest of the Jews could be helped, of which the Jews brought to him. See Numb. xvii. 22. Deut. xviii. 4, where the law requires, that they should give the tithe and the first-fruits of the earth, upon which they are not to question, but to receive as God commands, and that they should offer the sixth part of an ephah of a homer, their wise men concluded that they were bound to bring at least a sixth part to God for his ministers. But notwithstanding this, they accounted him but a covetous man that brought no more, and they called this a termean, or the heavy-offering of an evil eye. For thus Maimonides, A good eye, i. e. a liberal person, brings one part of forty; a mean eye, i. e. a man that hath some, but a less degree of goodness, one of fifty; and an evil eye, i. e. a niggard, to bring nothing at all. To this might be added, to give to see Patrick's Men. Myst. p. 161. Sed Hid. Hist. cap. 2, Ainew, on Numb. xvii. 12. This may also be applied to charity, which is the gift of God, and its value is the opinion of God, who has promised to bless and multiply it. Ver. 10. Give unto the most High according as he hath enriched thee, and let not thy right hand forget the gift of God (Verse here omitted, and not found clear). — This may be understood either of the payment of tithes, or of charity in general, either of which may be considered as a tribute, or an acknowledgment to God for what he has bestowed, and as a likely means to procure his further blessing; and therefore should be cheerfully done, and not given here or there, as if by chance. God hath well determined this, "Be merciful after thy power; for thou hast much, give plentifully; if thou hast little, do thy diligence gladly, if thou hast nothing, let them gather themselves together;" (Deut. xvi. 11. 14), and with a peculiar reward in the day of necessity." (iv. 7—9. Ps. x. i. 22. Prov. xix. 17. 2 Cor. ix. 6. 7. 1 Tim. vi. 17—19. Heb. vi. 10. xii. 10. 14.) Kephisapor χρηστος, which is the opposite ofavarice; and it should be εαυτον χρηστος, and so the Alexandrian MS, alone has it. It means,—Give cheerfully according to the gain of thy hands (for so χρηστος is used, and should be understood in the legal sense), and let thy liberality be as God has prospered thee, nor fear to be made poor thyself by such acts of goodness, render alms or private interest suggest any such excuse to you. To make any gift or sacrifice acceptable, it must be done in a manner likewise worthy of God; it must be done with a willing heart, and with such a satisfaction as may even show itself upon the very countenance. And so the command is to the children of Israel (Exod. xxxiv. 5), Whoso is of a willing heart, let him bring his offering unto the Lord of the first-fruits of the ground, or of the fruit of the vine, and whom his spirit made willing, brought accordingly the Lord's offering to the work of the tabernacle" (ver. 21). And in that great offering of David and the people, as a thank-offering for the change of their condition, and whom their spirit made willing, brought accordingly their ready and cheerful heart, "that the people rejoiced, because with a perfect heart they offered willingly unto the Lord." (1 Chron. xv. 21). In that offering, David, who rejoiced also with them with great joy, says, "I thank thee, O God, that I should be able to offer so willingly after this sort, for all things come of thee, and mine own hand hath not purchased any thing thereof." (ver. 22). And he therefore foresees an instance of unseemly goodness in God, to receive and reckon it as a gift, when we return to him but an inconsiderable part of what he has given us, and not only be ready to promise something for a reward of our graces, as is mentioned here, but, as the gospel assures us, a hundredfold, both in this world and the other. Of so great consequence and value, that a cheerful heart in all gifts, duties, and offerings, made to God; and so true is that reflection of St. Austin, Nemo invitus beneficet, etiam quod bonum est factum (Concil. lib. i. cap. 12). Ver. 12. Do not think to corrupt with gifts; for such he will not receive: — Nemo capta acceptus. Gratian understands it in the sense of our translators, of hoping to corrupt a lawful judge, or of offering bribes or compounding for something with a public officer. But it should be understood, and in the sense in which it was given by the Jews, to attempt the sacrifice condemns in many places. But capta acceptus is more generally and would be better rendered, do damno, or doing. A man who is willing to work in God's cause, loved, ". Diminuendo nothing of thy offerings;" which Junius and Jansellius follow; the latter has, Ne decurris mercata. The Tigrine version understands it of goods unjustly obtained or gotten, Ne decurris mercata, for which I think it most probable, as such are blemished and imperfect. However the determined sense of the word be, to offend in any of these instances is to affront God, nor will the magnanimity, state, glory, or reputation, of a man make any difference. God neither regards the person nor sacrifice itself so much as a pure intention, and a heart truly devoted to him.

Ver. 15. Do not the tears run down the widow's cheeks? and is not her cry against him that causeth them to fall? — See Luke xvi. 3, where the parable is proposed under the form of a question. The condition of the widow is, that of the more affecting, as that sex is more exposed to injuries, and widows generally above others. Quin Quinn, observes, Per se immacula est tellus, et afferi infatigabi naturali non pro pecunia legat, sed pro beneficio et magnam clementiam, et service; and three other passages of this sort, are said to cry to heaven for vengeance (Gen. iv. 19. Exod. ii. 22. 24. Macc. xiv. 31. Rom. vii. 18. James xiv. 1). But undoubtedly, the church, the protector of the widow, and the father of the orphan: he places his greatness in being the protector of the voiceless, the unaided, the mighty, and in particular he is the defence of those that are poor in spirit, to whom earth is as a place of banishment, and heaven the habitation longed for. By the mother and father of the widow, we are to understand the Port-Royal comment, the church, when under a state of persecution or such pious afflicted souls as cry day and...
ECCLESIASTICUS.

...have mercy upon you, O Lord God of all, and behold us and send thy fear upon all the nations that rise not after thee. Lift up thy hand against the strange nations, and let them see thy power."

Ver. 1-3. If we have mercy upon us, O Lord God of all, and behold us and send thy fear upon all the nations that rise not after thee. Lift up thy hand against the strange nations, and let them see thy power."

The author having spoken, in the conclusion of the former chapter, of the might of God, and of the enemies of the Hebrews; and the miserable circumstances of this nation, both in and afflicted, and to procure help for them against their enemies and oppressors, begins with a set prayer to God, that he would be pleased favourably to look upon and assist them. Which he did, as appears by the history subsequent in this book, when this work was composed, were dispersed in Egypt, Syria, and all the provinces of the east, and beyond the Euphrates, and those that remained in Judea and Jerusalem were likewise rescued, and comforted, some given to those of Egypt, and in their turns victims of their power and anathema. This so low and mortifying a state afflicted the Hebrews with tears, and made them fervently beseech God to have mercy upon and to restore tranquility to his people, and either to convert the hearts of the idolatrous nations, strangers to his fear and worship, or to lift up his hand against them, and desire them with a mighty deliverance; that they may deliver the chosen from them with a mighty stretched-out arm, as he formerly delivered their ancestors in the time and under the conduct of Moses. The things the wise man here prays for, are the very same the Jews besought their Messiah to perform, viz. the salvation of our Saviour's times, and the conversion of the Messiah; viz. the conversion of the gentiles to the true God, the destruction of certain nations, their enemies, and the advantageous results from the event of their sufferings: in both ages they prayed that God would hasten the accomplishment (see note on 1. 23. and Bishop Chandler's Def. of Christian, p. 42).

Ver. 3. The Jews feared, or suffered, something in us before them: so be thou magnified among them before us. And let them know thee, as we have known thee, that there is no God but only thou, O God."

The verse former will admit of a dual signification; it may refer to the time of the persecution by the heathen; or the time of the Babylonish captivity; or to the time of the Messiah; in all these ages the Jews worshipped and adored God, is a necessary qualification for acceptance. As it relates to prayer, it consists in discarding all right or pretence of merit to the bounty and munificence of God; and in submitting ourselves to be delivered from both or either, respect to the benefit itself petitioned for, and likewise the time and measure of it; and, lastly, that we should consider ourselves not only as dependent creatures, but also as such in our most holy and fundamental condition here. The due notice of three particulars, or effects of the prayer of the humble:—1. That it is so effectual as to pierce the clouds. 2. That it is so persevering, as not to desert till it reaches them and is presented before the throne of God. 3. That it is so important and fervent, as not to return back till it hath obtained its request. All virtues and graces exult us towards heaven, say Messeniors of Port-Royal, and as it were, knock at its gate for admittance; but it is humility that effectually opens it, and brings us to the throne of him who ascended not thither, after he had demeaned and emptied himself of all glory till he was made perfect through humility and sufferings.

Ver. 18. For the Lord will not be slack, neither will the Mighty be patient toward them, till he have smitten them in sundry places:—But he will be merciful, and will long-suffering, and will not perform his purpose of judgment, as in the days of Noah; and broken the sceptre of the wicked nations."

Majestatis, patience, or long-suffering, signifies slackness in punishing; and this he subjoins, to show the reason why he has not as yet done his stroke, that he has not delay to do justice to them, viz. to the humble or afflicted, or will not be slack to execute justice upon them, viz. the unmerciful, or the heathen, to whom he is to show his power, seems to refer. This place cannot be better illustrated than by comparing it with Luke xvii. 7, "Shall not God avenge his own elect, which cry day and night unto him; and will he tarry long? I tell you, that he will avenge them speedily: even as he spake in the days of Noah, so shall it be."

Ver. 19. For the Lord will not be slack, neither will the Mighty be patient toward them, till he have smitten them in sundry places:—But he will be merciful, and will long-suffering, and will not perform his purpose of judgment, as in the days of Noah; and broken the sceptre of the wicked nations."

Ver. 6. Show new signs, and make other strange wonders.] i. e. Καιρικάς σημαίνατε, Renew the miracles which thou hast often made, and renew thy works. To the Jews the miracles of the law and of the grace of the law, and those of the first and second kingdoms of Israel, and by Joshua against the Canaanites; and add new ones to them, that foreign nations may discern thy infinite power, excited in wrath against the enemies of thy people, and against all the enemies of thy kingdom, the power of thy miracles, that thou only art God, that their idols are lying vanities, their kings but weak mortals, whose life and death are in thy hand, that, urged by the dread of thy omnipotence, they may cease to oppress thy chosen.

Ver. 5. Make the time short, remember the covenant.] The Greek copies vary here in their reading; some have εὐθέως, others μετά τοῦ κατεστάθη, momento finnis, as if the Vulgate has it; others, μετά τοῦ κατεστάθη, which our translators follow. God's oath or covenant, and the assurances given him by the people, were the greatest of the blessings expected by the Jews, both before and in our Saviour's time. What this oath was, is fully explained, Ecclus. xlv. 21, 22, it was the blessing of all men, and the covenant of peace; the second part of the covenant of the Jews, or with Isaac: it was the covenant of kings that he made with David, to exalt his horn for ever—his mercy, whereby he promised, 'I will be unto the Lord; and he will be unto me for a name, and for a praise, and for an exaltation.' Ps. cxlvi. 11, 12, as the Jews understand the words of Isaiah there alluded to (see Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 43). And thus he made his men in the Old Testament, to be made a sign and a memorial, a covenant and promise (2 Chron. vii. 14, Ps. cxxxix. 19), and make mention of his servant David, or Abraham, or Isaac, or Israel, for whom he did it, and the glory of all his works, the proof of his regard or compassion. Some understand the wise man, when he says, 'Make the time short,' as if he prayed that God would hasten to their succour, and kill the calamities that shall come upon their enemies make haste (Deut. xxxii. 35). But this petition may be considered in a higher sense, as a prayer for the speedy coming of the Messiah. But, in the time of such miseries, the acts of God have been such as to give much impatience, and prayed for it with so much warmth and earnestness, Christians should at length receive it with such calm coldness and indifference, and be so little affected with it as the Jews were.

Ver. 10. SMILE IN SANTER THE HEADS OF THE RULERS OF THE HEATHEN, THAT THEY MAY KNOW THEY ARE MANKIND, Thus doth the Lord, the God of Israel, declare. This prophet designates the Messiah, who, &c. That he shall wound even kings in the day of his thral; that he shall judge among the heathen, and fill the places with the dead bodies, and smile in the faces of those he shall destroy. This, &c. That the kings of Syria and Egypt, chiefly the former, and some shall be in unto the heathen kings, and in the midst of them; and among these, the character shall be with Antiochus Epiphanes, who, if he do not affect divine honours himself, hindered the paying them to the true God. His blasphemies are expressly foretold, and in the 21st day of Judas, he translated his history, as recorded in the books of Maccabees, shows that he was an enemy to all religion, and even defied God, and that the end of this cruel oppressor was as miserable as his life had been wicked. This is the true sense of the prophecy, following a copy which had 50DVO instead of [DVO]. This and the foregoing verses show the vindictive temper of the Jewish people.

GIVE THE TRIBES OF JACOB TO THE TRIBE OF JACOB, AND THE PEOPLE OF SHECCHIN TO THE PEOPLE OF THE SHECCHIM. Juli. 2. Hebrew. This is the 12th verse. This is a frequent phrase in the Old Testament, and was a kind of epithet, and a peculiar distinction of the language of the Jews; as, 'the house of Jacob,' 'the house of Israel,' 'the house of Shechim.' This restoration the Jews promised themselves before, and at the coming of their Messiah. Grotius observes, that this exegiotic is here to be taken in a formal high, as it is used by this writer, v. 21, and the same he had caused them to inherit them, as from the beginning. When this author wrote, the far greater number of the Jews was dispersed in different provinces of the East, in Greece, Africa, and India; it was a common and a received form of their prayer, to beg of God to recall the several tribes that were dispersed, such as they were not yet returned into Judea. In the 43rd verse of Deut. xxxii. 2 in the book of Psalms of this devout request (see Ps. cv. 45, cxvii. 5). See Execli.xviii. 10, where Elias is said to be ordained to restore the tribes of Jacob. The &c. verse next follows, &c. The &c. verse next follows, &c. This and the foregoing verses show the vindictive temper of the Jewish people.

VER. 12. O Lord, have mercy upon the people that is called by thy name, i.e. Have pity upon that people, who are called the people of God, who are the children of Abraham, and art their Father, their Husband, their Master, their King: and art pleased to style thyself the God of Abraham and of Israel. The Hellenists love to call the Israelites Jews, and this is a title, and the Jews were called Αμαλάχων and Δισεοπόλεον. And so Aés and άνένο are opposed, Acts xiv. 14, where, speaking of the profligate or guilty nations called to the gospel. God is said to have got λεγών, and declared he that had been in the midst of them. Bishop Fell observes, that St. Cyril accords accordingly to choose the faithful people, and not popularum, and condemns Tertullian for inaccuracy in using so general a term (Not. in ib. ibio. Tert. adv. Jud.). And upon Israel, whom thou hast named thy firstborn, This term not only signifies the order of birth or generation, but the degree of love and favour with almighty God. Egypt was possessed by their fathers' merit, he would never forsake them. They prided themselves also in their holy city, where God, they imagine, was present and with them, and in their temple, where the Shechinah dwelt, which, they thought God, for his own sake, would not fail to preserve. All others, who were not favoured with the like presence, they called uncircumcised, Isa. xxxv. 8, and looked on them as no better than dogs, disregarded and neglected by God; and this common phrase among the Jews, our Saviour, when he observed the Jewish writers, that they are naturally given to magnify their own nation and privileges more than any other people living, which appears now more clearly than in the apocryphal writings, where frequent instances of this vanity, even in the times of persecution and distress.

VER. 11. Fill Sion with thine unspeakable oracles, and thy people with thy glory. The Greek version has, Fill Sion, &c. And here, in the marginal reading, and seems more agreeable to the Greek; or, Fill Sion with thy favours, with the effects of thy mercy and loving-kindness, by fulfilling thy oracles, and doing good, and making good all the promises that were spoken, and thy people may have fresh occasion to publish and display thy glory; or, Fill Sion with thy presence here, i.e. Fill it, and let them here, as formerly. The oriental versions have, etc. the temple, etc. The word τύμμον is, as it were, the glory of the Shechinah adorns thy temple, following a copy which probably had τίμων, instead of τύμμον, which is in all the present editions.

VER. 15. Give testimony unto those that thou hast possessed from the beginning, and raise up prophets that have been in thy name. This sense is pretty much the same, whatever we read κτισματος or κτισματοις, or προφητας; i.e. Give unto Israel, whom thou hast chosen for such a multitude in 25, a pest, and may not have, since their captivity, so many proofs of thy love, fresh testimonies of thy regard and notice: remember the ancient predictions in their favour, and fulfil the promises which the prophets have made in thy name, in the same manner, or with the same effect, when they call upon thee in their distress. To teach the word does not relate to the coming of new prophets, as some have understood it; nor is it to be considered as a wish that such should arise, for such prophets have been in the reception of the Messiah, by pointing out the several material circumstances relating to his coming, the gift of prophecy ceased; neither was there any public succession of prophets for the space of four hundred years together before the coming of Christ, on purpose to raise men's minds a more earnest expectation of that happy advent. It was God that would have his name and his dealings to his former prophecies in his name. And so the Hebrew word is rendered by the LXX. 1 Sam. iii. 11, 12. And thus the Syriac and Arabic versions, Affirma testimonia servat tua, atqnum, et adventavit vaticinitationes prophetarum tuaorum, qui nomine tuo locuti sunt (see Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 42).

VER. 16. Reward them that wait for thee, and let thy prophets be found faithful. Reward the patience and holy trust of thy people, who, notwithstanding their many calamities, revolutions, and reproaches, have continued true and faithful in thy cause, and have not, since their captivity, been so unfaithful. Lapsed again into idolatry, as their ancestors did under their kings before: or, Comfort them that live in hopes of the completion of the prophecies, with the happy accomplishment of the dispensation of the Messiah, that they are found true and faithful in what they foretold. The author seems to intinuate here, that the Jews, at this time, waited for the Messiah, or that prophet, by way of remembrance, before or after the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, and that the most of the Covenant prophets. And accordingly by the coming of the Messiah, all the oracles and prophecies were fulfilled, and the faith of his exils, who had waited for him with much eagerness and anxiety, was blessed and rewarded; and by it God filled his people with those spiritual and true blessings, of which that of Aaron was only a figure, and showed himself the eternal God, the Lord of ages, by bringing to pass, περισσευεια των αδιαλειθων, what he had foretold and promised four thousand years before. VER. 17. O Lord, hear the prayer of thy servants, according to the height of thy greatness. Even so, mercifully partake of those blessings, and repay the benefit of that solemn form, which thou hast appointed the high-priest to pronounce, and may the full force of the benediction (Numb. vi. 24), the oneness of the benediction, Θεός, as the margin has it, and Grabe Prefere αποτελεσει, the common reading. According to Bossuet, the author here intires of the authority of the high-priest, that he may have a good name and a good report in the family of Aaron may continue, and not such a corrupt and venal one as was under Antiochus Epiphanes, purchased with money by Jason and Menelaus, to the manifest wrong of the people, and may be a high-priest (2 Mac. iv. 8. 23). However that be, this passage certainly contains a very particular commendation of the established ministry, its usefulness and efficacy. For God could grant the promised blessing only to his people, without the priest's intercession, but he on purpose appoints him to be the ministerial asker, and to be the public examiner of the petitions and addresses of his suppliants. He could not more effectually grace and distinguish his servants, than by declaring, that what they should beg, he would the more readily give; thus confirming and recommending their prayers as the stated means to draw down God's blessing; and in time of sickness would apply to him, as the people did to Samuel, "Pray for thy servants unto the Lord thy God." (1 Sam. v. 17.)

Ver. 18, 19. The belly devoureth all meats, yet is one meat better than another. As the palate tasteth diverse kinds of victuals; so doth a heart of understanding false speeches. The holy man is earnestly exhorted to a proper regard of the foregoing prayer; but so is it in all the versions and editions. The sense seems to be, as the stomach promiscuously receives all sorts of food, but all do not digest alike, by one equal wholesome, so the heart receives all sorts of thoughts, though not equally profitable and good; and as the will has various affections and desires, but the objects of them are not equally innocent, so may be given of different sorts of knowledge, but they are not alike useful; for the knowledge of the law of God and of religious truths is of most importance, and preferable to all knowledge of the external sciences, or the satisfaction of the senses, as the flattering, profitable and evil discourse. But as the mouth should be kept clean, that the taste may be more quick and exquisite, so the mind, in order to receive right graces, is obliged to clear prejudice and prepossession.

Ver. 20. A floury heart causeth heaviness: but a man of experience will reimburse him. [A harvest*avit, Dariusnomen avit, and so Geneva version.] A "floury heart" brings grief, but a man of experience will restore it." By a "floury heart" is meant a wicked and deceitful person; who often takes the odour of honey, and invalidly teaches the careless, but a man of prudence and experience will beware of and find out his artifice and designs, will oppose and punish him according to his deserts. For so duraكنع is often used for those that are strong in their truth.

Ver. 21. A woman will receive every man, yet is one daughter better than another.] Various are the senses of this place; yet in our version a good one, may be given of it, without any such reflection upon the modesty of the sex, as Grothus and some other expositors have thrown upon it. May not therefore the meaning either be, that every young fresh and unadulterated addresser and attendant of the heart is among the sex who deserve a preference before others? Or, that women are not nice and scrupulous, when addresses are made to them, about the mere person or beauty of the man,? If this were true, you would shun the beauty of a woman, which is a perfection that distinguishes them from one another, and is engaging in the eyes of the other sex.

But I take the true meaning of the author to be, that in marriage regard is only to be had to the proportion of the species, it is but of little consequence where the choice falls; but if happiness be the thing proposed, and you would have a valuable companion, an agreeable, and accomplished partner for life, regard then ought chiefly to be had to virtue and good qualities.

Ver. 23. If there be kindness, meekness, and comfort in her tongue, then is not her husband like other men. If her beauty a wife adds such engaging qualities as strict virtue and modesty, prudent economy, obliging behaviour, and such good sense and address, as, by her winning carriage, she can please the mind, and service well the cause of crowning love and usefulness. Possessed of such a treasure, he should bless his choice, and set a just value upon his happiness, which has made him even an object of envy. No one in such a condition, can expect a more perfect expression of his good fortune: his lot is above that of common mortals, it resembles that of the blessed above, where love and harmony reign triumphant.

[1] A wife beginneth a possession, a help like unto himself, and a pillar of rest. [O κύριος γυναικα, διαίμνησες ανθρώπον, τοιαύτη καρά απόθηκη διά αυτού διακόμης ανθρώπου. The Vulgate with great judgment inscribit bonam, qui possidet mulierem bonam; i.e. He that has a good wife in all respects, has a house and family, and all he builds on the surest grounds to build his hopes of happiness upon, and of raising a family to his mind. Junius transposes the words here, and renders, Qui compropvit mulierem adjunctorum omnium in matrimoniis, quem nullus homines cuncte scient, etiam quae, cum cohabitasset, eum, si Deus fuerit, in uno mulierem constituerit, qui cuncte est more clarior et exstatior quam nos versione. According to Grothus, κύριος γυναικα means inacere stabile; and so is it here, as is the conversion of the form κύριος, which is sometimes taken: i.e. He that takes a wife, sacts over his house and fortunates a helpeante and an assistant, equal to himself, that will divide his cares, and in whose bosom they will be content and secure. He shall confide, and will be to him a pillar of security, as well as of agreeable rest. According to this sense, the pointing of the Greek should be, κύριος γυναικα. κυριος γυναικα, κυριος γυναικα, κυριος γυναικα, κυριος γυναικα, κυριος γυναικα, κυριος γυναικα, κυριος γυναικα, κυριος γυναικα, κυριος γυναικα, κυριος γυ

Ver. 25. Where no hedge is, there the possession is wide, no little faculty to engage him to be set, and down nourishing.] As, by the breaking down the fence of a vineyard, all they that go by pluck off the grapes; and the wild bear out of the wood dath root it up, and the wild beasts eat the fruit. So is it with the servant, who is without a proper helpeante to order and direct his domestic concerns; all things are in confusion for want of management, and without a careful understanding eye his servants, and out of the whole family: and for which reason the Syr. Uni non aedict, recaenatur uncto; et ubi non aedict uxor, omnis detects sunt nc disipat. A man seeeth always, who is understood in forms abrupt, all things at random, or to trust wholly to servants, whose fidelity is not always to be depended on. But in a well-regulated family, where a prudent woman presides, such a servant is kept, who, though she be invisible, is so near her husband is abroad and attending public business, and providing what is necessary in his sphere, she discreetly orders affairs at house, and looks so well to the ways of the family concerning his house, that nothing wrong will befall him in her without any apprehension of waste or spoil.

Ver. 26. Who will trust a thief well appoited, that skippeth from the mouth of abundance, the man, that hath no house, and falsity whersoever the night behold him? i.e. An unmarried man, being always unsettled, is esteemed but little better than a vagrant; as he hath no home to call his own, and therefore he is, and always ready to seize upon another's property on every occasion that presents itself. And indeed the oriental versions instead of κυριος γυναικα put adolescens coelebs. It may not be amiss to observe, that in ancient times such as had no wife or family, no fixed dwelling or certain way of life, were looked upon as loose and disorderly persons, as suspicious vagabonds or strrollers, not fit to be trusted, lying with whom they could, and therefore spoken of in terms of great reproach, especially among the Jews, all of whom married at a proper age, and thought it both to their credit and advantage to be settled in that state.

CHAP. XXXVII.

Ver. 1. Every friend soth, I am his friend also: but there is a friend which is only a friend in name.] Aristotle has well defined friendship to be, Medicatia inter amationem et animinationem. The friend, who appears such in all his actions, who does not load his own heart with the weight of his friendship, nor indeed has he any occasion: the loss of such a one, whether by death or some unhappy misunderstanding, is a misfortune that affects a man in the most sensible part: the flatterer attempts to gain your affections by pretending to be your real friend or admirer, though he is only so in appearance and for his own ends; his favor and friendship are given with a view to profit, and so we are to suspect them. In adversitate ad mortem aequo non persistit; Arist. As if the copy which those translators used, read (ver. 2) sci is from a very good, and likelihood is as good as this upon to one, who, under the mask of friendship, lies in wait to do hurt, and, while his words are smoother than oil, has mischief and war in his heart.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Ver. 5. There is a companion which helpeth his friend for the belly, 6) (of iniquity) Will labour with or for his friend. Darius understands it in the sense of grieving, that he will be beneficial to his friend, and yet not an open enemy, but one that will not happen to his friend. And so the Vulgate, Sodalis amico conoldeo; sympathet, or takes part, in his grief or sufferings; but his concern is for his own advantage, and his pretense is that he loves his friend, but for his own support and subsistence; it is his table, more than the man himself, that he is really concerned for. Groton renders it: Collaboravit eum ad pecuniam suam. That the parasite spares no pains to provide for and feed his belly. And taketh up the buckler against the enemy. This denotes the open and avowed character of a true friend, and so the Sturt makes it, Bonus est amicus, qui pugnat contra inimicum, et teneat cypleum; but as this sense suits not with the former part of the verse, nor with the preceding word, the word is here put metaphorically, as is very common, and so we are to understand. Groton observes, in a note, that the usage of putting a buckler against the enemy is a quite contrary one; viz. Such a counterfeet will not take the buckler in his friend's behalf, nor stand by or protect him in the time of danger. Indeed, the more harmless the, more of those who, when the enemy is present, which is the marginal reading, he will take up the buckler to fight against him whom he formerly followed for his own convenience and advantage. This is preferred by Darius, whose Ciceronian favours him in his rendering. Seu tum pro hoste; i.e. He will take his buckler to assist the enemy.

Ver. 6. Forget not thy friend in thy mind; Darius thinks here, Forget not the friend; nor forget a friend after thou hast been his friend, or one according to thine own mind; and that the grandson probably mustook for 2, and so rendered in thy mind instead of according to thy mind. Or the same may be understood, Forget not thy friend, and do not let things go according to thy mind, dans la joie de vore âme, says Calmet.

Ver. 7. Every counsellor extolleth counsel; but there is some that counselth for himself. Beware of a counsellor, and know before what need he hath. lest he cast the lot upon thee. A false friend extolhth his own counsel, will boast of his ability and inclination to serve you, whereas his advice aims only at his own interest. Consider what selfish ends he may have in view, and that his forwardness to advise you may not be owing to any sincere regard for you, but to make a prey of you, and to draw you into some mischief. The Syriac rendering is more explicit. A consilium in quo cavit ebi, et nosce propri quid requirat, ne dolo maneat in societate tua. More ingenious conjectures that the true reading here is δισοιων, dura aliquid, which Dr. Grabe likewise prefers, and is confirmed by the Vulgate; Ne fortibus nutum in terram dabitur. Nor will he build a strong wall against thee, nor set up a bulwark in the way, and encourage thee to go in it, in order to entrap thee and then laugh at thy fall and disaster.

Ver. 10. Consult not with one that suspecteth thee; and hide thy counsel from such as envy thee. i.e. Ask not counsel of thy enemy, nor communicate any secret to such as have an iniquitous design against thee. And let not the light of thine eyes be turned aside, or that the light of thine eyes be turned aside, or that their light be turned aside, if it be turned aside, if it is turned aside, i.e. turning aside into other eyes; there are persons who are too unwary in this respect, and, because they intend no harm them-affairs, and has your interest more at heart than a stranger, he will direct you well, and give his advice the most effectually and cordially. The Vulgate inserts sancti, understanding of it a good thing to give good counsel, or to offer wise counsels; and to be truewise, is to be wise unto the great purposes of the Lord. Whatever knowledge contributes not to this, is beside the mark that ought principally to be aimed at. "The careful and good master finds wisdom, and he standeth andruleth in the way of his understanding." The Vulgate gives a different translation, as he who truly loves him, sooner than to any others. And therefore, as is advised in the next verse, we must pray to God with faith and perseverance, and address ourselves to him for his direction and assistance, before we apply to our friends for theirs. For men do but imperfectly guess at what is right; but it is God that takes us by the hand, and leads us into the right way, and makes us go on successfully in it, by the enjoyment of his grace, as being himself the way, the truth, and the life.

Ver. 17. The countenance is a sign of changing of the heart. [Eccles. 4:2-7] Some copies have, [Eccles. 4:1-9] I. e. One sees upon the countenance whether the heart is gay or sorrowful, content or afflicted. There is also another reading, [Eccles. 4:1-7] and, [Eccles. 4:10] that of the Vulgate; i. e. There are four things which make such an impression upon the heart, as appear to the very countenance; hope and fear, life and death. (Ver. 18.) Solomon compares with another sense; viz. That in every action or affair of consequence, the mind is, as it were, in suspense for a time, and cautiously examines four particulars: whether the thing is like to succeed, or like to fail, and that it is both gainful, sinful or allowable, and the occasion of life or death to us.

Ver. 19. There is one that is wise and teacheth many, and yet is unprofitable to himself. This observation holds more in reference to our Lord Jesus Christ than to any other body of men, who seek to be the most profitable to himself. The truth of it wants not much to be illustrated, and yet is too notorious to be denied. There are too many of this sort of wise men, says Calvin, who are too much given to the pursuit of human knowledge, and yet have not the sense to make use of and apply it to their own advantage and happiness; who deliver useful precepts to others and all to edify others, and yet themselves continue unfruitful. But to what purpose is learning or knowledge, if it terminates only in speculation, and is not accompanied with good life. What advantage is there of an interpolation from the like words in the next verse. Unhappy, in so abasing the true knowledge, as thereby to fall short of the tree of life. Or possibly the author here may condemn those who place learning and knowledge as their end, and do not believe in the testimony of their better part, who prefer piety to sacred history, and human to divine literature.

Ver. 20. 21. There is one that showeth wisdom in words, and another in the resort and converse of all food. For grace is not given him from the Lord; because he is deprived of all wisdom. Many copies, instead of ροὴς, have σοφία, as the marginal reading; that is, in their answer to the question that he makes of an interpolation from the like words in the next verse. By ἀποκαλυπτείνειν, i. e. Μαθητεύειν, all the commentators, with St. Austin, understand a cunning sophister, who deals in subtleties, who makes a vain show and ostentation of knowledge, without the true use and power of it; one who uses captious and ensnaring arguments, true in appearance only; to impose upon men and lead them into error, instead of enlightening and instructing the ignorants. Calvin, with the rest, does not to teach true wisdom, or to mend the heart, nor so much to rectify men's passions and wills as to cheat and bewilder the understanding, their knowledge fed with vanity and trifling. It is a science falsely so called, devoid of the grace of God, and of his blessing, which he has promised, not to learning, as much less to a vain show and ostentation of knowledge, and a different meditation in his law.

Ver. 22. 23. Another is wise to himself; and the fruits of understanding are commendable in his mouth. A wise man's conversation is not of an empty noise, nor is it pleasing and pleasant under the standing fault not. In the two foregoing verses our author has described a wise man who is so in appearance only, or in outward discourse, whose wisdom, not being rightly employed, is not of such utility to others as it would be, if along with it, is useful and unprofitable. Here he describes a truly wise man, who is inwardly such, and wise to the best purposes: who makes use of the parts God has blessed him with, as well to edify himself, as to instruct others, and is, as the Vulgate excellently expresses it, Amicus sum sapientiae. True wisdom is in order either to the welfare of ourselves or our commonwealth, and to be truly wise, is to be wise unto the great purposes of the Lord. Whatever knowledge contributes not to this, is beside the mark that ought principally to be aimed at. "The careful and good master finds wisdom, and he standeth and ruleth in the way of his understanding."...
CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Ver. 1.

One hour a physician with the honour due unto him, for the presence of his face may make a king to rise, and a sick man to stand on his feet, and thereby hath created him.

The precept of honouring all men. I Pet. ii. 17. For the degree of greatness whereby persons are more or less beloved; but more is here intended. The exhortation addressed to the physician, a man of science, to maintain his character as a physician with a handsome and proper gravity, because of the very great use he is of in life, in healing the many diseases of mankind, and thereby, that he may stand for a general good. And so youth is often used in the New Testament, and by the best Greek writers; Tully too applied homos to a physician in this sense (Epist. Famil.).

The dignity of the physician. Ver. 1. No good skill cannot be without its due and due proportion, and it displays itself in proportion to that multiplicity of evils and infirmities to which we are subject, all of which come from the sin of man, but the remedies to cure them from God; and therefore we ought to respect and honour a profession whose original is so exalted and noble, and which contributes so much to the preservation and health of human life.

Ver. 2.

For of the most high comes healing. As it was a prevailing opinion among the ancients, that the gods were the authors of all diseases incident to mankind, in some of which the divine providence was so immediately evident, the Hebrews attribute to God himself, or however to Adam, as taught by him, the invention of physic, and made Moses, either by inspiration, or by what he learned another way, their founder. For though God created man, and made it produce thorns and briers, yet he has given it thus; by giving a restorative power, a medicinal virtue and efficacy to roots and plants, for the health of mankind; so that the medicine of the body is also in this father sense ascribed to the Deity, as a natural sagacity is required in such as arrive at a great perfection in it. And thus the oriental versions, Dono Del says, The skill of the physician shall lift up his head, etc. in the sight of the great men he shall be in admiration. Some copies have beyond this, He shall receive a gift from the king; and so the marginal reading in which is supported by the Vulgate and oriental versions. That physicians of note and eminence anciently had large salaries fixed upon them by great men and princes, appears from Bodens: Sex millia ducum annui, and from Josephus,' to show the high estimation of the learned Romans A prima principibus habuit (De Asse).

And our author here seems to speak of what he saw or heard was done in his time at court by the kings of Egypt; and however they might be less esteemed elsewhere, yet among the Jews they were in high reputation; and the dignity of their profession was such among the Athenians, that, by an express law, none of servile condition was permitted to undertake it (Cujae. Observ. lib. xvii. cap. 57. Pliny's Nat. Hist. lib. xxxix. cap. 1. There are some passages of scripture too which seem to prove, that formerly, among the Hebrews as well as Greeks, physicians were rated and practised physic, and that it was thought an accomplishment not even beneath a prince (Isa. iii. 6. 7. Hos. v. 13. Pliny, lib. xcv. cap. 1.)

Ver. 4.

The Lord hath created medicines out of the earth; and he that is wise will not abhor them.

As God has given to medicines their healing qualities, which, applied by a skillful hand, are sovereign remedies for all the diseases of mankind, men have often been found serviceable, a man of wisdom or modesty should not deprecie the benefit of them, nor in sickness decline the use of them. There are two reasons why the ancients made no objection to their use, one is, the art of physic, and to the wise man's dwelling upon the power and virtue of medicine: First, to beget an abhorrence of magic and superstitious remedies or charms, as they are called, some way or other, to his soul. But still it is very evident, though God has forbidden the use of them in his law, ECCLESIASTICUS.

Though prosperous hope may not make sweetness, but to pray unto the Lord, and he will make thee whole. Leave off from sin, and order thine heart aright, and cleave thy heart from all wickedness. One sees from several passages of the prophets and effects of the priests, which Grotius has noticed in the titles of this writer, that all sickness was a punishment for some sin committed. And indeed our common experience of the unavoidable necessity of disease, to which the whole species is condemned, and our passage to it by an infinity of accidents and diseases, is the consequence of the sin of our first parents; but the ancient Jews had, as a hereditary fate, that every event that happened to us was a chastisement sent from God, for some particular fault or crime; hence that question of the disciples, "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" (John ix. 2.) As it was a received opinion therefore that sin was the occasion of sickness, the wise man here well advises to leave off from sin, to avoid the punishment of it, and to be in such a frame as to be putting hopes of recovery, and not to regard ourselves, what sin or delitement has probably drawn down such affliction upon us; should humble ourselves under the hand of an avenging God, and acknowledge, that we should be visited with sickness, or that every sickness not as a severe judge who would condemn us, but as a merciful father who would reclaim us.

Ver. 11. Give a sweet savor, and a memorial of fine flour, when thou pourest out thy oblation for thee, and offer a sacrifice for thine heart's desire. We are not to take the word memorial in the sense of a dead man, according to the margin. Grotius reads om slabem, or oblation. Badwell and some others make the sense be, Give thy oblation and thy offerings to God, as not being yourself the original proprietor of them; but having received them at first from him, return them to him by way of acknowledgment. But this sense seems too general, and is not believed, besides this hereditary fate, that every event that happened to us was a chastisement sent from God, for some particular fault or crime; hence that question of the disciples, "Master, who did sin, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" (John ix. 2.) As it was a received opinion therefore that sin was the occasion of sickness, the wise man here well advises to leave off from sin, to avoid the punishment of it, and to be in such a frame as to be putting hopes of recovery, and not to regard ourselves, what sin or delitement has probably drawn down such affliction upon us; should humble ourselves under the hand of an avenging God, and acknowledge, that we should be visited with sickness, or that every sickness not as a severe judge who would condemn us, but as a merciful father who would reclaim us.

Ver. 12. Then give place to the physician, for the Lord hath appointed him. One sees here the same advice given for the punishment of sin, and is a merciful call to reformation and amendment, so nothing can more contribute to the removal of the affliction, than to take away the cause of it: to pray therefore unto God in time of sickness, and make heavy and sincere resolutions against sin, is the way to regain his favour, and the most probable means to qualify the patient, through the blessing of God, to receive benefit from the skilful applications of the physician. We are not here advised first to send for the physician, and when we despair of his help and are breathing our last, then to send for the priest, as some have thought; but to a physician useless; but first to make our peace with God by the grovethly offices of the priest, and then give place to the physician. Which method his Saviour has also taught us by his precious words, "If thou believest on me, thou shalt see the heavenly visions, first healed the soul of sin before he removed the bodily infirmities (Matt. ix. 2), teaching us, that sin is the occasion of sickness, and that the cure and removal thereof is the only thing to be expected; and therefore it is not to be tampered with, unless, when speaking of God, Ps. ciii. 3, he says, ‘Who forgiveth all thy sins, and healeth all thine infirmities.’ This is the reason he has added this passage (Decretal. lib. v. Tit. 38. cap. 13). By this present decree doctors (priests) are strictly charged and command all physicians, that, when they shall be called to sick persons, they first of all admonish, and persuade them to send for the priest; that they may, in this provision hath been made for the spiritual health of the soul, the may more hopefully proceed to the use of corporeal medicines: for when the cause is taken away, the effect may be expected the sooner to follow."

Let him not go from thence but hasten to the aid of his need of him. Ver. 13. There is a time when in their hands there is good success. Grotius points the Greek thus, ει γαρ αυτων ηθηκε, ‘If for them it was not good success, but open success, ευπραινης, not rapius, as the common editions have (see Prov. xvii. 15). Though medicines are uncertain in their operation, and do not always reach the case, the wisdom and cure, of the hands of God, who can take us out of the world when and in what manner he pleases, notwithstanding any previous and successful application of medicines. Give the hands of God, yet are not these reasons sufficient to make us reject the use and application of medicines, which God himself has created out of the earth, to be used with thanksgiving, and was appointed as the ordinary and stead means to restore health, under the direction and in the hands of an able physician.

Ver. 14. For they also shall pray unto the Lord, that he would prosper that, which they give for ease and remedy to prolong life. A good physician will not depend only upon the greatness of his skill, the secrets of his art, and the efficacy of his medicines, but will occasionally invoke the assist to his help; he will live in a constant sense of his own dependence upon God, and recommend himself and others to his favour and protection. There is some difficulty in this verse, for the intent upon doing good may be considered as a guardian angel to all around him. The Vulgate which renders, χαιρετω σωτερι, proper conversationem aliquam (see Acts xxvi. 4), is not fit for this place. But if we take a physician to be a skilful physician, who is himself also a good man, sooner than of any other, as he aims chiefly to please God, both by his own conduct and his endeavers to lessen or remove the evil. And in this case, the prayer of the physician may be the means of the success, which might not otherwise attend the same; and may serve to remind the physician, that God would crown their labours, and bless the engraved word, with all joy and comfort in believing, and with the power of an endless life, and particularly in the times of public calamity, or epidemical sickness, should, by the powerful ministry of prayers and holy intercessions, stand between the dead and the living, and stop the progress of the destroying power."

Ver. 15. If that sinwth before his mother, let him fall into the hand of the physician. The intention of the author here is not to undervalue physicians, or cast a reflection upon them, but to direct us to him, even when it is not in the least of cure, to fall into their hands, of whom such honourable mention has been made in the preceding verses; but to intone, that God will bring upon the same all the effects of sickness and weakness, that are capable of being made use of for the advancement of religion: in other words, to make necessary the help of a physician, on purpose to convince him of his weakness and folly. The common reading of this portion is, ‘He who is sinning before his mother, let him fall upon the hand of the physician.’ The Vulgate has it, Qui delinquit coram eui facit eum, incidet in manus medicus; and the Syriac, Quc peccat coram Deo, traditur in manus medicus. Which meaneth, that he is made liable to all the effects of sin, and that without the help of art, or even with it, he shall with difficulty recover, and shall be given over unto Provenunt; requo tu. Ams, neca dexter servat. (Ex. lxi.) He acknowledges, that it was the interposition of a divine power that had healed the eper, in which all his application and skill had been fruitless. Nor is this the only place where Virgil joins these two qualifications together. The skill and remedies of medicine are not gods for anything, where he mentions Hippocrates as brought to life by the favour of Diana, and the skill of Asclepius.--Praemio revocavit herbis, et amore vindicta.--As it is this skillful man, and not the wise man here and in the context points out the spiritual physicians of the soul, who, sensible of its many infirmities and diseases, should apply often to the throne of grace in behalf of others, that they may be healed and saved, that God would crown their labours, and bless the engraved word, with all joy and comfort in believing, and with the power of an endless life, and particularly in the times of public calamity, or epidemical sickness, should, by the powerful ministry of prayers and holy intercessions, stand between the dead and the living, and stop the progress of the destroying power.

dearth and perdition, if he should show no signs of contrition upon his bed of languishing. One sees by this passage, that this author thought that sickness was a punishment sent by God, and that he did not consider it as a charge to the impotent man, "Sin no more, lest a worse thing come unto thee." (John v. 11.)

Ver. 19. "Let us each sum up over the dead, and begin to lament, as if thou hadst suffered great harm thyself: and then cover his body according to the custom, and neglect not his burial." Thereby the funereal and religious conduct of the body is indicated, and the relations deceased; these are the only instances in which we can give proofs of our tenderness and respect for them. Besides the ordinary tribute of tears, the wise man probably mourned for the dead himself, with a due commiseration of the passage of his soul in the grave. This would be the crisis of the relation of the dead and of the wrapping the dead body in linen, according to the custom of the Jewish and other nations (John xi. 44. xix. 40; καθ' τον συναξαντα, secondum dedicatam eius, as Bossuet renders, which I should prefer, but that it follows in the next verse. Our translators omit αὖθις; it would probably be better rendered, According to his right, or the rule and custom in his case. For, εὐφράζομαι, as Grotius observes here, signifies to be comforted in a particular sense, as εὐλογεῖεισκοίμοι, or εὐλογεῖαι. So καὶ τὸ συναξαντά, 1 Kings xiv. 28; τί οὖν τὸ συναξαντά, 2 Kings xvii. 33, 34, 40; καθ' τον συναξαντα, αὐθεντής, Numb. xxx. 6, 23; καθ' τὸ συναξαντά, 1 Chron. vi. 63. The above verses translate here próto eπεκτενζε; i.e. as is due to him.

Ver. 17. "Weep bitterly, and make great sound, and use lamentation, as he is worthy, and that a lamentation may be seen, and comfort may be given for the heaviness." Though the usual term for mourning was seven days, the rabbins themselves allowed and approved of divers degrees of mourning, according to the degrees of the relation of the person to the deceased, and in the following the sorrow might be somewhat abated. As man is apt to go into extremes, the author on this occasion advises a prudent moderation; he approves not of grief extending itself over a whole generation, and in the following the sorrow might be somewhat abated. As man is apt to go into extremes, the author on this occasion advises a prudent moderation; he approves not of grief extending itself over a whole generation, and the fear to be set upon them; he allows that great mourning should be made for those who were dear to us as friends, or related by the closer ties of blood; and that we should lament more or less for persons, according to their respective merit, lest we give offence by our indifference and insensibility, and should be reproached for want of affection and humanity. But at the same time he sets bounds to our grief, and would not have us inconsolable, or give ourselves up, in the bitterness of our mourning, to excessive sorrow and woe; "if we cannot do the dead no good, and may do us much hurt. He here condemns those who, during the interval of mourning, so passionately indulged grief, as to refuse all conversation, and whose advice concerning the regulating of mourning was so insensible, that he could say, "We can do the dead no good, and may do us much harm."

Ver. 20. "In affliction also sorrow remaineth: and the life of the poor is the curse of the heart." Some copies have πάσας τις οὐκείς, that "grief passeth away" weareth or exhaust by degrees; but the reading which our translators follow seems preferable, —that in affliction, ἐν ὀλίγης, or any grief whatsoever, "our losses of life, that grief passeth away, grief sits heavy, and is with difficulty removed. The Vulgate seems to have followed a copy which had σοφίαν, obedientia; —i.e. the prudent, obedient, or religious soul, which often induces the necessitous person rashly to curse his fate and condition. The other reading ἐν ὀλίγης, or ἐν ἀνείματι, vita pauperis pocula, has the same meaning. He neither agreeable to the context, nor confirmed by experience.

Ver. 20. "Take no heaviness to heart; drive it away, and remember the last end. Forget it not, for there is no time to remember it; and if thou remember it, —i.e. Remember death, which, by overmuch grief, that is, the most and most useful of his time, and generally produce better works than the more public and active life of others. This may also be considered in a religious view. ver. 22. The redeemer word, or rather, εἰμι, viz. He who attends to the varying of imagery, whose assiduity, cujus perseverantia, is αὐθεντικός, or independent, and is not dependent, as in modern works, called ιδιωτικὴ τοῦτος, variægenia scientia, Job xxxviii. 36. And if the rendering be, as it ought without the Hebraism, et ille, cujus assiduitas variat picturam, the sense would be, a man of genius, who varies his images, and just, without seeking out for a particular verb to answer the nomine, τοῦτος, et ille, and S. genii splendidissimae, and the sense of the whole is to the following effect; as the countryman above mentioned doing his mind to something like manner every artist, who labours night and day, superintends his. Thus the cutters of seals, and he who attends to the imagery, is ever mindful to the finishing the similitude, and who watches for the perfecting his work; thus the smith sitting, &c. &c.

Ver. 23. The smith also sitting by the anvil, and considering, his hammer in hand, and his tools at hand, as in his everyday work, which must occasion them more labour and trouble. Thus Homer describes Vulcan all in a sweat, and on leaving off his work, laying aside his bellows, and shutting up his tools no descensus, or swoon but what is forced. Some copies have esent, movet aereus, which is too weak and soft, as κέρας may seem too strong and violent, and the alteration too great. One would think, from the English version, that Homer had to carry the iron to the anvil, which seems a strange way; but it may be possible that some kind of iron, or wrought iron, is carried to the smith's anvil to be worked upon, and the copy used by some ancient ones had some other word besides; for, according to some old Latin versions, the King's Bible, 1541, and that of Coverdale, he carry, have, 3957, καταβαίνειν, καταβαίνειν. Being of the destination, as in the common, ideas, καταβαίνειν, if there is any authority for its being used actively) is not to be despised, as being expressive of a thinning kind of sound, καταβαίνειν (Od. r. 4/3) which, though applied to the sound of a c adron, does not always mean a hollow sound. Dr. Grabe condemns the present reading καταβαίνειν, and bath given a very ingenious emendation of it, Prot. cap. i. sec. 6, with a just censure of Beza's καταβαίνειν, which indeed has nothing to recommend it. But I think he treats Grotius's interpretation of the word, as it now stands, which is not an unnatural one, viz. δικαίωσεν, too contemptuously; for one may suppose such a man's ears reecedated with what he gets money by, though it be not harmonious. He thinks κατάβαλλε as the better reading, as I would not understand in the sense of radi- οτο γράφει, as the noise, being familiar to the smith, cannot be thought ungrateful or unpleasant to him, but in its other sense of τιλτόν, or prætium movem, and is more expressive of the heavy sound of hammering, which occurs in ver. 35. τιλτόν, poliptare, from whence are derived the Hebrew of cymbelium and tinninubulum. There is something musical thought to be in the sounds of the hammer and anvils, and anvils and hammers, and hearing a number of them together, as if made by philosophers, that he got his first ideas of the several fixed ones of music from the different sounds expressed by the smith's anvil and hammer. So that the meaning here may be, that the sound or reverberation of them clinked or chimes in his ears.
CHAPTER XXXX.

The method of deciding, and the form of reasoning, in the present volume, which is the same as in the former, is such as to make it easy to follow the progress of the argument, and to see at a glance the main points of the discussion.

The general plan of the work is as follows:

1. The nature of the subject.
2. The state of the art.
3. The history of the art.
4. The present state of the art.
5. The future of the art.

The first chapters deal with the nature of the subject, and the second with the state of the art.

Chapter I. The Nature of the Subject.

Chapter II. The State of the Art.

Chapter III. The History of the Art.

Chapter IV. The Present State of the Art.

Chapter V. The Future of the Art.

In the first chapter, the nature of the subject is considered, with a view to showing its practical importance, and its bearing on the welfare of the community.

The second chapter deals with the state of the art, and shows the progress that has been made in the last century, and the improvements that have been introduced in recent times.

The third chapter treats of the history of the art, and gives an account of the different schools, and the great masters, who have contributed to its development.

The fourth chapter describes the present state of the art, and shows the extent to which it has advanced in recent years, and the new methods and processes that have been introduced.

The fifth chapter predicts the future of the art, and shows what may be expected in the way of progress in the coming years.

The work is intended to be a comprehensive treatise on the subject, and is divided into five parts, as above stated.

The first part deals with the nature of the subject, and the second with the state of the art.

The third part treats of the history of the art, and the fourth of the present state of the art.

The fifth part is devoted to the future of the art, and shows what may be expected in the way of progress in the coming years.

ECCLESIASTICUS.

Hebrews in the general were not very curious to inquire into the crimes of the nation; on the contrary, they still retain a dislike and contempt of the learning of strangers; but under the monarchy of the Greeks, and the Macedonian empire in particular, they applied themselves to receive and incorporate in their own the learnings of other nations. The general style of those Jewish authors that wrote after that time, as it appears likewise from the author of the book of Wisdom, and the translators of Job and the Proverbs, the like may be observed of Josephus, and more especially of Philo.

And he occupied in prophecies. i.e. He will be very diligent in his prophecies; and there is no wonder that this writer should press the necessity of studying the prophets, and endeavouring to attain the right sense of them, as both particular persons and whole nations have been governed from the prophecies and the non-attendance to, the voices and predictions of the inspired men of God, and for want of comparing the predictions with the events. To have an insight into, and form some judgment of the recognised meaning, was the chief and principal employment of the holy and great men of old. It was thus Daniel studied the prophecy of Jeremiah, which told the tale of the captivity, and the return from it, and the restoration of Jerusalem, Dan. ix. 2; and before the coming of Christ, the greater part of the prophecies were in such obscurity and darkness, and yet of such deep importance, especially that concerning the great and magnificent promises of the kingdom of the Messiah would be accomplished, that they both called for and deserved the serious application of the most learned men, that they might make a clear understanding about them. The excellence and usefulness of reading the prophets, almost all the fathers acknowledge, who spent much of their time and labour about them, and from thence composed works of commentary for the guidance of their hearers. We cannot have a fuller instance of the surprising effect of studying the prophets, than in Justin Martyr, and he is a very gentle instance, for he was confounded and bewildered in the uncertainty of human philosophy, and after many painful searches, and shifting from sect to sect, like a doubtful and benighted traveler, found no hope of deliverance; and from thence was led into the way of truth, and received that solid instruction and satisfaction which he had in vain sought for from the Peripatetics, Stoics, Pythagoreans, and other philosophers.

Ver. 5. Where seed be parables are, he will also be. He will seek out the secrets of grave sentences, and be conversant in dark parables. To speak, intently, to pronounce apopthegms, to propose enigmas, and to be able to penetrate into the secrets of things; and he would be much in vogue among the Hebrews. Under the reign of Solomon, kings and princes, and even queens, as appears from the visit of the queen of Sheba for that purpose, derived great advantage from his knowledge of the arts of difficulty, and receiving ready and ingenious answers, Mechanics, and persons of ordinary education, attempted not such enigmas, either to invent or resolve them (xii. 30. xxxviii. 23. Prov. xvii. 7), they were the province of the learned and more refined. To understand a proverb, and the interpretation; the words of the wise, and their dark sayings, is the description which Solomon himself gives of wisdom. Prov. i. 6. This sort of knowledge was in ancient times the accomplishment as well as entertainment of courts, and thought the proper way, as being the most ineffective, of address to kings. Neither the prophet, and the woman of Tekoa, came each to David with a parable, 2 Sam. xii. 1. xiv. 4. And Jehoshaphat, king of Israel, sent a message, couched in a parable, to Amaziah king of Judah, 2 Chron. xx. 9. And the riddles of two nations were put to them, one nation to the other, upon condition of a forfeiture to be paid by him who could not explain the riddle sent him. This was that σπάσαντες, or "prize of wisdom," between Amasia king of Ed. and Eliphaz the Temanite at Damascus, feast, 1 Ed. iii. There are many such learned questions resolved in Plutarch's Symposias; and Athenæus hath collected the flowers of almost all authors, poets, philosophers, and historians, lib. x., that afford any entertainment this way.

Ver. 4. He shall serve among great men, and appear before princes, and be a great man in the synagogues; for he hath tried the good and the evil among men. Wisdom will gain a man admittance and acceptance at court, and recommend him to the notice and favour of the great. It was said of Daniel, that "he was the quick servant of Nebuchadnezzar;" and it was by the same accomplishments that Ezra and Nehemiah arrived at so high honours, and that Joseph acquired such authority at the court of the Pharaoh of Egypt. A man of knowledge in the study of wisdom, and to improve in the knowledge of arts and sciences, is, to travel; by this a man will gain experience, and make proper observation upon what passes in good and bad. And thus Calmet, Il passera dans les terres des nations étrangères, pour éprouver parmi les hommes le bien et le mal. Homer describes an accomplished person says, that he knew all things both good and bad—σιδήρας ἐχει ἀλογόν, καὶ τινὶ διδομένην Ἀρείαν τι εἰς τινὶ οἴκον (Od. xviii.). Instances of wickedness, in use among the Gentiles, were often foretold in the prophecies; and by some means was brought to the like commission, but serve rather to excite an abhorrence in him of evil, and his knowledge of what is amiss in others teaches him to shun it. Nor are the examples of the great men of old as a preserver of his own good time, and in the manner and proportion he thinks proper; and that God has so blessed him, wisdom shall flow from him like a torrent: he shall perceive his heart enlarged, disposed, and as it were transported, to show forth the praises of God, and to publish his greatness in the most solemn manner. And thus it often happens to his square, in consequence of their prayers, they describe an accomplished person says, that he knew all things both good and bad—σιδήρας ἐχει ἀλογόν, καὶ τινὶ διδομένην Ἀρείαν τι εἰς τινὶ οἴκον (Od. xviii.). more modest in their decisions. It is excellently observed by the lawyer, "The law is everywhere the sabere, quàm cum de Diis agitur. And by Cicero, Timide de potestate Deorum, et paene decusa sunt (De Nat.
Deor.). And the apostle, in admiration of the stupendous wisdom and knowledge of God! how unsearchable are his judgments, and his ways past finding out?" (Rom. xi. 33.)

On the other hand, the author, in his disquisition on the word and plenitude of God's nature, says, ver. 21. "Nunquam quærim in Deo adhibita, sicut in aliis," c. "all things are created for their proper and peculiar uses;" and though we cannot now discover what use there may be of some of the creatures, or good in them, yet time may discover much benefit and excellency which we see not. Later times have found out the profitable use of many creatures whereof former ages were ignorant; and why may not the churches of times to come, in like manner, find a greater service to us, because perhaps their virtues are unknown at us present? Multa venientes aut populus ignotis nobis sequitur (Senec. Nat. Quæst.)

At his commandment the waters stood as a heap, and at the words of his mouth the receptacles of waters. This relates to the passage of the Israelites through the Red Sea, and of the Egyptians, who, on both which occasions the waters collected themselves so as to become a heap, and opened a way for the Hebrews to pass over; afterward they returned to their primitive state and form, and took possession of their former habitation, which includes both the state of the waters in the beginning; at first God created the mass of waters as one immense chaos; afterward he separated them; and when they were parted, he gave mine house a place, a name, better than of sons and daughters; I will give them an everlasting name, that shall not be cut off" (Isa. vi. 4, 5).

Ver. 17. And many say, What is this? Wherefore is that? for at time convenient they shall all be sought out: Was this made, or why in this manner? what good did it do? why should this have been better if this had never been made at all, or had been made otherwise? Such censures, though not devout, would be more pardonable, if employed upon the works of men only; but to charge good creatures on God either with manifest ill, or however with unprofitable-ess, betrays a distrust either of his wisdom or goodness.
If no other answer could be given to such bold inquiries, it might suffice to say,—that in the creation God must be supposed to act by his own divine prerogative, and according to his will and power; but the apostle assures us far from this; this God, who is in the way of his own will makes abroad, Eph. i. 11, not merely by his own will, but "according to the counsel of his own will." They who search for hidden knowledge out of a spirit of contradiction, or from a cavilling spirit; who are always at variance, in the creation, are like the men of Beth-shemeth, 1 Sam. vi. 19. who, looking into the ark of God unwarrantably, will be more like to meet with their own destruction, than to find out the truth. Job, well observes of God, "He giveth not account of any of his matters, wherefore dost thou strive against him?" (xxxix. 10.) Why do we presume to dispIBE with God, or call him to account for his actions, who will not reveal to us all the secrets of creation and providence; neither, indeed, would our present capacities admit of such a discovery; tsuch knowledge is too wondrous for us, we cannot attain unto it." Excellent, therefore, is the counsel of St. Cyril, Firmam fidein mysterius adhæbentes, nunquam in tam sublimumus rebus illud gnoimo cogentia, et proferetam (Lib. iv. cap. 13, in Joh.). For believers do not believe God, "He giveth not account of any of his matters;", but believe in God's providdelity, Deudra 6pωοτι των παρ ου ους Μενεως (Just. Mar.).
Our author, ver. 16, lays down this thesis, That all the works of the Lord are excellent; and he proves it in the following verses by an enumeration of particular. To stop this capacious disposition was the very end, according to St.
Chrysostom, of God's pronouncing the whole creation complete. The same purpose is comprehended in a gorous curiosity of man, to silence at once all cavils, pro-nomines, upon a particular survey of all his works, that they were very good; that, above all the description of infinite wisdom, favour, shown in his preservation, mercy, or con-sure or find fault with them (Tom. v. De ipsis qui scandal.
&c.). Would men but consider the infinite distance between their imperfect state, and the state of the highest unerring wisdom and their notorious ignorance, they would times the divine purposes and decrees, serve to display his justice and almighty power. And therefore the conclusion standeth sure, that God is ever to be adored by men and angels, for the numberless instances of his goodness; and that the more he is admired, the more he will wean the wise minds from all the wonders which we do perceive and know in his works, and even for those which we do not know or understand; for our life being of so short a continuance, and present to any one person nothing but a small space of time. Now the universal nature of the world, it is impossible to comprehend the order and the design of that eternal wisdom which sees through all times and all places. And, therefore, the laws of God, the general and special events of this life, as by so many links fastened together, forms that long chain of providence which extends through the succession of all ages.

CHAP. XL.

Ver. 1. Great trust is creared for every man, and a heavy yoke is upon Adam, from the day that they go out of their mother's womb, till the day that they return to the mother of all things. Three particulars are here mentioned of the heavy yoke said to be laid on all the sons of Adam. 1. Its continuance, that it lasts for the term of life, from the day of nativity to that of death. 2. That this yoke is a composition of miseries, made up of care, labour, toil, and the like. 3. That this composition of miseries is an eternal and continual dread of death, which damps all enjoyments. 3. That it is equally the lot of all men; persons of all conditions, ages, and sexes, gross alike under it. St. Austin has expressed it thus: "Parvulos eum et alios, et parvulos, et alios, solet destruere prius quam maculai patiantur, in quibus vanitas, crux, error, errantium crecentes; deinde jam grandes, etiam Deo serientes, tentantur error et decipiantur, tentantur non laborem, etiam, etiam Deum errabant, etiam Deum excolant; et quis expetit omnes festinatam quibus gravatur jagum super filios Adam? quod jagum non fuisse, nisi delicti originalis meritis persecutionis; sed haec passiones, cum necessariis, et fata, et contingens, et communi parente, et parentem, et filiis et filiis, et filiis filiorum, and so on.

Ver. 2. Their imagination of things to come, and the days of death (troubles) their thoughts; and (cause) fear of heart. All the copies have το τι ουσιαστεως αυτον και ψυχη ουσιαστεως αυτοις, ισημερινα ερωτησεις, μη συνυπολογισεται ἐν αυτοις, and so on. The construction here is peculiar: the first is a compound of the word of the verb 'think', and the last three words are connected with it, and give it a determinate sense, which our translators have attempted to supply. Bossuet and the Tigrine version insert διό, εγώ εἰμι οἱ καρδίαι σας. 1. Life is made miserable by their surmises and fears, through the thoughts and apprehension of the day of their death. Not much unlike that, Luke xxi. 26, διὰ τοῦτο λέγειν ἵνα κακοὶ αἵττηναι, τιμάσαι δὲ ἡμεῖς τὸν θεόν, τιμάσας δὲ τὸν θεόν; etc. 2. But, as a general rule, it is true that the two are connected, and that the fear of the judgment answers to the life of care, labour, and sorrow, which precedes it. The Tigrine version renders not improperly, ingenium cujusque variis factis. Massenius of Port-Royal observes here, that the author, by using men's suffering, while he indicates the causes of their sufferings, puts out the original of the sin, the cause of all their evils and misfortunes. He does not only mention the outward plagues with which it pleases God to visit men, and to which the frail condition of man makes them, but dwells chiefly upon the wounds of the spirit, the of his home and rest, and all that he can have of future refreshment, is to be found in this state of the mind, and to be conformed to it. Therefore Bossuet, and afterward he is in his sleep, as in a day of keeping watch, troubled in the vision of his heart, as if he were escaped out of a bottle.

But this is only to show that the exercise of a virtuous mind has the same influence on the body as the exercise of the body has on the mind. Hence, says Bossuet, where

Ver. 5. (Such things happen) unto all flesh, both man and beast, and that is so often more upon sinners: That men and all animals are subject to the fall and the destruction of death, and that fear, anger, revenge, jealousy, and uneasiness, is agreed on all hands; how far beasts are influenced by some of them is a question, especially if we deny them the use of reason and reflection; but, as we have seen, they have the same passions which arise from reflex actions, from reasoning on what is past, or what is future? They are manifestly afraid of death, or enraged at each other, trepitude, and give evident tokens of jealousy, and are not without symptoms of uneasiness, and yet have no claim or pretence to reason; what they do is ascribed to instinct and mere natural inclination.

Ver. 6. The earth is no more inhabited for evermore. Vulgate; i. e. at his fear which had no foundation.

Ver. 5. (Such things happen) unto all flesh, both man and beast, and that is so often more upon sinners: That men and all animals are subject to the fall and the destruction of death, and that fear, anger, revenge, jealousy, and uneasiness, is agreed on all hands; how far beasts are influenced by some of them is a question, especially if we deny them the use of reason and reflection; but, as we have seen, they have the same passions which arise from reflex actions, from reasoning on what is past, or what is future? riety, which delights to do good to others at its own expense. It calls for the highest respect. He who does this is a treasure, i.e. that he has competency of fortune left him, or, as Calmet further explains it, who comes suddenly to be rich without any fatigue to himself or injustice to others, is happier than a man that has had a fortune from the beginning of his own getting. Bossuet thinks all these senses low, and, by a treasure, to which the preference is here given, he understands the regard of fortune, the respect of which, Prov. vi. 22, 23, 28, is wisdom. Wisd. vii. 14, as Junius does by it as mercifulness, mentioned in the former verse. The oriental versions give still a different but agreeable sense: That laborious profit honesty and a useful garment are more self charitable by repeated acts of kindness, shall enrich himself thereby, shall be as one thatfindeth a treasure.

Ver. 19. Children and the building of a city continue a multitude, and a prudent wife is a crown to him both i.e. Festerity called by the name of their ancestors, or by the parents that of their founder, as the Perea Romani, &c. and cities called by the names of their conquerors, or first establishing of Alexander, Seleucus, Antiochus, compose the glory of such to late generations; but a woman of great accomplishments, and who in the conical state rather than in others, as in other parts of her character, is evident in her way: "her husband is known in the gates, when he sitteth among the elders of the land!" (Prov. xxiv.): such were Esther, Judith, Deborah, Joel, Artemisia, Zeno- bob, &c. Israel is a diamond which the glory of the most comfort of their husbands. The wise man's meaning here, says Calmet, is not that a blameless wife is more capable of immortalizing her spouse than a series of descendants founded on one that is not found in at all, but that she is a blessing preferable to either. In the following verse he gives wisdom the preference (which in the septuagint books is described as a lovely and beautiful female) to a ten thousand horses, as is seen does, which gives more pleasure to the soul, than wine and music at an entertainment to the senses. The pleasures of the under- standing are more agreeable to the body than all the former we approach to and resemble the Deity; by the latter, especially the abuse of them, we degenerate into and act like the beasts. St. Austin has the like sentiment: Delicacy, says he, de lumina sapienti; non inventur voluptas cui possit aliqut ex parte comparari (Serm. 139).

Ver. 22. Thine eye delighteth favour and beauty, but more than both are a green. Xicov eov eolov. For some copies omit es. The eye is pleased in beholding artificial symmetry and proportion (for so I would render dovos, rather than favour, according to the common accentuation of it), whether of building, statues, pictures, &c., but more so in contemplating the beauty nature even in minute things, whose colour and simplicity it is beyond the power of art to produce. Beautiful is the genus ornamentum in corn, a blade of grass, or the lilies of the field, of which wisdom itself pronounced, that even Solomon in all his glory was not so beautifully arrayed (Luke xii. 27). As Bossuet observes, there is a certain metaphorical significance in a mean corn, a blade of grass, which means that the eye is most delighted with what is green, as it refreshes the sight, and assists its weakness, according to Pliny's observation on this colour. Nullius colors specusus est incarnandi: ide herbos viridem, fromodes avdole spectamus (lib. xxxvii. cap. 1). In this Grotius acquiesces. Bossuet makes the reason of the preference to be, that the green leaves of trees, &c. are successively renewing, whereas the perfection of art is impaired by time. Junius thinks that corn was particularly instanced in, because it contains stile delei, what is serviceable to the necessities of life, as well as agreeable in outward appearance, and the affectionate sapienti; non inventur voluptas cui possit aliqut ex parte comparari (Serm. 139).

Ver. 23. My son, be not a beggar's life; for better is it to die than to beg.] The author here speaks of begging, according to the notion which the Jews had of it, by whom it was regarded as a sign of the chagrin of God for having given to him. And indeed God does threaten the extremity of want to the transgressors of his commandments. Nor could the Psalmist have been more to the purpose in using such a metaphor, as he himself, when he says, "Let their children be vagabonds, and beg their bread; let them seek it also out of desolate places" (Ps. cx. 9). When a state of poverty is derived from discom- mencement, it is to the benefit of the greater. But under such poverty as men have brought upon themselves by idleness, or evil conduct, than which death is more eligible. The scripture throughout expresses an abhorrence of idleness, and a regard to the merit of industry, as the best kind of life, which proceeds generally from laziness. We may understand our author here, as if one who followed this trade was not worthy or fit to live; according to that of St. Paul, "If any will not labour, neither let him eat," 2 Thes. iii. 10, for every one should understand, and acknowledge, that he ought to work in the manner and way that he is most capable of, and that it is the lot and portion which God has imposed upon all mankind since the entrance of sin, and the life of the world, that the labour of his own hands (Gen. iii. 19), or of wisdom, Wisd. vii. 14, as Junius does by it as mercifulness, mentioned in the former verse. The oriental versions give still a different but agreeable sense: That laborious profit honesty and a useful garment are more self charitable by repeated acts of kindness, shall enrich himself thereby, shall be as one that findeth a treasure.

Ver. 20. The life of him that dependeth on another man's table is not to be counted for a life; for he pollutes him- self with other men's meat: but a wise man well nurtured will beware thereof. "Any B. he is the builder, B. is the builder, he builds on the blood of others. As Deino is here used in the sense of Deino, as the Syracus and our version rightly take it, so Deino is in scripture a beggar who is "impudently, unwor- tagnate," and will take no denial, and is here used in its proper and original sense. It is not want merely, but a bold and clamorous expression of it, which is here condemned. The next step is, not only to be a beggar, but to make a mere trade of it, and will not resolve nor be persuaded to work, to get his living, and ease his necessity. This experience abundantly confirms in all those vagrants and idlers who would have the bountifulness of others, and asperations and demands of the base of life, however entered by good offers, or threatened with hard usage. Nay, will sometimes even threaten others themselves, if not relieved at the time, or in the manner they expect. They love better to live in shameful laborious idleness, though exposed to a thousand inconveniences and wants, than to alter their way of life, and gain a livelihood by honest means and labour. Plato, in the ordering of his republic, expressly enjoins the magistrates to drive them out of all towns, that the country might be altogether free from such cattle (lib. xi. De Leg.). Grotius understands by. he who is most voracious and greediness, and Bossuet by the extremity of hunger. This metaphor is not unusual in the poets. Thus Ovid in his fine description of famines, or hunger, Furit arbor edendi, Perque avidis faucibus. Immensusque visceras regnat.

Utique rapax iride non unquam alimenfa recursat. Immurgerante funere crematur, et quo copia major Est data, plura cura.

Metaphor (Metamorph.)

Junius understands it of the curse of God, and the fire of his wrath, that shall consume gluttons; and others exposed it of bodily diseases, which are usually the consequence of intemperance.

CHAP. XL

Ver. 1. 2. O death, how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that lieth at rest in his possessions, unto the man that hath nothing to vex him! . . . O death, acceptable it thy sentence to the needy, and unto him whose strength fail-eth, that is now in the last age, and is vexed with all things.

He is reproached for his suffering at the hands of his enemies, but Deikle, as says he, is considered as a most sovereign evil, as the greatest of misfortunes, by one in flourishing circumstances, and in the bloom of years, and vigour of constitution.

trait of magnanimity and indomitable fortitude and endurance, which they break and dissolve them, the ungrateful prospect gives gloom and uneasiness, and the faster the earthly knot was tied, the greater will be the pain and unwillingness at the separation. And it is a man who appears to be thoughts of being there, when he remembered the happiness, glory, and state he was possessed of on the earth, the quitting his

And indeed that mighty conqueror himself, that so often deplored death in the field, when he was struck with a mortal disease in Babylon, and had death in his view, betrayed an inglorious panic; his palace was filled with priests and diviners, and no superstition, says Plutarch, was so soothing, but he used it to preserve himself. And the exit of this conqueror was by dyingdaily to the world.

Ver. 3. Fear not the sentence of death, remember them that have been before thee, and that came after; for this is the common lot of man: no man is able to escape death, against the pleasure of the most High? There is no inquisition in the grave, whether thou hast lived ten, or a hundred, or a thousand years.] Kiph was to be properly rendered, not the period of time, but the age, with a limited and pleasure; he considers it as the haven of his shattered back, as the final period of all his vexations, and the agreeable passage to a better and more welcome life, and it rigorously estimates the exchange, when it shall happen to be, as it really is to those that die in the Lord, a substantial gain. How much nobler is a contempt of life, proceeding from a higher principle of approach, and a due estimate of the lot of all mankind, and the pernicious and abject condition of the earth and of men. The Lord upon all the descendants of Adam, who received their sentence of mortality in his: and this may be one reason, that though the firstfruits of the world lived long, yet it is noted of those that lived the longest, that at length, they died, to show that this sentence of God is infallible and irreversable, and that he will be found true in whatsoever he decrees. The law of the most High, in this respect, admits of no exception; we are not better than so many others that have gone before us, or those that will follow after us; why should we therefore expect an exemption, or be so alarmed at that not natural change of the body, which never suffer alike, and undergo the same fate with us, should diminish and take off the horror, and the insignicificances, of death, and that it Science? of the fear of death, for us against the danger; as in a battle, where there is only a probability of death, despair drives away all fear, and turns it into bravery and courage. Science has a pertinent observation on the danger. Adam was a very good virtuous man. Stultus est dolere in ejusmodi conditio esse, in qui nemo non est; solutum est, et grande cum universo uini rupi (De Prov. cap. 5). Another motive to reconcile us to death is that we shall not be always desirable; it being always desirable; it may perhaps occasion our sharing in more misfortunes, or only serve to increase the number of those things which the other world has to offer to us, how long, or how little, persons have lived here: none will then curvy or reproach others about the number of years, or the state and condition they lived in upon earth; but the great good which he beheld, which no age or quality can escape, how they behaved themselves here, how their stewardship was managed, and their time improved; how the account was settled, how they were reconciled to him, how they should not be ashamed, how there was nothing that shall be correct, that there shall not be a possibility of altering, changing, or correcting what is past.

Ver. 5. The children of sinners are abominable children, and they are not conversant in the dwelling of the un-godly.] The evil example and bad principles of parents have an influence upon the conduct and sentiments of their children; a proverbial expression taken, perhaps, to the next generation, the son of a wicked father is generally more abandoned and corrupt.
The last clause is but indifferently rendered; the sense according to the Greek is, that the children of sinners become so vicious by the evil dispositions, seek out for loose companions like themselves, and are chiefly conversant with the wicked, and in such places of sin as he has spoken to be righteously

Ver. 7. The children will complain of an ungodly father, because they shall be reproached for his sake.] A parent who bestows nothing better upon his children than the sad lot of a spurious birth, and the ignominy and contempt which generally attend it, is to be looked upon rather as an enemy than a father; and he that gives his lawful issue no better inheritance than the poison of a bad example, and makes them the children of wrath by the loose maxims which he instils into them, and his evil communication before them, or, by giving them too much liberty, permits them know evil counsel, and is not more abominate the be not rather a murderer than a father? But such parents as encourage their children in vice or lewdness, that are themselves the seducers and betrayers of their innocence, that parent is not only a murderer, but a much more than such unnatural tempests very few.
We read
with astonishment of those merciless parents that offered with their own hands soul destined of help in sacrifice to Moloch (Wisd. vi. 8); and are as much to impute to their children into impure or Bacchanalian rites less wicked and barbarous? Will not such unhappy ones rise in judgment against, and cause their parents, at the great tribunal, of cruelty, and inhumanity, and be "loud witnesses of wickedness against them in the day of their trial?" (Wisd. iv. 6.)

Ver. 8, 9. Wee be unto you, ungodly mens., for if ye increase, it is the judgment of your own peace, when ye shall be born to a curse: and if ye die, a curse shall be your portion.] The wise man here addresses himself to the wicked, whose birth at first it was thought a curse, so their death will end with one. It had been better for per-tons with such evil dispositions never to have been born, to than be born and live in continual sin, and be eternally miserable. Was it not to be wished that such men as Cain, Jerobamon, Antiochus Epiphanes, Judas, Simon Ma-gus, Maximius, &c. and other wicked and notorious sin-ers, had never seen light? The author of the Book of the Wisdom of Solomon, and the Catholic Church, speak of,

ECCLESIASTICS.

... deed to be a better rending than that of our version, and makes the whole clearer and more consistent; viz. That it is neither good to avoid all shame, because there is a shame which is a glory and grace, nor is shame to be approved of in every opinion, or every cause of shame, but there is a faulty and a criminal shame. This is confirmed by what follows in this and the next chapter, where the wise man instancesthere of instances, which shows when and where things of which we ought or ought not to bear witness, in order to observe, that in most of the following passages takes the sense in which our hath been used.

Ver. 17. Be ashamed of whoredom before father and mother: and of a lie before a prince and a mighty man. (28 i. 36.) This is here used in the sense of coram, denoting the person before whom the offense is committed (see 1 John ii. 23), and so answers to και among the Hebrews, & sunt, in conspectu, as καὶ, which followeth to stand in the same sense. Some Latin copies have preter, i.e. upon account of the particular dignity of such persons. As fornication or any indecent act or word in the presence of parents, or in such an open manner, or place as may come to the knowledge of their persons and office are sacred, they have a right not to be imposed upon by any falsehood. What Terence says of the same thing may include also civil one's; Qui men- tiri non fallere naturam et moraes, et moralites sunt. Here is a great hiatus in the various versions; scarce one of the particulars from this place to ver. 20. is found in any notice of which, according to Jansenius, are no less than fifty-six different senses of the same word, very different from each other. Some are crimes, others only faults, more or less considerable, according to the judgment of the others, which are rather instances of inadvertence and inconstancy than sins, properly speaking, against God.

Ver. 18. Of an offence before a judge and ruler: of iniquity and corruption, and profaneness. These are there found also in verse 17. Here open some misbehaviour or crime before persons in office, whose authority and dignity, as they demand a respect, so also are the visible and avowed, and they are sure to punish what gives any offence in their presence, or, in particular, had immediate example of such as seem to disrepect and slight them. Crimes done covertly, not being known, have often the good fortune to escape punishment; but such as are done perhaps in the court of justice, or in the very verse of it, in a bold and daring manner, or contemptuous and profane words spoken in the hearing of the public magis- trate, be sure to be punished, as an insult deserves. By σωφρονεῖος some understand the great Sanchelinir, and by διευθυντα, others. Think any public inquiry against the good of the state. In this chapter, there may be included evil counsels and designs, threats, conspiracies, and attempts upon the laws, privileges, and liberties of a public nature, as they are jealousy and clamour, and often bring down public punishment. The same have been suspected of a design to infringe them. History abounds with examples of impeachments and proscriptions of bad princes, and, in those times, people have often been so exasperated against the supposed enemies of their country, as to assassinate, stone, or otherwise destroy them. One sees by the example of Rehoboam, king of Judah, how dangerous it is to provoke the people by any impatient answer or threatening language (1 Kings xvi. 14). The advice seems nearly the same with that in ver. 7 (see note on it). Admo, which follows, is not to be used even towards a stranger, but the relations which we may be engaged in with them even beyond strict justice. Something is due to our acquaintance, more to our friends, but most to a partner, who may be considered as our own self.

Ver. 19. And of theft in regard of the place where thou sojournest, and in regard of the truth of God and his cov- nant. (28 i. 37.) The advice was, not to be ashamed of a judgment or sentence to justify the ungodly; except heathen means here, as it does sometimes in Greek writers, to condemn or punish, which is not here or in any other place of a judgment or sentence in which any wicked man is intended to be favoured or acquitted; be so far from concurring in a wrong sentence, as to resolve to oppose all wickeddefence and expostulations in which no love, let neither fear nor friendship, nor interest, nor any human regard, stop you in the prosecution of justice, according to the direction, Deut. i. 16, 17.
Ver. 3. Of recomplexing with thy partners and travellers. It is of no vain labour to endeavor to make friends of not being ashamed to entertain companions and fellowtravellers, συμπαρασκευαζοντως, with agreeable discourse, to show civility to those we travel with or meet on the way, to take in their company and engage in that kind of intercourse to make the time and journey pass agreeably. Others, more justly, of doing business uprightly, as an agent for others, or for oneself, when not troubling friends and keeping a fair account. Badwell explains it, which seems the sense of a judicial hearing between an acquaintance and a stranger, and of not being influenced by the flattering or angry words of either party, but equally and impartially between friends and those that are unknown, between domestics and foreigners. That διαπρεπον is sometimes used in the sense of διαλεγει, see Mommaert's History 2d Eges.

Or of the gift of the heritage of friends. Περὶ διαπρεπον εργουλαι διαπρεπον. I do not greatly approve Grotius's exposition. Nor be ashamed in traffic, says Calmet, to be honest, or to give legacies to your acquaintance, though your relations be discontented, and take it amiss. The sense may either be, Take great care not to be partial in the division an inheritance, where your friends are concerned and have an interest. Dans le partage d'un héritage où vos amis sont intéressés, according to Calmet. For where a man has several συμπαρασκευαζοντως, and they have, as they say, a settled practice of dealing, there is a danger if not an influence with him, he may be in great danger of accepting persons, in making a division between them. Or, the advice of Grotius is, when an inheritance is divided, intermeddling or effects, of a deceased friend, according to Calmet, to avoid scandal, and conformably to the tenor of his will, without looking to or regarding the solicitations or talk of interested and looking persons, the dividing the heritage according to the intestate's will, to divide the inheritance impartially among the several heirs. According to this sense διαπρεπον is equivalent to διακερανται.

Ver. 4. Of getting much or little. Look narrowly to the weight of your funds in dealing with strangers, for you have any dealing, and also to the prices which are set upon their goods, and trouble not yourself about those who blame or laugh at your scrupulous exactness in these particulars; or, as the Latin renders it, vel specialer, or vel junctae, prudently and moderately dealing, the Greek literally may mean. Be not ashamed to look out for a good chapman, to treat with them magnificently, to compare and choose among them that offer the best price, and that do not take you for a fool. Be not ashamed to ask the price of things, to examine and cheapen which that you are about to buy, if you cannot depend on the advice of a friend, or the opinion of an expert. If you do complain of a bad commodity, to turn it back, or to insist on an exchange, or an abatement. Most of the versions and commentators understand διαπρεπον in the sense of indifferent, as our translators do; but διακερανται in this text more generally signifies money (see vii, 19, xviii, 1, 2 Macci, 1. 55). According to this acceptation it may mean. Be not ashamed to ask for the money for goods sold and delivered to the merchant; or, when you are about to receive a sum of money, scruple not to look at it, and try and examine it, to tell it, and, if need be, to weigh it. Ver. 5. Scruple to look at it, when you find it in your wife's possession, or in the possession of any other woman (see xi, 1, 3 concerning wife). Ει διακερανται νομίσματα καλον και σκέτον. Σκέτον here signifies a signet or seal, with which things valuable and precious were sealed for their safer beauty and preservation. A woman's possessions, and the use she makes of them, is a cou-cou of her husband's authority. Scruple not to receive the reverence due to old age, and remind them who play upon them, if occasion be, of the fate of those jeering young men (for so it should be rendered) who insulted the old man, Daniel 3. 30. Probably it is a piece of proper advice literally taken; in a spiritual sense it may be understood as a direction, according to Messieurs de Port-Royal, to stand up for and maintain the truth and purity of the character of an elder, or for his advice, for which he is meant by the pious zeal of so many saints and fathers, who have appeared in its defence, when it is attacked by the upstart errors of such, whose proper character is a kind of messianic for mortality.

Ver. 6. The father waketh for the daughter, when no man knoweth; and the care for her taketh away sleep: when she is young, lest she pass away the flower of her age, and our translators, understand the passage in a quite contrary sense.—that God hath not given such a power or enabled his saints to declare all the wonders which he hath done; and, as Almighty Lord, hath established, beyond all power of eloquence and imagination, that perfect system of nature, that they may continue for ever, in the order and manner he has fixed them, to his glory, and the good of the whole system; which seems confirmed by a parallel passage, xviii. 20, "If one would show his works in the hereafter, and how shall he show them to him that is dead, and those are not interred, and how shall he show his works to one that is in the grave?" The Vulgate supplies it, "he that is dead, and those that are not interred;" who shall number the strength of his majesty; and who shall also tell out his mercies!—where the interrogation is equivalent to his knowledge. We may thus see why the Greek in the sense hence so expresses it, οὐκ εὑρέθη τὸ μνήμην ἦν ἐνοχὸν.

Ver. 18. He seeketh out the deep, and the heart, and considereth all his works;—as those signs of the world. Something seems here wanting, and is probably dropped from the text; Grotius supposes it to be ρητωρίζω, which, indeed, the Vulgate has inserted. It may be, We see the wonders of his works even in a spark; i.e. to understand by the "signs of the world," which God is said here to behold! The learned critic above says, that the least discriminable point of time is called εὐχολικόν, and that God knoweth every portion and instant of time which passes in it. According to Calmet, it means, that he sees into and understands all future events, not by inspection of the stars, or the help of any signs natural, but he knoweth perfectly and distinctly those events which have not yet occurred, having any occasion to consult second causes. And how, indeed, should he be ignorant of them, who seeth from everlasting to everlasting, the past, the present, and the future, are present; and the events of all times and ages are known from eternity, and as it were written in his mind? οὐχ οἶδα τὸ ἔχουσθα, "not even one thing,"—for so it should be rendered.

Ver. 22, 23. O how desirable are all his works! and that a man may see even to a spark. All these things live and remain for ever for all uses, and they are all obedient. We see the heavens declare God; and how do his works command our wonder, and merit to be extolled and reverenced by all that hear him! for after representing to ourselves, in the best manner we are able, him in the heavens, and in the earth, and in the seas, and in the creatures that are therein; with his knowledge which is so superior, but a spark; so small a part of his works do we see, and so imperfect is our knowledge. Or the sense may be, that he doth provide for all the things which he has appointed them;—All things says a very judicious writer, since the heavens doth not only declare the work of God, but the thing it is, he doth provide that which is to be done;—and how do his works command our wonder; and merit to be extolled and reverenced by all that hear him! for after representing to ourselves, in the best manner we are able, him in the heavens, and in the earth, and in the seas, and in the creatures that are therein; with his knowledge which is so superior, but a spark; so small a part of his works do we see, and so imperfect is our knowledge.

Ver. 24. All things are double one against another: and he hath made nothing imperfect. Each thing has its contrary in nature, and the one is opposed to the other, night to day, life to death, creation to destruction, &c. Many of the ancient philosophers maintained the like contrariety of qualities in nature; they thought the universe subsisted by a just temperature of these opposites and extremes, none of which predominated over the other, though there was a mutual antipathy between them. Ovid, speaking of the creation of the world, says, That God by his wisdom knew how to reconcile this opposition, and to keep things in a fixed and permanent state, notwithstanding this continual displacement (Metaphor. B. 1, 1), and so we find it; even this diversity, instead of disturbing the order of the universe by any confusion, is, like to that of different voices in an excellent concert of music, accompanied with various instruments and others, so, by giving variety, innocence, wonderful in such a variety of bodies, whose harmony, during such a revolution of numberless ages, composes a hymn to the glory of the great Creator (see note on xxxiii. 14, 15).

CHAPTER XLIII.

Ver. 1. The pride of the height, the clear firmament, the beauty of his countenance, and the glory of his dominion, doth think that he begins wrong, as we cannot account for the construction of the Greek, if we do not refer γυμνίζεται, στερεύεται, and εὖροι to be in the preceding verse of the last chapter, and put them in apposition to εὐρωπίζεται immediately foregoing to the following sense: Who can be satisfied with contemplating his glory; viz. the immensity of height, the vast expanse of clearness, sublimis cantentis, as Ennus well expresses it, the general face of heaven, and heaven's expanse; and a pious, glorious voice? The obscurity here seems to arise from a string of Hebraisms, for which we have a parallel place, Ps. xxix. 2, 3, where σου χάρας "beauty of hosts;" means "beautiful holy place," ἔλαυνεν "God of glory;" magna "pious voice in might and in glory," means "in mighty and glorious voice." So the words here rendered by γυμνίζεται, στερεύεται, might signify a most exalted altitude, στερεύω, καθορισθῆναι, a high plane, and high stage, and both these farther represented, as being or exhibiting ὅπως ἐρημικόν, "the face of heaven," which is εἶναι ἔν οὐρανῷ ἔλαυνεν, "a glorious sight," or "view of his glory," which answers in nature to what is said of his "glory, which filleth the heavens," as which is called by him, ἐν οὐρανῷ ἔλαυνεν ἐκείνος ὁ Κύριος (Ezek. 1:26), I cannot here conceal from the learned reader an ingenious conjecture, which aims at explaining this by a simple borrowed from art, and supposes the reading possibly might be, ἔν τοίχῳ μετὰ ὑπερβάλειν ἔλαυνεν; i.e. That the face of the heavens to appearance is as one entire piece of carved work, one grand sphere, most perfectly turned, and most beautifully graven, the difficulty of whose workmanship is known to increase, according to the bulk of the thing intended to be perfected. If Thudius then would find it difficult to this, he would judge, that however great the bulk of the work, it is not possible, at a certain time, without that one which is called by him, ἐν οὐρανῷ ἔλαυνεν ἐκείνος ὁ Κύριος (Ezek. 1:26), it in the number of the letters with which we can write, the opening of the door, the height, breadth, and depth of the greatest ocean, or of the whole universe; considering the philosophy of those times when our author wrote, the description here given of the face of the heavens, taken in this light, must be considered, far more sublime and magnificent than it is commonly thought to be, as being the exact picture of nature. If to this we add, that τοιοῦτον was a term of art frequent in Egypt, when the Greek language was in use there, it may seem not improbable that the translator of this work, who resided there so long, might borrow it from thence.

Ver. 2. The sun when it appeareth, declaring at his rising a marvellous instrument, the work of the most High. "ὢρατος ὁ θεὸς, ἐποιημένος ἐκ τούτων, ζύγην ἔλαυνεν." The Geneve version here is much clearer. "The sun also, a marvellous instrument, when it appeareth, declareth at his rising a marvellous instrument of the most High, a sun of right sight of the sun (so ἐποιημένος is used ver. 10), in the morning, is an evidence of its being the work of God, and a wonderful instrument in his hand, which the sun itself is a testimony of. Eph. iv. 11. (ver. 3), by his powerful effects upon the earth, as ἵπποι was thought sufficiently expressive without (πλῆθος, ἐποιημένος) to be held out as a symbol of greatness, and (πάντα ὄντων) rather expressive of the variety of its effects; viz. it, some have supposed to have attempted a alteration. And Drusius seems to like ἵπποι, sol in aspectus gloriosus; Groton, τὸ ἱππότα, sol in aspectus ilium gloriosum, i.e. Deum, anubimans, which also fairly expresses the meaning, but does not follow from his reading. It suggests to me, I think, the true τὸ ἱππότα, i.e. The beautiful appearance of the sun proclameth, the Beautiful One; i.e. which is lovely and truly expressive of God's glory and beauty, and Druinus, 4 ερ of their perpetual plain, Her Prout for the very기관이; for the moon is wonderful, and therefore ἑαυτήν ὑπάρχον, which the Roman edition hath, is better than ἑαυτήν ὑπάρχον which the Com- and, Alex. have, which Grocyn abounds to render ἑαυτήν ὑπάρχον; for which, according to her name, increases wonderfully in her change; for in what sense can this be said of a month? but the Hebrew word לַמַּוֶּה agrees with this sense, as being derived probably either from לֶאֶם, to light, or from לֶאֶם, to shine; and therefore, what expresses or alludes to her manner of spreading or drawing out to that time of maturity, should be a very proper and most significant name for her, she being after her full in a kind of dying state, shrinking in, or ceasing to be continually, what she was before; from being immense or ple, she becomes repentent nulla, as Pliny describes her change (L. ii. cap. 9). Horace seems to confirm this, that Нa бе is, when the moon is before the sun, she is as it were swallowed up in his rays; but as soon as she begins to separate from him, alluringly, her light is increased, and her whole disk becomes luminous.

Being an instrument of the armies above, shining in the firmament of heaven, the Hebrew word לַמַּוֶּה seems to understand it, An instrument of the armies or armies of the most High, as if it had been γὰρ ἐκ εἰρήνης. Arabic has, لَخَوُة الخَلْق. Grocyn under- stands it in meaning, the reading סמרח for סמרח, for the representation of the moon, and indeed Polybius makes the knowledge of the moon's rising and changes a very considerable skill, and necessary to a general (L. ix. p. 551, ed. Caspari). The moon should be made principal in the representation of the moon, if, as has been ingeniously conjectured, the reading was, סמרח נchants שָׁלָשׁ, "an orb encasing up and shown in the bones of the moon," as a symbol of the heavenly bodies, a variable and irregular course, as those that dwell in temis have, and as the children of Israel had in their several encampments in the wilderness. And there is the more reason to fix this data of irregular wandering to סמרח, as, in Numb. xxiiii, where the frequent encampments of the children of Israel are described, it occurs above forty times in this sense; and it is remarkable, that Numb. xx. 15 (see, Josh. vi. 19. Pa. iv. 49. as this vague and unsettled abode is called wondering; may not therefore the moon, who is styled נchants שָׁלָשׁ, by Horace (Sat. vi. 110), be called wondering, or a wandering spirit? The Geneva version seems to glance at this sense.

Ver. 2. The beauty of heaven, the glory of the stars, an ornament giving light in the highest place of the Lord;) The first form describes the glory of heaven, and the second, the glory of the stars, the glory of heaven signified in their form, which is distinctly and curately translated; the Greek is, ἐν ἑαυτῇ ἐν ὑπάρξει ὑπάρχον, "from the moon is the sign of the feast," i.e. the feast of the new moon. The first phase or appearance of the moon was of great importance in the Jewish religion; as God com- manded that the new moon should be a festival, and that they should offer up a particular sacrifice to him on that day (Numb. xxviii.). It is no wonder that the Jews took such care to discover this new moon at its very first appearing, and that even the great Samnherd should be concerned in declaring and fixing it, since both the civil and religious parts of the law depended on this; and by fixing and determining it before their better help herein, they had pictures, or similitudes, of the moon in tables, and upon the walls of their upper rooms, from which they judged of the several appearances of it, and its phase, the first form, which is distinctly and curately translated; it should either be a "light that decrease upon her perfection," for so еві signifies here; or, "a light lessenings till it is out," or to its end, and so the Gene- } compasst, the heavens about with a glorious circle, and the hands of the most High have heaved it.) The tradition of antiquity concerning the rainbow is very pretty: for Iris, which is the name of the rainbow, is said to be the daughter of Thetis, the daughter of Oceanus. And very just is this mythology; for how does that glorious phenomenon at once fill our eyes with wonder, and awe, and the curiously observant mind present a correct account of the agreeable variety of its mixed colours, but as it is a natural sign that there will not be much rain after it appeareth; and so is an emblem of hope, and a significant token of the second coming of the Saviour, more properly styled the sacramental sign of the rainbow. Homer seems to have had the same notion, that the rainbow was at the very sign of great things to come. In 1 Thess. iv. 16, and the context, there is such a figurative account of the glowing beams of the glory of God, as the sun in the heavens, that our author here ascribes to the north wind and hurricane the same effect which he does to the thunder itself, whose roar is the passage of the clouds.

Ver. 19. The hoar frost also as salt he poureth on the earth, and being congealed, it lieth on the top of the sharp stones.) This seems not well translated, the marginal reading as salt, and salteth he the earth, is very apt to stir up an idea of abundance of salt such as is used in the East for the preservation of victuals, but it seems more expressive as being compared to ashes, and its likeness to salt seems more expressive as it has something satisfying in it, and its taste is more conspicuous. Calmet says, not every species of salt, but maric, or the salt of the earth, is here meant, to which our Saorit alludes, Matt. v. 12.

Ver. 20. When the cold north wind bloweth, and the water is congealed into ice, it abideth upon every gathering together of water, and clotheth the water as with a breast-plate. It doth not only make the water upon the earth to be as glass and crystal, but makes also the air itself to be so changed and altered, and makes it into frost, that it is as the breast-plate of the Paraclete, and which is called the garment of all meanest beasts.

Ver. 21. (Gen. xiii. 19.) II. 36. Or may not ver. 12 be understood of the outward form of the universe, the whole of which God has included in one vast circumscribed circle, though only one half is discernible by us? Corn. A Lapide, with some other interpreters, take it in this sense.

Ver. 22. (Gen. iv. 25.) He bendeth swiftly the lightnings of his judgment. Through this the treasures are opened: and clouds fly forth as fowls. Fulgura pro judicio suo conicit, i.e. according to his will and appointment. Or, it may meaningly be thus rendered, He sends his lightnings, or the electric spirits, or angry tempests, to his enemy, the enchanter, or, the tormentor; for thus the word is rendered in Deut. xxxii. 39, or it may pertain to the great artillery of heaven, viz. either the winds to raise storms and tempests, or he bringeth forth the clouds from the ends of the world (Ps. xxviii. 4), which pleasurable and comely spectacle together, like a flight of birds, and descend either in a deluge of rain, or fall in snow, in which manner they seem to descend so thick as to resemble not merely birds in their flight, He bendeth swiftly the lightnings of his judgment, but exceedingly, from one country to another: for so the latter part of ver. 17 should be rendered, which relates to the same subject: or, by his power he commands the clouds, and from their substance he forms the water, which he causeth to descend from the top of a rock (see Wisd. v. 32), as ver. 13, should be rendered and understood; and of these the psalmist speaks, when he says, that God 'causeth forth his ice like morsels,' Ps. cxlii. (see De Muis, in loc.)

Ver. 16. At his sight the mountains are shaken.) The Vulgate renders in conspectu ejus, i.e. before him, which conveys aesta grand idea. This seems to exceed that much-admired description of Virgil, Ille fragranti Altho Ano Rhodopen, post alta Cerimona celo deject (Georg. lib. i.), for what must we think of that omnipotent Being, who had been so long silent and concealed most of the works of his providence, that Jupiter wields his thunderbolt, and he beats down a mountain; Jehovah appears only, and at the sight of him the foundations of the mountains are tossed to and fro, trembling and shake like the joints of an afflicted man; but that sublime description of the psalmist exceeds even this, 'The earth shall tremble at the look of him; if he do but touch the mountains, they shall melt, the waves thereof shall roar at an hand; so shall the nations be in great fear at the presence of him, and the earth tremble at the presence of him, and the earth tremble at the appearance of his visage.'

Ver. 17. The noise of the thunder maketh the earth to tremble, the floods thereof to be agitated, the mountains thereof to melt, the nations to be in great fear at the appearance of the Lord, and the earth to melt at the presence of him. The noise of the thunder is no less magnificent and terrible than that of his appearance in the former verse. God sends forth this his glorious voice, and the earth echoes, giving rise to fear and trembling, and the nations fall to their knees, and the pang of one in travail; for so the Greek literally signifies, and the margin well expresses it. We meet something like this in the poet's lofty description of a tempest,

'Ipse gater, mobili nimbarum in pace, cornua (margin.) Con spatialur, ut dismaxa, Turra terruit. (Georg. lib. i.)

Here again the majesty of the scripture language excels, for when the highest thunderers, he does but show his voice, and the earth trembles, and the nations fear. This is an account that our author here ascribes to the north wind and hurricane, the same effect which he does to the thunder itself, whose roar is the passage of the clouds.

Ver. 19. The hoar frost also as salt he poureth on the earth, and being congealed, it lieth on the top of the sharp stones.) This seems not well translated, the marginal reading as salt, and salteth he the earth, is very apt to stir up an idea of abundance of salt such as is used in the East for the preservation of victuals, but it seems more expressive as being compared to ashes, and its likeness to salt seems more expressive as it has something satisfying in it, and its taste is more conspicuous. Ver. 20. When the cold north wind bloweth, and the water is congealed into ice, it abideth upon every gathering together of water, and clotheth the water as with a breast-plate. It doth not only make the water upon the earth to be as glass and crystal, but makes also the air itself to be so changed and altered, and makes it into frost, that it is as the breast-plate of the Paraclete, and which is called the garment of all meanest beasts.

Ver. 21. (Gen. iv. 25.) II. 36. Or may not ver. 12 be understood of the outward form of the universe, the whole of which God has included in one vast circumscribed circle, though only one half is discernible by us? Corn. A Lapide, with some other interpreters, take it in this sense.

Ver. 22. (Gen. iv. 25.) He bendeth swiftly the lightnings of his judgment. Through this the treasures are opened: and clouds fly forth as fowls. Fulgura pro judicio suo conicit, i.e. according to his will and appointment. Or, it may meaningly be thus rendered, He sends his lightnings, or the electric spirits, or angry tempests, to his enemy, the enchanter, or, the tormentor; for thus the word is rendered in Deut. xxxii. 39, or it may pertain to the great artillery of heaven, viz. either the winds to raise storms and tempests, or he bringeth forth the clouds from the ends of the world (Ps. xxviii. 4), which pleasurable and comely spectacle together, like a flight of birds, and descend either in a deluge of rain, or fall in snow, in which manner they seem to descend so thick as to resemble not merely birds in their flight, He bendeth swiftly the lightnings of his judgment, but exceedingly, from one country to another: for so the latter part of ver. 17 should be rendered, which relates to the same subject: or, by his power he commands the clouds, and from their substance he forms the water, which he causeth to descend from the top of a rock (see Wisd. v. 32), as ver. 13, should be rendered and understood; and of these the psalmist speaks, when he says, that God 'causeth forth his ice like morsels,' Ps. cxlii. (see De Muis, in loc.)

Ver. 16. At his sight the mountains are shaken.) The Vulgate renders in conspectu ejus, i.e. before him, which conveys a esta grand idea. This seems to exceed that much-admired description of Virgil, Ille fragranti Altho Ano Rhodopen, post alta Cerimona celo deject (Georg. lib. i.), for what must we think of that omnipotent Being, who had been so long silent and concealed most of the works of his providence, that Jupiter wields his thunderbolt, and he beats down a mountain; Jehovah appears only, and at the sight of him the foundations of the mountains are tossed to and fro, trembling and shake like the joints of an afflicted man; but that sublime description of the psalmist exceeds even this, 'The earth shall tremble at the look of him; if he do but touch the mountains, they shall melt, the waves thereof shall roar at an hand; so shall the nations be in great fear at the presence of him, and the earth tremble at the presence of him, and the earth tremble at the appearance of his visage.'

Ver. 17. The noise of the thunder maketh the earth to tremble, the floods thereof to be agitated, the mountains thereof to melt, the nations to be in great fear at the appearance of the Lord, and the earth to melt at the presence of him. The noise of the thunder is no less magnificent and terrible than that of his appearance in the former verse. God sends forth this his glorious voice, and the earth echoes, giving rise to fear and trembling, and the nations fall to their knees, and the pang of one in travail; for so the Greek literally signifies, and in the water; which notwithstanding the violence of storms and tempests, and the force and impetuosity of the waves, have subsisted numberless ages, and have escaped perishing; and it is being observed with wonder that in some respects have the advantage of the continent, as by their situation they have the opportunity of a freer commerce, and are less subject to hostile attacks, and to be surprised on a sudden by invasions.

Ver. 26. By him the end of them hath prosperous success, and by his word all things consist. The Alexandrian and some other Greek copies have, which Junius follows, οἱ τῶν τινων εὐθανασίαις, i.e. all the pious men, which God directs all things to a good or their proper end; so the Geneva version, For all things are subject to and obey his will. Or, Through him such as to go sea have a good voyage, and all things in the sea have been accomplished with prosperous success. The great waters, which is one meaning of the sea; for the sea is mentioned here; and God, which is the sea's messenger, speaks, by a word, safely; but if tempestuous, in his command all things are shattered, and go to the bottom. Either of the other senses I think preferable.

Ver. 27. He sang a song for to thee, and yet came short: whereas in sum, he is all. His true service is to praise, and yet he cannot praise all. Ver. 11. [With their seed shall continually remain a good inheritance, and their children are within the covenant.] Some copies have but; and so the Vulgate, Cum semine permanent bonum. As applied to the families of Noah, the token or pledge of the covenant, it signifies a right inheritance, they are sons of the covenant, and heirs of the promises made to the fathers, and by virtue thereof have possessed the land of Canaan. The idea of that was twelve tribes possesed by promise, were put in possession to their children, and their seed shall never be extinct, nor their glory be blotted out. It may also be understood in a general sense, that the generation of the righteous shall be blessed, and shall fill the earth, and shall be established in the earth forever. God's covenant; riches and plentifulness shall be in his house, and his seed shall be mighty upon earth, and continue long in glory throughout all ages.

Ver. 16. [Enoch pleased the Lord, and was translated, being an example of repentance to all generations.] When, or to what place he was translated, is not said; but according to the common view of interpreters, he was translated. He was comforted in his state of mortality, with the hopes of a better life, and made him a living testimony of the immortality of souls and bodies. The tradition of Jewish writers is, Enoch had his incision in his side, and he shall come with Elias before the last judgment, to encounter antichrist; and in this sense 2 Pet. iii. 3 is generally understood. Bossuet, accordingly, understands the last judgment to be the last time, to turn the hearts of the disobedient, and to give repentance unto the nations, as the Vulgate has it, or vel profecit, to the generations then in being; for all is neithet written, nor translated into his family in preaching. The account in scripture of Enoch's sinning or repentance, it seems better to understand εκενος τον περιγραφησαν της ανθρωπινης της, to exhort the people therein to repentance, and to give an example, to speedy repentance, to prepare for the approaching judgment, and to resist the power of antichrist.

Ver. 17. [Noah was perfect and righteous in the time when God began to remove the earth.] For that therefore was he left as a remnant unto the earth, when the flood came. He is said to be perfect in his generation (Gen. vi. 9), i.e. with respect to all others of his time, and he was perfect in the sense of comporting himself so as to prove himself the first to the second, in the world, in the account in scripture of Enoch's sinning or repentance, it seems better to understand εκενος τον περιγραφησαν της ανθρωπινης της, to exhort the people therein to repentance, and to give an example, to speedy repentance, to prepare for the approaching judgment, and to resist the power of antichrist. Noah was perfect and righteous, in the time of wrath he was taken in exchange for the world. The words in the parenthesis are not in the Greek. It looks, according to our version, as if Noah was the sufferer, and the rest of the world excused, as was indeed the case with the holy Jesus, who might properly be said to be "taken in exchange for the world," at the death of our Lord Jesus Christ, who was perfect and righteous in the time when he was "taken in exchange." (Ps. lii. 7.)

CHAPTER XLIV.

Ver. 16. Abraham was a great father of many people; in glory was he a third, in riches, a fourth, and in judgment, a fifth, in the house of Abraham was preserved in single persons till Jacob's time; but Abraham then first began to be the father of many nations, when Jacob, being near his end, appointed Esau to follow him, which was afterward twelveth to them, that they should be put to their children, and their seed shall never be extinct, nor their glory be blotted out. It may also be understood in a general sense, that the generation of the righteous shall be blessed, and shall continue long in glory throughout all ages. And this covenant, this is, the covenant; riches and plentifulness shall be in his house, and his seed shall be mighty upon earth, and continue long in glory throughout all ages. Hence is for regard, the father, and the seed of the covenant; and the name the covenant, was, or as it is translated, dier衔ες, and the punch of the promises made to the fathers, and by virtue thereof have possessed the land of Canaan. The idea of that was twelve tribes possessed by promise, were put in possession to their children, and their seed shall never be extinct, nor their glory be blotted out. It may also be understood in a general sense, that the generation of the righteous shall be blessed, and shall continue long in glory throughout all ages.

Ver. 20. [Who kept the law of the most High, and was in covenant with him, and dwelt in the tents of his fathers; and when he was proved, he was found faithful.] Therefore he assured him by an oath, that he would bless the nations in his seed, and multiply him as the dust of the earth. This covenant on God's part was, that he would multiply his seed, and make it great, and give him the land of Canaan from the river of Egypt to the great river of Euphrates, and that the nations should serve him, and be blessed in his seed. And the token or seal of this covenant was the right of circumcision, the mark of which was to be in the flesh of his family and descendants. This distinguished the Hebrews from other nations, and they gloried in this sign, calling other people "the uncircumcised," by way of contempt. Covenants, or alliances, were usually engraved on tables of marble or stone; sometimes public or they were transacted before witnesses, who were to transmit them down to posterity. But with respect to the Jews, God was pleased to set a mark of his covenants to remain for ever, not on brass or stone, but on the body of him with whom the covenant was made, and on those of his descendants; and that no one might be disputed with concerning the covenant, he made a son as a violator of his covenant. It was customary among the eastern nations to mark or stigmaize themselves as a token of their being devoted to some particular deity; this usage was in practice before Abraham's time, or, which seems more probable, was done in imitation of him (see Calmet's Dissert. on Circumcision). Most certain it is, the design in so doing was the same with his; viz. as a solemn and indelible mark of their being dedicated to some particular god. Hence they who were consecrated to Bacchus were distinguished by an ivy-leaf woven in their flesh, and Plutarch, in the two oracles, the Macc. vi. 7, and hence the votaries of the Syrian goddesses were burnt, some on the wrists, and others in the neck (Lucian de Dea Syria). From this procedure of God with his favourite people, this useful reflection may be drawn by our knowledge of the decay or increase, so do likewise his favour, and the testimonies of that favour. At the beginning of the friendship between God and Abraham, he only made him a promise (Gen. iii. 1—3); but after the passage of time, when love was increased between them, this promise became a covenant, when he and his received the token of circumcision (Gen. xvii.). But when he had established, and had confirmed this to this children, by offering up his only son, then God confirmed the covenant by an oath, and swore by himself that he would do what he had promised and what he had promised he would do now; at their first entrance into his family, he gives them many promises, which depend upon conditions, and afterward he renews the covenant with them, and does farther ascertain them of his favour, but still on terms of perseverance; and at length he swears unalterably, when they have given repentance, that the covenant will be given to him, and all take away his merits nor his loving-kindness from them.

Ver. 22. With Isaac did he likewise establish (for Abraham his father's sake) the blessing of all men, and the covenant." Isaac was the heir of his father, and of the blessings promised to him; for God renewed the same promise to Isaac, which he had made before to his father Abraham. By "to his" is meant of him, he adapted the promise made to Abraham, to give him the land of Canaan (Gen. xv. 18). And both these parts of the blessing were given to Isaac for Abraham's sake, and these two promises were inseparably connected together from the beginning, and were continued in some degree to the end (see Bishop Sherlock, dissert. 3). This covenant, or rather God's oath, ὡς ἐν αἰῶναῖς, the LXX. render, with the promises made by successive prophets, was the ground of hope of the blessings expected by the Jews both before and in our favour's time.

Ver. 1 Cor. i. 3. (dispensation.) A very learned writer observes on this passage, that it undoubtedly relates to the settlement and the blessing of the tribes of Jacob, in the forty-eighth and forty-ninth chapters of Genesis; and it shews that he did not endow them with the seven blessings mentioned, as the other tribes, but portions of the blessing which Jacob received from Isaac, Isaac from Abraham, and Abraham immediately from God. And in this view the several blessings must be considered as portions of the blessing, to be considered as an exposition of the original blessing given to Abraham. And indeed Gen. xl., which is commonly called Jacob's blessing of his sons, might as well be called Jacob's appointment of twelve rulers or princes to govern the house of Israel (see Bishop Sherlock, dissert. 3).

CHAP. XLV.

Ver. 1. Moses, beloved of God and men, whose memorial is blessed. The Jews, when they make mention of any of their holy writers, call them thus; as thus, "his memory be blessed" or, "Be his memory blessed to eternity." (see xi. 1 Macc. iii. 7). ὡς τίνα τοι ὡς τῷ ἀληφανίῳ τῆς ἀληφανίας ὑπὲρ τοῦ Λαοῦ τοῦ ἑαυτοῦ. Let his (Judas Macabees') name be blessed for ever. The word is of the same form as. In what sense is the memory of the righteous disposed, or with blessing? The LXX. translation of the Hebrew is thus: "The memory of the righteous is with praises, but the controversy of his name shall be taken, will explain it, for they, instead of the words, "The memory of the righteous is blessed" or "with blessing," have πᾶν γενέσθαι πρὸς ἀνάξ. The memory of the righteous is with praises. To make mention, therefore, of the righteous by way of benediction, or with blessing, is to praise them (see Mede's Works, lib. i. disc. 32). Instances of this sort of blessing, are the anniversaries of deliverance, both in the primitive times; the appointment of festival-days for their memorial; the assembling at their sepulchres, and making panegyric orations in honour of them; and, above all, that ancient and so long continued custom, to commemorate their virtues, to keep alive their memory, and to perpetuate the blessings the patriarchs, prophets, apostles, evangelists, martyrs, and confessors: all which commendations tended to this, that the memory of the righteous might be with blessing.

Ver. 2. For his deeds were magnified, and his memory stood in fear of him. The whole of what is said of Moses in this and the following verses is to be explained by the wonderful appearance of God to him in the bush, and by that singular privilege of seeing the glory of God pass before him (Exod. xxxiii.,) and the revelation which God made of himself to him, as he speaks in the third person; he is spoken of as his parent, and without dark speeches, and the largeness as well as intimacy of the divine communications, without the medium of dreams and visions; and by being called up to his alliance, to be his chosen instead of his father's son, and to inherit the prosperous succession in the peculiar manner, on the top of the mount, at the delivery of the law, and constituted by him legislator to his people, and made the author of the great prophet that should come (Deut. xviii. 15). He was further eminent for his own personal conduct, for his faithfulness and meekness; by the former, acquiring God's people with all his will, delivering to them the law, (see Exod.,) the Lord established Aaron to be his high-priest all his commands; by the latter, gently leading a stubborn and refractory people through a barren wilderness forty years, and conducting them happily out of Egypt; and for his adherence to God and his obedience without money, according to Philo de Preem.; and, lastly, for the power of his miracles, and the number and strange numbers of them, controlling thereby the wonders, i.e. the false miracles and strange events, produced by the heathens. There are the characters by which Moses stands distinguished among the Jewish prophets; and was any that ever before or after stood so high in the estimation of the people.

The prophets that sealed the canon of the Old Testament, and probably Esdras at the head of them, in their additions, which close the book of Deuteronomy, have acknowledged that no other prophet had received as much glory, and was so much beloved, as Moses. The LXX. is, "he who was honoured among the Egyptians: θέατον ἐστίν συμβάλλοντος." (Con. Jul. lib. i.) and Eusebius, that he was honoured among the Egyptians, τοῦτος ἡμῶν καλοτάτους Ἀγαθόν (Comp. Evangel. lib. 12.). Ver. 3. An everlasting covenant made with him, and gave him the priesthood among the people: he beautified him with comely ornaments, and clothed him with a robe of glory. (see 1 Chron.) The Lord established Aaron to be his high-priest in Israel, and appointed the same dignity to his children in succession for a perpetuity, preferring his family above all the rest of the tribe of Levi: he endowed him with greater dignity, for his inheritance which was greater than that of the other tribes, and increased it; and gave him similar honours, as was a due proportion of the sacrifices, which were to be given to him in the tabernacle and temple, besides other privileges and prerogatives among his people. This was God's kindness to the family of Aaron, and his family on their part engaged to serve the Lord faithfully and to observe his laws and statutes, as well those given in common to his people as those which concerned them in particular, and delivered by Moses for the right discharge of their holy office. The principal obligations upon Aaron and his successors are set down ver. 10—17, following. God clothed or blessed, as the margin has it, his high-priest, to procure the greater reverence to him, with all the decorations and ornaments which the priests of other religions were only single or in part; but his high-priest was provided not only with the most elegant, but also the most awful and solemn, so to speak, drapery, in which he might appear before the Lord. A high-priest, even of the most common attire, would probably have been far from that respect and reverence which he should have showed to them when adorned with their priestly robes and glorious garments. A very holy man, as Sirach, who feared God from his heart, and honoured the service that was done unto him, could not mention so much as the garment of the high-priest but in terms of the highest respect and reverence; and infers, that the love which men bear to God should make the least things which are employed in his service amiable, rather than that the over-serving him aught, that he should withdraw men's hearts and affections from the service of God" (Hooker's Eccles. Pol. b. v.). And in another place he adds this farther reason why this writer here, speaking of the way of treating with the children of the priestly stock, urges it as an argument of much dignity and greatness in him; viz. "That the good go-government either of the holy nation, is scarcely an object of external so much, as on those public marks and honourable tokens whereby the estimation that governors in are in made manifest to the eyes of men, and whereof they are the sign, have not only the external honours and marks of their excellency; the former by the ornaments of sovereignty, the latter by garments of judicial authority, though the roles of either do not add to the dignity of their bearers, because they are mere external things, whereas these high-priest's beauteous, whereby God was pleased to reveal himself when he was consulted in difficult and weighty cases, and wherein he was enabled to do fore a sort of oracle; but all differ about the matter of them and the manner of God's giving answer by them: nor does the scripture anywhere acquaint us what this Urim and Thummim was, nor how it was employed, nor to any mention of them, Exod. xxxix, where the making of all Aaron's garments is related. Most writers seem to mistake in confounding them together, and making one thing and the same thing, whereas in reality they were two different oracles. Some think by Urim and Thum-min is meant only that divine power and virtue, given to the high-priest, of having his epiphany, of being present in the breastplate, of containing an oracular answer from God; and that this word signifies, by which the LXX, translate these, or "the light and the truth," as said to be in the ephod, because the high-priest, having his epiphanies on him, is sent from God the light and the truth which he declared to men (see Pocock on Hos. iii. 4, Du Pin's Hist. of the Can. lib. i.).

Whatever they were, God was pleased to signify his will to his people thereby, when they consulted him. But how this was done is uncertain; whether by an extraordinary shining of the stones, or by inspiring the high-priest, as it were, with God's proper mind, or his word, or to what was desired, or by a voice, or some other way unknown. There are some passages of holy writ, wherein when counsel was asked by the priest, having his ephod on, and being in his breastplate, the oracle answer was introduced with "And the Lord said," which seems to confirm the opinion of those who suppose the and answer was given by an audible voice from the midst of his glory (see Judg. i. 1, 2. xx. 12. xxiii. 18. 1 Sam. xiii. 2. 11, 12. 2 Sam. ii. 1).

Ver. 12, 13. He set a crown of gold upon the mitre, wherein was engraven Holiness... Before him there were none such, neither did ever stranger put them on, but only his children and his children's children perpetually.

Upon Aaron's triple crown, which like a sovereign he wore, was an inscription of the sacred name of God, Holli

ey unto the Lord being engraven in the golden plate upon the forehead, to intiate the high and most honourable office of the high priest, and his successors of that superlative degree of holiness, which is the duty and lustre of the sacred function. The ornatments of the high-priest above described, which he wore on the solemn day of expiration, and other great festivals, when he officiated himself in person, were peculiar to him and his successors in that supreme dignity; no other Jew, not even their king nor any priest of an inferior order, presuming to wear them. But there was no such ceremony or practice put them on but in the temple, and that only on very extraordinary and solemn occasions. Herein was intimated, that the sacred office could not be administered by him but by a solemn and peculiar habit, as likewise that none should take this honour to himself but he that is called of God, as was Aaron. Ver. 14. He consecrated him, and anointed him with holy oil; this was appointed unto him by an everlasting covenient, and to his seed, so long as the levies should remain."

Then was the sacred ephod, as a vestment for the high-priest, introduced; which signified, in scripture, signifies to consecrate, as it is here rightly rendered (see Exod. xxviii. 41. Numb. iii. 3. Jude. xvii. 2). It is a periphrasis, expressing the manner of Moses conferring a consecration on Aaron, and the following ceremonies:—1. By clothimg him with a proper and particular garb and habit (Lev. vi. 7. 13. 24). By putting on his breastplate, and giving him the two particular parts of their bodies with it (ver. 23, 24). This consecration and anointing of Aaron, was as a mark or seal of the alliance or covenant which God made with him and his sons, and by which he assured him and his posterity of peace for ever. But the priesthood of Aaron must be considered rather as a type of that of Jesus Christ, in whom what is here said of a perpetual priesthood, was literally fulfilled (Heb. vii. 11—13), but it is not true of the legal priesthood, which isJongrobbed and long since ceased. Ver. 23, 24. The third in glory is Phineas the son of Eleazar, because he had zeal in the fear of the Lord...

Therefore was there a covenant of peace made with him.) The meaning may either be, that Phineas was the third in glory after Moses and Aaron, or, as Bossuet understands it, the third in glory after Moses and Aaron, because he was his grandfather Aaron. God commended him for his great forwardness and heat of zeal, Numb. xxv. 11, for whereas Moses and Aaron were pure in the execution of their office, making God's ordinances prevail upon the earth, sorrowing for their sin and the plague, to whose grief, especially the righteous among them, the bold lewdness of Zimri must greatly add, only Phineas, hitherto most holy and very zealous, should not be any more, but had rather take the place of his high-priest, and offer such religious instructions and77 servant of the priesthood, was always the servant of God. He had no other time to sit still and weep; but rousing himself with a very fervent zeal, made haste to execute immediate judgment upon the daring offenders: as a reward for this instance of justice and courage, a covenant of peace was made with him, which does not contain any promise to him or his family in particular, to make them prosperous, but rather extendeth his honor and glory, and signifying by its meaning, that God made Phinehas the instrument of obtaining pardon for the sin, upon account of which the people were under his displeasure (see Shuckford's Conc.f. vol. iii. p. 88). From hence appears, that this covenant of peace and of the priesthood, which is mentioned in the next sentence, were two distinct things; and so Philo understands it—God says, he crowned his pious, "holy h" periphrasis, which means that the true reading of the Greek is, ἐναπελεχτικοι ἡμών ἐκ τοῦ ἀνθρώπου (Proleg. tom. iii. cap. 4). The Jews, before and about our Saviour's time, had a notion that Phinehas was the priest of God's choosing that everlasting priesthood to him and his posterity; the author of this book seems to be of the same opinion, and so do (De Vir. Illust. xiii. 10. 3), and other writers. It is the book of Maccabees (ii. 54), but in fact there was not such a perpetuity of the possession of the priesthood in this family. The notion of such a promise seems founded on Numb. xxv. 14, which runs thus, "He shall have it and his seed after him, even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood." The term everlasting, here joined to the priesthood, has been generally thought to express a design of a perpetual continuance of it to Phinehas's descendents, without being at any time translated into any other branch of Aaron's family, which is not true, particularly with respect to Eli, who was high-priest in the time of Samuel, for he was of the family of Ithamar, the brother of Eleazar; and therefore the priesthood went out of the hands of the descendents of Phinehas, when he came to Eli, and did not return again to them until after the customary successions, it came to Zadok, in the days of David. The term "everlasting" is rather to be annexed to the priesthood, in its limitation to the family of Aaron, and suggests too much; for though not more than a type of the priesthood of the Messiah, it is not so altogether annexed to them. God made to Phinehas and to his seed after him, not an everlasting grant of the priesthood, as some have thought, but an everlasting covenant of peace, as our version renders it; but rather a grant of the everlasting priesthood; of the priesthood limited to Aaron and his descendants by that appellation (see Shuckford's Con-

c. vol. iii. p. 51.) Ver. 25. According to the covenant made with David son

Ver. 20. After his death he prophesied.] Learned men are of very various opinions respecting the date of Samuel’s appearance, some imagining that it was an evil spirit in his form that appeared unto Saul, and others that it was Samuel himself, who on this occasion, foretells his death. Some suppose it was all a visionary dream, and that his opinion that it was really Samuel is very ancient, the most ancient of any, and seems to have been the persuasion of the Jewish church long before the coming of Christ. Not only the author of the book, but all who have written a hundred years or less of the book Malachi, suppose that it was Samuel himself that appeared in person (he was a constable) upon Saul and the Philistines, and not through a metaphor, or by a figure of speech, or by a particular expression of scripture, and to give the general sentiments of the Jewish church, as any man of that age; but the Greek translators of the Old Testament, who lived not long after that this prophecy was fulfilled, were persuaded that this was a literal, historical prophecy. The ancients, and the Jews, read very expressly, that Samuel the prophet gave the answer to King Saul, when he inquired of the sorcerer, as the Vulgate, R. V. and T. Heute, “that the true and the plain, the common, the evident, was the answer of the enemy that fell by the sword of the Israelites ( Josh. x. 11), that the nations might know roum, potential, punctum ejus, Vulgate, “all his Joshua’s strength;” but, as the plain truth and plain sense is justly odious for his crimes, particularly in slying his treasore and ten brethren, that he might obtain the name; but by the memory, their memory, they might have preserved their name, and their fame. It is an allusion to the custom of placing sepulchres in gardens, and such other verdant places (2 Kings xxi. 18. 26. John viii. 41), which were generally chosen to inscribe, as well the freshness and perpetuity of their memory, as the hope and expectation of good men of a joyful resurrection, for their bones then seemed to flourish out of their place, as if the sepulchre were a field of flowers, and like these cemeteries were in their greatest beauty and verdure, as if they partook of the richness of the soil, and germinated by its fruitfulness. As this phrase shows the Jews’ frequent custom of placing sepulchres in gardens, the poet and the prophet represent the return of that people from the Babylonish captivity by a like expression, viz. that their bones shall flourish, and it is added, (Ezek. xxxvii. 3.)

Ver. 18. He destroyed the rulers of the Tyrians, and all the princes of the Philistines.] The ancients frequently confound the Phenicians with the Philistines, but the sacred writers, as well as our authors, plainly distinguish one from the other. The Phenicians oppressed the Israelites in the time of the Judges (Judg. xxi. 11); and in the beginning of the government of Samuel, they entered into alliance with the Philistines against the people of God; but the Philistines being worsted, the Phenicians after that never undertook any thing against the Hebrews.

Ver. 19. And before his death he made protestations in the sight of the Lord and his anointed, I have not taken any man’s goods.] 1 Thess. iv. 6. The words are the same metaphor, 1 Tim. v. 8. They are acknowledged by the learned, but not all the fathers. As they are departed, is, that they slept with their fathers.” St. Stephen is said, after tasting, to fall asleep (Acts vii. 60. Heb. iv. 12. II. Cor. v. 1). The verb has the same metaphor, 1 Thess. iv. 6. The solemn protestation here made by Samuel of his integrity, was not out of ostentation, but partly for his own vindication, and to prevent the misrepresentations of his enemies, but more particularly, that being publicly acquitted from all faults in it, he might more freely repire the sins of the people, and particularly that of desiring a king, despising thereby the theeocracy they were honoured with. power of the air." But the true reason why Samuel is quoted is, "as the expression is in the book of Samuel, and here said to "lift up his voice from the earth," is, because his body was under ground, to which the soul was still conceived to bear a relation; and it was upon this chirity, that the popular prevailingly notion of all separate souls being in the heart of the dead was founded; which popular notion, as it obtained among the Jews, and is often alluded to in the language of scripture, to extort from the Jews the necessity of not venerating the dead; and it is certain that the relation of this appurtenance of Samuel should be accommodated thereto; so that nothing can be concluded in this case negatively, as Samuel is said to have been (see Waterland's sermon, ibid.).

In the last sentence we have a farther reason of his appearing at this time, besides showing the king his end; viz., that Israel might be guided and moved, not by such a warning, or, as others understand it, to acquaint the people that they also should be delivered into the hands of the Philistines, and be destroyed with him; or, as the Geneva version has it, more agreeably to the Greek, "that the wickedness of the people should perish."

sense we are to understand Ephraim here, and in ver. 23. But since the return from the Babylonian captivity, Israel and Judah are taken promiscuously for the same people, and are all, without distinction, mentioned sometimes called Israel, and sometimes Judah. In reading the history of the kings of Judah and Israel, it is observable that many of the kings of Judah and Israel are designated the "sons of David," and sometimes the "seed of David." Because designed in God's promise to David by Nathan, which promise is there called "God's mercy, that should not depart from him." He is called "the sure mercies of David," from the certainty of the performance of his promise, because God had "sworn by his holiness, that he would not fail David." Accordingly the sacred writers of the New Testament with good reason say, that "the start of all things, the beginning of the creation of God, is David, the king thereof." Ps. cxlvii. 29. They still depended upon and pleased themselves with the expectation of the sure mercies of David. Isa. livii. 1. To say, "why is the murderer of the Mercies of David?" Ps. lxix. 28. It completed. It probably succeeded to the first throne of Judah, because where he should give a remnant unto Jacob, and a root unto David out of his loins; because it refers to the first throne of Judah, when the kingdom of Solomon was completed. And thus the Syriac and Arabic versions read. Very remarkable is the gloss of those interpreters upon this passage, which probably was the exposition of the Jews. The root of David shall stand for ever, as He spoke it to Simeon, says a learned reformed Bishop, as he relates in the second part of his Discourses to the Jews. In the Geneva version. A very learned writer observes, that the translation of this passage should be, He was described, or, written of, as the margin has it, viz. in Malachi's "great and eternal root." Ver. 1. The Saviour of the world. This alludes plainly to the last verse of the prophet Malachi, where the expression is the same. The meaning is, That as Malachi's Saviour at the second coming would put an end to religious differences, which divided the nearest relations from each other, and make them all join in the same faith, and in the duties of repentance and reformation, and thereby prepare the way for the coming of the Messiah, as part of the reformation, the Saviour shall produce a general reformation in the minds and manners of all sorts of persons, as before he was a great reformer of the law, under its greatest degeneracy and corruption. And to the restoration of the tribes of Jacob, i.e. Deliver and redeem Israel, or restore the kingdom to Israel, through the Messiah's advent, which was part of his office (see Isa. xlix. 8). Or in the same sense, as to the restoration of the tribes of Jacob, whose gathering this writer prays for, xxxvi. 11. These words may also be referred to the coming of Elias, at the end of the world, or at the time of the restitution of all things, according to the Jewish sense, i.e., "...the consummation of all things, which God has spoken by the mouth of all his prophets since the world began." Acts iii. 21. A notion entertained by very many of the fathers, and seems to have its foundation in our Saviour's own words, Matt. xvii. 10, 11. And this conjecture I am the more encouraged to offer, as I find it supported by a great number of ancient Jewish writers, who endeavoured to explain this passage with many cogent reasons, and apply this very passage to support the opinion, explaining it of an Elias who shall be the harbinger of the Messiah's coming, the Shepharim, or type for the times to come. The foregoing passage likewise of Malachi, of turning the hearts of the children to their fathers, he refers to Christ's second advent, and to an Elias, which shall come before his advent, new teaching, new spirit, new doctrine of judgment; who shall labour to bring the unbelieving posterity of the Jewish nation to have the same heart and mind their holy fathers and progenitors had; i.e., to confound them with their reasonings, with the learned; to ordain new teachers, new preachers, new presidents, new patriarchs, hoped in and looked for, lest, continuing obstinate in their unbelief to that great day, they should be smitten with a curse, and perish among the rest of the ungodly. The second coming of Elias is the very subject matter that is treated of in the second verse of this chapter (ver. 24). In this and the five foregoing verses we have a beautiful specimen of the figure ana phora, like that admired one, Calcut. Ort. 1st. or that in Ps. xv.

Ver. 11. Blessed are they that now thee, and slept in love—The rendering would be better, "Blessed are they that see thee, and slept in love." The thoughtful reference to the thoughts of the three Jews in the Talmud, Targum, and their later commentaries, the coming of Elias and the Messiahs immediately go to the Messiah; and this is the reason why the Jews pray so hearty for the conversion of the Jews, and they are considered here, because the coming of the one, according to the prophet Malachi, infers the other (see Bishop Chandler's Del. p. 81). If we read ἀνεπιστάμενοι, as our translators follow, the sense then will be: Blessed are the dead, those good Israelites which died in the Lord; not merely those that "slept in love," as our version has it, but such as departed in his favour and love; they shall obtain a better resurrection; i.e. they shall be preferred a part in it, and with his other saints shall reign gloriously with him.

For we shall surely live.] Zooh ἡμεῖς. We may observe here the constant allusion among all future works. The death of Elias is represented by a new life. And, indeed, the restoration of the church is sometimes represented as a resurrection of it from the dead; and her return from a low state, as the second coming of the Savior; and the general resurrection of the dead. This figure is nowhere more strongly or frequently used than in Ezek. xxviii., where God is introduced inquiring of the Jews: ""Shall I breathe upon thee, and thou shalt live?"" (ver. 3), and promising to put into them vituperativa, "the breath of life" (ver. 5), ἐγέρσαις, "and ye shall live;" and bidding the prophet blow on them, ἐγέρσαις, "that they may live." (ver. 9), noli duxi et non semper retinui, "nor breath entered into them, "et vitae, "and they lived again" (ver. 10). In all which places ἐγέρσαι is used to express the resurrection of the dead, and the same may be occasionally used of a glorious state. Mr. Mede understands this place in like manner of the Jews' conversion, and observes, that this is agreeable to the ancient and general doctrine both of Jews and Pagans, that the same saints, being once the particular supposed to be previous to it. And in this last sense St. John uses Conv. Rev. xx. 4, to express the resurrection of the martyrs slain for the testimony of the truth.

Ver. 12. Elias it was, who was covered with a whirlwind: and Elias was filled with his spirit: while he lived, he was not moved both the presence of any prince, neither could any bring him into subjection. Rather, instead of "Elias, ὁ ἐπιστάμενος" essentially, which is the reading in all the editions, Grabe preferit deo ἐκβάλλει, s. v. (Proleg. tom. iii. cap. 4). And so do Badwell and Beza, which the Geneva version follows; i.e. as soon as Elias was taken up in a whirlwind, Elias was filled with his spirit, and succeeded him immediately in the prophetic office. Nor is it to be supposed that in a succession of so many miracles, he was designedly a crown worthy of the successor of Elias. Neither fear nor carelessness, promises nor threats, could overcome him: he respected not the persons of the mighty, and was indifferent above all things, and their glory. He was not moved at his appearing, in the beginning of the next verse, of his great penetration and knowledge of things done at a distance, as his presupposing the coming of Ben-hadad, and his setting the stage for it; at his departure, and being inspired to direct the way of his journey; or, respecting the vileness of his own servant, Gehazi (2 Kings v. 26); but the former sense seems preferable.

And he prophesied. The term of a long, or a future time, is of great significance, and besides the foresight of future events which is the ordinary notion of it, it signifies to work miracles, in which sense it is taken here; for the author refers to the miracles performed, as posterior, and cast into the sepulchre, where Elias's body lay, it revived upon touching his bones (2 Kings xii. 21). Hence it was conceived that the Spirit of God in some sort accompanied even the dead body of that holy prophet, and that he con-continued to work miracles in his grave. The sense here is somewhat different from that in the latter part of the next verse; viz. "At his death he was more works marvellous," i.e. when he was just dying, he foretold the downfall of the Syrians, after his death, and his work was the greater consequence to God's distressed people, whom he comforted with his last breath.

Ver. 13. For this the people repeated not, neither departed they from the kingdom of Israel, till the death of Elisha, who was taken out of their land, and were scattered throughout all the earth: yet there remained a small people, and a ruler in the house of David. The Jews were a people remarkably distinguished by the favour of God; they were never conquered by any city or town of their descendants forfeited by degrees God's favour, and brought down his judgments. For when neither miracles nor commands, promises nor threats, nor the instructions and examples of holy men and prophets among them, had any eftect upon them, but they continued obstinate in their evil courses, God determined to remove Israel out of his sight, and the ten tribes were at length carried away captive by Shalman, and the vast majority of the Jews were carried away by Nebuchadnezzar, and his successors. God's favour departed over all the earth, confirmed (De Bell. Jud. lib. vii. cap. 5) which indeed appears from their present state and circumstances. A great prospersity of the Jews kept in their native country, and straggled through all the world, neither God nor man being their king, and they are debarred the privilege of setting their foot on their own country, though merely a few days' journey. As long as they were collected together, a very small number, yet such was the spirit, the moral and religious spirit of the Jews; their spirit was so profound, that was so justly said to be the same as that which actuated the prophets; that it was as a small lamp in the dark gallery of the world, and as a candle in the dark street. But when the people were scattered throughout all the earth, and were scattered, and left in every part as a little company, which was what is here meant, the moral spirit of the people disappeared, and the church was scattered itself; and when God, according to his promise, renewed his people, and as the Jews were scattered, and were restored, and renewed in the same spirit, it was said of an old man, that he was a prophet of the old school, and a prophet of the young school; and of the Jews, that the moral spirit of the church was continued among them, for the most part. But when God, according to his promise, renewed his people, and the Jews were scattered, and were restored, and renewed in the same spirit, it was said of an old man, that he was a prophet of the old school, and a prophet of the young school; and of the Jews, that the moral spirit of the church was continued among them, for the most part.

Ver. 22. In his time the sun went backward, and he lengthened the king's life.] When Hezekiah was sick unto death, Isaiah, as an assurance of the truth of his prophecy, told him that his time of return backward (ch. xxxviii.) i.e. the learned Usher, Talmud root detractum, quantum diutius fut additum (Ann. ad A. M. 1819). As much a prediction derived from the (next) night, as was added to this day, the divine providence so ordering this miraculous retrogradation, that it was no hindrance to the regularity of the motions of the other heavenly bodies, as appears from the calculations of the same, eclipses, by the ancient Chaldeans and modern astronomers; nor was it discovered or taken notice of in other countries, which occasioned an embassy from Babylon to inquire about the time of the return of the sun. And the learned Dr. Trench has thought this a particular miracle, manifested only by the shadow on the sun-dial of Ahaz. The ch. xxvii. 2 returning spirit what should come to pass at the last.] ἀκολουθοῦσα μετάφρασις. Isaiah was filled with the Holy Spirit in a greater degree than the other prophets. Hence Greg. Nazianzen calls him μεταφοράντως τοῦ πνεύματος. By his receiving as many new talents as the old we may understand the last or latter times, which phrase is frequently used in scripture, to signify the days of the Messiah. One certain time had been prefixed by God for bestowing a great blessing on the world; this was known to all in the age of the prophets, and therefore, when the prophet speaks of things to be done then, they often, by way of eminence, call that time the last time. The prophet, therefore, saw the end of days, and sometimes the end of the age, or as above, in the following verse. It is particularly true of Isaiah, above all the other prophets, that he saw what regarded these times; for he foretold the destruction of the world, the destruction of the Messiah, the future glories of the church, the enlargement and flourishing of it under the gospel, and bringing the fullness of the gentiles into it, more clearly and frequently than the other. A wide prospect is often opened in the writings of the New Testament, and obtained the character of the Evangelical prophet.

CHAP. XXIX.

Ver. 1. The remembrance of Josias is like the commonwealth great memorials that are made by the apostacy: ... He behaved himself sprightly in the conversion of the people, and took away the abominations of iniquity.] Josias, of all the princes mentioned in holy writ, was the purest and most disinterested; he was of a pattern, and his conduct so unblamable, that the scripture represents him without fault, and as having no equal (2 Kings xxiii. 20). He began to reign at eight years old, and was as early in his duty to God. Though he always expressed a great regard and attachment to the true religion, it was at a time that he seriously set about the work of reformation and correcting the abominations, when former reigns had not only introduced, but allowed. Instead of the iniquity and indifference of many of his predecessors, who, though religious and well-disposed persons, yet persisted in some faults, Josias, having exerted a laudable and disinterested courage; he demolished the high places, overthrew the altars, burnt the groves, and even the bones, which he caused to be dug up from the graves of the kings of the former dynasty. In the conversion and pious manner, he successfully made use of his authority for the service and establishment of the true religion. The assemblage of so many good qualities and uncommon virtues in him, it is natural that the author here compares his life as the knowner to refreshing perfume, composed with the nicest art of the most precious and exquisite spices. But the beauty of this comparison is lost without observing that he who makes such a scheme of Josias, here makes use of the name of Josias, in Scripture, while Messieurs of Port-Royal have a good reflection here — "Kings generally pride themselves in victories gained in battle, or any other public achievement, but Josias has taught us, by the praises bestowed on king Josias, that the truest honour is to serve Him by whom princes reign, and that their glory shall be eternalized after death, when in their life labour to promote his glory, that, as Josias contented not himself with his own personal goodness or instances of private piety, nor was easy till he had brought off his people from great wickedness and idolatry to the service of the true God; so princes, when they shall hereafter celebrate an example, not only to be good and religious themselves, but, as persons invested with the supreme authority, should labour with all their power, through the means of their office, to keep up, form, and render religion in their dominions, and firmly establish in the hearts of all their subjects, his pure worship who put and continues that worship.

Ver. 4. All except David, and Ezekias, and Josias, were defective: ] i.e. Fell into idolatry, or however tolerated it by not destroying the high places, or acted in some way or manner contrary to the purity of God's worship, or against his will. The scripture commends Jehoshaphat in most instances, but blames him for making an alliance with the kings Ahab and Ahabiah, and not taking away the high places. Of Asa too it is mentioned, whose heart in other respects was perfect, that in his time the high places were not removed (1 Kings xv. 14). And if David, here instanced in as a pattern of purity, in his kingdom he governed so perfectly, and in the splendour and multitude of his own riches, he stoned for these faults, by a firm attachment to the true worship of God all his life, and a perfect resignation to his will at the approach of death.

Even the kings of Judah failed.] This was true of all of them from the first to the last, except the few here mentioned. We read, 2 Chron. xin. 1, that when Rehoboam, son of Solomon, was made king, and all his people with him, and Manasseh, one of the latter kings of Judah, before their captivity, seems to have been justly reproved by the punishment of his very destruction of the true God and his service from off the earth, and to establish idolatry, though he repeated before his death, 2 Kings xxi. 2. And whosoever reads the several instances of abomination, 2 Kings xxii. 4, 15, would suspect that among all the kings of Judah, there was none so much guilty of idolatry, and so guilty of contemptuous and unjustly persecuted and afflicted God's prophet, whom they raised up on purpose to declare his will and denounced his judgments. For there that fills up the measure of men's iniquities sooner, or draws down God's displeasure upon them more severely. Perhaps Ezekiel's prophecies were omitted because they were not fit for publication in his own time, or because his message was too great for his own age; but, as a matter of fact, the wants of his day were so great, that he could not get rid of his burdens, which he was not able to bear himself, without some aid from his brethren.

Ver. 8, 9. It was Ezekiel who saw the glorious vision, which was shown him upon the chariot of the cherubims. He begins, therefore, by mentioning the enemies under whom he lived, and directed them that went right]. 1. He also mentioned the judgments on the enemies of God under the figure of rain, and it would go well with them that went right. It has not been learned men only, that have been directed, where it seems proper to have inserted him, as a Jewish prophet and author, whom Josephus calls one of the seven sages of the heathen, and a prophet of that kind, who would be a forecaster of good things (Antiq. lib. x. On this account Mr. Whiston inclines to think, that Daniel is meant and spoken of in ver. 9. For, says he, where doth Ezekiel make mention of the enemies under the figure of rain, or what sense is there in that assertion, or how is it peculiar to Ezekiel that he foretold good things to those that walked uprightly? But Daniel made mention of the enemies in that same vision, wherein he was directed the vision. So the enemies of God's people would attempt against them, as also what happiness God would at length bestow on his chosen; he conjectures therefore, that le visage, is the translation of the Hebrew, which he also obtains in several of the Greek copies (Addenda to Hist. Memoirs, p. 183). But I can not altogether approve of this conjecture; for, as to the first place, it depends upon this, whether the thing was written by the writer of this book, many probable reasons may be assigned; he might, says a learned prelate, forget Daniel, as he did Joel, Micaiah, Job, Ezr., and other scripture writer; or he might mean there was an addition to the vision, as Nehemiah, whom he praises. It may be he reserved speaking of Daniel to another place in his book (for he observes no order of time), which he lived not to finish. Or it might be at first numbered with the other prophets by the first composer of Ecclesiasticus; and yet, by reason of the author's imperfect work, or loss of one of his vulgare, which the same editor has ascribed to the transcriber's carelessness, the name of Daniel might be wanting in all the copies (Bishop Chandler's Def. vol. 1. p. 81-83). To these reasons I must add one more, which seems to me to carry great weight with it. Thus, that Daniel being not reputed and placed among the prophets in the Hebrew code, but among the hagiographa, if our author had intended anywhere to have mentioned him, yet it was not expected that he should do it in this very place, because here he follows the order of the books in the Hebrew division, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets, in successive time; and it was, moreover, among the enemies of whom, as is before observed, he takes no notice. As to the second inquiry, where doth Ezekiel make mention of the enemies under the figure of rain, the margin will answer. It is true, it is in a place I need not now enter into; but Ezekiel says, that the margin, which are sufficiently clear and express. And it is remarkable that the margin there refers us back to this passage of Ecclesiasticus, as explanatory of each other. Nor is it a forced or unusual metaphor to express God's judgments against either Gog or his other enemies, by an overflowing rain or shower. The psalmist, it is certain, uses this figure, when he says of God, that upon the ungodly he shall rain snares, fire, and brimstone, storm and tempest; this shall be their portion to drink" (Ps. xi. 7). As to the last reason alleged, for adjudging this ninth verse to Daniel, viz. his form of speaking, it was not at all paralleled to Ezekiel, who walked uprightly, it may be replied, this is not peculiar to Daniel; for which of the prophets did not foretell the same, though, perhaps, not so minutely, or at so great a distance of time? with regard to Ezekiel, it may be said, that he stands single in the two following respects, which are both mentioned by our author; 1. That he saw the vision of the temple; 2. Declared and published the security of the righteous, and the safety of them that went right in the perilous time, when God should visit, by introducing three of the most eminent for right- eousness and grace, and warning the enemies of the same by the sight of the ungodly, with great admiration. He made mention of the enemies under the figure of rain," the Syrie and Arabic have it, "he made mention of Job," which I do not imagine to have arisen from a different reading, but to be another translation of the same reading, because דָּבָר, or with the rees quaeque דָּבָר, like Daniel 9:17, is in the Hebrew after Daniel 9:16, and in Ezekiel 33:2, Job, or Hebrew word for iniquitas. Hence Mr. Hutchinson's observation, that Job signifies persecuted, for דָּבָר, is the particle passive of the root דָּבָר, immittitio aegri. Therefore Job signifies one evil-treated by enemies, &c. Then as to the second question, whether Ezekiel gave it the rain, he might either render the דָּבָר, or הָלַךְ, in Ezekiel ili. 2, or a storm, and is so rendered by Joesph. Deut. xxxii. 2, or a storm, and is so rendered in Hos. xxi. 2, where it has the signification of pro- them, and by Joesph. Cest. xliii. 13, Joesph. seems to have called it a storm. If, therefore, the Hebrew was דָּבָר הָלַךְ, it might either be rendered דָּבָר הָלַךְ, or הָלַךְ דָּבָר, as the enemies in rain," or "Job in a whirlwind," out of which God answered him (either in a whirlwind, or in a storm) by a voice of afflictions. And it is remarkable, that Ezekiel is the only prophet that does make mention of Job; in this he is singular, as likewise in the vision of the cherubim, which are the two points here mentioned. Perhaps the storm means the judgments of God, spoken of in the places where Job is mentioned, as one who should deliver his own soul, &c. So that יָדַע יָדִיעְךָ is not unlike נָעַר יָדִיעְךָ (xliv. 17,) and both are joined together by the prophet, as worthy to be delivered in the time of wrath. But how comes Job to be mentioned in this place, and not also Noah and Daniel? For these were joined together in the two passages of Ezekiel! I answer, if the Syrie and Arabic would bear me out in guessing at a mistake in rendering the original, as well in these two names as they do in Job's name, I would allow of the mistake, it is the rendering of the original Hebrew Noah and Daniel; for in both these places of Ezekiel, Daniel is written without the sign, Daniel, where, it seems, no such mistake would have occurred, because the words, would give another sense; so that יָדַע יָדִיעְךָ might signify either the two proper names, and so the Greek might be mistaken, or יָדַע יָדִיעְךָ; instead רָעַךְ יָדִיעְךָ יָדִיעְךָ, signifies require, the rendering might be, as is the sense of our version, Ex. requisitum ad dirigentes viri sunt. Could this be admitted, how apt it would be in this place! I shall consider it as an image of a passage, for as such only it is proposed, might be allowed, the passage would be pretty clear; whereas, as it now stands, it is indeterminate, and liable to many objections. Ver. 10. And of the twelve prophets let the memorial be blessed, and let their bones flourish again out of their place; for they comforted Jacob, and delivered them by assured hope.] See note on xlv. 12. The author having mentioned Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel, speaks here of the twelve minor prophets, as they are called, who completed the Old Testament canon. These too in their respective time were the interpreters of the mind of God, and delivered to us the scriptures of truth, that deliverance which they looked and prayed daily for at the temple; and successfully comforted them, that God would perform or confirm his mercy with them, and deliver them. They delivered them too well to be forgotten, and therefore it is added, that among the twelve prophets could be no other than the redemp- tion by the Messiah, because three of the twelve that pro- mised it lived after the return from Babylon, to which some would apply this, and the like passages, and yet after that return they foretold it as a thing still future. The Jews expected it at a happy event yet to come, and prayed for it in the days of Simon the high-priest; i. e. or for the days of Alexander the Great: and the writer of this book renewes the petition, that God would make the time short for the accomplishment of their deliverance, xxxvil. 8 (see note on xlvii. 8). Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 64.) From the mention of the twelve prophets here it seems manifest, that the canon of the sacred books was already made, when this tract of Ecclesiasticus was composed, and their prophecies collected and determined. It is remarkable, that the Old Testament was in the same order that now it is, with respect to the prophetical writings at least (see Deut. xxxiii. 8-11. Pin's Hist. ch. vi. v. 1. 5). Ver. 11, 12. How shall we magnify Zareobat? Even he was as a signet on the right hand. So was Jesus the son of Joseph: who in their time builded the house, and set up a holy temple in Jerusalem, which p accurd glory. The former of these was governor of Judah, or vicecroy of the province of Judea, and the latter high-priest at the time of the Jews' return from the Babylonish Captivity. To the former we refer the intention of rebuilding the temple; to these the prophets Haggai and Zechariah address themselves, encouraging them and the Jews under their conduct to go on with the great design by a promise of God's assistance and protection, and an assurance that the glory of such a house should be superior to that of the former. They readily obeyed, finished, and perfected the temple, and restored the public worship. The editor of Josephus, and Grégoire and prepared it for everlasting glory; i.e. according to the glory of the Lord's everlasting glory, and not of the builders'11, as Grothus explains it; or rather, fitted this second temple for the second coming of the Messiah into it, for the appearance of the Messiah in it; in which case they were supposed to work the glory of this latter house. These chiefs are the two anointed ones, referred to Zech. iv. 14, and are said by this writer to be the "prophecy of the Avenger of the Lord" i.e. of God, as having the care of his people and church, and completing their salvation thereto by his signet or authority. Both Zerubbabel and Joshua the high-priest were figures of the Messiah, or Jerusalem the moral and hieratical of the Christian church, the true temple or house of God.

Ver. 16. Sem and Seth were in great honour among men. All the names except ours put Seth before Sem, and indeed such an order is necessary in point of time, for Seth was the father of the righteous before the flood, as Sem was after it. The Syriac and Arabic versions insert Enoch after Seth, and there seems to be a good reason to place Enos among these worthies rather than what Philo says of Adam, ο ουκ οικεταθη εις τον διονυσια δύναμας, κ. η. η. Cui mortalis scio hic nobilitate conferendus est; qui in corpora regna, et super regnum, in gloria, Dioni sui, et in arte artificii; animo vero dignitatis, in alterius prudentia, in insigne divini virtutis; sanctum quantum mortalis natura poterit capere. Prastana adeo nobilitas, ut nulla alia quavis virtute aquariam, dimidiam victoriam, in comparationem venire potest, &c. (Ibn esyeyna). See also more to the same purpose, De Mundi Opificio.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. Simon the high-priest, the son of Onias, who in his life repaired the house again, and in his days fortified the temple. 1. We find in the Jewish history two Simons, sons of Onias, both high-priests, but at times very distant from each other; the first was Simon the Just, so called for his great piety towards God, and for his good-will and benevolence to the children of his own people. Antip. lib. ii. cap. 29. The second is mentioned likewise by the same historian (bid. cap. 4), and is the same high-priest, who was greatly zeal opposed Ptolemy Philopater's entrance into the sanctuary (see 1 Macc. xi. 15). But it appears, which of these the author here speaks of, Grothus, Bossuet, and Calmet, contend for the latter; Eusebius, Januarius, Diodorus, Diodorus, Badwell, and the very learned author of the Dissertation on the Temple, in charge of the Two Sarachides, herefore prefixed, are for the former, whose opinion is supported by the following reasons:—1. The great similitude of the names of Simon II. and Simon II. 2. Simon the Just was contemporary with this last, and this writer mentions him as officiating, and takes particular notice of the goodness and integrity of his service, ver. 11, 12, and was himself then probably about ten years old. 3. The author manifestly speaks of a Simon then dead, for he mentions what he did in his lifetime, ver. 1, particularly his good deeds for the house of the Lord, if the offices thereof; but the pontificate of Simon II. was not as a sufficient proof from the instance of this writer, and will suit better with that of the translator.

Ver. 3. In his days the custom to receive water, being in company with meals, and covered with plates of brass: In, or rather before, the tabernacle of testimony was only a laver or kettled; afterward, when the Jewish church was in its flourishing and settled state, Solomon enlarged it to a beautiful edifice. But it is affirmed by many writers too hastily, that in the second temple there was no proper ark, no throne encompassed by cherubims, no visible glory, no molyten sea. However the learned answerer, as he says, has taken "real" as a superlative word; and it seems great reason to conclude from the words of this writer, that there was a molyten sea (see 2 Chron. v. 12). In the time of the church of Christ, as represented in the book of Revelation, there is a sea of glass, like crystal, infinitely more precious and beautiful than either of those in the Jewish temple, or any thing made of metal (see Deubner on the Apocalypse).

Ver. 7. And as the rainbow giving light in the bright clouds: Εις τον θυσια σημανθη είναι. I would rather render, "As the glorious bow shining in the clouds," or, "As the bow shining in the clouds with glory." One cannot help observing, what pains this writer takes, from ver. 5 to 13, to set forth the graceful presence and august appearance of this favourite high-priest; he searches heaven and earth, and goes about in the world, in the ruins of the ancient order, as well as the variegated flowers beneath, lend their colours. The gold and superb ornaments of the temple, the odorous incense, and holy fire on the altar, the rich vases, &c, need to reflect honour and glory, as the great works both of nature and art, the most curious and valuable in their kinds, are borrowed, either to express the superior glory of that ancient dignity, or rather, like a tall cedar; or the perfection and glory of that high-priest's actual, and as it were, spiritual, and hieratical apparel, as if, when he put on the robe of honour, in his long garment was the whole world," as the book of Wisdom declares (Wis. i. 23-25). The high-priest of the Israelites, and all the people together; and I went up to the earth upon their faces to worship the Lord God Almighty, and to the high-priest. The singers also sang praises with their voices, with great variety of sounds was there made sweet melody. And the people answering one to another, they said, "Praise the Lord. Then the high-priest made a special prayer before him that is merciful, till the solemnity of the Lord was accomplished, and they had finished his service." The eighteenth verse seems out of place here; it should follow the sixteenth, and be what was foretold in the prophecy of Zerubbabel (see Dan. ii. 35). It seems proper to consider, that these were offering, which was the first part of the temple-service, the priests with trumpets, and the Levites with musical instruments, and the singers, together with the people, joined their voices and sang praises to complete the harmony. We find that David and Solomon appointed singing and trumpeting at the time of sacrificing (1 Chron. vii. 7), and that Ezra restored this custom after the return from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra ii. 10). The good noise and the smoke of the incense at the temple, at the entrance of the priests into God's presence, was the external, and the sweet smell of incense at the time of the sacrifice was the internal and proper signification of the manner of the people's praying without, whilst the priest offered the sweet-smelling savour of incense before the Lord, for at the time when the priest offered incense in the sanctuary, it was a sacred act, and not an external action, Judasor. praying for the pardon of their sins, every man silently apart for himself. This seems likewise to be referred to the hour's silence in heaven. Rev. viii. 1, which is set down that "unto point of time, and number, and half time, being gone in, to offer incense, or the odor of sweet smell. I see no necessity, with Calmet, Bossuet, and others, to imply that the priest was without a hat, and that the principal officiating at Ptolemy Philopater's solemn sacrifice of the temple; it is as applicable to the high-priest officiating upon any other solemn occasion; nor can a true synchronism be preserved in so odd a manner. This verse is a parenthesis of interpretation. Ver. 20, 21. Then he went down, and lifted up his hands over the whole congregation of the children of Israel, to give - the blessing of the Lord, and to rejoice in his name, and to have set aside to themselves the study of the second time; that they might receive a blessing from the most High.

When the sovereignty of the Lord was ended by the incense being offered, the people walked round about the sanctuary and sang. The form of the incense offering is called the "blessing". The blessing was accompanied by the priest blessing with which the priests dismissed the people by God's especial order was this, "The Lord bless thee, and keep thee; the Lord make his face to shine upon thee, and give thee peace" (Num. vi. 22). And lest any one should think too slightly of this blessing, because pronounced by a mortal like himself, it was followed by the words, "the Lord bless him", and therefore properly called here, "the blessing of the Lord," by the priest's lips; showing that the effect of this blessing does not depend upon man, but upon the fact of it being pronounced by the mouth of the priest, whom he hath appointed to bless in his name (Deut. xvi. 9), and whose blessing he hath promised to confirm. We see from this passage that when the people received the blessing from the priest, they received it kneeling, or bowing down their heads. In the primitive times it was customary for the deacon (to prepare the people the better for it) to call out immediately before the time of the blessing, in præsbyteriis words as these, "Bow down to the blessing" (Chrysost. Liturg.). The blessing of the bishop or priest was so highly esteemed in the primitive times, that none durst go out of the church until they had received it, according to the councils of Agatha (can. 31), and that of Orleans (can. 22).

Ver. 22—24. Now therefore bless the God of all, which only doth good; bless his name, which is everlasting, who exalts our days from the womb, and dealeth with us according to his mercy. He grants us of his heart, and that peace may be in our days in Israel for evermore, and for evermore (and deliver us at his time)! We may learn from this short prayer of the wise man, how to compose and regulate our own; we should acknowledge God therein to be omnipotent and all-powerful; that ever since we were born, we have been preserved by his good providence every day, hour, and moment; that it is an instance of his great mercy to us thus to be mindful of our preservation; but to think also of our weakness, and not to be due to us but punishment. The conclusion of this prayer seems to contain more than a request for peace and temporal blessings; it relates to and manifests the writer's and his countrymen's dependence for the Messiah, and their earnest wish that God would speedily send the blessing of all men, to "perform the mercy promised to his forefathers, and remember his holy covenant" (Luke i. 72).

For it was the constant prayer, in prayer words as these, "Bow down to the blessing" (Chrysost. Liturg.). The blessing of the bishop or priest was so highly esteemed in the primitive times, that none durst go out of the church until they had received it, according to the councils of Agatha (can. 31), and that of Orleans (can. 22).

Ver. 25. There be two manner of nations which my heart abhorreth: there is no nation at all. It is to be observed, that the two nations here referred to are not to be taken exclusively, and in opposition to the Jews; but as gegen among the Latins is sometimes used for "limited" sense, more than a family or kindred, so here ἄνθρωποι, "two nations," may signify two parts or cities of Palestine, as it had several divisions; and Samaria is probably one of them. Our translators, by rendering ἄνθρωποι, "two manner of nations," seems to guard against understanding them strictly as such. The author will not allow the third to be any nation, because of the great mixture of all sorts of people among them, in the Cuthites or Samaritans, who dwelt at Sichem, whose ancestors the king of Assyria sent thither; for when the Assyrians carried away captive the ten tribes (9 Kings i. 28), they placed strangers in the chief part of the country, viz. Samaria.

Which my heart abhorreth.] The schism of the ten tribes was the worst rise of the exiles among the Jews had for the Samaritans, Samaria being the metropolis of the kingdom of Israel, and set up in a manner, as a rival to Jerusalem, as the temple on mount Gerizim. Scholars differ about the time that the Samaritans were likewise much increased by the opposition these last made against the former from the Babylonish captivity, both in the place of worship, and the form of worship, at Jerusalem (Ezra iv.). On these accounts the disputes and animosities between them rose to the greatest degree imaginable (see Joseph. Antiq. lib. xiii. 6, 9). The separation and the Jealousy and Averseness between the two were so great that they would have no converse together, nor show any act of kindness to each other; and that this hatred was very ancient, appears from hence, that when the Jews would express their most aversion, they would say, "This is a Samaritan, and has a devil." (John viii. 48): as if to be a Samaritan, and have a devil, were things of equal reproach. If the Jews hated the Samaritans, the Samaritans, on the other hand, were showing their resentment against the Jews upon all occasions, as is plain from Luke ix. 53. Jesus going one day to a village of Samaria, the inhabitants would not receive him as though they would go to Jerusalem. Josephus instances in many affronts and injuries offered to the Jews, as they passed through the country of the Samaritans to their solemn and religious ceremonies (Antiq. lib. xiii. 6, 9), which some have extended so far as to exclude all manner of civil intercourse, even the asking or giving one another a glass of water, and that of this answer of the woman was an insult upon Our Saviour out of the national hatred that people had a Jew forced to beg a little water of her. It may seem somewhat strange, that this writer, who has delivered such excellent precepts of morality and instruction in the former parts of his work, has ended it at the conclusion of it, as to declare, that he hates such and such nations from his heart. Caiaphas, in answer to this, says, that the author does not here express his own sentiment, but that he be judged these people, from their invertebrate malice against the Jews, to be the greatest and most dangerous enemies, and as such to be disliked and shunned by every one. (See Ver. 26.)

Ver. 26. The mountains: Sichem, and the mountain of Samaria, and they that dwell among the Philistines, and that foolish people that dwell in Sichem. Some have fancied that the Samaritans are spoken of in the first and last part of this verse; and indeed, one would be apt to think, by what Josephus says, that Samaria and Sichem were one and the same city, since that historian places Sichem among the places in the metropolis, and calls it the capital of the Samaritans (Antiq. lib. ii.). But the most exact geographers make Samaria and Sichem to have been two different cities. However this be, it is not probable that he was thinking of the same people in these places, or that, mentioning three nations whom he disliked, he should name the Samaritans twice in so short a compass, though we should suppose him punctured with the national hatred to that people. I rather therefore incline to Drusian's learned conjecture, that the true reading here is, ἐκ τῆς συχέως, those that inhabit mount Seir, i.e. the Edomites, Quo sedent in monte Seir; and indeed, one would be apt to think, by what Josephus says, that Samaria and Sichem were one and the same city, since that historian places Sichem among the places in the metropolis, and calls it the capital of the Samaritans (Antiq. lib. ii.). But the most exact geographers make Samaria and Sichem to have been two different cities. who assigns the incident of the accusation to the reign of Ptolemy Physisen, whose cruelty inclined him to bring any one, and on the slightest occasion, into danger of his life, that came into his power (Connest. tom. ii. b. v.).

Ver. 10. I called upon the Lord, the Father of my Lord, that he would not leave me in the days of my trouble, and in the time of the proud, when there was no help. When the proud or wicked have most power and authority, that is said to be their time. Thus our Saviour says to the chief priests and the elders, and those that came to apprehend him, Acts xxvi. terip. h alip; "This is your time!" (Luke xxix. 53). Most of the interpreters observe, that the second person in the Trinity is here plainly distinguished from the Father. A very pious and learned prelate says, that the author speaks as plainly here of our Lord Christ as David did when he said, "The Lord said unto my Lord," Ps. ex. 1, to which probably he alludes, and plainly gives us to understand, that not only the prophets, but all God's faithful people in those days, believed the Lord, the Almighty God, to be the Father of one who was himself also the Lord; and in a peculiar manner their Lord and Saviour; and that in their prayers they had a respect unto his name, calling upon the Lord as the Father of their Lord Christ, Matt. xxvi. 63, John i. 49, and so expecting only to be heard upon his account and for his sake who was promised by the name of "the Lord," Dan. ix. 17, for Daniel prays in his name as plainly as we do now, saying, "Now therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplications, and cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary, that is desolate, for the Lord's sake!" i. e. for the Lord Christ's sake, for no other Lord can possibly be meant there (Beveridge's Sermon vol. iii. p. 223). Grotius will have Know to be an interpolation from some officious Christian hand, and makes the reading only to be, ἔκκλησάψανεν Κύριον τετίμων τοῦ, κ. τ. Λ. Calmet reprimes him sharply for his suspicion, and determining so magisterially in the point; and observes, that errors propagated under such a name are more dangerous, and that an opinion, grounded on so little reason as this is, ought to be exposed, and the truth thereby vindicated. Nor is Bossuet more favourable to this critique on the same account; he allows him to have excelled in grammaticis, in historicis sapè etiam in moralibus; but thinks him not altogether orthodox, and therefore advises such as consult him, ut eum adjuvem, non ducem, non magistram habent (Com. in loc.).

Ver. 28—30. Get learning with a great sum of money, and get much gold by her. Let your soul rejoice in his mercy, and be not ashamed of his praise. Work your work betimes, and in his time he will give you his reward.] The advice is, ver. 25, "Buy her for yourselves without money," which is not inconsistent with what the author directs here. The sense of both connected together seems to be, That diligence alone will make a considerable progress in wisdom, and procure a large share of it; that the value of it is so inestimable, that no expense should be thought too great for the obtaining it; and should ever so large a sum be laid out in the way of education, and for the purchasing the necessary help towards learning and improvement, whatever it may cost is not to be repined at, for she will sufficiently repay the charge; "for all good things come together with her, and insinuicate riches in her hand" (Wind. vi. 11). The advice is not unlike that of Solomon: "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom; and with all thy getting get understanding" (Prov. iv. 7). Let the pleasing reflection of the many benefits and advantages proceeding from her encourage your pursuit (so Grotius expounds Dan. reading likewise of's); nor be ashamed at any time, or repent of your fondness and affection for her. Our translators, more agreeably to the Greek, understand it of the mercy of the Lord; and so Calmet renders; and the Geneva version, very explicitly, "Let your soul rejoice in the mercy of the Lord:" which, it must be confessed, introduces the next and last verse better; the sense of which is, Labour to obtain true wisdom, and to work the work of God and of your own salvation early in life; and when the time of recompense shall come, wherein God will reward the improvement of men's talents, you shall have the happiness to reap the blessed fruits of righteousness, and to find that "your labour will not be in vain in the Lord." In a word, the author finishes this work as Solomon does his book of Ecclesiastes; and the "conclusion of the whole matter" is this,—"Fear God and keep his commandments; for this is both the glory and happiness of man."
THE BOOK OF TOTIB.

The authors of the books of Tobit and Judith, and the rest of that order, were no prophets inspired by God to write his authenical scriptures. They who first put these deutero-canonical, or ecclesiastical books into the bible, did not thereby intend to make them equal to the books of Moses and the prophets, but only to recommend them unto the private and public reading of the church, both for the many excellent precepts and examples of life that be in them, and for the better knowledge of the history and estate of God's people, from the time of the prophets to the coming of Christ.—Bp. Cosin's Scholast. Hist. of the Can. of Script. cap. 10.

Libros Tobit, Judith ad Synedrium Alexandrinum deletosuisse plusquamprobabile est. Si fuerint antem delatai, tunc in examin vocati; si in examen vocati, tunc approbatis, vel reprobatis; si repubratis, aut rejecti, tunc procul dubio non accipissent tus institutoris in Christos, sed acceperunt eis a Judasae ad Christiani conversionem. Seu potius hos prios receptus Christiani facti non rejectur—rejectos a Synodio isto (cuibus res hanc erat) non fusse, ac damnatos, citra omne est controversia: receptos fusse ac conprobatos versumque est valde.—Grabbe's Prolegom. cap. 1. tom. ii.

PREFACE.

Before I proceed to speak to the book itself, its original language, and by whom wrote, at what time, and on what occasion, its several versions, and their agreement, it seems necessary, in the first place, to consider the nature of it, and to examine, and if possible settle, this fundamental point, viz. whether it be absolutely a real history, or how far it may be considered and allowed as such by the orient.

Many and especially some of the moderns contend that this book does not contain a true history; that there is too much of the marvellous and supernatual to be accounted for as historical fact; and that the whole is a pious fiction, wherein, under borrowed names, is given a pattern or image of a good father, and an obedient and dutifull son; in which manner God rewards the practice of good works even in this life, and especially the care of burying the dead; and the superintendency of his ministering angels over such as shall be heirs of salvation. But even considered in this light as fiction (an opinion which I cannot by any means subscribe to), it should not be represented as lying fiction, but rather like the invention of a Xenophon or a Homer, to which last Dr. Prideaux indeed compares it, and the most exceptionable parts, as so many studied ornaments to an instructive narration: a narration (for fable I cannot consent to call it) founded on historical truth, but dressed up in some particulars, perhaps with improvements, to dignity and set off the story. What we have in them at least poetic truth; i.e. what agreed with the current notions of the age, or was thought an allowable embellishment (and may not the figurative and miraculous parts be innocently considered in this light?) to make it read with more delight, or remembered with more ease.

Moral fictions are very different from forgeries and falsehoods. Xenophon's Life of Cyrus, to which this of Tobit has been resembled, is one such, amongst many others, of heathen writers; and possibly many pieces in the early times of Christianity were such, which have cashier names injuriously given them. Telemachus bears a distinguished rank among those of the present age, and neither the more ordinary facts, nor the miracles related in it, are considered as lies, though they are not true. The eastern writers make more free with the marvellous in such composition than we of the west do; and what they have at any time wrote of this sort agreeably surprising, is rather to be excused, if not commended, for the improvement, or at least amusement designed us, than condemned for the want of veracity. Of this sort are the Arabian Tales, which is really an Arabian performance; and though it abounds with bold flights, according to their figurative and invention, yet, ought not I conceive, to be charged with want of truth. In like manner, though we cannot perhaps vindicate the whole of this history as real fact, and its embellishments have a near conformity to the theology then in vogue, so as to give some brage to a reader, who will not be so candid as to acknowledge with St. Jerome, Mulia in scripturis servas diem inter quas opinionem illius temporis, et non quod rei veritas continentem (in Jer. cap. xxviii.); yet it may be sufficient for the present purpose, that the historical ground-plot is true, whatever may be said as to particular passages in it. Amongst the most exceptionable of these, the continuance of angels for several days with particular persons of no extraordinary note, and seemingly on no very important occasions, and under disguise too, and being what we have no instance of in genuine scripture, has been most insisted on and objected to. But if we consider the stories of Raphael and Asmodeus in an allegorical view, as representations of the doctrine of good and bad angels allowed to every person, the one as a guardian, the other as a tempter, the objection will be greatly weakened, if not wholly vanish. They are both words of Hebrew original, and, ac-
PREFACE TO TOBIT.

According to their primitive signification, might possibly be adapted by the writers to their characters in the history. And should any one conjecture that Tobian, the Chaldee name both of father and son, was invented to express the good man of God, was, and be. Some may, indeed, say, from Nizani, effusit, or responsit, clamavit, it would not perhaps be of any forced or unnatural interpretation, nor altogether to be disapproved of. Not that I mean hereby to insinuate, that these are not proper names, or to weaken the evidence of their real persons, or that they acted their parts only dramatically.

We may observe, that the writers were deeply dramatical, and what as historical, must be judged partly by internal characters, partly by the opinions originally entertained of them. By internal characters, I would understand such notes or marks by which the reality of what is related may be discovered and ascertained, as, personal facts, the time when done, where performed, and on what occasion, and their being recorded and transmitted by the persons themselves, all of which circumstances declare in favour of Tobit's being a true history. In it we have his genealogy or pedigree, the place of his nativity, the time in which he lived, his condition of life and employment; his family, his captivity, poverty, blindness, his recovery from it; his age, death, and place of burial; all which were circumstances not mentioned. We have also his behaviour and moral conduct set down in the different states of life, particularly under his misfortunes. In him we have a perfect model of private life, and all the virtues and duties of that condition seem united together. We see in him a firm resolution to stand upon his guard against all allurements to sin, an integrity, an equality of mind in the different situations of life, a generosity in the time of his plenty to succour the distressed, and lend even large sums of money without interest; a patience in supporting even an extreme poverty, not only without murmuring, but with thanksgiving: an invincible courage in the exercise of works of mercy; a godliness in bearing with contradictions at home; a firm confidence in God under the severest trials; a constant care in training up his son, as well by his example as by his instructions, in the fear of God, in doing justice to his neighbour, and showing compassion to the poor: and lastly, a lively and fixed expectation of future blessings, and an assured hope of the promises made to Israel, which supported and comforted him under the greatest afflictions; and these he reminds his fellow Jews of to excite their trust in God and the belief of his prophets for the fulfilling of those things which were yet behind (see Rollin's Belles Lettres, vol. ii.): a character resembling that of holy Job, in almost all the particulars, whose history, like this, has been misrepresented likewise as merely dramatical. But if, where such express circumstances of real historical facts appear, a strong conceit shall be allowed wantonly to turn all into parable, there must be an end of the certainty and reality of all history. By the same right and with as much justice every author, sacred or profane, might be made to be or speak any thing, which fancy invents or caprice dictates, and to take his turn upon the stage to act a part of some drama. Might not the history of our first parents be made to open the scene? But when enigmatically represented, as some bold spirits have of late attempted, what a forced and unnatural appearance does it make! The story of the brains of Jonah, his being swallowed, or even by the sight of it, on those bitten by serpents, with that of Gideon's fleece, what a scope might they give to a teeming fancy! The like might be said of the history of Samson, where one meets with a number of facts so extraordinary, that they might seem incredible, were they not warranted by the testimony of the Holy Spirit. To say nothing of the free hand, have we the right to declare it a mistake, I conceive, of our version, the great number of things which he, even a thousand Philistines, with no other arms than the jawbone of an ass, an instrument very unusual and unpromising for so great a slaughter; the surprising flow of water from that jawbone for his refreshment; the ponderous gates of a city carried away on his shoulders to the summit of a hill—these, and other like actions, of which that history is full, are so extraordinary, that, should jealous and suspicious persons, who cannot persuade themselves to believe any thing that surpasses the ordinary course of nature, but employ the like ingenious torture, might not these too be metamorphosed into enigma and parable? At this rate, the history of Esther may become also a tragedy: for the sudden and astonishing revolutions, the hasty and precipitate changes, recorded there, brought about almost in a few hours, beyond all observations and precedents in story, may possibly be represented, rather to carry the air of a tragedy, than to contain a real historical event, especially as it is not agreed who it is supposed to be. Ahasuerus the Emperor was nowhere mentioned. What I have urged in defence of the history of Tobit, particularly the latter instance, is equally applicable to that of Judith, which Grotius and other learned writers have represented likewise as parabolical, and may serve to show what a warm, unrestrained fancy might attempt. But if to attempt to work such fictions, on what they termed historical facts, the credibility of these, or any parts of scripture, is rashness and presumption, to say no worse of it, why should a like liberty, with regard to either of those deuterocanonical pieces, as they were anciently called, be thought allowable, which carry in them the strongest marks of their being real histories?

The other way I mentioned, by which ancient works designed as historical might be distinguished, was the opinion originally entertained of them. With respect to the book of Tobit, it is certain that the Jews had all along a great regard for it, that they read it, and looked upon it as a true history of this particular family at least, and compiled from the memoirs remaining with it; and though they did not receive it into the canon, yet what that history wrote in Hebrew, or not extant before the time of Esdras, yet they admitted it into their Hagiographies; see Grot. Pref. in Tob. et Stix. Senens. in Bibl. lib. viii. where it stands placed in the Alexandrian MS. and the best editions of the LXX. The ancient Christians, who confined themselves to those books which they acknowledged, for the same reason admitted not this book into their canon, but still they paid a great regard to it as an instructive manual. Polycarp, Clemens Alexandrinus, Chrysostom, and other fathers, frequently quote and refer to it; and St. Ambrose has a whole treatise on it. We may be assured that persons of their nice discernment would not have spent their learned labours on it, nor made use of its authority, if it had been a mere drama, a parable, or an entertaining fiction only; nor have recommended the principal person in it, as a pattern worthy of imitation for his many virtues, if the character had existed only in imagination. Several councils, as those of Carthage, Florence, Trent, were so wrought on it; but though this is carrying matters too far, it shows however their sentiments of its value. They would searcly have taken into their canon a romance, or a fable, however instructive or piously designed.

I shall next consider the original language of this book: it is generally agreed that it was first written either in Hebrew or Chaldee, though the original cannot now be found. It was translated into the former, and that the original was what he saw at Constantinople; but many learned men are of a very different opinion, and think that that have been only some later version, probably made from the Greek (see Huet. Demonst. Evang. prop. 4, Fabric. Biblioth. Graec. tom. ii). It is most probable that it was written in Chaldee, which was the language of that country where Tobit was a captive. St. Jerome, having met with a Chaldee copy, employed a person that perfectly understood that language to render it into Hebrew, which himself, at the same time, translated into Latin, and his translation is that which we have in the Vulgar Latin edition of the bible. The book, itself, is supposed to have been wrote, the former part of it by Tobit himself, and the latter, almost to the conclusion, by his son Tobias; but there is no certainty of it: at least it is thought, that they left behind them memoirs of their family, and such materials as a Chaldee author afterward digested into that form in which we now have it. A late writer supposeth it to be the work of some Babylonian Jew in particular (Whiston’s Sac. Hist. vol. i). And indeed Calmet observes, that the name Raphael, which is found no where but in the book of Tobit, is of Babylonish extraction. However this be, the design of the book, when or by whomsoever wrote, was certainly commendable and good; it appears to be not so much to preserve the memoirs of a single religious family, as from the example of so good a man, exercised with a sad variety of misfortunes, and yet rising superior to them, through an assured hope of the promises made to Israel, to comfort the Jews under their captivity, and by a prospect of future blessings, to alleviate their present afflicted condition.

As to the several versions of this book, besides that of Jerome’s above mentioned, there is a Greek one much anciernter, for we find it made use of by Polycarp, Clemens Alexandrinus, and other fathers, who were before him; and from this the Syriac version is supposed to have been made, and the English one which is at present used; for Coverdale’s was apparently from the Vulgate. It is uncertain by whom the Greek version was made; that it was after that of the LXX. appears from viii. 6, which is manifestly transferred from them, and cannot any more belong to Theodotion, because Polycarp quotes from it long before that translator: it seems rather the work of some Hellenist Jew, probably one of Alexandria. The Hebrew copies of this book are thought to be comparatively of modern composition, and to have been made by Pagnius and Munster, whose names are prefixed to them; that of Pagnius approaches nearest to the Greek, and seems more pure and correct; the other, some have suspected to have been done from the Vulgate. The Latin and Greek copies vary extremely, each having some particulars which are wanting in the other. Hence some have surmised, that the history of Tobit was written twice; once more large and fully, which the Vulgate is thought to follow; and once succinctly, which the Greek copied from, or in the form which we at present have it; which if true may account for the variations mentioned. Thus much however should be observed, that the preference should be given to the Greek. As Jerome himself did not, as he acknowledges, understand Chaldee, the substance of his version was either dictated to him by some learned Jew, upon whose skill and sincerity he must depend, or, which seems improbable, was the translation of a translation, and consequently, as Huetius observes, Hinc alienum aliquis et adventitium hic adhaesisse par est suspicari (Demonst. Evang. prop. 4).

If by comparing carefully these several versions together, and critically examining the Greek text in particular, I have been so happy as to throw a new light upon passages otherwise obscure, and if I may so speak, have helped Tobit’s blindness; if the solutions which I have offered of the objections made to this history, shall in some measure contribute to clear difficulties, remove prejudice, and silence profane and foul railing, and thereby to justify the wisdom of our church in the public use of it, I shall answer my design in engaging in this work, and think my labour not misemployed.

A DISSERTATION ON THE DEMON ASMODEUS.

TRANSLATED FROM CALMET.
upon bodies and spirits in a manner yet more incomprehensible to us; that every kingdom has its angel which pre cesses it, and is the object of one of the seven angels which which watches for our good and preservation, and is assisting in the great business of our salvation, if we ourselves do not oppose their kind intentions, and frustrate the mercies of heaven in their proper forms.

But even in that which God has been pleased to discover to us, how great is the obscurity, and how many the differences with which spiritual things are repressented as corporeal. Most of the histories, which make any mention of them, have rather the air of fiction and romance than of true history. Let us examine, for instance, the history of the angel and the queeners.

We are not sure where the title of the queeners comes from that of the angel’s appearance to Balaam and his ass, the history of the demon Asmodeus before us. Satan’s tempting of Job, and the blessed Jesus himself in the wilderness, are not instances more to disquip our doubts and mutual difficulties than to dispel or remove them? God seems to have designed thereby to put bounds to our curiosity, and to turn away our attention from any matters, the knowledge of which is not so necessary for us, in order to employ the whole capacity of our minds upon more important subjects, and which have a nearer and more direct regard to the true and essential

The ancient Jews before the captivity of Babylon do not seem much to have concerned themselves in their in-quities about angels; we do not any where find that they paid any particular attention to their names or their differentiations, whether or otherwise, to them. It was not, by their own confession, till they came into Chaldea, that they learned the names of Michael, Gabriel, and Raphael, and that there were seven principal stars. It is related that the knowledge more perfect with respect to evil spirits: the name

Satan, which we sometimes meet with, is, indeed, Moscow, Beelzebub, but it seems to idol. Isaiah (xiv. 12) mentions Lucifer; but that means only the morning star, and when applied to the devil, it must only figuratively. Asmodeus seems to be the first name of a devil spirit, although perhaps, in some setures, and yet there is room to doubt whether this be a really a proper name; as we may understand the passage of Tobit, iii. 8, in this manner, viz. the evil angel, the destruction is not to the husbands, but to the name. We must be, confessed, that the natural sense of that place rather leads us to understand Asmodeus as a proper name. The Greek reads, “Asmodeus, the evil spirit”; Prosper styles him

“the most wicked”; and Maniser’s Hebræo copy,

“the prince of the devils.”

Amongst the many etymologies of the name of Asmo-deus, and an angel, which executed God’s vengeance upon the Egyptians by the ten ten plagues inflected upon that people, and upon the murmuring and rebellious Israelites also, who בקרב, which signifies “to ruin, to destroy, to exterminate, to make desolate,” &c., titles which belong but too truly to the devil, whose principal aim is to ruin and destroy the blessings of piety, to prevent good intentions, and to oppose all the gracious and merciful designs of God our Saviour towards us; in a word, who, in the mischiefs, and employs his power to make them a source of discord, confusion, and disorder through the world. St. John (Rev. iv.) mentions an evil angel, whose name in the Ne-browm is Abaddon, but in the Greek Apollyon, and in Latin, Extirminatius. It seems to be that destroying angel which executed God’s vengeance upon the Egyptians by the ten plagues inflicted upon that people, and

upon the murmuring and rebellious Israelites also, who died in the wilderness, and on the army of Sennacherib, destroyed in Palestine. It was he that stirred up the first persecutors, and hath ever since raised disturbances in the church of Christ. This is the final, who always comes to make war against it by heretics and wicked persons, who corrupt its faith and dishonour its purity, by their evil lives or promiscuous delinquencies.

It is, therefore, and the Exterminator, or destroyer, suits equally all evil spirits, it may be asked, which that in par-icular was which tormented Sara and killed her seven heathen maids. It is said that the sorts that one (I Cor. xv. 24). Some are princes and rulers, some inferior and subalterns; some preside over one vice, and some over several. There are devils of avance, and of change; demons of the air, and of waters; and monarchs of luxury. Some are concerned in foretelling future events, and giving out pretended oracles; some are employed in tempting and seducing people; others in tor-council of Trent determining it to be so.

gate: the Greek omits them.
men, extrinsic and foreign to them, they shall receive the same impressions as if they were really corporal: it is after this manner some have attempted to explain the passions of love, for instance, of the damned souls in hell, who are tormenting in material fire; viz. that that element does not act directly and immediately itself on them, but, by an effect proceeding from it, will of destruction or corruption affect their souls the same sensations of pain, as if they were really clothed with flesh and composed of matter.

The heathens, who supposed the bodies of their demons to be always visible and immediately affected from matter, were at little pains to explain how they could be affected with agreeable or bad smells. Their subtle bodies, which partake of the nature of the prismatic light, according to the law of refractions and the odour of the exercises offered in honour of them; they were fed and refreshed with the smoke of the incense and odour of the victims. But, as Porphyry observes, a wise man would be cautious how he offered such sacrifices, for fear of inviting such mischievous spirits; he advises rather to drive them away, and to cure the disease which one that is pure, uncorrupt, and unsullied. The Chaldeans, among whom the book of Tobit was written, and the Jews for whose use it was composed, were doubtless of that opinion: the demons were not absolutely engaged from all matter. They attributed to them all such sensations and impressions as belong only to beings that are corporal. Hence they made them correspondent according to their situation and presence of that people, says Tosheus, that the demon Asmodeus loved Sara, and had a passionate fondness for her beauty, and through jealous ness kept all others from coming near her. St. Jerome observes, "that in scripture one often finds things mentioned rather according to the prevailing notion of the times than they happened, than they happened after they happened. (I. E. xxviii.)"

The demons of the church were not entirely free from this error; they represent demons or spirits as having subtle bodies, and as affected with odours and other fine and pleasant objects. Origen mentions it as a thing intolerable, that demons love liquors, and the taste of flesh roasted. (Cont. Lib. iii.) He thinks that they appear in and assume the form of human beings, that they are good and evil angels. Grotius cannot help showing his spleen and indignation against those who have paid too great a deference to Aristotle, who was the first, and thus perhaps the purveyor of this opinion. Upon the supposition of their being corporeal, there will be little difficulty to explain how demons and angels may appear in a bodily shape, eat and drink, and occasion and cure several distempers; for nothing is more easy and natural than for bodies to act upon matter, and to strike the senses. I do not set very much store on those who pretend that the remick of the heart and liver of the fish drove away the demon by a natural virtue and efficacy, can maintain that sentiment, without admitting that the unclean spirit had a body and sense of their objects. I think it will never persuade any that there could be any antipathy which they held between Asmodeus and the smoke, in a spirit absolutely distinct of matter. Such a supposition is utterly forborne upon a diversity and opposition of qualities, cannot meet in beings which have such a disagreement and even contrariety between them as spirit and body have; if they could be united in substances so subtly natures as are supposed to have the same, as they equally and essentially in the properties peculiar to each.

If the effect of the smoke, of which we are speaking, is supposed to consist in the sensation which it occasioned in the person affected by it, which producing an agitation and alteration in the blood and humours, is transferred in the same manner, by taking from him the means made use of to incommode and torment the party possessed, such an opinion seems to contain nothing but what might be admitted by the most scrupulous divines, and the most exact and serious divine philosophers. If unclosely the cause of Saul's madness, it is no ways strange that the sweet sounds of David's lute, driving away that black humour, and raising his spirits, might at the same time affect the evil spirits and springs of mischief; and in that sense music might be said to bind, or however to suspend and stop his further evil designs. One may observe the like of Origen, both against the views of some of the ancients, and the views of the metaphysicians of the school of the received stylus of the possessed, the virtue of which Solomon himself, he says, first discovered to those of his nation. We are told like both the ancients, and especially the Stoics, of the effects which have the power, as it is pretended, to drive away evil spirits, and to hinder them from entering into such and such places, and that they may appear in a man, and we, Austin, who, speaking of the pernicious and odours which demons have been represented as fond of, says, "they are not fed or supported by such things as these, but by the odours of certain brought (to pass, lib. ii. cap. 39)." They are neither smoke, nor herbs, nor minerals, that drive them away and keep them in awe; but it is an error and a foolish mistake in men to think so. Even with them; or God may employ such one as the demon, who shall make use of some natural and sensible means as his instrument and assistant, whether the agent employed hath need of such natural assistance or not, or the thing he desires is a miraculous disposition and quality fit for the purpose, or derives all its virtue and efficacy from him who applies it. In the present case, he thinks the smoke of the liver and the fish is but an evil spirit, which he proves by what the angel, speaking as a man, says, "If a devil or an evil spirit trouble you, we must make a smoke thereof before the man or the woman, and the part the wrong vexed. (v. 7.) Young Tobias, who then looked upon Raphael only as a mere man, understood it in this sense; and when he said to the angel, "To what end are the heart and liver of the fish?" he thought nothing, doubtless, of any supernatural effect; one ought to believe, therefore, that Raphael spoke to him according to the sense of the matter. The same writer is of opinion, that God forewarning, in the beginning of the world, the evils which the devil would bring upon mankind, gave to certain plants a natural power and virtue to oppose and hinder these evil effects. He acknowledges, however, that nothing supernatural be fore mentioned, founded principally upon what the angel says, that the devil never returns to make a second attack upon those who have once proved themselves being in superlative, and cannot be said of any other natural one. In short, he thinks that the prayers and entreaties of Tobias, his good dispositions, and those of Sara, who had a wonderful assistance from the presence of Raphael, contributed very much to the producing such unusual and extraordinary an effect.

To suppose all this to be a parable, and understands it in a figurative sense. He neither acknowledges an evil spirit, properly so, to be concerned, nor any thing supernatural to have happened in the cure of Sara, and pretended Asmodeus, who killed seven husbands, was only some ill quality attending Sara's body, which proved mankind's death and agonized her. The Hebrews used to ascribe to the devil all the diseases which they could not account for, or assign the cause of. They thought there were devils which made persons deaf and dumb, epileptics, and other ill effects, not well understood, which medicine despaired of curing, and could not effectually reach, were, according to them, inflected by evil spirits, as appears from several passages in their scriptures. They supposed the devil, in his very essence, was of this sort; but Tobias, by using such calculations in the bridal chamber, and about his person, as were proper in that case, not only preserved himself from the fate of his predecessors, but cured his wife, likewise, of a computation of indisposition that was unknown to physic, and therefore ascribed (as the custom of the Jews was, with every distinction possible) to the devil, or Asmodeus. This is cutting the knot, as they say, and turning to novel and romance an authorized and well-grounded history, received and acknowledged as a true one by the Jews and the whole Christianity; but for that fast tract regarding saray great stress upon, the singular opinion of some modern expostors, who, without any substantial proof, have attempted to dispute the truth of this history.

But ono who hold the expiation of Asmodeus was by a supernatural power, do not entirely agree among themselves. Some assert, that the smoke of the fish was only a symbol of the prayers of Tobias and Sara, to which alone they attribute the result. But our Saviour Christ spread clay upon the eyes of the man that was born blind, and ordered him to wash in the pool of Siloam, and yet who, the next morning, Asmodeus was one of those evil spirits, which were not to be expelled but by continence and prayer, like those under the gospel, which went not out but by prayer and fasting. Other ancient authors state, that it was only as a sign when the evil spirit should be chased away. There are some also that maintain, that it was Raphael that drove away Asmodeus, and purposely concealed what was done, for the sake of the devil. In the undertone, lest Tobias should discover he was an angel, which was contrary to the intention of God, who would have Raphael hide himself with that of his father's house. Prosper ascribes the whole effect of the smoke to Jesus Christ, whose mystical name is Con; means a fish, and that it is he that drives away unclean spirits, and heals every malady. But let us press figuratively, his opinion is not to be put in the number of literal explications.

The principal proofs of those who contended here for a supernatural and medicinal power are, 1. The essential difference which there is between any thing sensible, gross, and corporeal, and a being purely intellectual. 2. The disproportion between the remedy and the disease. Bodily illneas are not cured either by applying cause corresponding to the nature of the disease, or by evacuating and taking away the humours that occasion the complaint. or by any method of expelling the burning spirit and burning again, which is to be effected various ways, either by acting directly upon the humours, and taking away the cause of the disorder, or by restoring tranquillity and cheerfulness to the body. 3. The prominent influences and has an effect upon the blood and humours, and settles them in a just and due equilibrium; or the indisposition may be an atrophy, weakness, and faintness, and then it is helped or removed by raising the spirits, and repairing, by good and wholesome nourishment, the blood and exhausted humours.

But in the case before us, none of these means could take place. Sara had no bodily illness that one knows of; the business to be done was to drive away the evil spirit which molested her, without doing her any harm, but would not suffer, or allow itself to be approached by him. The burning of the fish's entrails could not act upon the body of the demon, because he was purely spiritual, nor on his spirit, because the smoke was wholly material; besides, the entrails being cast out, it would naturally be the cause of a malady, appears to be insignificant; neither fumigations, perfumes, good or evil smells, have ever been able to drive away devils from any determinate place or person. The burning of balsam and other things, of a quick and strong scent, it sufficiently appears, from divers circumstances, that one is not to attempt to expel a spirit by the heat of the fire, but rather to effluvia, but to the efficacy of the prayers which accompany them. In short, if the smoke from the burnt entrails had a natural and sufficient efficacy to chase away the evil spirit, to what purpose were Tobias' and Sara's prayers, and their remarkable continuance? Why does Raphael say to Tobias, that the evil demon has no power to resist against them? He abandon themselves to their impulse and brutal lusts. Does a natural remedy depend upon the virtuous or evil dispositions of those who apply it? Is it possible that a man, who might strive to suppress in them carnal and sensual inclinations, and contribute to their continuance and efficacy; effects which naturalists ascribe to some plants, poisons, and odours. The same reason which as above the diet on the demon's banishment, and put it out of his power to execute his malice against Tobias, as he did against the seven others, he retired to the desert. He was deprived of his vision and passion, as a punishment and occasion of his imprisonment; and his captivity at the hands of the Hebrews, and of his present, was operated greatly to Tobias' conquest over Asmodeus, not only in discovering to him the remedy we have mentioned, and acquitting him how good and true Israelites should censure, but also, that it was done in Ragon's house, and by his presence more especially, and invincible power, which he could not resist. The scripture sufficiently intimates, that he had the greatest share in the victory, when it says, that Raphael bound Asmodeus, and put him in the parts of Egypt, which cannot be ascribed either to the smoke from the entrails of the fish, nor even to Tobias' wise conduct in this respect. For he declares that Asmodeus, of her mainly consisted chiefly in these three particulars: 1. In the discovery of so singular and extraordinary a remedy as we have mentioned. 2. In opening the way of the disease, for the sake of the demon, to the hands of theendeaged Sara, and pointing out the means to render his impotent and ineffectual. Lastly, in the supernatural assistance which Raphael invisibly gave Tobias on the occasion, and saving them, and so the demon a great way off, in a manner never heard of before.

The only thing which remains at present to be examined is, the manner of their captivity and their deliverance from the desert of the upper Egypt. The Greeks adds, that Raphael claimed victory over Asmodeus, who, smeling the smoke of the burnt liver, fled into the upper Egypt. But neither the one nor the other makes mention of the angel's seizing him, as the Vulgate does; which is not to be understood in the scripture, where the devil is spoken of almost in the same sense: for instance, our Saviour says, "No man can enter into a strong man's house and spoil his goods, except he first bind the strong man and cast out the devil." Wherefore, "the dragon, that old serpent, which is the devil and Satan," is laid hold on by an angel, and bound for a thousand years (xx. 2). St. Peter, speaking of the fall of the apostate angels, says, that "God cast them down into hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness, to be reserved unto judgment" (2 Pet. ii. 4) and St. Jude, "That the angels which kept not their first estate are reserved in everlasting chains, under darkness, unto the judgment of the great day." (ver. 6). None of these expressions were ever understood of a real confinement, or material chains, to bind the devil. But it is to be understood as if Satan was cast out of a superior force, which continued them in their torments, and stopped the violent effects of their fury and malice.

St. August, explaining the manner how evil spirits may be bound, signifies that when the angel of the Lord opens the way, when applied to these enemies of mankind, then that he have liberty or permission to do mischief, or have not the liberty to devour the children. But Tobias, as he says, "for he does not deprive the world now, as formerly, by idolatry. Since the gospel of Jesus Christ hath been preached through the whole world, our Saviour has bound the strong man, entered into his house, and cast away spirits which were trusted, and spoiled his goods. Raphael, with respect to Asmodeus, was as a mighty conqueror, who disposes of his captive at his pleasure, lays him in chains, or sends him into banishment where he pleases. That archangel, by the command of God, ordered him to lie away; he signified to him that he should not mouse those miseries for which he had been hurt: he then set him free, and left him to be bound or confined from doing farther mischief. St. Austin very well compares him to a great mastiff, tied up and chained, who growsis angry, and shows an inclination to break away, but at the same time is forever to be bound or confined or doing farther mischief. Neither would he have given himself over to the devil, but for this: be, neither religion nor good sense will permit us to ascribe, either to the devil himself, or any of his subalterns, much credit to magicians, impostors, and imposture and exceptions. All the masons, powers, and force of the devil, after his exultation, and his not being the place where the Asmodeus was banished to, was the desert of the upper Egypt; a soil dry, sandy, uncultivated, and almost entirely uninhabited; as it never rains there, and the overgrowths of the Nile cannot there, by reason of the mountains and its high situation, it must of course be barren. St. Jerome intimates, that it abounds with serpents and venomous creatures. This frightful desert would for ever have continued in abhorrence and oblivion, if it had not been visited, and as it were consecrated, by a great number of religious hermits, who by their noblest and venerable life, and by the sublime benediction and abhorrence of it into a delicious paradise; a place particularly favoured, and where Jesus Christ displays the greatest and most sensible effects of his grace and power. The devil, on the other hand, could not live, or continue for a time there, any longer than the necessities of the case made it. The scripture does not mention for how long time Asmodeus continued banished in the upper Egypt, but we may be assured that it was not for ever, either to the justice or to the mercy of God. The banishment of Asmodeus, and his return to the place where the Lord had permitted any person to be tempted, the tempter's power is limited to that person, and to the place where he lives.

It is only God that commands the evil spirits, and has a right to fix the places and times when and where they may exact their power. He alone can act bounds to their malice, and stop its mischievous effects when he judges proper. It is true, indeed, that both angels and men have sometimes made use of the same power in confining evil spirits, and stopping the progress of their rage and violence; but neither angels nor men could effect this by any proper power of their own, they acted only by the appointment of God, and in his name. It was thus Raphaeus subduing Asmodeus; it was thus Michael the archangel stopped the attempt of the devil to enter in and subdue the Lord Jesus Christ. No other than the Devil himself, nor any other, nor any reprimand than "the Lord rebuke thee." It was thus holy martyrs and confessors of old, and our exorcists at this day, control evil spirits, and limit the exact period of it was done in the name and by the power of Jesus Christ.

Not so the magicians, who boast of their power over evil spirits, that they can at pleasure stop their operations, and make them confine their action, change their estate, live in a circle or chamber, and others in their places. One cannot say that magicians act in the name of God, and make use of his authority over evil spirits; much less that they act against the permission of God, and in spite of him; for who can resist his will? We cannot help thinking, therefore, that this pretended power of magicians over evil spirits is purely chimerical and imaginary; or that God, by a secret but most terrible judgment, permits for a time, that those miseries which the devil might exact, and which our service, should become slaves of the devil, who wickedly deceives them by an appearance of submission, which he obsequiously pays to them, whilst in truth he tyrannizes over them, and devours them as he pleases, to make them miserable slaves. It is not impossible that but the devil may exercise such a sort of authority over his subjects, as to command them to execute the will of such wicked magicians, as have given themselves over to him, but however this be, neither religion nor good sense will permit us to ascribe, either to the devil himself, or any of his subalterns, much credit to magicians, impostors, and imposture and exceptions. All the masons, powers, and force of the devil, after his exultation, and his not being the place where the Asmodeus was banished to, was the desert of the upper Egypt; a soil dry, sandy, uncultivated, and almost entirely uninhabited; as it never rains there, and the overgrowths of the Nile cannot there, by reason of the mountains and its high situation, it must of course be barren. We cannot help thinking, therefore, that this pretended power of magicians over evil spirits is purely chimerical and imaginary; or that God, by short, if what is said be true, we cannot help acknowledging something miraculous in the creature. Some have thought that it might possibly be the demon Asmodæus, whose abode we mentioned to be in these parts. One could wish it could be certainly known how long it is since it first appeared there, for the ancients say nothing of it. Or possibly the whole may be only invention, to embellish the traveler, and to entertain and amuse credulous readers (Luccar* Voyage into the Levant, tum. i. cap. 9. 14).

As I have already pointed out some errors of the Romans, couched in this Dissertation, it may not be amiss, at the conclusion of it, to take notice, that in the old Roman Missal, and also in the Missal of Sarum, there is a proper mark, after the Hebrew, to distinguish the following rubric, by way of preface to it, grounded plainly on this history:—

"The following office of Raphael the archangel may be celebrated for pilgrims or travellers; that as he conducted and brought back (in his journey) Tobias safe and sound, so he would bring back those for whom the mass is said."

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. The book of the words of Tobit.* Ekidos tov lógyon. Lógoi often stands for things; thus Sophocles, vsi epéngwa vàvèo aúto eis tote,皰 the archangel Raphael, with the following rubric, was curiously a word and a thing, and is rendered both by ἔργα and λόγοι. See Exod. viii. 12. 1 Kings xiv. 19. Eccles. i. 1. Mark i. 45. Luke iii. 27. 15. ἔργα τοῦ γεγονότος, i. e. "this thing doth happen." The design of which is to shew here and by acts. The Hebrew versions, and Syriac, and the Alexandrian MS. differ in the following genealogy; the Vulgate wholly omits it. Our translators follow the Rom. and Completers.

Ver. 2. Who in the time of Enmessar king of the Assyrians was led captive, &c.] The first book of Chronicles, v. 26, tells us, that God stirred up Pol and Tithlah, the kings of Assyria, against the impious Israelitish, and that the latter carried them away from beyond Jordan, and sent them into the countries of Halah, Habor, and Harat, and to the river Gozan. And this book adds, that the tribe of Nephthali, of which Tobit was, being carried away by En-nessar, who is the same with Shishmaneser, as the margin has it, was placed in the province of Media, and himself at Nineweh. It is plain from hence, that there was a double invasion, and a double captivity of the Israelitish. Of this second captivity we must necessarily understand this place, which was thirty years after that by Tithlah-Fleezer. In the same manner, the last translation, Tobit was carried away captive with many others, being then, as is supposed, about forty-four years old, with his wife and young Tobias, A. M. 390, or 214 B.C. about fifteen years, or two days of the tribe of Nephthali, which is called properly Nephthali in Galilee."

That city which is called properly Nephthali in Galilee,"

"properly," Koloss. Where is there such a Greek word so used? All other translations have it as a proper name, Cydirios, or some such like. The Alexandrian MS. has Κολοσσαῖοι, which Graece alters for Koloss. Calmet thinks the reading might be Koloss. This is thought to be the same with that which was otherwise called Kedesh-Nephthali, and so the margin explains it. This being the principal city in the tribe of Nephthali, in the more early times, for brevity's sake, it was called Nephthali. It was not only a Levitical city, but also one of the Great Cities of refuge on the west side of Jordan. It is the opinion of the learned, founded on Isa. ix. 1—3, compared with Matt. iv. 14, that as the land of Galilee, or of Zebulon and Nephthali, had the misfortune to suffer there that which was to be suffered by the other tribes from the Assyrians, so, in recompense of that misery which they suffered above the rest of their brethren, they had the first and choicest share of the presence and conversation of the Messiah in his life; as the Jewish Church was delivered from their miseries by grace, and accordingly, we see actually fulfilled in the gospel. In like manner it may be presumed, and from many passages in this book (see the notes. v. 14.) it seems probable, that To-bit, and others of the faithful Jewish Christians were enchanted in their captivity a distant prospect of this glorious appearing, and of the happy state of the church under it.

Ver. 3. Tobit being blind all the days of his life, in the way of truth and justice, and I did many alms-deeds to my brethren, and my nation, who came with me to Nineweh into (the land of the Assyrians.) Tobit here in person relates his own history; and so the other versions, the Hebrew, Syriac, Greek, and the ancient Latin, all read in the first person; the Vulgate only differs, which from hence to the end of the third chapter, runs in the third person. One may observe that Tobit's misfortunes never induce him to leave the way of virtue; but his charity to his brethren, under the same captivity, is most extraordinary and ammisifying. Human presence proceeds upon maxims very differ-et; it is natural for a captive, at a distance from his country, and reduced in his circumstances, to manage and reserve the little remainder to subsist himself and family, and to think that such a way of proceeding may be the best way to bring poverty upon himself; but Tobit's faith judged otherwise, and had a respect unto the recompense of the reward. St. Anbrouse's character of him is very just: "He bore with humble patience absence from his own country, and the loss of his goods occasioned by it, and was more sensibly affected with the afflictions of his brethren than his own; he regarded not as his private property what he had hitherto acdquired, but distributed it to the necessities of his follow-captives, esteeming only what he himself suffered as his due, and the just punishment of his sins. He was every where and at all things submissive to the will of God, without listening to the motions of self-love, or the suggestions of partial and corrupt nature." (In Tob. cap. 1. tom. 1.)

Ver. 5. Now all the tribes which together revolved, and the house of my father Nephthali, sacrificed unto the heifer Baal.]

For distinction's sake, Baal had particular titles and different names; here we translate him Baal, or in some other diverted form, to point out to us what Baal is meant, viz. the heifer, or calf of Beth-el, or rather Dan, which was near to the tribe of Nephthali. The margin renders, 'to the power of Baal,' as it the reading was, τού Βααλ ἀξίως ἀξίως, with a sentiment which might be more justly conveyed, by the word 'strength,' as in the following verses, τοῦ βασιλεία τού Βααλ, and consequently by a verb of strength. This is determined from many passages of scripture (see Exod. xvi. 11. Deut. xxxii. 37.) but then such a title does not belong, nor was usually given, to false gods or idols, who are always styled μαγγαλ, or their name is not mentioned. It was the word used, even when Baal was called the name of the God of the Canaanites, and very improperly so, it is observable, that Aquila, in his version, renders 'Eli, Eli,' which in the LXX. in β Ελλακτιν, β Ελλακτιν (Ps. xxxi. 11). by λέγεται, λέγεται. That God is called 'the Strength,' or 'the King,' or 'the God of the kings,' is an expression brought from man which it followed in our version, τοι Βααλ, τοι ἀξίως, i.e. to the idol or image of Baal, with the form or resemblance of a hither. And so Jer. v. 23. Hos. xiii. 1, where the LXX. renders τοι Βααλ, τοι ἀξίως ἀξίως, μετὰ μεταβολήν, and in general, it is observable that Baal is here expressed in the feminine gender; besides the common one, the learned Selden assigns these two particular reasons: 1. That Baal was ἐξαρχαίος, "male and benign," like the Egyptian gods, the Syrian Ashtoreth, and others of those images, which antiquity worshipped, who were indifferently gods or goddesses among those nations who adopted their figures. 2. The Jews, Aραβειον, "Terribl. Apol. 1. 15."

3. The Egyptians, and other idolatrous nations that worshipped images, preferred, according to Herodotus, feminim bos, before other animals, because they were the figures of their worships, styled them θησεως or νεανιας (De Dies Syns, Συναγ., 1. To these I shall subjoin a third reason, comtemmed by Bochart and our Father Oliver. 5. Baco.
6. Ver. 7. 1. He spoke expressly of the Egyptians, or (Ex. St. Paul Rom. xi. 4) speak of Baal in the feminine gender, it is by way of ridicule and contempt. The like may be observed of the calves of Dan and Bethel, which, being inspired writers (2 Kings x. 29. Hos. x. 5), are styled κατα θησειν, not that they were always of that sex, but by way of contempt, and to expose them the more; like that of Virgil, Ο νεανίς Φεργελς, οὐκ είναι θησειν.—(C. i. 11.)
Ver. 6. But I alone went often to Jerusalem at the fasts, as it was ordained unto all the people of Israel by an hallowed decree. As the whole body of the people conspired with that idolatry which Jeroboam set up and authorized as the national religion, except a small remnant of the faithful in Israel, which bowed not to Baal; so too, in the great number of the tribe of Tobit, that amidst the great number of the inhabitants, that together revolted, he kept himself undetected, and free from the general offence; especially as he was not inhabitable, nor could be led away by any power of example. For it is a proof of an uncommon degree of virtue to live untainted in the midst of surrounding wickedness, and to preserve the purity of his heart, the time of his pilgrimage. But when it is here said, that Tobit alone kept himself from idolatry, and went to the regular and appointed place of worship at Jerusalem, at the usual time and season, it may be supposed that he was on a particular mission, mentioned above, which he had to perform at Jerusalem, and making their offerings together at the temple of the habitation of the most High. This expression, therefore, is to be understood like that concerning Elipha, 1 Kings xxi. 11.
Having the first-fruits and tenth of increase, with that which was first born; and them gave I at the altar, to the priests the children of Aaron. Ver. 7, 8. The first tenth part of all that I got of the children of Aaron, who ministered at Jerusalem; another tenth part I sold away, and went, and spent it every year at Jerusalem: And the third I gave unto the priests the children of Levi, for these verses were not omitted, so that unregular and unmethodical way of bringing unto God, or his ministers the tithes, which things were to be offered to him, to the payment of which the Jews were obliged, was condemned. But this, though it was contrived out of the fruits of the earth, particularly corn: as also the firstlings, and tenth of their flock, and of the wool of their sheep, which were paid in kind to the priests themselves at the temple; than the first-tenth, called here "the first tenth part of all increase," viz. of wine, one, olives, and other fruits of the earth; this was given unto the Levites, and was always paid in kind. But the learned differ whether it was always it was brought up to Jerusalem, as some assert, or paid unto the Levites in the several cities of tillage, as others conclude from Neh. x. 37. The decision prins of firstfruits being paid, the people paid out of that which remained the second tenth, the ἐξαρχαῖον, or "the second tenth part," as it is here called: this they might either pay in kind, or by way of commutation give them in the form of a rent or tithes. This ten per cent, it may be rendered, the tithe of the third year, was called the "poor man's tithe." this the possessor carried not to Jerusalem, but spent it at home within his own territory, the fruit of the earth, the wheat, and the corn (Deut. xx. 28, 29. 12. 13. Hence these sorts of tithes were called ἐξαρχαῖοι. So that the first and second tithes were paid by the people, the third in years after the sabbatical year; but upon the third and sixth only the first tithe was paid to the Levites, and the second was spent or distri-butated at home, and given unto them to whom it was most;
÷. i. e. to widows, orphans, and strangers, as Manaster's copy has it; or for the repairs of the house of God, as that of Fagius. St. Chrysostom, speaking of the liberal maintenance of the Levites among the people, and of Titus (says he) how much the Jews gave to their priests and Levites—as, first-fruits, tithes, then tenth again, then other tithes, yet no man at that time envied them, or said they had or ate too much" (Cl. et F. p. 249.) Ver. 10, 11. And when we were carried away captives to Ninive, all my heathen and those that lived among them either did eat of the food of the Gentiles, or else (says he) kept myself from eating: Many of them that were carried away by Tiglath-pileser, Salsamassar, and Assur-haddon, still retained the true worship of God, and maintained the ordained law, and fell not into the idolatrous usages and impieties of the heathens, among whom they were dispersed. It is certain, from the instances of Daniel and his associates, Ezekias, the Maccaeuses, and others (Dan. i. 3. Judith xii. 2, 3, that the Jews, from the time of their captivity, when they could not avoid conversing with the gentiles, were careful to abstain, not only from things really sacrificed to idols, but from most thingsthat came out of gentle hands; because there was a presumption, that a part of all kinds, by way of firstfruits, had been offered to idols, that all was polluted, as dedicated likewise to the idol. It appears, therefore, that they forsook, from such an apprehension, all meats and drinks that came from the gentiles, out of superstition and vanity; and the Jews tell us, that Nehemiah, being eunuch to the king, was dispensed with from tasting or drinking the wine of the gentiles. The like is recorded here, which, though it was not fully known to him, in all probability he was obliged to provide corn, and all necessaries for the king's use, yet kept clear of all defilement, as Joseph did upon a like occasion in Egypt (Gen. xiii. 32.) "The example of Tobit's resolution and constancy in this particular, makes one to reflect with tears (say Messieurs de Port-Royal) upon the weakness of Adam, who, being perfectly free, and the general use of the creatures indispensible to our nourishment; or, we will not offer any one to God which had forbidden him: whilst Tobit, a captive, deprived of all his possess-sions, in the midst of idolaters, and even living among Jews, who scrupled not occasionally, to eat things for bidden by their law, preserved his innocence by a religious abstinence" (Com. in loc.) Ver. 12. Because I remembered God with all my heart."
Our version manifestly refers to the foregoing verse, and assigns his great regard to God as the reason for Tobit's not causing forbidden meats: and indeed this sense is a very just one, as the personal law was never suffered to interfere with the divine from God, and was the rule for every Jew's conduct. But there is another sense of the place, supported by good authority, "That because of his great pity, God had succored him in his distress; and I will not leave him," referring to the following verse. And thus the Vulg. understands it, quoniam mentor fab Domini in tim-cord suo, Deus debit illum gratiam; because of his love, distant rem. and Fagius' Hebrew copy is to the same effect.
The like is mentioned of Daniel, i. 9. But people, in the following verse, may signify also an engaging man, something in his looks and gestures that gave the king a liking to him.
Ver. 14. I went into Media, and left in trust with Ga-bard, the brother of Gabries, at Ragas a city of the province of Media, ten talents of silver: The Vulgate intimates, that Tobit lent this sum to Gabael, and took his note of hand for it; but the Greek and Hebrew versions import, that he only lodged it with him, and took a receipt for it. This seems most probable, as it is here said, that he committed such a sum to his trust; and
ix. 5, that Gabael brought out the money in bags scaled up, upon Raphael's authority,性和 the handwriting. It may seem strange, that Tobit, knowing Gabael to be poor, should lodge such a considerable sum of money with him as ten talents; but it is probable that he charged Gabael at Rages, and secured himself in his notes or receipts, and fixed that sum with him at Nine-ve, where it might be in some danger; or possibly he might permit him to traffic with it upon a promissory note to return it when able; it is perhaps the safest, or the most usual, of all the instances of

The talents of silver.] If one was sure of the original language, whether Hebrew or Chaldee, this book was written in, it would greatly help to connect the sentences. Thus, for instance, if the Hebrew word for talent בַשָּׁהֶם was-supposed to be in the original, it would not necessarily bear the sense of ἀναφέρειν in Greek, but might only signify the mention of it, which would have been made in those days. And thus I would expound ἀναφέρειν talentum argentum, 2 Kings v. 23, begged of Naaman by Gehazi. It might be, I think, more properly rendered massa, or frustre—nothing; and it would be most natural to understand this as meaning talents: unless it be reasonable to believe, that Gehazi would ask in his master's name, for the entertainment of two thousand shekels of silver, and four hundred pounds of our money, or that Naaman would lend him, with between seven and eight hundred pounds of silver in specie. But if Tobit was wrote originally in Greek, we must believe that he passed through a Greek translator to a Latin translator, which is expressed so peculiarly called, the least of which amounted to a great sum. Bishop Cumberland compares a Hebrew talent of silver at 5321. 11s. 10d. of our money; consequently, ten such talents amount to 5321. 18s. 9d. But then possibly this passage is not understood of the Hebrew, but only of the Greek or Attic talent, which was but half the value. As it was nearly the same with the Babylonian talent, as the learned say, it might be nearly the same with that in use in Assyria and Media too; and this will reduce the sum to one-half of the former, viz. to 1700. 13s. 4d. of our money, which was precisely the weight of one of the lesser Attic talents. For when nothing is added to specify talentum, say the antiquaries, the then current or lesser Attic talent is always meant, consisting of six thousand drachmae; in this their mistaken notion of the lesser Attic talent, the sum will not seem so improbable, especially as Tobit had been the king's purveyor.

Ver. 15. When Enemessar was dead, Senachemar his son restored the city, that had so long been laid waste, except that he could not go into Media.] From the time of Pul, or Tiglath-pileser, the Medes continued in subjection to the Assyrians, but under Senachemar, the Assyrian monarchy fell into decay, either by his irreparable or carnal fortune, or a mixture of both. The Medes taking advantage, it is likely, of his long and distant absence, or perhaps upon the new settling and removing of his army, or deeply revolted, and were never after reduced in like manner to the Assyrian yoke, though Esar-haddon in the course of his reign seems to have been both a valorous and fortunate prince, as well as a judicious and enlarging the censors. These are the troubles which prevented Tobit from going into Media according to his custom, or intention. But the Greek καθαρο δεπον ευσχευσε, will perhaps admit of another rendering: viz. And the Medes either were troubled, infested, or dangerous, so that there was no getting safely into Media. Munster's Hebrew copy, with this interpretation, is much understood, proper bidders in Media, it not being safe to venture in that Medorain. The margin offers a third reading, but it carries not so determinate a meaning as either of the former.

Ver. 16. And in the time of Enemessar Fagius' Hebrew copy, the Greek, and Syriac, agree with our version, but the Vulgate and Munster both omit these words. And indeed it may be an expression, as well as a judicious enlargement of Enemessar's death, and Senachemar's succeeding, and the account of his kingdom being disturbed with civil commotions, to resume the account of Enemessar. Calmet, expressly of opinion, that what follows here of Tobit's charity regards the times after Enemessar, who had some compassion for the Israelites, when there were not so many public interferences of distress; but Senachemar treated them with the utmost cruelty and rigour, which gave Tobit many opportunities to show his zeal, and exercise his charity towards his distressed brethren.

Ver. 17. And there was a famine in Egypt, when he was come, and fled from Judea, &c. Senachemar, after his return to Nineveh, being inflamed with rage for his great misfortune, in having lost his gold, and a hundred thousand of his men, by the angel of the Lord smiting them, as if he would revenge himself of this accident upon his subjects, was seen to manifest himself accordingly, very cruel and tyrannical in his government; especially on and towards the Jews, numbers of whom he caused every day to be slain and cast into the streets, in defiance of all dec edoms of his country, and all consideration of the present and future happiness of men and nations. I married them prixly, &c. St. Ambrose, speaking of this charitable action of Tobit's, says, 'that there is not a more excellent duty than to do good to them that cannot return the same service. This is the justest revenge that can be taken from our enemies, the wrongs done to us are of themselves the most indifferent heinous; the wrongs done to them are just blow from their own hand, and they must bear the violence of the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field.' (Lib. de Tob.) It was always held an act of justice and mercy to bury the dead; of justice, that earth may be restored to earth, the first mother of mercy, that bodies might not be exposed to the spoiler and the raven, and of mercy, the honour of burial, was among the ancients held one of the greatest punishments that could be inflicted; and with this Jehovah, the son of Josiah, is threatened, Jer. xxix. 19. And the distress occasioned by this famine, was so great, that it even taught the bearers of the dead to be so great and increased, that as he should be left a prey to the birds and beasts (Ezn. lib. ix.), And Messiah, in the same writer, does not desire Manasse to appear his kinsman; he should be left to such a distres of the dead and of the living (Ezn. lib. xii.). Turnus earnestly entreats for the same favour from Zanes (Ezn. lib. xii.). The right of sepulchre being sacred by all nations, the king's body was only, with a least of which amounted to a great sum. Bishop Cumberland compares a Hebrew talent of silver at 5321. 11s. 10d. of our money; consequently, ten such talents amount to 5321. 18s. 9d. But then possibly this passage is not understood of the Hebrew, but only of the Greek or Attic talent, which was but half the value. As it was nearly the same with the Babylonian talent, as the learned say, it might be nearly the same with that in use in Assyria and Media too; and this will reduce the sum to one-half of the former, viz. to 1700. 13s. 4d. of our money, which was precisely the weight of one of the lesser Attic talents. For when nothing is added to specify talentum, say the antiquaries, the then current or lesser Attic talent is always meant, consisting of six thousand drachmae; in this their mistaken notion of the lesser Attic talent, the sum will not seem so improbable, especially as Tobit had been the king's purveyor.

Ver. 15. When Enemessar was dead, Senachemar his son restored the city, that had so long been laid waste, except that he could not go into Media. From the time of Pul, or Tiglath-pileser, the Medes continued in subjection to the Assyrians, but under Senachemar, the Assyrian monarchy fell into decay, either by his irreparable or carnal fortune, or a mixture of both. The Medes taking advantage, it is likely, of his long and distant absence, or perhaps upon the new settling and removing of his army, or deeply revolted, and were never after reduced in like manner to the Assyrian yoke, though Esar-haddon in the course of his reign seems to have been both a valorous and fortunate prince, as well as a judicious and enlarging the censors. These are the troubles which prevented Tobit from going into Media according to his custom, or intention. But the Greek καθαρο δεπον ευσχευσε, will perhaps admit of another rendering: viz. And the Medes either were troubled, infested, or dangerous, so that there was no getting safely into Media. Munster's Hebrew copy, with this interpretation, is much understood, proper bidders in Media, it not being safe to venture in that Medorain. The margin offers a third reading, but it carries not so determinate a meaning as either of the former.

Ver. 16. And in the time of Enemessar Fagius' Hebrew copy, the Greek, and Syriac, agree with our version, but the Vulgate and Munster both omit these words. And indeed it may be an expression, as well as a judicious enlargement of Enemessar's death, and Senachemar's succeeding, and the account of his kingdom being disturbed with civil commotions, to resume the account of Enemessar. Calmet, expressly of opinion, that what follows here of Tobit's charity regards the times after Enemessar, who had some compassion for the Israelites, when there were not so many public interferences of distress; but Senachemar treated them with the utmost cruelty and rigour, which gave Tobit many opportunities to show his zeal, and exercise his charity toward his distressed brethren.

Ver. 17. And there was a famine in Egypt, when he was come, and fled from Judea, &c. Senachemar, after his return to Nineveh, being inflamed with rage for his great misfortune, in having lost his gold, and a hundred thousand of his men, by the angel of the Lord smiting them, as if he would revenge himself of this accident upon his subjects, was seen to manifest himself accordingly, very cruel and tyrannical in his government; especially towards the Jews, numbers of whom he caused every day to be slain and cast into the streets, in defiance of all decrees of his country, and all consideration of the present and future happiness of men and nations. I married them prixly, &c. St. Ambrose, speaking of this charitable action of Tobit's, says, 'that there is not a more excellent duty than to do good to them that cannot return the same service. This is the justest revenge that can be taken from our enemies, the wrongs done to us are of themselves the most indifferent heinous; the wrongs done to them are just blow from their own hand, and they must bear the violence of the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field.' (Lib. de Tob.) It was always held an act of justice and mercy to bury the dead; of justice, that earth may be restored to earth, the first mother of mercy, that bodies might not be exposed to the spoiler and the raven, and of mercy, the honour of burial, was among the ancients held one of the greatest punishments that could be inflicted; and with this Jehovah, the son of Josiah, is threatened, Jer. xxix. 19. And the distress occasioned by this famine, was so great, that it even taught the bearers of the dead to be so great and increased, that as he should be left a prey to the birds and beasts (Ezn. lib. ix.), And Messiah, in the same writer, does not desire Manasse to appear his kinsman; he should be left to such a distress of the dead and of the living (Ezn. lib. xii.). Turnus earnestly entreats for the same favour from Zanes (Ezn. lib. xii.). The right of sepulchre being sacred by all nations, the king's body was only, with The very heathens counted this the greatest calamity, and such as hindered the deceased from entering into a state of happiness: hence probably it was that Patroclus, in the same spirit, did not return to look to the body to bury it. The like earnest suit does Paulinus in Virgil put up to Enescus for the same reason. Horace brings in a dead corpse, promising a reward from Jupiter to him that should do the work. The judges of Athenes, from doing this good work of humanity, that no sacrifice should be able to expiate the crime. And because want of burial was counted one of the greatest disgrace and punishments that could be inflicted on the dead, hence self-murderers were debarred the privilege of interment (see St. Austin de Caru pro mortuis gerendis, and Spenman de Supputatur, 2 Ed. ii. 23). Ver. 5. Then before I had tasted of any meat, I started up, and took him up into a room until the going down of the sun. Then I returned, and washed myself, and ate my meat in betimes. He rose immediately upon his son's death, as did Isaac by the order of Abraham, from which he had invited many Israeldites, the children of his people; his piety would not permit him to feed and refresh his own body as long as the corpse of a deceased countryman and brother lay publicly exposed and unburied. Not putatbat piam, ut ipse iucum sanerem, erat in publico cor- poris occursum examinare!" (Lib. de Tob. 1. Tobiah. It has been mat- ter of inquiry, especially among the commentators, whether Tobit himself removed the dead body, and whether he carried it to his own house or to one in the neighbour- hood. His readiness indeed to do such an act of kindness appears by the words, that the corpse was taken up by Tobit himself, that took up the dead corpse, though he might use the ceremony of washing himself before he returned to meat, as is here affirmed of him, yet how could he escape notori- ously, if his polluted body was so long exposed? And when is what is mentioned Nah. x. 11, "that he that toucheth a dead body, shall be unclean seven days!" It has therefore been thought more reasonable to suppose, both on account of the pollution attending such an act, and from the consideration of his own safety, which would have been endangered if he did it. But he did not himself refer to the dead body to be removed out of sight by others; or if he did do this, says Calmet, we must suppose that he ate his meat at his return separate, and by himself; and perhaps by such an act he desired to seem to intimate his being thus lonely and apart. And for the like reason they have concluded that it was carried to another's and not his own house. Our version adds it is probable that the Romans and other Greek authors expressly read a rhogicis, in domum quamnum, as Junius renders.

Ver. 6. Remembering that prophecy of Amos, as he said, Your feasts shall be turned into mourning, and all your mirth into lamentation. Therefore I wept. Amos prophesied under the reign of Oziad king of Judah, and Jer"niah king of Israel. Let a corpse more years before the event here mentioned. It appears from hence, that Tobit read the scriptures with great attention, and that he occasionally applied what he read. Amos is the angel referred to echother forstels the misery of the captivity, in which Tobit and his countrymen were involved under the Assyrians, which Tobit then saw and bewailed the accomplishment of. or he was able to be present in person at the prophecy, to be present unhappy state and circumstances, when, instead of celebrating their feasts with joy and gladness, as usual in their own country, they groased under the yoke and slavery of the Chaldeans, being the post of their freedom and liberty and commendable right of burying their murdered countrymen, without manifestly incurin the danger of their lives. A spirit full of tenderness and compassion. The history of Tobit, especially with respect to the national calamity, is an example to all such melancholy junctures; the reflection on his own danger, and the continual injures his brethren were exposed to, called forth such acts of charity, as one of these sins and idolatry which had provoked God to deliver his chosen into captivity, and to inflict such heavy judgments upon them.

Ver. 7. If the going down of the sun I went and made a grave, and buried him. But my neighbours mocked me, and said, This man is not yet afraid to be put to death for this matter: who fed away, do ye, and wait? And let a corpse remain seven years before the event. What, then, considered the sins and idolatry which had provoked God to deliver his chosen into captivity, and to inflict such heavy judgments upon them. But the last kind office to an unfortunate stranger, when even the high-priest among the Jews, though he was not to be present in person at the prophecy, by chance he found a dead corpse, was obliged to bury it self. The primitive Christians were remarkable for the like kindness; so that some of our old writers, from doing this charitable office to their deceased brethren, especially such who died martyrs for the faith. The Roman clergy, in an epistle to them of Carthage (Epist. 2. int. 3.), says, Let a corpse remain seven years before the event. Can it be possible then, that this instance of charity, above that of relieving the poor, or ministering to the sick; and that fidelity in this matter was highly acceptable to God, and rewarded by him. Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, speaking of the plague which reigned there, commends the Christians for carrying out their dead brethren, which they cheerfully did, notwithstanding the great danger that attended it. St. Ambrose's sentiments on this occasion are very fine and moving: Si vivantes operatae omnium, quarum magis debemus operare defuntorum corporibus? Si vinties ad longiora deducere solemus? I recollect of one on the contrary, under which vales, unde jam non revolut? nihil habere praestantis, et concreer, qui tibi jam non potest reddere, vindicare a volu-tibus, vindicare a bestias consortium natura, Fierunt hanc in urbe, ne cum clamor omnium coram curulis deduce prodeatur; homines negabant! (cap. 1, 2.)

Ver. 9. The same night also I returned from the burial, and slept by the wall of my court-yard, being polluted. St. Ambrose says, that he slept in cubiculo suo, "in his chamber," but it seems most probable, from the accident which is related afterward, that he repose himself in the court-yard, as his body, as the saying is, had been polluted. But what is mentioned is Nah. x. 11, "that he that toucheth a dead body, shall be unclean seven days!" It has therefore been thought more reasonable to suppose, both on account of the pollution attending such an act, and from the consideration of his own safety, which would have been endangered if he did it. But he did not himself refer to the dead body to be removed out of sight by others; or if he did do this, says Calmet, we must suppose that he ate his meat at his return separate, and by himself; and perhaps by such an act he desired to seem to intimate his being thus lonely and apart. And for the like reason they have concluded that it was carried to another's and not his own house. Our version adds it is probable that the Romans and other Greek authors expressly read a rhogicis, in domum quamnum, as Junius renders.

Vol. II. -157
means prescribed in the law, which he intended to make his, and so would pass the night till the time out of his house, as every thing or person that touched one thus divested was made impure thereby.

Ver. 10. And I knew not that there were sparrows in the wall. Tobit had open eyes, and without expressed wonder or amazement, dangled into mine eyes, and a whiteness came in mine eyes: and I went to the physicians, but they helped me not. I think we need not ask here with the commentators whether Tobit's eyes were open or not. This text implies expressly his eyes were open, and his face uncovered. The author of the Synopsis, attributed to Aelianus, mentions that Tobit's eyes were open. In the next line, one or more people are known to do, particularly such as walk in their sleep. If Tobit's eyes were open, either naturally or by accident at this time, it is easy then to comprehend, says Calmet, that the physicians might fall under a mistake. And this is the account here mentioned; for the excrescences of these birds, according to some naturalists (Pliny, lib. xi. cap. 37. Gesner, Hist. Anim. lib. lin.), is extremely hot and acrimonious, and they cannot blind or make anything blind in the eye, and occasioning an inflammation there; and though the sect seems not to have been known to the Assyrian physicians, as here are called, yet it is not found by a successful method to remove this obstacle of vision, by the dexterity of couching. As to the remedy which Raphael employed to restore Tobit's sight, which this place prepared, there is no certain notion which makes naturally produce such an effect when we come to that chapter.

Novero Achiacharus dec nourish me, until I went into Elymas. The commentators are divided, whether this is to be understood of a physician or seer; and it is probable Tobit himself is meant, as he continues to speak in the first person. The sense is, That Achiachar took care of Tobit under this infirmity, till he (Achiachar) went into Elymas, and by some accident fell into disgrace, and deprived of his place and dignity (ch. xiv.) It appears from some parts of this history (ch. xi. xiv.), that Tobit had taken good care of him; and it is likely this was done with the true holy desire, therefore, I presume to be eylouos, which Drusius and Grotius both prefer, and Junius renders accordingly, Achiachar verò alit me, done prospectus esset in Elymas. This word is taken from Ecclus. xlv. 18. LXX. in the Septuagint, where ἐναρέσασθαι should be rather εὐαρέσασθαι, to answer to the Hebrew.

Ver. 11. And my wife Anna did take women's works to do, and brought in her husband to recover his sight, and was employed by his nephew Achiachar. It may seem surprising that Tobit, who before had lived in good condition, should fall into such a state of poverty, that it might be observed of this holy man, that he did much alms, and was continually employed in some instance or other of charity, till Semnah expired deprived of his place and employment which he had, and hence his widow, appears to venture less upon trust with Gahael he could not recover, not being able to go into Media through the troubles of the times; he had been at considerable expense too for advice and help under the hand of Tobit, and has undergone a fain large great loss and injury for his care in burying the dead, by a severe persecution on that account. All these joined together; viz. his having lost his employment, bestowing much alms, suffering great oppression and loss, and the expenses incurred for the recovery of his sight, were such drawbacks, as will sufficiently explain the alteration in Tobit's circumstances, and hence we may account for his wife taking in work, and being necessitated to seek out an employment for her livelihood and subsistence.

Ver. 14. She replied upon me, Where are thine alms, and thy righteous deeds? Behold, thou and all thy works are known. Tobit, who adhered strictly to justice, and whose maxims was, Do rightfully all thy life long, and follow not the ways of unrighteousness (ver. 5), thinking such a present one as Tobit was, who had the holy and good grace of living in the midst of the world, and the little good it had done him. You need indeed reproach me; behold your disgrace is known to every body; the charities which you have exercised all your life long, are followed by the house of the just, and haman else which deprives you of all comfort. You had fine hopes that living so piously, you could not fail to be prosperous and happy, and that serving God he would most certainly repay you for all your former works, and make you at last enjoy the everlasting life, domus statuta omni viventi, as Fagius expands here. There is nothing more common even in scripture, than for the saints, under great tribulation, to experience such a state of affairs. Old Tobit, griev'd with the unjust reproaches of his friends, the insults of his wife, and various assaults from Satan, in the bitterness of his soul cri out, My soul chooseth straungling, and death rather than my life. I blush; it: I would not live always!'
(vid. ii. 28-30.) And Elijah was persecuted by wicked Jezebel; he asks it of God as a favour, that he might die, "It is enough now, O Lord, take away my life!" (1 Kings xii. 4, and xx. 34.) His last request was for pleasure, above strength; 'tis tenderest cum vitae, says the Vulgate. It is therefore not all surprizing, that Tostig, under the misfortune of pains and hollines, that he is so ready, with others, to recommend for the good deeds of his past life, should desire to die, and thereby be freed from the unjust scandal cast upon him; but it is observable, that he introduces what is most for his advantage.

Ver. 7. [In imitation of a city in] Media]. The Vulgate and the old English translations have here a Roman, as of Marie, xii. 1. If Sara lived at Rages, then Gabriel and Sara would have been in the same city, nor would there have been any occasion to have gone from Babatane, neither, as is supposed, probably.
As certain therefore as Raphael went to Rages, so certain also is it that Sara did not live there.

Ver. 8. Asmodeus the evil spirit] Some will have it that Asmodeus is very so called from the place which he chiefly haunted, nemo Medorum, ubi dominatus, and to be the same with the " prince of Persia," Dan. x. 13 (Jerem. in loc. et Cassian, in Collat.; but not Vulgate). Helen, the Greek word, signifies a destroyer, evil spirits delighting in mischief, and leading them that worship them into perdition; hence almost all plagues, ordinary and extrava-tary, are ascribed to them. And as the Greeks, the names of the demons and evil spirits in scripture, have done a relation to the mischief they do, or occasion; thus Lev. xvii. they are called uLpe; fleshly, or sensual, lusts, rather than divines, as our translators, here.

Gen. xxv. 15, the infamous, by an anathema, and, ii. verse 10. According to the notion of the Hebrews, there were also evil angels or genii, whereof some presided over one place, and some over another, insom-uch that there are demons of avance, demons therefore as Raphael went to Rages, so certain also is it that Sara did not live there.

Ver. 9. Herefore dost thou beat us for them? if they be dead, go thy ways after them.] All the Greek copies place the interrogation or our version does, putting the question thus, "Si mortui, cur nos irasceatis, ut ejus\' spiritus?" But Jonas conjectures it ought to be placed in this manner, "si mortui, non posse mortuis ibi esse," i.e. " Why by your blows do you revenge upon us those who have been by the command of God and Jonas confirm this latter construction.

Ver. 10. When she heard these things she was very sorrowful, so that she thought she should not live long."] Our version manifestly implies, that she had actually thought of strangling herself. But though it is certain that grief does sometimes put people upon desperate courses, yet that any such resolution was incited into her, to design actually to make away with herself, does not appear, but rather the contrary; for the history informs us, that she not only survived, but would bring great reproach to her family, being the ordinary and common punishment of great malfeasors. On her father's account too, whose death would prove a signal loss, and, lastly, one who appears so religious and well-disposed, cannot be suspected of any such wicked design as self-nurder, which would be constant with her great character, as well as the contrary expressed to God of which she was informed, according to the will of God. Others therefore think that the words, δοκεῖσαν ἃς ἐπωθητέρων, do not mean any premised design of strangling, but that she was extremely, very piteously, intent on expulsion, as being suffered by grief, by a disease called ἐποκον, when a man in a violent fit of spleen or melancholy is strangled, and sometimes bursts with it; which, according to St. Eucher's text, i.e. 180, seems to have been Jonas's case.

Ver. 11. Then she prayed toward the window.] i.e. Of the upper room or oratory, which opened towards Jeruusalem. Munster's Hebrew copy has here, and the Lord; with a monetary at Jerusalem. The Vulgate is more explicit, Parce coxit in superius cubiculum dominus suus, et tribus densibus et tribus maculis non manifest cecequant, neque habentes, in a horruit, sanctus, non pro injuria individi in ipso, ver. 15 (see note vii. 7). The old Latin version accordingly has, Jube me Jon dismitter. The Syriac, indeed, countenances the other rendering; and it may seem to have been supported from Exod. xx. 19, 19, like this translation of Chaldee or Hebrew, or the writing of a Hebrew author used to Hebrew tautology, and to that most peculiar mood, biplan. That I may hear no more the reproach.] Tercentus Christianus introduces Sara thus lamenting and expostulating:

San noster judicium, et in pace vitam dimitto.
"Bene venient homines in honorem meum." Quo quoniam siuera, aspera et periculo eversa, se in tentationem conimi ut potentissimum excusatum, horreunt ut venificiis.

Ut et suas et insipiantem devorant, et se commiscantem

Tacius expressores.

(To be cont. in)
Ver. 14. Then knewest, Lord, that I am pure from all sin with men. The Vulgate is more full and explicit, "Tu scis, Domine, quia nonunque concupisci virum, et mandatum se- vavi ammam mcln ab omni concupiscencia. Nuncupatu cognitum est, quod in levibus ambulant, participem pecunque."

Ver. 17. And Raphael was sent to heal them both. The introduction Raphael, a name no where mentioned in scripture, as the ministering angel for the purposes here mentioned, has been objected against this history. But this deserves less refutation. 1. This name may be inoffensively used as Gabriel and Michael are by the sacred penmen. 2. As part of Raphael's commission was to heal Tobit's blindness, so the words†Angel of the Lord was to be used, as being expressive of the business itself; for Raphael signifies one that healeth from God, and in Munster's version he is called princeps et præces sanctum. When God sent Raphael, he says, (Gen. viii. 12.) he says, the archangel Raphael, one of the seven spirits before his throne, to accommodate the care;

Ver. 6. When thou dost truly, thy doing shall prosperously succeed (or, shall be truly done to all them that live justly). This whole verse is omitted in Munster's Hebrew copy, and Flagman's Vulgate, and Fugius' Hebrew copy takes no notice of the last sentence, nor does St. Cyril, who recites all the foregoing part and indeed... it seems improperly inserted here, as one sees no reason why Tobias' personal honesty and right dealing should succeed prospectively, and yet he lived justly. But, applied to all others that deal fairly and uprightly.

Ver. 7. Give alms of thy substance, and keep thine house, and the face of God shall not be turned away from thee. This is agreeable to that of Solomon, Prov. xiv. 29. "Whoso stoppeth his ear at my wisdom, shall be called wise, and shall add days to his life." He shall have justice with his eye, and who has showed mercy. By an "envious eye" we are to understand a niggardly and covetous spirit, one (see Exeh. xiv. 10). "The mouth of the righteous feedeth many, and the stomach of the wicked devoureth.

Ver. 8. If thou showest mercy, alms are magnified; if thou shewest not mercy, backsliding is" (see Debg. ii. 12). We are to observe, that mercy here enjoined to men's own proper goods, to that which truly and lawfully belongs to them, alms founded upon, and given to others, is another substance, is not only, but that and robbery, and will be so far from procuring the favour of God or his blessing, that a sacrifice of goods unjustly gotten will rather provoke his resentment and call down his judgments. And indeed, if we look into the foregoing verses, this exposition of the place will not appear forced or unnatural.

Ver. 9. As thou hast cast out. give alms accordingly; if thou hast not cast out, be not afraid to give according to that latter. Our charity to others ought to rise in proportion to what we have received ourselves from the Lord of God, who, if he gives us any thing, it is not without a due consideration of the nature and value of our gift, and because we be receivers of his grace, we shall be their own which may be intrusted with for the benefit of others; injuring by such niggardly behaviour as many poor persons as we were unable to relieve. If we take up the whole verse, the advice then is, God's grace being of such a great extent, and one may affirm that no body is exempt: in what state or condition soever he be, it is impossible but that he must have something either to bestow upon others, and therefore grace taught me this, that if all these be willing, and he be not in attendance, or some bodily help and service may be administered; or, however, advice, and kind and tender expression to such as are in affliction, will not be unacceptable, as one testifies thereby, that and robbery, and will be so far from procuring the favour of God or his blessing, that a sacrifice of goods unjustly gotten will rather provoke his resentment and call down his judgments. And indeed, if we look into the foregoing verses, this exposition of the place will not appear forced or unnatural.

Ver. 10. For thou hast laid up a good treasure for thyself against the day of necessity. 1. God will reward the charitable person with temporal blessings, or guard him against necessity, or provide for him underlings, as he promises the sabbath-day seer in Ex. xxii. 25. "Blessed is he that considereth the poor, and the needy." The Lord will deliver him in the time of trouble; the Lord will preserve him, and keep him alive, and deliver him upon the bed of nations, and make all his bed in his sickness." And Solomon confirms the same truth. "He that giveth to the poor shall not want." (Prov. xxii. 7, 8: Vulgate, very much resembles this of St. Paul on the like occasion, "δια τον μισήθησαι γάρ γνώμων καὶ τάν ἐξιτίς, 1 Tim. vi. 19, where a very learned writer observes, that τάναρος, in the rabbinical dialect signifies a holy or virtuous person, whereby such a deed as would be secured to receive their own again; and the apostle's meaning in that place, is, That those who exercise works of charity and beneficence do provide themselves with the counsel of God, and that which they may see and do as it were for their comfort, which they may see and do as it were for their comfort, and for a reward, and a suitable return for their kindness (Mede's Works, lib. i. dec. 22). The like may be said of the words here used. And accordingly the Vulgate renders it by a word which signifies διάφορος, or a pledge.

Ver. 10. Alms do deliver from death, and suffereth not to come unto darkness. 1. Charity, through the blessing of God, often proves the means and occasion of long life, as seems to be more fully expressed, xiv. 9. Or it may mean, that it is effectual for the prolongation of life, or to turn the cure of one's death, that it shall make the good and beneficent man's exit easy, and his death comfortable, according to that observation of St. Jerome, Numquam mens mortis est evocatoria antiquorum, quod moribus nostris, sanctissimi exercit (Ad. Nepot.). Or, lastly, that charity wipes away sins, and delivers from death, the consequence of them (see Dan. iv. 27. Eccles. xiv. 10). In like manner, St. Austin has a fine reflection upon the other part of the verse: "Tobit had the misfortune to be blind, yet he showed his son the way of truth. He who had lost his bodily eyes, could say to his son, 'He that doeth evil, shall not come into darkness, but the light of God leadeth forth from darkness,' and outward light is a condition to direct others how to walk. There is therefore another illumination than that of sense, which enlightens the soul of the immortal."

Ver. 12. Remember, my son, that our fathers from the beginning, even that they all married wives of their own kindred, and were blessed, may not the falsity from hence appear to you at all, but at all times you shall be prepared with the clearness of that vulgar notion, that relations who marry never thrive and may it not be further observed, that to the wantonness of the Jewish nation (whose regulations descend from Isaac and Rebecca, who were related in the same degree.

Ver. 13. And in tenderness of heart and great works for tenderness in the poor. This is undoubtedly a great and very true observation, and confirmed by the unhappy experience of persons addicted to it. But σπαθός, the term here used, I apprehend represents a modesty, a niggardliness, or ill-will, and to this the observation will equally correspond.

Ver. 15. Neither let drunkenness go with thee in thy journey. Fagans, in that to which they are curtailmente usus in omnibus visibus. And Junius, by a Hebraism, understands πίπτει to signify va ebrietates; according to which the sense is, "for any time when you are affected with drunkenness," or, in what we say not, as the expression in the Greek is in τον εύθειαν, that Tobit had the particular journey in his eyes when he was going to send his son a pair of shoes, by which way he had conveyed the words, to his fiancée, to say, for the warm climate, being a strong temptation to drink plentifully, he might cause his son against any excess! The Vulgate omits this precept relating to sobriety.

The Jews had not only banquets upon account, or in honor of the dead, but even over their graves distinguish their funeral entertainments into two sorts, do- smec, or such as were kept in the house of the deceased, for the refreshment of the melancholy relations and friends there present, which were probably more to be expected from the humanity of the deceased (see Joseph. lib. xvii. Ani. Jud. cap. 8. and de Bell. Jud. cap. 1. Jer. xvi. 5. and, 7. in the LXX); and, secondly, sepulchral and festive entertainment, which were such as were shown at very solemn occasions, such as were carried to the grave and carried away by the poor (Meursius De Funer. cap. 35). The exhortation of Tobit here to his son to partake of the bread, ci τό ταῦτα τινά, alludes to this latter custom (an ancient one among the heathens), and shows that it was of some antiquity among the Jews. Villalpandus, referring to this passage, says, Sat pacet moris fuisse, et in ipsis sepulcrum spicae communicavit, in Ezek. xxiv. 17. The words in τό ταῦτα πιπτέσθαι signify something to be done upon the tomb itself, and not to merely something to be expended for the burial of the just, as the Hebrew passage was only. We cannot have a more ample testimony of this custom, than what we meet with Eccles. xxx. 18. "Delegates poured on upon the mouth shall ascend," where the son of Simeon of Netha set upon a great deal of show upon the burial of the dead. Where the son of Sim-were derived from the Jews, expressed, that their pious regard for the dead, by observing the burial rites, the blazoning of tombs, and celebrating the funeral or sepulchral feast over them; but these at length degenerating into dissoluteness and debauchery, St. Ambrose found it necessary to forbid the celebration of feasts in his day. The same, in fact, is true of the burying of the dead in the rich soils of Africa. They obtained also among the Romans; but the same abuse probably induced Numa to give strict orders that no one should honour the dead by pouring wine upon the entrance of the sepulchral chamber, and Bellarmino ascribes it to the same purpose, that Tobit had not recommended to his son such a practice, it had not been in his day an object of much regard, and in some cases, the just persons themselves, and Tobit, as much as would procure some case and refreshment to the souls of the deceased; and from hence they infer the advantage and necessity of such reparation, which had been made by the Rome church offers for the repose of the soul. To this it may be answered, 1. That by these sepulchral fasts no obligation was intended to be made to God, but only a decent honour shown thereby to the memory of the dead.
2. That no mention is here made of any prayers or inter-cessions for the dead. 3. That what is here enjoined was to be done by a conscientious, the distressed relations and friends of the person deceased. 4. That the heathens, from whom this rite was borrowed, and who entertained a notion that the dead ascended to heaven, was only to be regarded as a superstition, but extended it not to the soul thereby, or affecting the condition of it in its separate state.

Ver. 5. For every nation hath not consent! No nation, i.e., not of mankind, mere mankind, independently of God, hath counsel of wisdom enough to effect any scheme of importance, or establish any business of consequence: which did not proceed from the Holy Ghost, nor from those private persons or communities to trust in the Lord Jehovah, and to depend upon him for direction and assistance.
The context warrants this interpretation. Munster's Hebrew copy has, Quoniam non est neque consulatu temporis, neque subseque innumerus Dei; and Fagius, Quoniam non est sapiens, neque consulatum contra Dominum. Calmet also sees in it the same sense, Mettez en Dieu votre confiance, et nul est qui doive raisonner de la raison, qu'il n'y a plus sage, ni prudence, ni conseul contre le Seigneur.

Ver. 8. And now I signify this to thee that I committed seven talents to Gobor the son of Gabrias. J ch. 1, 14, he is called his brother. The Hebrew versions give no light here, Munster has brother in both places, and Fagius, son.
St. Ambrose affirms the companion of Tobit, and his son were disinterestedness with respect to this money, "He was poor and in want, and yet regarding less his own than others' necessity, he thought not of recalling a very considerable sum. He would have been very glad if he had been of great service to him in the condition he was in;
nor did he resolve to call it in, till he imagined himself near death, and then he thought it but a piece of justice due to his noble patron, that he should be paid for all the trouble and trouble of a sum which lawfully belonged to him. Nor am consuetudine commodatam repescere, quia, solitum non frandare, ferredorem" (And. in Tobit, cap. 2. tom. ii.). The same writer takes occasion, from this example of Tobit, to reflect on "the prodigious difference between his conduct and that of those who are so wedded to their interests, that they are glad of an opportunity to take advantage of a brother's necessity to enrich themselves, under the pretense of doing them a kindness, and on that account exact large and unlawful interest; whilst the generous and open-hearted To-it, unmindful of the necessity he had himself fallen into, and of the regard which he owed to his family, hastened not to demand this money, nor require any thing more than the bare principal, though it had been lent a long time; even from Tobias' infancy," as the Vulgate here adds (Ibid.). There is also another useful inference, which may be drawn from this place, viz. that though Tobit seems, from ver. 1, to have translated all of his riches to his son, he was not afraid to affair of the money lent, yet it is observable that he rather chooses to begin his seemingly farewell charge, by laying down rules for his moral conduct, and his instruction in righteousness above everything else, and it is in the same thing, when he opens to him the business of the talents in Media; as if in those early times he had known the divine precept, given by him who fulfilled all righteousness, "Seek ye first the kingdom of heaven, and all these things shall be added unto you" (Matt. vi. 33).

Ver. 21. Thou hast work wealth, if thou fear God! This sentiment is so exalted, that the Port-Royal comment ners, who are very critical in observing the grammar of this passage, would think, that it was spoken by some Christian father, in the time of the apostles or the Church, and not unlike that of St. Paul, "Godliness with contentment is great gain." Tobit had lost his sight, a captive, and was reduced to poverty; and here, in the full assurance of faith, from the good treasure of his heart, he pronounces this encouraging maxim to all others in the like distressed circumstances, "Thou hast much wealth, if thou fear God." He may want gold in the form of money, but he is a benefi-cient servant, what he may at any time have lost, especially for the sake of his truth, and bless his latter end, as he did that of Job, with the greater flow of prosperity; or having proved his soul sound and full of refuges, reserves for him a treasure in the heavens, with which temporal goods are not worthy to be compared. St. Austin, full of those exhortations to virtuous behaviour in a state of poverty, says, Quum ludusbus sit sanctae Matris, quid auget a contar, cuius devotionem nec captivitas, nec oculos amissio, quoniam Deus benedicet, persuasit. Neque, ex-Amstrongius, a vis justitiae et veritatis aversor.

BOOK OF TOBIT.

Ver. 3. Seek thee a man which may go with thee, whilst I yet live. Besides that of our version, there are other render-ers of this sentence, and bring to the point as their desire:
The Vulgate has, Ut, dum adhuc vivo, recipias pecuniam.
Fagius' Hebrew copy, Fortasse redditibus, me adhuc vivente.
And the Greek and Syriac, Dabo et mercedem dum vivo.
The Vulgate properly enough inserit fedelum herein, I inquire incalesce fedelum virum, qui eat tecum; i. e., "Inquire for somebody of trust and probity to go with you;" for every idle or person or vassal was not the case of the poor be, if, like Tobit, they had ever this excellent maxim in their minds, which he here gives in charge to his son! It may do not be anis to observe, and place in one view, the several particulars mentioned as the different blessings of the Lord.
In the first place, it is said, to remember God, and to pray him devoutly for his blessings. To pay a reverence and regard unto his father, and submit to his parent's rules and directions.
To bless the Lord in all his works, and declare his name with their memory by a decent funeral. To ask counsel of the wise, and follow it. To trust in God's goodness, even in the midst of poverty.

CHAP. V.

Ver. 5. He found Raphael that was an angel. But he knew no man of such name. But that this sentence, as it is assumed a human form, of no mean or common appearance but, as the Vulgate adds, having an air of majesty and greatness, which he looked upon as his natural man, and which he resembled as a person of other kind or sort, as afterward to be. That good angels are appointed by God to be the guardians of particular men, and in execution of this their office, do frequently assume human shapes, to guide them in their journeys and to deliver them from dangers, is a doctrine as ancient as the patriarch Jacob's time, embraced by Christians, and believed by the wisest heathens of Greece, alv. 16. Ps. xxxii. 8; Mat. viii. 19. Acts Hence Mercury was fabled to be the messenger of the gods and guide of the way; and so was said to have wings On his shoulders and feet; and the Greeks, and the the title of Mercury. But the same notice in this history is attended with some difficulties, and has been made a principal objection to the authority of the book: for though it be true, that angels have sometimes actually assumed the form or appearance of men, yet it is not probable by the context that Tobit was in condition of man, yet this has been in appearance only; our Saviour himself seems to say as much; for when, upon his entering into the room where his disciples were assembled, and the doors shut, they were terrified, and thought they saw a spirit, he puts the proof of its being really himself, and no more than an apparition of the thing. In answer to all which, it may, I presume, be very justly replied, first, with regard to the angel's appearing at all in this transaction, that it was no more than a mere apparition of the greatness of Tobit's virtues, who was probably the most illustrious instance of piety and charity amongst the whole ten captive tribes, or the loss of his fortunes first, and his eyes after, and so the greater the fruit of his self denying also; if we attend further to the particular situation of himself and his countrymen, which required uncommon supports to keep up their spirits, and maintain a proper dependance and hopes in God, it could not be any unworthy God's wise and good providence in such circumstances, to send a messenger from heaven, and to make this a sensible example, and that neither cast off his people: any time be warning in the cares of good men under their afflictions. As to the other part of the difficulty, which arises from an immaterial being conversing and inhabiting usual and ordinary objects of sense: for, it may seem, or so much as suspicion, that it was not a real body, we answer, that the angel's skill and address, even to the business, and not subject to such absence and inattention, the ignorance of men, and the mind of angels, instances of discovery. And if, as we have it, a farther instance God's extraordinary providence here, all the difficulties Ver. 9, 10. So he called him, and he came in, and solitary another. Then Tobit said unto him, Brother, show me of what tribe and family thou art. The Vulgate is in like manner, and more explicit, as to the conversation, where the definition is sti sit semper. Et at Tobias, Quod gaudium simul, erit, qui in tenebris sedet, et lumen colli non video. Cui aut quandem Forti animo esto; in proximo est, ut a Deo curvatus, ut corpus meum, quod est nutat. Et a te Dei, et a te Christi, et dominii tui. Exempli, et fac te felix, ut dominus tuus. Et semper, et semper, et semper. Eru, xii. The term brother is not to be taken strictly, the Jews called all those of their own tribe or nation brethren; Tobit who uses this appellation in several places of this chapter, speaks to Raphael according to his human appearance, as one of the brethren. Ver. 11. Doth thou seek for a tribe or family, or an ailed man to go with thy see? i.e. Why dost thou beseech, if thou art not a member of the family? i.e. Why doth Tobit himself make his request? I will not contain myself about my tribe or family? contented, without any further inquiry, that thou hast got a good guide for thy son, ab utramque merceriam, according to Matthew, he may be, and he may be, in the intended journey, to know my family? Dost thou want the family, or a hireling only, that is well acquainted with the business, et calvat, et sime. Port-Royal comments it, Est-ce la famille du mercier, qui doit conduire telle flèche, ou le mercier lui-même que vous cherchez? There is, however, more in this question than may seem at first hearing: as it is not merely a question of curiosity, natural to old men, but Tobit being young and inexperienced, the intention of the good old man, his father, was, by this inquiry, to get all the intelligence and assurance he could possibly of the condition and credit of one, to whom he was about to entrust a son, whom he had been all along careful to bring up in the fear of the Lord. As Tobit and with an adherence of evil company, and when Tobit asks Raphael of what family he was, it was in effect only to demand who and what he was himself; for from the good or evil disposition of the stock, or heads of the family, he might infer the temper and manners of the children and dependants: as we form a judgment from the tree itself what fruit may be expected from it. Terentius Christians expresses this expectation more clearly: "Anno, Tobiso, hocpos, Cujus est? aut quibus parentes, quos quo idem est, aut in illo, aut in aliquo? Ad sum quod sanguis tui. Tob. No id misi, pater, frater, Scribere hominem, quod curiosius scripsit. Tob. Nisi suum. Scimus quum. Non sit tutum sanctum, hoc per gentem, sanctum. Commiserat ignorat, et certum est mans gratias. In Tob. act. iii." Ver. 12. I am Azarias, the son of Azariah the great, and of thy brethren; i.e. an Israelite. See vi. 3, where he makes himself to be of the tribe of Naphtali. Many Greek copies read here very abruptly, and therefore, in the words of Azarias, and therefore our version is confirmed by vi. 7, viii. 9, 10. It may be more material to inquire, how Raphael is Azarizas, and with what propriety he is described as a native of the tribe? This section several answers may be given:—1. That angels having no proper name, but what is derived from the office and ministry they are employed about, Azarizas, according to the Hebraic custom, designating a certainangel, this may agree very well to the angel Raphael, who was sent for this very purpose to be instrumental in curing Tobit and his family, meaning a 'helper from God, and this may appear very well to the angel Raphael, who was sent for this very purpose to be instrumental in curing Tobit and his family, meaning a 'helper from God.2. In his journey, and therefore very prudently concealed his quality of an angel, that he might more conveniently execute his commission. The giving of proper names to persons, or persons derived from their ancestry, may be accounted for on these instances. 3. It was, I think, very ancient, and customary among the Hebrews. There are many instances of this kind in scripture, particularly Gen. xxxvi, where the names given to Jacob's children are very observable and expressive, if considered in this view. Secondly, As the angel had assumed the form and person of Azarizas, he may be supposed to speak according to his appearance only; as the mayor of the first book of Samuel said, That Samuel spake to Saul, seeking his counsel by the witch of Enow, because the person that appeared was in Samuel's habit, and the eyes of Saul, or the more experienced, pour contenance, like manner this angel, personating Azarizas, for a time bare his name; or thus, as the picture is usually called by the person it represents, and that he who in the tragedy speaks from the picture that bears his name, so Raphael, personating Azarizas in the form and appearance of a young man, was in that capacity to act and speak with propriety, in which instance may likewise serve to illustrate this, viz. When Joseph was sent after his brethren to Sichem, and had lost his way, there met him a person (Gen. xxvii, 13, 16, that directed him to the place: and Jonathan on the place pronounces to be the angel Gabriel. As this concealing the angel had the appearance of a man, and is, indeed so called in that text, and under that form innumerable instances; either of the name, as we conceive, how the same person here should be the angel Raphael and yet Azarizas also. Ver. 13. My brother, thou art of a good stock: it may seen surprising, that Tobit, hearing the name of Azarizas the Great, did not think proper to inquire how it happened, that Azarizas, the son of so considerable a person, was so much reduced in circumstances; and to such a wretchedness, as to be obliged to get a poor livelihood by occasionally hiring himself. To say nothing of the vices of fortune, which God has placed in his own power, it may be, and is, that Azarizas, as was that of the Israelites at present, all distinction of families is lost, or however not considered, the greatest and most considerable families are also considered as only being in the same degree of refinement, and they are carried away promiscuously from their country, so they are equally stripped of their possessions and fortunes, and condemned by the merciless victor to the same instances of hardship and servility. Ver. 14. "Will thou a dracham a day?" It appears by the gospel of St. Matthew, that a Hebrew dracham was the fourth part of a shekel, i.e. ninenum of our money; for there, xxiv. 24, the tribute-money, annually paid to the temple by every Jew, which was half a shekel, is called ἱδαιψία (i.e. the two dracham pieces); and therefore, if half a shekel contained two drachams, a dracham must have been the quarter of a shekel, or ninenum, as every shekel weighed about three shillings of our money. We suppose this Greek version of Tobit to be made from the Chaldean by some Alexandrian copy, and every Alexandrian dracham contained two Hebrew drachams, one dracham of Alexandria will be of our money eighteen-pence. Ver. 15. Go thou with this man, and God, which dwelleth in heaven, will be thy surety, and the angel of God keep you company. As indeed he did, according to the representation of this history, though Tobit in heart spoke falsely, or, This is not the least request amongst my friends, his father's presence, shows us the opinion of the Jews at least, that God has given his angels the charge of mankind, and that he makes use of their ministry to conduct them through his life, in all sorts of circumstances, many of which they serve them. Our Saviour intimates such a tutelar care with respect to little children in particular. Matt. xviii. 10. But it does not from hence follow, that the angels have such a knowledge of human affairs, or power over them, as that power should be purchased by men; but it is purchasable with God should be requested, or that any reliance should be had on their merits, as the popish expositors on this book would infer; for however highly favoured, still they are considered as mere and helpless sinners, who have neither omniscience, nor omnipotence, nor any attribute to make them fit objects to be addressed to in a manner, hence the object of the tobin analyst's charge here, of all the scribes, who are manifestly biased against Tobit. The affectionate charge here greatly resembles Abraham's commission to his servant, Gen. xxiv. 40, upon his sending him to fetch a wife for his son Isaac; "The Lord, before whom I stand, will send his angel with thee, and, prosper thy way; and thou shalt take a wife for my son of my kind, and of my father's house." This in particular also of a scribe, the resemblance holds; for though Raphael had nothing to do with it in the journey relating to the hapless crowned his journey, by concluding a match for his master's son, who sent him in quest of money only.

No, this is not discovered by the young man's dog with them."

This clause is wanting here, both in Munster's Hebrew copy and in the Vulgate. The latter, indeed, inserts it, vi. 1. It is most probable that the dog went with them, as it is mentioned in all the Greek copies and the Septuagint, and Fagius' Hebrew, as going and returning with them, xi. 4. This circumstance of the dog, though of no great moment, is neither absurd or unusual, as it is according to the simplicity of the country. But it may be necessary not to pass over this incident of the dog without some farther remark, since no less a crime than Mr. Pope has passed across its memory upon it. As he very ingeniously entitléd himself a man of the world in satirizing some of the follies and failings of men, by setting forth the contrary virtues and good qualities of dogs; in the same manner he argues, with an equal clearness, to the book of Tobit, that there was no manner of reason to take notice of the dog, but the humanity of the author. Now, to call the introducing the dog an instance of the author's human- ity, and that he was exemplary upon it, so odd, that it seems plain we are to consider it a hasty stroke of fancy, not the result of Mr. Pope's judgment; indeed, were he serious, there is as little truth as candour in this ceremonial; it is more proper to take a journey into a strange country, and to bring a large sum of money back with him, attended only with one other person, who, though an angel, thus unobserved by him to be such; and does not the reason of the thing speak itself; that the author had taken a proper guard under these circumstances, and therefore taken by Tobias, Comequise via dominique satellites? Pliny thus it is worth his while to remark this wise dog, and gives an instance of a master preserved in his journey from thieves by his dog (Nat. Hist. lib. viii. cap. 40). And this we apprehend is sufficient to show, that the mentioning the dog is only in the ceremony, and not in the simple experience.

As to the significance of introducing him again at their return, there is no reason why we should admire such a circuit. It is more proper to take a boat, or a ship in a beautiful country, and let the men who take a journey there be mercenary adventurers, who, supposing they had been the original one in this passage, the meaning clearly is to hasten or accumulate money on money. They are both Chaldee words, and, as far as I find, those only, which in the LXX. are thus translated, it may they be thought to the point. The first is μελλων, in bipal., pettingers ferris, adductus; in this sense, and as a noun, it is to be rendered with this.

The other word which they translate by φθορα, is ὑπαίτιος, in hithp., robatur, and, by a common Hebrew, to hasten a thing, or to do it with all one's might (I Kings xii. 18). In any of these senses, or the several supposed to have been the original one in this passage, the meaning clearly is to hasten or accumulate money. They may in Hebrew words, and, as far as I find, those that are in the LXX. are thus translated, it may be thought to the point. I doubt, to make out his own meaning, would have ὑπαίτιος, or something so understood, which also would answer as well to complete our word, as altering the text; but possibly there may not be occasion even for this here; may not γορίσκει, in the second person, in the passive sense be rendered "let it be our busi- ness to get money to money, but let the money be φθορα of σαλιν, i.e. either free or σαλιν, as fifth and dirt for the sake of the salt, that is, the money that is to be taken away by this loss." Gal. vi. 17. σαλινα τοις, are not the marks properly of the Lord Jesus, but the wounds and marks suffered, only our interpretation may be thought to render the passages to refer to those propitiatory sacrifices among the heathens, when in the time of any great calamity, some vile wretches were sacrificed for the purification and atonement of the whole people; and such sacrifices were πυρεῖα καὶ ἀνθρώπων, and the sacrificial form was, as Simonas tells us, such, as the Levites would have moved to their own πυρεῖα in this view, the meaning of our passage is, Let us not sacrifice our money to the welfare of our son.

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 2. A fish leaped out of the river, and would have devoured him. According to Bochart, it was the silurus; this same call the sheaf-fish, and which is described by Pausanias (xxxii. 14. 14.), a most peculiar creature, and he said that when its smell was effectual in expelling demons; but possibly this very history of Tobit might originally give occasion to these notions. If it should be objected that the silurus is a fish of very smooth flesh, and which might be sold, and therefore not to be supposed to be held by the bare hands of Tobit, it is sufficient to answer, that the head is disproportionably big to its body, and the gills vast and open, so as to offer easy and firm hold; there is, therefore, in the Latin version, where Tobit is ordered preludere branciam, very great propriety, from the singular form and circumference of this fish. This is the deduction which was made; as mentioned ver. 5, is quite agreeable to Lev. xi. 10, is a difficulty that hath not been fully considered. Against the cæолнюπας, which the greater part of the interpreters suppose denotes silurus, is the observation, that this word is said to be in it by Piny and other naturalists, there lies this very material objection, That it is a fish of so small a size as is utterly inconsistent with the story. Longitudine est (says the most accurate Mr. Keil, with whom John son agrees), donandalone, rariis pedido, and therefore can never be supposed to atack, much less able to devour, a man.

Ver. 7. Touching the heart and the liver, if a devil or an evil spirit trouble any, we must make a smoke thereof before the man or the woman, and the party shall be no more vexed. These effects were rendered upon certain material forms, wherein they smouldred up the perfumes and bestowed upon themselves the odours of the incense and sacrifices that were offered to them, by an easy way of solution; also, this is a remarkable example of the kind of burnt heart and liver of the fish was offensive to Asmodeus. The Chaldeans, among whom the book of Tobit was read amongst the Jews, and the Israelites, for whose use and instruction it was written, might both be of this opinion, that demons, as not absolutely divested of all matter, were capable of some sensations and impressions that belonged to corporal substances; and therefore, in accommodation to the vulgar idea and prejudice of the people, the author of this history might express himself as though the expulsion of this evil spirit was affected by a natural cause, the smoke of the fish given him to devour, as it were, as the sacred intimates, that it was through the merciful help of God, obtained by prayer, that it came to pass (ver. 17). But if this demon was incorporeal (and this is the supposition which generally prevails), we may safely conclude, that the smoke of the fish's entrails could have no direct or physical effect upon him; that his fleeing away, therefore, was occasioned by a supernatural power, in the exercise of which this angel appointed to attend Tobit was the principal instrument, and that he ordered the illumination as a sign, that Tobit belonged to a human spirit, and that hence power, should be chased away. Others have been disposed to consider Asmodeus not as any real demon, but only as expressive of the great power of lust, and that the illumination in this story signifies, that there is a virtue in certain words that is virtue contributed to check and suppress such an extravagant and brutal passion as was predominant in her other husbands, the efficacy of which (ver. 7), is said to be so powerful and general, and as that it would cure all, "any other person" tempted in the like irregular manner. But following the same reasoning that this demon, being incorporeal, could not possibly have any other had medicines, yet it would, I conceive, be more proper to consider this as a lower and secondary instrument only in the cure, as prayer and abstinence are, in the instance of every one of the principal demons; and that there was no powerful an effect was produced. And this seems to be a more likely way to hinder the return of Asmodeus, i.e. of any base lust again, than the power of natural fumigation, which has not escaped censure, as having some appearance of magic.

Ver. 8. As for the gall, it is good to assuage a man that hath stitches in his side. This gall, it must be observed, was the gall of the fish this or any other fish has such a natural virtue to restore sight, naturalists can best determine. Pliny, indeed, speaking of the calloniumus, mentions something like this; it was very sweet and the most esteemed; and from super- lulent consumm (Lib. xxiii. cap. 4. 7). But I have before showed (see note on ver. 2), that this is not the fish here mentioned. It seems best in this case, likewise, not to rest the cure in the mere natural ingredient, but to understand the outward application as somewhat similar to our Saviour's spreading clay upon the eye of the man that was sighted; and ordering him to wash in the pool of Siloam, not as the cause, but as the proof, of the cure. It was the power of God in both instances; and Tobit, sensible of this, returns devout thanks to God accordingly, xxiv. 15. 16.

Ver. 21. I know that Raguel cannot marry her to another, according to the law of Moses, but he shall be guilty of death. According to the precept in the Mosaical law, (Num. xi. 16.) Raguel may not marry her; for he, being a Levite, and her father, would be a demum, who, having no brother, succeeded to the inheritance of her father; but the penalty of death, mentioned in this verse, is a correction of the Mosaic law; and according to this, the Sadducees, or Pharisees, were divided, and is not to be met with anywhere in the law, either as denounced against the father, who would not give his daughter to his nearest kinsman, or against the nearest kinsman himself, he would not expose her. The Geneva version, which qualifies the expression, is therefore preferable: "I know that Raguel cannot marry her to another according to the law of Moses, else he should die." But the translation, that "Sardus" may be better rendered, 8, or (if he does) that other to whom he gives her, Sardus, will be obnoxious to death, or in great danger to be slain by the power of Asmodeus. For this has been thought not very unlikely, that the true reason why the seven husbands were given up to be slain by the wicked demon, was because they unjustly claimed her. As she bestowed on marriage to his heathen, the author of this book, with whom was a sort of attempt to ravish a virgin already betrothed, and belonging to another by their law; and by the slaughter of these, Providence preserved her pure and innocent, and in fullest safety and security; see Whist, Auth, Records, vol. ii. Nor is the sense which Tertullian Christianus gives of this passage to be despised: Non denegabat, sicut se vere Maximus, i.e. potierit iuris tum Nisi modo si nominem debet aliqui, sed qui e cognitione ac genere proximus. Ex. Not eum sapientem propterea Mosaicum, Aliquemque sicut locabit conjungi, Nisi crucem caputse veli incerre. Vol. III. 185.
Ver. 17. And the devil shall smite it, and flee away, and never come again any more: but when thou shalt come to her, rise up both of you, and pray to God which is merciful.

The account of driving away the demon by fortification, reminds one of what Josephus mentions, De Bell. Jud. lib. viii. cap. 2, that one Eleazar, before Vespasian and a great number of persons, freed several, who were possessed with evil demons, from the place where they were, by throwing to their nose a certain ring, having a specific root under it, which quickly expelled the demon out of their bodies, so never to return again: and that such method of cure was at that time in common use among civil spirits. If this relation is to be depended on, it shows the power of smell upon evil genius, and the effect here ascribed to the incense, is not less probable than that of the other miracles recorded in the Old and New Testament, Numb. xx. 9. Josh. vi. 20. 2 Kings ii. 11. iv. 41. Matt. xx. 20. John ix. 7. 10. Acts v. 15. xix. 12. with which the popish expositors of the Old Testament, and those undoubted miracles recorded in the first of Moses, and in the later books of the historical part of the prophetic and the prophetic books themselves, are supposed to have reference, in comparing them with these reports of miracles; as also in that passage where the prophet is instructed, Isa. lxi. 1. ‘Give a deaf ear to their counsel, and a blind eye to their knowledge:’ the one thing is as much against the other, as the practice of the one is against the propriety of the other. In the one case, as itseems, to mean that those who are destroyers of orders, and destroyers of grace, shall have it in their power to lead away from their proper places, and hinder the exercise of them, those who would have the power of grace, and the aid of God. In the other case, as it seems, to mean that those who are destroyers of orders, and destroyers of grace, shall have it in their power to make those who are destroyers of orders, and destroyers of grace, be led away from their own destruction, and be saved from their own destruction. Wherefore, from this verse, and the following verses, the terms used with respect to the spirits, and with respect to the demon, are both proper and usual on the occasion. ἀναλύω λαβίν is the same with ἀναλυόμενος, Matt. x. 20, which is the word used in the Vulgate, cap. xxv. 21. ‘Quisquis debeat me adhuc recognoscere, et triumphare, et dominium presenti, et locutione, et olim dignitate et designatione.’ ἀναλυόμενος is taken in this sense to signify that which is ordered by divine appointment, Matt. xx. 23. xxv. 21. Cor. ii. 9. Heb. xii. 16.

And thou shalt preserve her; i. e. By maintaining, protecting, and defending her; and be a suitor to her, as the term is used on the like occasion, Eph. v. 23. Munster’s Hebrew copy is more explicit. Et per manus tuam Domina liberatam de manibus demonum; see xiii. 3, where Sara is mentioned as made whole, or freed from that plaguing and devilish spirit, the devil and ii. 17, where Raphael is mentioned as sent to heal Sara, by giving her for a wife to Tobias.

I suppose that she shall bear thee children.] He might expect blindness on the mountain, as the rewards of his obedience, and those angels who accompanied him, and whose appearance he assumed, or in his own person, as the angel Raphael. For angels too, though called intelligences, however desirous they may be to look into, are occasionally supposed to have human form, as appears from the pretended stories here of Tobit’s wife. It is possible that God is pleased to reveal them to them, or commissions them to declare them to others. As when the angel foretells unto Tobias how that day should be Ditto. It is possible that he assumed an authority and commission. ‘I am Gabriel, that stand in the presence of God, and am sent to speak unto thee, and to show thee these glad tidings’ (Luke i. 19). Calmet renders, J‘apporte qu’elle vous donnera des enfants.
parents came to emigrate so soon, as to give their daughter to Tobias the very same day that he arrived; the reasons probably were,—I. Her parents' desire of having her well married, and their hopes of securing their own happiness; II. The circumstances relative to her spouse. 3. His near relation, and legal right to her. 4. Raphael's importunity and persuasion. Some questions may also pertinently be asked concerning the presence of Sarah in the house, and without the knowledge or consent of her husband. Such a procedure seems not agreeable to the opinion which one entertains of his piety, and may be considered as an instance of the great concern of marriage to which it is debated, that Tobias knew perfectly the intentions of his father on this head; that good old man had recommended to him before his journey, to take a wife for himself. And it is observable, that Raphael reminds him (vi. 15) of the instruction which his father gave him, to marry a wife of his own kindred: and, indeed, the law itself is sufficiently clear in this matter; for had he been indifferent, or so particular as to have refused what was known the custom of the law required, Raphael could have compelled him to it, or obliged him to have renounced the rule of the law; for it is not to be supposed, that he would have overlooked him sufficiently, had it been his business, to bring him to it. So much for the evidence, insinuated in Raphael, and the great concern Tobias had in his marriage; but besides the reason before given, that the nearness of the return required this from him, Raphael assured Tobias that he should provide conveniently to secure him against the like accident, and to prevent his sharing the other's fate.

Ver. 13. Then he called his daughter Sara, and he told her, and gave her to be wife to Tobias. In the Vulgate it is, "Raphael, the father of the bride, took her by the right hand, and joining it to Tobias' right hand, said May the God of Abraham, the God of Sarah, and the God of Jacob he be with thee and guide thee by the sacred ties of marriage, and fill you both with his blessings." To this custom of giving away the bride by the hands of the father, or some relation or friend. St. Paul seems to allude, 2 Cor. xii. 2, and the Psalmist, Ps. xiv. 14. The reason of this, says a very judicious writer, was, "that in ancient times all women, which had not husbands or fathers to govern them, had tutors, without whose good counsel and influence there was no act which they did warrantable, and for this cause they were in marriage delivered unto their husbands by others. Which custom retained, had the husband, by the hand of his, regulated whose direction the very imbecility of their sex dolth bind them, viz. to be always guided and directed by others" (Hooker's Eccles. Pol. b. v.). Whether this custom of giving away the bride by her hand, or that of the bridesmaid, which is the more common in modern times, is not a very decent one, that a woman, whose chiefest ornament is modesty, should rather be led or presented by the hand of another, than offer herself forwardly before the congregation to any one in marriage; and therefore the direction of our church is herein much to be admired, which enjoins it to be asked, "Who gave this woman to be married to this man?" Ver. 14. And called Edna his wife, and took paper, and did write an instrument of covenant, and sealed it.] Here we have a contract between Tobias and Sara, drawn up, not by a public notary, as among the Hebrews, but by Raphael the high priest. We may further observe, that before the writing this contract, there was a formal giving of the woman unto her husband by her own father, and that of a particular and express character, and upon the delivery of her. It appears from hence, that a contract and marriage were anciently all one in effect, and the like may be gathered from the law, Deut. xxii. 24, where an espousal or marriage ceremony are required by positive laws. The Jews usually drew up the contract of marriage, and agreed about the dowry before the wedding; after this they read this contract, sealed it in the hands of the bride's relations, and then they put the ring upon her finger: but in Tobias' marriage, things were ordered otherwise, for Raph

Ver. 2. Thus is driven away the demon by the ashes of the perfumes, and put the heart and the liver of the fish therewith, and made a smoke thereof. This story of driving away the demon by the ashes of the perfumes, possibly took its rise from the account of the stroke of Aaron's increase, staying the destroying angel and endearing, used by husbands to their wives. Tobias, in the next chapter, ver. 4, calls Sara by the same name after he had married her (see also x. 12). An instance as well in Solomon's Song, ch. iv. where the second verse, "my sister, my spouse," come three times together in four verses. And hence, if solutions were wanting, we may justly Abraham calling his wife Sarah, as Jer. xlv. 16, in which some writer has been favoured to expose as an evocation. For as she is a sister of tenderness, love, and affection, it was very properly applied to his wife; but indeed Sarah was not really so called, being, as Abraham acknowledges, his half-sister, the daughter of his father, but not the daughter of his mother (Gen. xx. 12).

Preparations were made for Sarah's being "made thine in her thirtieth year." Into another bedchamber, different from that where Sara lay before, in which her seven former husbands were killed. This thought was just, and the exchange proper, as the very room inspired horror.
Ver. 6. Thou hast said, It is not good that man should be alone; let us make unto him an aide, like unto himself.}

verse 9. To Garagor, who said unto him by oath, that he should not depart till the fourteenth days of the marriage were expired;] According to the sense that at first hearing offers itself, it seems as Ragan had said to Tobias, before the time was expired, that he should not depart before the time was expired. This is too instand to be the meaning; for if Ragan said this at all, he must of course be supposed to say it before the time was expired. Calmet seems aware of this objection, and makes the sense to be, That before the time was expired, Ragan put himself in some secret correspondence with Tobias, and sets down some particulars of the entertainment, Uxori sae dixit ut inuenterat concinuam, dux quoque pianissimis, ut quatuor arietes ostendit, et parari epulins omni sequimur. The Vulgate translates: uxor.

Ver. 21. And go to Roges of Media to Gabael.] According to the Vulgate, Tobias went to Roges of Media, who was cousin of Ragan, and told him what had happened, and that he was weak and unassisted, as to all natural functions; and therefore it was not by any bodily power or force of his own, nor by the efficacy of natural remedies; but by the supernatural power of the Angel Raphael, acting in this matter as one pure spirit acts on another, and, by the mighty and unseen power of him who commissioned him, he charmed or confounded the impure spirit to the place and in the water it was appointed him, that he should do no more hurt, at least in the house of Tobias and Sara. Something like this we read in scripture. Rev. xx. 1-3, that the angel which came down from heaven, having the key of the bottomless pit, in great chariot he held in his hand, the dragon, which is the devil, and bound him for a thousand years, and cast him into the bottomless pit, and shut him up, till he be seen no more, till his thousand years be fulfilled. But, viz. They happened.

Ver. 19. And he kept the wedding-feast fourteen days.] Rejoicing, and taking his sister home to his house, he was the more obliged, not only from a natural, but from a sacred duty; it was abundantly necessary, that the husband could not any ways be excused from them, but was obliged to have them for at least seven days; and even the sabbath-day itself, according to the Mosaic Law, was their proper day, for the remembrance of the Passover.

Ver. 20. For before the days of the marriage were finished, Ragan had said unto him by oath, that he should not depart till the fourteenth days of the marriage were expired.] According to the sense that at first hearing offers itself, it seems as Ragan had said to Tobias, before the time was expired, that he should not depart before the time was expired. Rages? I answer, That this is either a mistake, or all the country or province about Elephanta was called Rages; and according to Vigenier, Vatia is, or was, a small town in the island of Cape, or Cappadocia." (6. 14.) The marginal reading is, "in the land or country of Media." And the Genevian version has expressly it, "in Media." But Gabael might live in the city particularly called by that name, and resided in the great or country town of one of our Shires. But the truth is, Raguel lived at Elephanta (iii. 7. vii. 1.), which was at the distance of one day's journey from Gabael's. Gabael and Tobias are represented as returning from a journey to Raguel's house, ver. 2. As to the objection which is founded on the Vulgate rendering, "it is to be observed, that the translation respecting the "Magi," as also our version (see note on iii. 7.)

Ver. 3. So Raphael went out, and lodged with Gabael, and sent Tobias, a youth, whom he had brought up, which were sealed up, and gave them to Tobias, saying, "Tobias, seeing himself pressed by Raguel his father-in-law, to stay with him fourteen days, was unwilling to refuse him, on account of the handsome manner in which he had been received and entertained by him, and especially his new relation to him; but as it was absolutely necessary to send to Gabael, and to exhibit to him the note or hand-writing, in order to receive the money, he feared he should disoblige his own parents, if he deferred his return too long, and his desire of testifying his grateful acknowledgments to his father-in-law, in the way of a present. This consideration made him contrive a method to satisfy at once both these obligations. He applies to, and prevails upon, Raphael, the holy companion of his journey, of whose wisdom, affection, and firmness the author speaks in a previous chapter. Raphael did not, however, undertake the management of this commission himself, and to set forward without him, but sufficiently authorized to receive the money, which he specially and happily accomplished. Throughout the whole narrative of this part of the story, Raphael's influence and power is manifest. Tobias was so great and extraordinary, for having conducted him through the journey so successfully, and brought about a match so advantageous to his parents, and for delivering him from the jaws of the voracious fish, and the fury and malice of the demon Asmodeus, that he professed to him, that if he was for the future to be his slave in return, he would have been content. Tobias, as we have reason to believe, had been a matter of much inquiry among the commentators, whether this money was deposited and lodged only with Gabael, or at Raguel's, as a place properly of greater security at that time, the Greek and Hebrew copies mention, or was really lent to him, probably to traffic with occasionally, as the Vulgate represents it; be this as it will, Gabael showed himself an honest and punctual man, by returning the ten talents instantly on a proper demand; and Tobit proved himself no less a good man, as St. Ambrose observes, by taking only the principal, without any computation for the greatness of the sum, or the length of the time."

Ver. 4. And Tobias blessed his wife. The design of the exhortation in the preceding verse, contrived to exalt and encourage the maiden in the situation in which she was, is, according to Mr. Badwell, and the Genevian version expressly has, "To bis had his wife with child." Grotius conjectures, from the authority of St. Jerome, that the reading of the Greek formerly was, ως ευχαριστηθησαι (Euchartethai) Tobias, she that had been forty years without a child, i. e. abyenuebe bene praecatuse est; but it does not appear they were then setting forward; the fourteen days were not yet near expired. His blessing on them on their departure follows after (s. 11.) Junius' rendering, inscribed in the margin, seems more probable, Benedixit Gabael Tobias et uxori ejus: That Gabael, at his arrival with Raphael, wished Tobias and his wife all possible joy and happiness in their new condition. Fagius' Hebrew has, Ad quorum adventum aduex maigie beneeditus fuit Tobias cum Sara uxore sua: Tobias, that upon the coming of these guests to the white, kissed and blessed them. He, as was and Sara were more pleased and happy. Calmet, lastly, makes the sense to be, That Tobias blessed, or was the cause of blessing and happiness to his wife, by the advantage which she received from this marriage, particularly, the assurance of a child, and the means of recovering from the demon, and taking away the reproach which before had attended her; instead whereof it would now be said, as a common form of benediction at future weddings, to the bride, "May you be as happy as was Sara, the wife of Tobias.""

CHAP. X.

Ver. 5. Now I care for nothing, my son, since I have led thee go. "He plea mu now, sit, at the end. " It is generally agreed upon, that the Helenian, and that of the Genevan versions have been proposed for restoring the true one, ως μη δει ροι, et μη ροι. The last seems preferable, as being confirmed by Vagius' Hebrew copy, the Vulgate, Vatia, Vigenier, Vatia, and others. The reading was therefore of the Grecian versions. Various conjectures have been proposed for restoring the true occasion of unenesses, or complaint against him. Pagus' version adds a very moving and substantial reason for this opinion of Tobit, viz., the fear which he entertained, as before mentioned, of the vengeance of his father and mother, and all that was near to them, in case Tobit should espy him, or should know that he was run away with his sister. For Tobit was so full of sorrow which bad husbands occasion their wives through ill treatment, renders them the more inexcusable in the sight of God, as the weakness of their sex calls rather for protection of them, than for their punishment, as St. Peter, "to render honour and esteem to them" (1 Pet. iii. 7). This they have in charge not only from the parent, who gives the wife to her husband, but also from themselves, as the person of the institution marriage is, and as he has made it an emblem of that divine love and union which he bears to his church, will avenge all harshness and injustice, that is at any time offered to his wife, or her family. The above extracts and notes conclude this chapter with the verse succeeding, which our translation, following the Roman or Complut. makes the beginning of the next.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 3. Let us haste before thy wife, and prepare the house.] As Tobis' parents were uneasy at his long stay, and did not expect that a wife would accompany him in his return, it was reasonable advice of Raphael's, that they should send a servant to hasten his marriage, and free them from their anxious solicitations about him, as to prepare the house to the best advantage, and dispose all things for the reception of the bride, and the lodging and accommodation of the newly married couple, and not allow them to act alone, with him, and were part of her dowry. The Vulgate makes Tobis to arrive seven days before his wife; Ingrasse etiam post septem dies Sara uxor filia ejus, et omnis familia sana, et pecora, et capra, et pecus multa nutrix, sed et illa pecuna quam reciperat ad Gabele. The Greek takes no notice of this, but intimates rather her arrival on the same day, for the time that he delays is for evening, and a sure sign; Tobias now bringing his wife home as a bride, would not be so uncomplaisant and unkind, as to leave her on the road for so long a time as seven days only to serve as a pretext for his own indecision and charge upon them as his pay. It is more probable that Sara, though she did not make such haste as her husband, through the impatience of seeing his parents, and acquainting them with his success and happy change of condition, may be supposed to have done, as being fatigued with so long a journey, and unaccustomed to travel, at least so far, and hindered too by the long train of servants and cattle accompanying her, and therefore obliged often to stop and refresh herself,—notwithstanding these reasons, I say, it is more probable that she arrived happily on the evening of the same day. When it is said in the original, that those days did not pass with her before they drew near unto Nineveh, the meaning may be, that they all went together, till they approached so near that place, as to be within a day's, or a few hours' journey of it, and that then Tobias arranged their lodging there, and a house was built for them in their own neighbourhood, set forward to give notice of and prepare for their coming.

Ver. 5. Anna not looking about towards the way for her son.] Vulgate, Anna sedebat sedes viam quotidian in supercilio montis (see x. 7). This shows her great eagerness and impatience, which is well expressed by μειζονεραι, and μείρονεραι, which follows, implies more than ελλείπει, viz. her seeing him at a distance, and knowing him, vidi un little and illico agnost: for as love is said to be blind upon occasion, so is it quick-sighted, επίδειξις, in expecting and discovering the beloved object, as this illustrious doctor represented in the parable of the prodigal son, where the father is described as seeing him "when he was yet a great way off, and upon his approach falling on his neck, and kissing him" (Luke xv. 20). As his love is quick-sighted, so is his wisdom, επιτολογικα, which we often see in the case of Tobias, as is mentioned to be founded on this of Tobit's, recorded by Gregory of Tours, concerning his own father: Florentius rediveo calore capitatis est, ascendentur ebrios, inanescunt octogenarii, sed suaviter, deinde etiam â patre stabent, et artificium non cenervatur, jam penis consecutus jacet. Interea puer (filius Gregorius) Turon.) vidit interim in sonno perornam, sedem, utrumque Tobis cognominabant habitum, interrogatam. Respondit, Nequicquam. Qui aut, Novitae hincuisse cecum, aequum atque formum ex jecore piscis, angelum constitutione, curum. Er ergo fac similiter, et salvatibur genus tuis. Hee lice matri result, quis confessus peter ad amnum directe: piscis quater, quae de extis fusa fuerant, prunos impomnator: non follietur virescere, enim primordium famos obditus, inarbar patris reticiu, proponit omnis meaning of the noun in the original, then the verb to be mentioned, which is to be understood of Tobit, which, though, it has the appearance of the marvellous in it, yet doubtless the relation of the son, and of such a son, concerning his own father, deserves some credit; and as it is grounded upon the case of Tobias, as is manifested of any of the reality and worth of it. And perhaps his design, as well as that of the writer of Tobit, might be advanced to the belief of angelic visions and communications with good and holy men.

Ver. 18. And Achiccharus, and Nabuas his brother's son, came.] O εἰς ἄναπλεων, D. D. Thisus thinks the true reading is, προστάτευς, probably an error of authority, and an emendation of the Greek, which has venerate Achar et Nabath consobrin Tobit. Gratius conjecture seems preterite, καὶ Ναβάθ, i.e. he who was called also Nabuas, 11 for it was not unusual to designate a man by two names of his own invention. It is certain that Achiccharus was προστάτευς, Tobit's brother's son, i.e. his brother Arazel's son, L.
21, and it appears from the singular number being here used, that only one person is spoken of. Junius is of the same opinion, as the margin acquaints us.

Ver. 19. And Tobias' wedlock was kept seven days with great solemnity and rejoicing. This marriage, which was celebrated at Raguel's house fourteen days (vii. 19). This rather refers to the  ránsás, or, as the Lainns term it, répot, an entertainment made at the wedding. It appears to the reader, that the wedding was kept with uncommon joy, considering the advantage arising to Tobias by marrying such an heiress, and the many concerning agreements, promises, &c. that may be loosely set at this time; but sae safe return, his receiving the ten talents by him, and, which was of greater consequence, and more acceptable to him, the recovery of his sight at this age, after being de- pounded from the sight of all things, as the LXX. interpreted with extraordinary demonstrations of joy, the Hebrew word which signifies a wedding is sometimes rendered by the LXX. ędov, a banquet (Gen. xxvi. 30. Esth. 1. 3. 14, 14), sometimes a feast, and once yoo, joy itself (Esth. ix. 17). And in the gospel, the partaking of the marriage-feast, or supper, is called entering into the joy of the Lord. The wedding house was called Beth-Hailon, the house of praise, and the marriage-song, Halleluim, praises. And so Ps. lxviii. 63, the words, "Their maidens were not given to marriage," are by the Chaldee paraphrase rendered, "are not celebrated with epalaimusms," and by Aquilas, 60 kai yoo.

CHAPTER XII.

Ver. 3. For he hath brought me again to thee in safety, and made whole my wife, and brought me the money, and likewise healed thee." The Vulgate rocks up seven good offices done for me, and seven great benefits, that were entered into Media, and reconducting him safely. 2. Providing him with a good and virtuous wife. 3. Chasing away the evil spirit Asmodeus, and preventing his hurting Tobias. 4. Occasionally introducing Tobias from the jaws of the great varicious fish. 6. Restoring sight to Tobit. 7. Instructing Tobias by wise counsels, and employing him with things spiritual. This is the reason, why the angel Raphael took of the person under his guidance and direction, is generally understood as a figure of the invisible care which the angels take of good men, and as a pattern of the zeal and diligence wherewith the ministers of God ought to watch over the souls committed to their charge.

Ver. 5. 6. So he called the angel, and he said unto him, Take half of all that ye have brought, and go away in safety. Then he took them both apart, and said unto them, Bless God, praise him, and magnify him, and praise him for the things which he hath done unto you in the sight of all that live; for he hath showed his great and marvellous works only the wages at first agreed on, viz. a drachm or two drachms a day; but as Tobias was thoroughly convinced that he had been unjustly charged with the thing, he reproved Raphael, he moves his father for a much greater allowance; and he could not certainly testify his se- knowledge in a more generous manner, than in offering him the part of all his estate. What? says he. The man hath been chiefly instrumental in procuring, and to divide the inheritance with him like a brother. After the great offer made him, both by father and son, he immediately takes the opportunity privately to make himself known to them, and to acquaint them that he had no occasion for any part of their substance; that he was pleased with this proof of their gratitude, and the sense they had of the great mercies shown them, but that the acknowledgment and praise were due only to that great God which sent him, who hath power over unclean spirits, can give sight to the blind, and bring abroad the dead to life; by means seemingly the most unlikely and improbable.

Ver. 7. It is good to keep close the secret of a king, but it is honourable to reveal the works of God. The counsels of princes and kings are very closely kept, and the secrets of the soul locked up both in themselves and ministers; without this caution their enemies will have a great advan- tage against them, and the priest and best consulted sel^ce. We are here immediately, in reviewing the pass in the cabinets of princes are suffered to transpire, and get abroad through weakness or treachery, in vain does the politician and orator on the one side, and the historian on the other. We see therefore, that in all courts soon get the intelligence, and the design proves abortive. The emperor Tiberius being asked why he was so reserved and cautious in consulting with friends in mat- ters of the most private and confidential nature, he thus answered: "that a prince's mind should be known to none, or but a very few; for the generality of persons consulted with had not the gift of secrecy, and could not refrain talking of what was under agitation, whereby a prince was disappointed of his aims, and was, moreover, often subjected to the ridicule of his mistakes, and to the inquisitive friend less to be ad- mired: "I would burn my shirt, if I thought it was pry to what passed in my breast." (Tinty, cap. 61. de Vi- ries illustr.) But in the case of God, his works are no less manifest and revealed, the more they promote his honour and glory. Neither the malice, power, nor evil designs of men, can frustrate his intentions. He would not be jealous of the light which was given to them, for he always turns his light into his eyes, even though the human spirit was capable of entering into and searching the deep things of God. He rather encourages the freest inquiries, in order the more the more they understand, the more they proclaim his glory, and call for a larger tribute of praise and thanksgiv- ing. And accordingly the saints, both of the Old and New Testament, are exhorted, (Deut. iv. 6, 7; and John iv. 22, 23; Sain- riah, the father of John the Baptist, devout old Simeon, and the blessed Virgin herself, have left behind them eternal monuments of their praise and acknowledgment, in the songs composed by them. In ver. 7 following, this apothegm, "It is good to keep close the secrets of a king, but honourable to reveal the works of God," is repeated. If it was there encased in a parenthesis, the sense would be better expressed in other words. It was an ancient proverb: "Let not all the nations of the world say, that now all things work together for good to them that love God." (Rom. viii. 28.) To the same purpose the wise son of Siracli, "There shall no evil happen to him that feareth the Lord." (Pr. x. 19.) Thus we see that St. Austin says, not that the whole heavens and all the angels, when he says, Nunquam vino bono qui multa evenire potest, nec vivo, nec mortuo; nec unquam erga nos Dei immortalis neglegentur."

Ver. 8. But faith, fasting, and prayer, and alms, and righteousness. Not that prayer is indifferent or unavailable without fasting and alms, but the meaning is, that prayer is bet- er, or more prevalent, when the prayerer is fasting. St. Austin says, that alms and alms are like two wings to prayer, waiting it up to heaven. Our Saviour joins all three together, Matt. vi. as duties equally to be observed, and hinging one clause on the other, and the other, and so we find it in the foregoing verse; but in the Hebrew there is but one word for both. Thus in that known place of Dan. iv. 7., where the Vulgate reads, Free- ce has been translated, Godet has, et enfin devenu pau- perum (and the rendering of the LXX. is in the same manner), our version, following the Hebrew, has, "Break bread with the poor," and thus also Hasenmurach, which is a true rendering, Attendite ne justitiam vestram faciat coram hominibus; "Take heed that you do not your righteousness, i.e. alms, before men;" and some Greek copies favour this rendering. For this acceptance of righteousness, see Pa- x. xxi. 23. 26, 26. xvi. 3. Prov. x. 2.; xi. 21. 26, and Mr. Mede's Works, b. i. disc. 22. Ver. 9. For alms doth deliver from death, and shall purge away all sin. Those that receive alms and righteousness shall be filled with life. Though life eternal is not men- tioned, yet it is here meant, and is the true sense of this passage. The Vulgate reads, "Fasting and alms give life to the mire mercy to the poor," and so in the Syriac and Arabic translation of the New Testament, alms is expressed by a word signifying righteousness: and the Latin interpreter translates it by "give life to the poor." The Lord has, Attendite ne justitiam vestram faciat coram hominibus; "Take heed that you do not your righteousness, i.e. alms, before men;" and some Greek copies favour this rendering. For this acceptance of righteousness, see Pa- x. xxi. 23. 26, 26. xvi. 3. Prov. x. 2.; xi. 21. 26, and Mr. Mede's Works, b. i. disc. 22. Ver. 9. Ver. 9. For alms doth deliver from death, and shall purge away all sin. Those that receive alms and righteousness shall be filled with life. Though life eternal is not men- tioned, yet it is here meant, and is the true sense of this passage. The Vulgate reads, "Fasting and alms give life to the mire mercy to the poor," and so in the Syriac and Arabic translation of the New Testament, alms is expressed by a word signifying righteousness: and the Latin interpreter translates it by "give life to the poor." stand these words in so extensive and absolute a sense, as if they implied that charity shall purge away or cover all manner of sins, otherwise the notion of the context is very cautious, but in such a limited sense, as that passage, 1 Pet. iv. 8, is generally interpreted as "charity shall cover the multitude of sins;" i. e. it shall cover many lesser failings and neglects, and those committed in ignorance, or by mistake, which are properly enough for their number styled, "the multitude of sins." Solomon has the like observation, expressed almost in the same words, viz. "that mercy and truth do meet together, and righteousness and peace shall follow them" (Prov. xxxii. 6); and such is also the doctrine of St. John the Evangelist, which explains the great efficacy of charity, by a very apt comparison, "as water quencheth flaming fire, so alms maketh an atonement for sins," Eccl. iii. 30 (see also Dan. ii. 27).

Ver. 12. When they did pray. . . . I did bring the remembrance of your prayers before the Holy One.] The notion that the angel, as ministers of God, presented to him the supplications of mankind, was very ancient; the heathens themselves thought, that the office of angels was to serve as messengers between the gods and men, to present to the former the prayers and sacrifices of men, and to bring them back to them orders from above, and to return the fruits of their petitions. The Platonists in particular held, that demons or angels were of a middle nature between gods and men; and that the appearances of them were sent to carry up or carry down men, according as his commands to them (Plato in Interloc. Inter hominum (says Apuleius) calicolumque voces humic prenunci, indis docunor, qui ultra citro portant lineae ponitiones, inde surrexi, et occidit; ancipitum inter hominem et diem in loco Deo Societ. So Lucan describes Mercury as attending upon Jupiter for the like purpose, τωι δια παραπενιαν, και ουν θεο- φιλως, v. 14, 15, and those are the sentiments of his nation on this subject, describing them as messengers of good things from God to his creatures, and carrying back to God their exigencies and wants (Deo ad quendam operationem, accipere misericordia, quae dictum es, et ad quern habet inclinationem suam, hanc sommam accesit, embraced this notion, and from this notion probably sprung that φανερωθία, or worship of angels, condemned by St. Paul, Col. ii. 18. And not only the heathens, but the Jews also seem to retain this notion as thus commissioned and employed. When Gabriel tells Zacharias that his prayer was heard (Luke i. 13), and the angel is standing before the throne of God, and he inquires into the wish of the son, he is said to be "upon the golden altar which was before the throne." And the smoke of the incense which came with the prayers of the saints ascended up before God in the presence of his angels, Rev. viii. 3, 4; and these prayers of the saints must be considered as those which were offered at the altar of the sanctuary, and which were like the sacrifices of the ancients. That the prayers of the angels are offered at the temple of heaven, and that this is the place of all prayer, is what is taught by various places of scripture, e. g. Coloss. i. 13, 14. And when thou didst not delay to rise up, and leave thy dinner, to go and cover the dead, thy good deed shall not be forgotten. This farther must be contained in these words than what is expressed, or else the sense will be the same with the end of the foregoing verse. St. Cyprian (de Mortuitate) reads, Quia non ex omnibus, sed reconditus praeclaram dignitatem, at conditari mormum, missum summum sanctitum te. The Vulgate renders in like manner, or rather more fully, Quandod mortuos assecundabas per diem in domo tua, et nocem spe- lentias eos, ego solutus orationem tui Dominum; et quin acceptus eras Deo, nescis fuit propter probatione tantum. Munster reads yet more explicitly, "Because of your good deed, I will not delay to rise up and leave your dinner, to go and cover the dead, for so God chooses to prove his faithful servants." The Syriac version is to the same purpose. What makes this interpretation the more probable, is, that all the vowels of the whole sentence are transposed, and the sense of the passage is accordingly changed, (io. 7, 8), immediately follows the account of his blindness, as if by the infliction of it a farther proof was required from him of his faith and patience under affliction. It and it shall be a token for you that the Lord is true; and see also compend. that he, whom they had hitherto took for a man, and had entertained as a hired mule, was a quite different sort of being, and that it was an angel of God whom they had neglected, and not brought forth and made known to them by mere accident, but by God's order and appointment, and perhaps through the ministry and by the hand of this very angel. This interpretation, at least, has some countenance from the substance of the clause, "the Lord is true;" and I am persuaded, that there are no plain words that come near the Vulgate is very explicit, Ut Saram taxum filii tui a damo locubercensi. Ver. 15. I am Raphael, one of the seven holy angels, who present the prayers of the saints, and which go in and out before the throne of the Holy One. The voice of the angel was like that of Matt. xvii. 10. Seem only to signify their intimacy in the court of heaven, and their attendance upon God, as the principal ministers of God, an observation of great ease and pleasure. Munster's Hebrew copy makes no mention of seven angels. Some interpreters maintain, that we are not to understand the passage of seven distinct angels purposely, but that it is only given for the sake of some places of holy scripture. For it is certain, that there are infinitely more than seven angels before the throne of God. In Dan. vii. 10, Rev. v. 11, mention is made of neither the seven thousand ministering unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand standing before him. Others are of opinion, that there are seven principal angels, the most exalted, most glorious and chief of the heavenly host, who hold the first rank in the hierarchy of angels, and are princes in the court of the sovereign Lord of the universe. That some angels were among the command of others, seems probable from the one-time tradition, that there are seven principal angels, which minister before the throne of God, and are therefore called archangels, some of whose names we have in scripture, as Michael is the chief angel of the seven, and Gabriel one of the chief princes, x. 2, Gabriel, ix. 21, Luke i. 19, here we have Raphael, and 2 Esd. iv. 36, mention is made of Uriel, or, as others read, Jeremiel, the archangel. But presently the author says, that these seven archangels are, בִּהְלַחְלָל מַכָּלֶל אַלֵגֵנְלוֹךְ, בִּתְכָלֶלُ מַכָּלֶל אַלֵגֵנְלוֹךְ, i.e. Princpns primarius, seu primumoginiti angelorum principes. There are several passages in the book of Tobit concerning the seven angels; and there is no doubt that they are expressed there in a greater number, in the same sense as in the Vulgate, e. g. in the place, i. 4, iv. 5, 6, but the most express is, v. 2, "I saw the seven angels, viz. הַשֵּׁלֶשׁ בְּרֵיחַ בְּרֵיחַ, an expression very much resembling that of Tobit, "I am Raphael, one of the seven angels which stand and minister before the Holy Blessed One," i.e. God. For this, according to a very learned writer, is the true rendering. The Greek in- deed hath, αἱ ἑξὰπτομα, ut expressit, sunt deuæ, some spend, but do not. But how the Lord then brought them out of the Chaldees, nor Fugius' ancient Hebrew copy, perhaps translated from the same Chaldee original, hath any such reading; and therefore it seems an addition or liberty of the Greek translator, who thought their ministry to consist in presenting the prayers of the saints, and translated accordingly (Mede's Works, disc. 10). The notion of seven supreme angels, considered as being drawn from the seven chief princes of the Persian empire; and indeed the number seven has given rise to some other conjectures as, that they have the charge over the seven principal parts of the world, to divide it; that they preside over the seven planets, and direct the influences of them, &c., which are speculations rather curious than useful. Of the seven angels, the story of the author of this book is the representing the angel Raphael here, as offering up the prayers of the saints before the throne of God, which has been thought an invasion upon Christ's mediatorial office; but it we allow guardian angels, that they pass from heaven to earth, and from earth to heaven, and make a report of their charge to the Deity, as our Saviour's own words seem to intimate, the passage may then be defended, so that we attribute to the angels such offering of the prayers of good men, as is merely ἀφορμή, not ἐρωτήματα. Ver. 16. And now God hath sent me to heal thee, and Save thy daughter-in-law.] i. e. God having visited you will heal thee, and take away the evil of your wife; and not having proved you by this great affliction of blindness, and found you perfect, has sent me again to heal you; so for so Ass. 0 Lord God, for I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face;" by saying, "Peace be unto thee, fear not, thou shalt not die." (Judg. vi. 23.) It is an absurdity to suppose that the worshipers in the Temple of the Jews, or the reader of the Vulgate, or the reader of the English and Spanish versions of the Holy Scriptures, would have entertained the idea that there were angels among those in the event, whom at first they frightened by their appearance; but evil angels, on the contrary, fill those who are unacquainted with any other doctrine, with dread of their presence. To Ver. 18. For not of any favour of mine, but by the will of our God I came; wherefore praise him for ever.' The notion of angels presenting prayers to God, has given rise to their being supposed to be, and to endeavor to vanish from the eye of God, and to have any influence over the present. And, indeed, though it may with some carry the suspicions of heredity, yet may we account for, and what we have observed in this work, supposing some deceptious visits, or illusion in the senses?

Ver. 20. Write all things which are done in a book.] It is commonly believed, that Tobit and Tobias wrote their own history. This opinion was originally founded upon the angel's commanding them to 'write all things that were done in a book.' In the Vulgate it is only, Narrate omni recitation of the history of the fourteen, all but the last two verses, by Tobias the son; and that the whole is founded upon some uncertain family, preferably one of the family (Demost. Evangel. prop. 4). After this elucidation and explanation, the ordering what was to be noted, to be noted, the belief of angelical visions and communications with holy men, according to the received Jewish notions; as what follows for the repetition of the account, and the assistance of the twelve first chapters were written by Tobit the father; the whole thirteenth chapter and part of the fourteenth, cannot have been ascribed to Tobit; for there remains one of the family of the same name, a very obscure, to comfort the afflicted and persecuted Jews, with a prospect of future glorious times and of the last and most distinguished state of the church in the new Jerusalem, built of God with precious stones, and the corporate deliverance and exaltation.

event, in which the divine majesty and omniscience most completely and convincingly dwell upon the subject of that sacred nation. Or Tobit may be considered as speaking here prophetically, as he does in several parts of this hymn, regarding the future as if it was the time past, and the events to come as if they were passed. This, as we have before seen, was the way of the Hebrew poets and prophets; and the same manner of expression is used in the Psalms, where, when God, taking pity upon his people, shall cause them to return to their own land. He blesses God even in his captivity, as if the restoration was already accomplished, and the kingdom of David about to be established in all its glory. See Lee's Dissert. on the second book of Esdras, who makes the two last chapters to be both prophetical and descriptive, parallel one another. See also the note on ch. xviii. 19.

See the note on the two last chapters of Tobit and the two last chapters of the Revelation (ch. xiii. xiv. to the end, and xvi. 1-8, comp. Rev. xxi. 19, to the end, and xxii. 19, to the end). Here, as in the last book of Esdras, we have a complete account of the characters of the humans and the captives, which has been taken from the other, or alludeth to the other, p. 61.

Ver. 10. Praise the everlasting King, that his tabernacle may be established for ever and ever. If this is understood literally of the destruction of the city and temple, as all the interpreters expound it, it must refer to that in the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, when Nebuchadnezzar killed all the princes and the more constant part of the people, and burnt it with the temple (2 Kings xxv.). Now this did not happen till above a hundred years after the history here related: but to prevent this event, and as a multiplication of the blessings, there will be more causes to understand Tobit here as speaking prophetically, that the ruin of the house and kingdom of David should precede the coming of the Messiah, but that the destruction of the temple of Solomon and of Nebuchadnezzar should be the forerunners of the more distant and solemn event, the captivity of Zedekiah.

The captivity of Zedekiah by the Chaldeans perfected the fall of David's kingdom, which could not rise before the return from that captivity, and was to rise, as foretold (Ezra i. 1-11), to the power and dominion of the Messiah, who should recover and possess it (Mic. vi. 2. Luke i. 18), to its ancient splendour and dignity. Tobit here seems to refer to Amos i. 11. "In that day will I raise up the tabernacle of David which is fallen down;" and keep up the everlasting light of the Messiahs; and as Tobit here prays that God would raise up this tabernacle or building, and close up the breaches of it; that at a certain future time he would again exalt David's kingdom, which, for a time, was reduced to desolation, let the means be by a new captivity begun. But after the Babylonian captivity was over, none of David's race was of any great account; this, therefore, most probably relates to the days of the Messiah, and the meaning seems to be this: behold the house and kingdom of David, after the captivity, will have great room to rejoice in the blessed change (see Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 175, &c.) and that the accomplishment of this long-wished-for blessing that from Babylon, made a part of their prayer, whilst the sacrifice was consuming (see 2 Macc. i. 36. 27. 29. ii. 17. 18).

Ver. 11. Many nations shall come from far to the name of the Lord God with gifts in their hands, even gifts to the king of heaven: this relates to the calling of the gentiles, as does xiv. 7, who shall embrace the true religion, that of Jesus Christ, as should seem from the mention of gifts, by way of homage, which probably has a distant glance at the offering of the wise men, Matt. ii. 11. Or thus, God shall call the gentiles to enter into covenant with him, and make them, as the sacrifice of old, a part of his family, and accept of that which they shall bring for his name to be honored in his people and possession (see Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 112), and to be part of the restored kingdom of David, to be supplied the church with all the necessary gifts and graces. The mention of nations and the place of the ten tribes that fall off first from David's kingdom, and many of the two tribes that never returned from their dispersion. This Amos expresses by the name of Gentiles, which, as zealous for the interests of the Lord, and called by his name, Amos i. 12. It is very observable, that in Eager's Hebrew copy, the very words of Ps. lxxii. 10, to which likewise Tobit may probably allude, are retained, and the verse seems to connect itself, as connected with the two foregoing verses, of the great respect paid to the holy city after the captivity by the great and powerful nations, that princes of the Gentiles were not to sit under the beauty, the kings of Egypt and Syria, and even some of the Roman emperors testified their value for it and the temple, by great presents and offerings sent thither; that, since the establishment of Christianity, the great reign of God has not diminished; many emperors and kings have contributed to enlarge its beauty and privileges, and have prided themselves in being its protectors. Hence the following description of a holy city, which is engaged in to receive the holy land from the possession and propagation of infidels: hence those many voyages and pilgrimages, which Christians of all ranks, with a kindred spirit, have been lately engaged to see that holy city which Jesus Christ honoured with his presence and miracles; hence the great care to preserve its venerable remains, and to consecrate even events in its history. See Acts, Dei, lib. xxxii. cap. 87; but the first sense is most natural.

Ver. 16. For Jerusalem shall be built up with sapphires, and emeralds, and precious stones; and the name thereof shall be termed the city of the Lord, and of the Holy One of Israel.

Here Tobit having prefigured, under the image of rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem after the captivity, the far more glorious establishment of Christ's church, sees to have borrowed these figures, where he describes the new and heavenly Jerusalem, or the church triumphant above. The magnificence and pomposity of the expressions leave no room to doubt but that this is not to be understood literally, but of that spiritual building, built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief corner-stone (Eph. ii. 20).

This description very much resembles that of verse 17, viz. Ver. 18, 19, 23, of the city of God, Ezek. xli., so called to distinguish it from the earthly city of that name, and is there described as coming down from God, and adorned with all those glorious graces and ornaments which are metaphorically represented under the figure of a solid four-square, and beautiful structure, consisting all of gold and precious stones; having the glory of the sun, moon, and stars, and a peaceable and safe difference, as that as to the Jerusalem was like devouring fire, terrible to behold; this should have nothing of terror in it, but only a pleasing, delightful splendour, wherein the whole of the other city is built upon the earth, and not in heaven. See 1 Pet. iv. 12, 13, etc. "the city which hath the foundations," or the new Jerusalem, the foundations of whose walls were garnished with all manner of precious stones. Plato seems to have set forth the beauty and felicity of the paraisdical earth, by the stones of several colours and brightness which it abounded with: "In this pure earth (which he supposes to be quite different as well as far removed from that of ours), the true light is always to be seen, and the appearance admirable and surprising; all those things shine with the glistering lustre of gold, jewels, sapphires, emeralds, and those stones which he tells us to enjoy a long life, free from accidents or afflictions" (In Plato).

Who does not discern the style of the prophet in this passage, or can any way doubt that this description of the glorious Jerusalem, and the names of the precious stones are particularly taken from Isa. liv. 11, where God promises to lay the foundations of Jerusalem in the latter times, and all her borders with pleasant stones; or from Ezek. xvi. 13, where the glory of Eden is represented by the plentiful and joint lustre of gems of various kinds? From these fine images of the prophet, which Tobit adopts into this hymn, he encourages his nation in the hopes and expectation of the Messias, where great shall be the peace of the once afflicted children (see Bishop Chandler's Def. p. 92), lest Ananias alluding to and charmed with this glorious description, in pious raptures break forth, Felix anima mea, sempereg felix in seculis, a tertio mortuum gloria turam, talis est regnum Christi, pulcherrimum, ornatum munus, et plateas munus, et mansiones munus, ostia munus, et veneta munus, nobilissimos cives munus, et fortissimum regnum munus in decoro suo. Muri mansueti ou ex lapidibus profecti, pertinentia eorum de figuris, et manifestas ex aurum purpuris; in quibus quendam aliumque sine intermissione concinnat; mansiones tuis multa quadratis lapidibus fundis, sapphirus constructus, interfessis suis terris, aureis quique pulcherrimos, omnis narratur munus, nullus habitat inquinantis (Mestus, cap. 20).

Ver. 18. And all her streets shall say Alleluia: and they shall praise his name in all the earth. In Figius' Hebrew copy it is, "Blessed be God who hath exalted the horn of his kingdom for ever, even as the horn of David to bud forth. And according to the people of Almah, which was set down as a name, as being Jesus, as the Messias, was conducted triumphantly into Jerusalem; for then the multitude cried aloud, "Hosanna, blessed be the kingdom of our father David, that cometh in the name of the Lord: Hosanna in the highest." (Mark xii. 35; Matt. xix. 35; Luke xix. 38.)" But this verse, at least the beginning of it, seems to be taken.

CHAP. XIV.

Ver. 2. And he was eight and fifty years old when he last his sight, which was restored to him after eight years.

The Vulgate has set down thirty years, as if he had recovered his sight when he was sixty, being blind only four years. There is a marked disagreement in the versions about the time of Tobit's death; the Vulgate makes it thirty years, two hundred and fifty-six years before the beginning of the gospel in Tobit; and the time of his sight, thirty years, two hundred and thirty-six years before the beginning of the gospel in Tobit; and the time of his sight, thirty years, two hundred and fifty-six years after the death of Tobit. This uncertainty makes it difficult to fix the determinate time of Tobit's age when he prophesied of Nineweh's approaching ruin, or to ascertain the particular year of its destruction, the first prediction of Jonah against Nineveh. And, indeed, that great event is a point far from being agreed and settled among chronologers. Archbishop Usher placed it fourteen years earlier, in the fifteenth year of Josiah; Prideaux, four or fifteen years later, about the twentieth of that prince's reign, which was the twenty-third of Cæsarean, in the kingdom of Media. What is most certain, every interpretation, is, that he prophesied to one or other of the two texts, with respect to the years of Tobit and his son; and the diversification of the versions confirms this.

Ver. 4. I believe those things which Jonas the prophet spoke of Nineveh, that it shall be overthrown. Grothus contends, that both here and ver. 8, the true reading of the Greek is, "Ναυμαχον τον αραμανιν, και Ζωνον γρηγορον, και Αλμααν τον Νηνεωθην," (i.e., he did foretell the revenge which God will take upon the Assyrians for their repeated provocations, and for all the wrongs done to the ten tribes whom they had oppressed the breaking of the one hundred and forty thousand of Nineveh, that once famous city of three days' journey; but there seems no necessity for such an alteration of the text, if the prophecy of Jonah did really contain that prediction of the destruction of Nineveh, and Medes and Babylonians; and that it did so, seems probable from the following reasons:—first, Though it is well known that upon the humilation and repentance of the inhabitants, the first prediction of Jonah against Nineveh, that it should be destroyed by those floods, was not at that time fulfilled, yet it seems necessary to infer, that the like judgments hung over that city, as a prophetic prerogative, though not executed during Tobit's time. Secondly, and more particularly, it seems improbable, that a clause in the present copies of Zophaniah (ch. xxiv. 15—15, 11), which foretells the destruction of Nineveh, does not belong to that prophet, but to the prophecy of Jonah, though now dropped, in which he foretells after the final destruction of that city; and to this Tobit, as having another and better copy of Jonah's prophecy, may probably allude; see Whiston's Athen. Record. vol. ii. Appendix iv. and indeed his reasons for this suspicion, from Zeph. iii. 1, where he says, concerning Nineveh, Alvivada, called, according to the LXX. the "famous redeemed city," and by the Syriac, emphatically, "the city of Jonah?" and from ver. 6, as referring to the destruction of Nineveh, do still partly stand in argument in favour of this opinion. The like interpolation of a prophecy, and upon the very same occasion, he suspects to be 2 Esd. n. 8, 9. 20—23.

Jerusalem shall be desolate, and the house of God in it shall be burned. This passage, as it occurs in the Vulgate and most of the Latin versions, has been objected to as a mistake in point of time, as making mention of the temple of Jerusalem being burnt, which has been mentioned as the place, which it is said, has occasion to some to overthrow the authority of this book. But the Greek version, and the English which is exactly the same as the latter, is very improbable, and was still to happen, and not historically, as of that which was already done. But there is no necessity of supposing with some, that Tobit had the gift of prophecy, he rather grounds his observation on the prophecies of others, Jer. xxvi. 19. Micah iii. 12, which express the destruction of Jerusalem, and the house of God, in the days of Hezekiah, and which he supposes to have continued for fifty-two years after; till, by the favour of Cyrus, the Jews were released from their captivity, and reunited to their own holy city (2 Kings xxv. 8, Jer. lii. 12).

Ver. 3. And that again God will have mercy on them, and bring them again into the land, where they shall build a tempie, not like for the former times, but with a new foundation, and afterwirds they shall return from all places of their captivity, and build Jerusalem gloriously, and the house of God shall be built in it for ever with a glorious heavens shall be gathered together, and the whole prophecies of three periods, which should fall after his first.

The rebuilding of the temple, which should continue to the conclusion or the consummation of the age, i.e. the Jewish state; for the words, "so aother end not above," are here to be rendered, "till" or "when the seasons of the age be fulfilled," called, Matt. xxiv. 3, or the same, "the consummation" or "conclusion of the age," or, as Fagius' Hebrew copy has it, "till the first age was out." For the Jews were wont to distinguish their state under the low, which they called "the present age," from the period of time af-fter the coming of that age, which cannot be seen, which will come." Thus Daniel seals his prophecy to the time of the end, or consummation, as the Greek renders it, not the end of all time, but of the Jewish economy. And so the division of the Messianic kingdom into two parts may be understood, consummation, fulfilling, or the shutting up that age, which is the second period. And thus, in the third period, follows the state of Christianity, the glorious Jerusalem, that building, more beautiful than all jewels and all visions, xvi. 18, 19, and described here, ver. 6. by the turning of the nations, concerning the gentiles, serving God true, and by the book of the song, which is the song of Christianity. The learned Mr. Mede conjectures from the words, "and afterward they shall return from all places of their captivity," that the sense is very imperfect, and that those words are nothing, but the ideas, which are added and so without a preceding one of a captivity. And that it belongs to the destruction of the Jews by the Romans, appears by another passage added also in that Hebrew copy, and directly parallel to this, which he conceives was written about the same time as Jerusalem, v. 29, mention is made of the angels sent to gather the elect Jews from the four winds, so it follows in that Ho-brew copy, "but God, holy and blessed, shall remember and charge his servants and his saints, and shall make them great," (Dan. xii. 1). We have in Jerusalem an eminent prophecy of the restoration and final happy state of all the twelve tribes, with the mention of the horrible distress they then shall in force (Jer. xxx. 1—24, xxxi. 1—41, 32—25, 37—40. 1. 1—7, 19, 20. 5—10, 15, 19). This is also agreeable to what the prophet Micah says, v. 3, 4. "Although God will send his return for Messiah into Israel, yet he will let Israel remain in captivity till Sion hath gone the full time of her travail, and then her sorrows shall have a joyful issue; then the remnant of his brethren shall return with the children of his people, who shall learn mercy. In strength of the Lord, and, they shall be converted, and he (the Christ) shall be great unto the ends of the earth, and he shall be the peace," (see Bishop Chandler's Del. p. 158).

Prince of Peace is to be called Messiah, and "God truly, and shall bury their ills." The learned prelate above quoted says, that in this and the foregoing verses, To-bit mentions four great events which he took from the prophcy, which is to be considered as prophetic, and a long capitvity of his nation ensuing it, Secondly, A general return from the captivity. Thirdly, The rebuilding of the city and temple. Lastly, The introduction of the Gentiles into the gentile nations from idolatry, when the horn or kingdom of his people should be exalted (Ibid. p. 50). With respect to this last particular, we may in general take notice, that these prophecies are often mentioned as if they were observed as a principal circumstance in their description of the fourishing state of the church, which should come to pass in af-fter times; see Isa. i. 29. Jer. iii. 17. xvi. 19. Zechar. xi. 2.
But that of Micah, v. 12—14, is near clear and full. "And that there shall be a small remnant of them left, who shall cut off all witchcrafts out of thine hand, and thou shalt have no more souleaters. Thy graven images also will I cut off, and thy standing images out of the midst of thee, and then shalt thou know that the Lord thy God is in the midst of thee. I will pluck up thy groves out of the midst of thee," &c.
And it appears to have been the sentiment of the ancient Jews themselves; for the meaning of idolatry should attend the happy times of the Messianic

Ver. 10. Remember, my son, how Aman handled Achi-charus that brought him up, how out of light he brought him into darkness; for through the Lord's grace and mercy, Acharus was saved, but the other lost his rewards; for he went down into darkness. Monasres gave alms, and escaped the sources of death, which they had set for him: but Aman fell therein, and passed into destruction. He was also removed, i.e. He endeavoured, according to Darius, to take away his life, or, from a flourishing condition, to bring him into poverty or imprisonment. Who was Aman, is, uncertain; probably it is Tobit's nephew, mentioned i. 21, xi. 13.
Much less do we know who Aman or Monasres is.
There is no reason, but the mere name, to suppose the latter to be the son of Amon, the grandson of Tobit, and hence conjectures, another name for Achiachar us, and that Nasashes should be inserted in the text instead of it (see note on xi.
18). Nor is Aman here, that Hannan who was Mordecai's cousin, and is called Mordecai the son of Aman in Esth. vi. 8, and after the time of Darius the Mede. This, therefore,
is either an interpolation, as some suppose, in the history, and therefore not genuine, or it is inserted after the incident of Esther; for this is utterly incompatible with the time that Tobit is supposed to live in. The elevation of Mordecai to his great dignity, and the fall and disgrace of Haman, cannot be supposed to be described or inserted in this text, and after the time of Darius the Mede. This, therefore,
is either an interpolation, as some suppose, in the history,
and therefore not genuine, or it is inserted after the incident of Esther; for this is utterly incompatible with the Theo, before he died, he heard of the destruction of Ninives, which was taken by Nabuchodonosor end Assuerus." Usher, in his Annals, A. M. 3375, Prideaux, Conp. p. 47, 48, and other learned men, understand this of Nabopollassar, father of Ninevah, called by the Medes, Nabuchodonosor, and Cyaxares, king of Media, called, by Daniel, Ahasuerus, ix. 1. This remarkable transaction is generally placed in the twenty-ninth year of king Josiah, and the thirty-third year of the Nabop-llassar, and was brought to its end, as is at large set account given by the heathen historians, Herodotus, Strabo, Alexander Polyhistor and others. Esenius places the time of the taking of Ninevah in the twenty-second year of Cy-axares, and it seems to have been the same year as the death of Assuerus, both which accounts agree; for, according to Eusebius, this twenty-second year of Cyaxares falls in with the first of Na-buchodonosor. These two princes entering into an alliance together, by means of a marriage between Anystias, daughter of Astyages, and Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, marched with their combined forces against Nineveh, and besieged Chaldaumus in it; and after the city was taken, his dominions were shared between the two conquerors; Nabopolassar became master of Ninevah and Babylon; and Cyaxares, of Media and the bordering provinces. Some suppose that the above-mentioned Ahasuerus, that is, Assuerus can he the same person? Sir Isaac Newton gives the following solution of it, "That Assuerus is the same name with Achiacharus, Oxurres, Axares; and Cy, in the Vernum Inscription, signifying a prince of the Medes, or means prince Axares" (Chronol. see also Drusi Quzet.
p. 17, 18). It is uncertain who inserted the two last verses of this book, whether they be part of the original version, or whether they be a later interpolation. They continued the history from the end of the twelfth chapter to ver. 11 of this, but he could not write the account of his own death. It was added probably by one of the family, as that relates to Yonah, or by the scribe of the Hebrew hand, as was inserted by Joshua his successor, or some other hand. I shall only observe, that, though the Syriac concludes as our version, yet Munster's and Fagius' Hebrew copies omit the mention of the death both of father and son.
In the twelfth year. How is this consistent with what is mentioned ver. 13, where it is said that he marched in battle-array in the seventeenth year? Nebuchadnezzar, and others, to avoid this difficulty, suppose the war to have begun in the twelfth year of Nabuchodonosor, and to be finished in the seventeenth. But this is more than they have authority for; the account being rather of a particular battle, than of a continued war. Possible that this is one of those various readings which Jerome professed to have cut off, as corruptions of the text; for it does not occur in his translation. And agreedly his version places the expedition of Holofernes, that was the next year after this battle of Ragan, in the thirteenth year of Nabuchodonosor, which Dr. Prideaux says is the truth of the matter (Connex, vol. i. p. 29). It is remarkable that the Greek text of this book precedes the Latin one five years, as appears from the instance above, and from ver. 1 of the next chapter, where the Greek has the eighteenth year, which in Jerome's version is only the thirteenth. Some account for the difference this way, that Nabuchodonosor, the adopted son or grandson of Ashshaddon, reigned jointly with him five years, and sole thirteen years, to the time of his army being cut off with Holofernes before Bethulia (ch. xvi.). In the last year but one of his reign Nabuchodonosor overcame Arphaxad, and destroyed Ecbatane, and in his last, Holofernes was beheaded by Judith. The Vulgate begins this book with, Ioace Arphaxad, and after the name of the king of Babylon, that was a confirmation of something preceding. Calmet says, "It may be joined to the history of Tobit without any great inconvenience, or much breaking in upon the regular series of events. For the building of Babylon, and the war between Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor mentioned here, follow closely enough the taking of Nineveh by Assuerus, i.e. Cyaxares, or Artyages, which Tobias lived long enough to hear of, and the taking of Nineveh is the last event mentioned in the book of Tobit." But it cannot be inferred from this connective particle, that Judith is a continuation of the preceding history, if there be any such. The royal seat of Judith is rightly placed, A. M. 3351, and the taking of Nineveh, according to Usher, be in 3376. Nor ought this to be joined to Tobit, or necessarily to follow it, because so placed in order that the placing therefore being probably more relative, than denial and arbitrary: nor do their subjects agree, the history of Tobit being the memoirs of a private family, and Judith that of the Jewish nation. It seems more probable, as Calmet conjectures, either that this history made a part of, and was taken from, some public registers, wherein the most remarkable events are entered and recorded, in a regular series and order; or that the particle here is superfluous, as a like one, et, is placed at the head of several books of scripture, where it has nothing to do with the sense. But the best way to solve this is to observe, that the Greek and other more correct versions wholly omit it.

Of the reign of Nabuchodonosor, who reigned in Nineveh, the great city. The Medes, after subduing several of the neighbouring nations, under the conduct of their second king Phraortes, invaded Assyria. Sogdianus, or Sogdianus, called here Nabuchodonosor, raised a powerful army to oppose them, summoned the whole force of his wide-spreading dominions and invited all the nations round to his assistance. Most of those which were summoned received his ambassadors with contempt, upon which he resolves on nothing less than being avenged on the whole earth, and choosing Holofernes for the instrument of his vengeance: as he was commander-in-chief of his forces, he orders him to put all to the sword who should oppose him (II. 11). As to the cruelty with which the orders were executed, the dread and terror that merciless general struck into the countries through which he marched, the courageous resolution taken by the Jews to withstand the mighty conqueror, the great stratagem to which the city of Bethulia and their whole nation were reduced, and their miraculous deliverances; and, lastly, the great slaughter of the Assyrian army; these particulars were all matter for minute and minute allusion in the following chapters. Herodotus confirms the main of this history, telling us, that Phraortes, the Mede, made war against the Assyrians. "Those I mean (says he, lib. 1, cap. 102), who lived at Nineveh, who had formerly been the chief of all, but now were desired by their friends or vassals though nevertheless in a good condition to defend themselves." No two historical sources can, so far as they are concerned together, more illustrate each other than Herodotus and this book of Judith (see Montfaucon, Hist. Ver. Judith). It hath been objected, that the king of Nineveh is here called Nabuchodonosor, which is the proper name of the kings of Babylon; to this it may be answered, That we find not only in writers of different characters, the Greek and Hebrew, the sacred and profane, but even in writers of the same nation, the same person under different appellations; though therefore in strictness of speech it may be counted an error in history, to call the king of Nineveh by the name of Nabuchodonosor, yet, as it was the style and manner of the Jews to denote any prince who lived beyond the Euphrates by that name (see Tobit xiv. 15), we need not wonder to find this writer, who wrote either at Babylon or in Chaldea, and lived in an age when the fame and reputation of Nabuchodonosor the Great had quite eclipsed the name of all his predecessors, calling another king, who lived at a far distance, viz. Sogdianus, the king of Assyria, by the name of the king of Babylon, which perhaps at that time might be the standing name of every great and distant monarch. Others say, that this Nabuchodonosor, then the king of Assyria, sprung from the royal line of the kings of Babylon, and that he was the Chaldean name of the chief of the kings of Babylon, viz. Nabuchodonosor, as a standing memorial of his extraction, and that it might appear he was king of Jacob as well as of Assyria and Nineveh are concerned. In the days of Arphaxad, which reigned over the Medes Arphaxad seems to be a common name of all the kings of Media, as Merodach was of those of Babylon, and Phraortes of those of Egypt. But Calpern and many other are of opinion, that by Arphaxad is here meant? As Arphaxad is said to be that king who was the founder of Media, Prideaux contends that Dioces must be the person (Connex, vol. i. p. 28). But Calpern and many others are of opinion, that by Arphaxad is here meant the whole or the six hundred furlongs. It was the metropolis of all Media, and the seat both of the Median and Persian monarchs, their ordinary residence in the heat of summer, as Susa was in the winter-time. The royal palace was about six furlongs, or a mile in compass, and built with all the cost and skill that a stately edifice did require (Polyb. lib. x.). Some of its beams are said to be of silver, and the rest of cedar strengthened with plates of gold. 2. And built in Ecbatan walls round about of stones hewn three cubits broad and six cubits long. Iri- deaux says of Deicles, that having repaired, beautified, and enlarged the city of Ecbatana (which, according to Diodores, lib. ii., had been built from the times of Semiramis, one thousand three hundred years before), he made it the real seat of his kingdom, and reigned over it himself for about fifteen years; during which time it grew to be a great city, he is for this reason reckoned by the Greeks to have been the founder of it. (Curt. iv. 4. 1.) But Diodores, in his work entitled "On the Birth of Persia," does not mention the founding of this city here, though the Vulgate, without authority, does, but the adding new and magnificent fortifications to it, it is probably to be understood that this was a work of the spirit, and having many forces under his command, may not improperly be supposed to delight in works of this nature. His father indeed might have been engaged to some part of his lifetime in the works of improving this city, and in leaving the completion of them to his son, as undertakings of this kind are not so soon completed; and in this case he must have been long and audaciously engaged in; what is here said of Artaxerxes is applied to him. Particular mention we may observe, is here made of the largeness of the stones employed in the works, as the ancients placed a great part of the magnificence of their buildings herein, as appears from the description of old monuments in history, and from the ruins of such ancient buildings as have in some measure escaped the injury of time and the ruin of neglect.

And made the height of the wall seventy cubits, and the breadth thereof fifty cubits. Ver. 3. And set the towers thereof with battlements and the battlements thereof in the foundation thereof. The height of this wall is very much celebrated by the ancients, and minutely described by Herodotus (lib. i. cap. 99). That understanding, after all, the builders or masons, were gradually rising above each other by the height of the battlements of each wall. The situation of the ground, rising by an easy ascent, was very favourable to the design of raising it. The royal palace and treasury were within the innermost circle of the seven. The first of these walls was equal in circumference to the city of Athens, i.e., according to Thucydides (lib. ii.) one hundred and seventy-eight furlongs, and had white battlements, the second black, the third of a purple colour, the fourth blue, and the fifth of deep orange. But the seven were not, as some would misunderstand it, but seven towers, and perhaps seven points of a fence for the royal person of the king, and within one of which was his palace, were embellished above the other; the one being covered or gilt with silver, and the other with gold. Each of them being higher than the other, and distinguished by the colour of their several pinnacle, gave into the eye a most agreeable prospect (Herod. lib. iii.). This description indeed of Herodatus savours somewhat of romance, but the uncommon height and superb magnificence of the walls are confirmed by other good authorities. It should seem as if the walls of Ecbatane were each of their height more than the height of the towers of Babylon, the domes of the gates a hundred cubits higher; but this is to be understood only of the innermost wall. And this is the more probable, because the description of the walls themselves is ver. 4, ver. 5, and that of the wall, not walls, as if a particular one was only meant. The Vulgate is faulty in rendering, Feect muros ejus in Itulitidnum cubitorum septquaginta, et in altitudinem cubitorum triginta. St. Jerome's version agrees with our translation, and understands the seventy cubits of the height, which seems the true rendering, and is confirmed by the Greek and Syriac.

Ver. 4. And he made the gates thereof, even gates that were raised to the height of seventy cubits, and the breadth thereof were forty cubits. It is to be presumed, that this extraordinary height of the towers in comparison of the gates, and about the doors, and not that the gates themselves opened to such an exact height. We shall the less wonder at the extraordinary grandeur of the towers, if we reflect upon what is related of Ninoche, that it had fifteen hundred towers upon the walls of it, each of them a hundred feet high; and on what Josephus says of the number of the towers in the city of Jerusalem, that they were sixty cubits high and twenty broad.

Ver. 5. In the great plain, which is the plain in the borders of Rages. The plains of Rages, and the river Rages, a spring of Media, standing on the mountains of Ecbatana, and distant about a small day's journey from that city. This very obvious difference between the Greek and Latin version of this book, particularly as to the proper names. Probably both the great plain itself and the river had different names. What is called here and in the Greek, "Hydasper," is styled "Jadson" in the Latin versions. Conient observes, that the Syriac is most exact as to the names of places, and as to the distinguished parts of the edifice, engaged with Arphaxad in the plains of "Dura," mentioned Dan. iii. and instead of the river Jadson, it puts "Uliu," which occurs likewise in Dan. vii. 2.

At this period. Ver. 2. The Hebrew word here, יִכְנֹשֵׁי (Kynose), is the Hebrew name of the Persians, and signifies a "commander," or "prince," or "governor," with a sort of authority over the people. The mention of the Persians as a distinguished people at this time in the transaction which had been thought inaccurate, as the name of the Persians was hardly if at all known before Cyrus, at least not as the name of a distinct people, and not comprehended under the name of Elam, or Elamites (see Boch. Geogr. lib. iv. cap. 10). But this objection, supposing it well founded, is well answered; and the Persian word for geography and chronology are found in almost all ancient writers; and even the sacred text is not free from them, at least see our version to this part.

Ver. 10. The reference to the words of Tania and Mempis, and to all the inhabitants of Egypt. The Vulgate only mentions terram Jesse, which Calmet expounds "the land of Goshen," in the lower Egypt, called "the land of Goshen," I presume, in the preceding verse. Probably by synecdoche a part was designed for the whole. It should seem from this and ver. 12, that Nabuchodonosor did command in Egypt, though not the building of the wall of Babylon, as a necessary passage for the invading of Egypt; what is mentioned therefore here of Egypt, has been condemned by Diodote and others, if not as false, at least as premature. But all theevent which the former writer, Nabuchodonosor, was expected prince as Nabuchodonosor is here described, send his orders to those beyond Tania and Mempis, and to all the inhabitants of Egypt, though he had no power or command in the upper kingdom; as we read in his first invasion, up to the battle which indeed appears from the following verse to have been the very case. He who expected him there would have designed himself to Egypt, a small part of it, would not dispute his orders. The like answer may serve for his message into Persia, ver. 11.

Ver. 17. But all the inhabitants of the land made light of the commandment of Nabuchodonosor king of the Assyrians, neither went they with him to battle; for they were not afraid of him; nor he before them as one man, and they sent away the encomium from them without effect, and with disgrace. It may seem surprising and strange, that the inhabitants of the land should dare to behave in the manner here related, except they thought that Nabuchodonosor could not stand against Arphaxad, a valiant prince, and at the head of a numerous and powerful army. The truth is, after the destruction of Cuneachar's army by the devasting angel in Judaea, the power and art of the kings of Assyria began to dwindle; and among others who broke from that government was Merodach-Galadan, king of Babylon, who before was tributary to the king of Assyria (see Geogr. lib. iv. cap. 10); the king of Assyria and his grandson. But the latter being destitute of power, and therefore the following verses, instructed by the misfortunes of others, and seeing that their submission served only to render the conqueror more formidable, and to make the former conquerors the subject of those who are here mentioned, though seemingly rash and imprudent. It seems most probable that this message and invitation to the inhabitants of the several places here mentioned to come to his assistance, was before the engagement with Arphaxad, as our version, following the Greek, represents it; but the Vulgate makes it to be after that battle, to induce them by a sense of his conquest, and the terror of his arms, to submit to his dominion and empire; or whether he sent to the same people twice, as some have conjectured, both before and after the engagement; however this may be, his pride was somewhat checked at the disappointment, when he found to so many people, whom, in his own mind, he looked upon as already vanquished and subdued, daring to dispute his orders, and not only yielding to the force of his arm, but the natural law of war; having some copies have it, or being but a man, no better than themselves.

Ver. 19. Therefore Nabuchodonosor was very angry with all this country, and swore by his throne and kingdom. This was anciently esteemed a most solemn, sacred, and inviolable oath. Herodotus says, that the Sythians, whom he calls the Scythians, particularly used this form, when a more solemn oath than ordinary was to be taken (lib. iv. cap. 68). It appears from the Gospel (Matt. v. 34. xxii. 22), that the Jews some times swore by heaven, or God's throne, which was vir- tually swearing by God himself, who sat upon it. And the Persians use it to this day (see Tavern. Voyag. b. i.). And now my special reason for believing (Homer and the Jews, if I may be permitted to use their own expression, as when princes swore, they usually held up their sceptre.) that he would say with the sword all the inhabitants of that should he be arrested, or else he would be cut off. (Ptol. ii. 20.) Even in modern times has been the prevalent opinion, that the word Holophernes is of Persian extraction, in the same manner as Tisaphernes, Intaphernes, &c., but others imagine, that this general was a native either of Lydia or Phrygia, and Polybius makes mention of one of that name, who having conquered Capadocia, soon lost it again by endeavoring to change the ancient customs of the country, and to introduce drunkenness, togeth- er with a species of licentiousness which he thought would make his conquests, made him not unlike him (i. 955. lib. x. cap. 11, and Curnab. in Athen.).

The chief captain of his army which was next unto him,) by Zoroastre, he is called Archistrategus, by Jerumil and St. Austin, Rex; on account probably of the supreme power and command which he had. He seems to have been in the same figure, dignity, and power, with Nubathod- onosor, as a great Persian chief of the Persian troops to his assistance against the Medes, were doubtless rebel to their sovereign, and desired his sharpest remon- strance: but such as were free and unsubdual, were allowed to act as they pleased; as they were under no ties of duty, policy and prudence alone were to direct them. This seems to have been the case of the Jews in particular; they were independent of him, nor had he any right over them or their country. It does not appear that they owed him either services or tribute; or if some small acknowl- edgments of this sort were due from them, they did not imply such vassalage as to oblige them to be maximally subject upon every occasion. The justice of their refusal will appear yet further, if we consider that Nubathodonesor, being a barbarous and domineering prince, was likely to make the several nations to acknowledge him only to God (iii. 8. vi. 2), which the Jews could not submit to without a renunciation of their religion. And God seemed to have given them a principal example of his miraculous deliverance wrought in their favour.

Ver. 15. Mountains of Ravan.] It is no improbable conjecture, that this city, the same with Rages, Tobit i. 14. was built by Reu the son of Feleg. For not only the de- scendants of Arphaxad (of whom came Feleg, the father of Reu) settled in these and the adjacent parts, but Reu is called by the LXX. Ragen. And as to the possibility of Arphaxad settling here, it is remarkable, that in the begin- ning of this book mention is made of Arphaxad, who reigned over the Medes in Ekbatane. This name being probably given to Reu, and the dominion of their forefather Arphaxad, the son of Shem, and grandson of Noah, who, probably, upon the dispersion of mankind, settled himself in these parts of Asia, whence we find here a whole country retaining plain footsteps of his name, it being called Arraphachitis in Polenity, probably for Ar- phaxaditis (see Well's Geography, vol. ii. p. 196).

CHAP. II.

Ver. 1. And in the sixteenth year . . .] The placing the events of this history in the sixteenth year of Darius was a consequence of the former mistake (i. 13.) and a continuation, says Prideaux, of the same blunder (Connex. vol. i. p. 29). Jerome's version has the thirtieth year here, the expedi- tion not being against the Medes till the fortieth, which, according to that version, was in the twelfth of Na- buthodonesor. And with this agrees Usher, in his Annals, A.M. 3948. It is said here to be in the two-and-twentieth day of the first month, i. e. in that part of the month Nisan, or in the beginning of spring, called in the Hebrew the return of the year; which the scripture takes notice of, as the usual time when kings go forth to battle (2 Sam. xi. 2).

Ver. 2. And concluded the afflicting of the whole earth and did cause that there was no man left; the whole earth was void, because of the anger of the Lord; and it was so. This verb seems to have crept in from the beginning of this verse, and to have no place here. Other copies have haveveris, which our version follows; but it will be difficult to letch the sense given in it from the pre- sent Greek. As it now stands, it differs very little from what goes before, and what follows. Badwell's sense of the place is new and agreeable: "He declared to, and had to this respect, to be had by, the most rudeness offered to him from the nations he had sent to, and the contemptuous treatment his ambassadors met with." The original sense of the word in George's Bengali was understood in this sense when they rendered, "He com- municated with them his secret counsel, and set before them with his own mouth all the malice of the earth." And this sense is to be held up in support of the sense of some malum regionum istarum ore suo. And so Calmet, Nabuthodonesor representa lmi sine la malice de toute la terre. When it is here said that he mediated revenge on the whole earth, this is not to be understood absolutely, but includes such people and nations only, as refused to attend his summons, those mentioned in the former chapters, who, when called by Intaphernes and Polybius, makes mention of one of that name, who having conquered Capadocia, soon lost it again by endeavouring to change the ancient customs of the country, and to introduce drunkenness, togeth- er with a species of licentiousness which he thought would make his conquests, made him not unlike him (i. 955. lib. x. cap. 11). Here our translators have, with great judgment, followed the Alexandrian copy, which has ανασπασμός, instead of the other copies μεταβάτω. No doubt μεταβάτω ἐπὶ τὸν ἔριον is the original meaning of the number in the line above, ανασπασμός ἐπὶ τὸν ἔριον, over against which some had put the usual way of expressing that number, viz. twelve myriads; and this by mistake afterward crept into the text, in line with the above.
Artaxerxes, to be the person, who was very cruel and fond of going to war (Nest. Hist. lib. ii. cap. 22). Some have fixed the period of this modern emperor at the death of Artaxerxes II. (Chronic. B. A. 94, 95), St. Austin (lib. xvii. cap. 16, De Civ. Dei), and the Venerable Bede, and have assigned it as the reason why Cambyses, son of Cyrus, was the son of Cambyses the Arian king to whom the Jews called Holiness. But this history of Judah cannot fall in with the twelfth of Cambyses (see ver. 1), as that prince lived but seven years and five months (Herod. lib. iii. cap. 9). Thus, from the beginning of the cession against the conjecture in general, that Nabuchodonosor here mentioned, is all along particularly characterized as king of the Assyrians (2. 7. 11. ii. 1, 4, &c.), and his genealogy is not the same as that of Babylonia (see ver. 14, v. i. 1, &c.). As this particularity therefore seems necessarily to confine it to a Babylonian or an Assyrian monarch, and as nothing in the history of Nebuchadnezzar suit not with those of this history, may be the reason of the change of names through any J. W. corruption of the copies is to be suspected or admitted, that they changed the name of the king of Assyria or Babylon, Susaschinthes, or some other, into Nabuchodonosor? Further, if the demand of earth and water was not peculiar to the Persians, but in use among other nations, is only a common form of acknowledging submission; and if the Persians are to be considered only as auxiliaries, as seems most probable from i. 7, and were, among others, summoned themselves to assemble at Nabuchodonosor's command,—then what is here recorded should rather be considered as the commencement, or even the very establishment of the Persian empire; for it cannot be supposed, that when that was in his glory, the Persians made the conquest of Cilicia, or Xerxes, or indeed any of their kings, then lords of seven tribes, should be subordinated to the commands of the proud Assyrian, as to assemble at his summons; or so void of policy, as to join their forces to subdue the earth to him, and in his name, to defend and enforce his power,—in order to lessen and diminish their own; besides, "Did any of these Persian monarchs" says Calmet, "regain at Nineveh? Did they declare war against a king of the Medes? We know not who these Persian kings were, or where Cambodiotha, Cilicia, Syria, Arabia, Mesopotamia, and Phrygia? Or, rather, did not all these provinces make part of the empire which they received from their ancestors?" We should rather say, "Ye, they were a proud race of people, so that none, I am sure, would have dared to come from afar to save their eyes that were spared Agag, and the rest of the sheep and the oxen, and all that was good" (1 Sam. xv. 3, 9).

chodonosor, who had decreed to subdue the whole earth, and would be acknowledged and adored as a god by all the nations whom he had conquered, we may particularly understand, he would not only maintain and preserve his own authority by withdrawing his own allegiance, and exalting himself as God, to secure mankind, and to persuade them to desert the true and happy service in which they live under their present government, but would also cause the greatest number of his enemies, and especially those who had a different religion, to be destroyed by fire or tree near the altar of the Lord (Deut. vi. 21). Under groves, probably all other monuments of religious use are comprehended, as houses, high-places, temples (see IV, 1). All of which the author, Alciati, says, though they should be ordered to be destroyed, as so many rivals of his majesty and greatness.

For he had determined to destroy all the gods of the land, that all nations should worship Nebuchadnezzar only, and that all tongues and tribes should call upon him as God.] The Assyrian princes, when they rose to the sublimity of empire, were not only the objects of the universal admiration, but even divine honours, as may be seen in their history, and set themselves above all the gods of the people they vanquished; and not only presumed to pass sentence by the word of their mouth upon the whole world, but sometimes required that none other under heaven should be worshiped but themselves. We find in the account here given of Nebuchadnezzar that he was resolved not only to subdue the several nations from the Euphrates to Ethiopia, but intended likewise to oblige them to adore and acknowledge him only to be God. Accordingly his general, Holophernes, did not content himself with the possession of the gods, but he would remove the true God likewise, and set up Nebuchadnezzar in his stead. This appears to have been the avowed purpose of sending his great armies, not only for the destruction of his enemies, but to be acknowledged the king among gods. And, indeed, as if he had been a professed atheist, as some have represented him, the story of his insanity is a reproof of his reason, as to forget that he was a man, or that there was a god that could control him. But the king of Nineveh was not the only prince that we find infected with the folly and impety of desiring to pass for a god; the Emperors of Darins, who reigned over the Medes and Persians in the time of Daniel, proposed to him to make a decree, under pain of being cast into the den of lions, that no one should dare to ask a petition of any god or man, but of him only, for the space of thirty days (Dan. vi. 7). Nor was Semencheril less insolent, who boasted, 2 Kings xvii. 35, that he had not yet heard of any god besides himself, whom he called power. "Who are they among all the gods of the nations, that have delivered their country out of mine hand?" and from thence vainly infers, that neither would the Lord be able to deliver Jerusalem out of his hand; existing himself above all that is called god, or is worshipped. Alexander the Great, and many of the Roman emperors, had the like ambition of passing for gods. Nor is it very surprising, that those whom the devil had made without a master, should take him, aspire to be equal with God. For that proud spirit, however jealous of his honour, is not averse for special reasons to confer the complexion of a god upon him; and, by this means, the prince of this world subtle, dexterously allows that they shall be looked upon and treated as gods, if he can by such superstition tempt any to leave the service of the true God, and by consequence become his slaves.

Ver. 9. Over against the great street of Judea. Called the "hill country." Luke i. 39. It is particularly described ver. 7 of the next chapter.

CHAP. IV.

Ver. 2. Therefore they were exceedingly afraid of him, and were troubled for Jerusalem, and for the temple of the Lord their God.] It is not to be wondered at that the people of the Jews should be much afraid of, and tremble at, so great a force coming against them, to which so many nations were subject. From the history of Nebuchadnezzar, we learn how the Jews had dedicated their goods, their liberty, or lives; but the occasion of their meanness was the apprehension they were under, that the city of Jerusalem should be destroyed, and this great temple should be profaned and treated as other the like places had been, where Holophernes with his army had passed. The Jews, it is well known, had a profound veneration for their temple, and on many accounts, besides that through whose means they were delivered out of Egypt, they were charged with a thousand deaths for the preservation of that holy place, which distinguished them from all other nations; and therefore their thoughts at this time were chiefly fixed, and their wishes and prayers confined to their beloved sanctuary. "What they did from a pure zeal and spirit of Judaism, and to a strong disaffection to the new religion, we should be equally zealous to do (say Messieurs of Port-Royal) from a truer principle and a more excellent religion. It became them to be more interiorly considered for, they were affected with, what any ways reflects dishonour upon or is injurious to the glory of God and the interest of his church, than any thing that can happen to ourselves. We find that they sought to prevent the destruction of their sanctuary by observing the sanctity of his father's house profaned by merchandise, and the place of prayer changed into a den of thieves; but one does not read of any resentment he expressed against his adversaries. We find, on the contrary, his bitter hatred against his enemies, and exposed to their outrageous insults; though his body was without comparison a temple for more glorious and precious than that material one for which the Jews boasted so much respect, and showed so much concern for its safety."

Ver. 3. "For they were more moved from the captivity, and all the people of Judah were gathered together and the vessels, and the altar, and the house, were sanctified after the profanation."

It is a great dispute among the learned, whether what is related here happened before or after the captivity, or in both periods. Where we do not know what is related is placed.

Those who maintain the latter opinion, ground it chiefly upon this passage, wherein the author, according to the Greek version, says (for the Vulgate wholly omits it,) that the vessels were returned, the sanctuary was sanctified, and the altar and the house, were sanctified after the profanation. And v. 18, 19, it is further affirmed, "the temple was more than once sanctified," which was in the purport of theirs; that the temple of their God was cast to the ground, and their cities taken by the enemy; but now are they come up from the places where they were scattered, and have possession of the land. The bare mention of these passages, say they, naturally leads one to conclude, that what is here mentioned was not transacted till after the return from the captivity; which is confirmed by the opinion of many other authors, as well as the moderns (see Calmet's DEP. sur le Liv. Judih, and Stackhouse's Hist. of the Bib.);

Those who maintain that this transaction happened before the captivity are disposed, some placing it under Manasses, and others under Zedekiah; but the difficulties on either hypothesis possibly may be adjusted, if we be careful to distinguish the slight and particular dispensations and captivities of the Jews from the long and general one; and if we understand the captivity here referred to, not of the grand captivity of Babylon, but of that one that was slight in comparison of that, it in the time of Manasseh seems most probably to have been, and that at that time of which the the present king posteriorly times were related in the former passages."

Ver. 4. "Thus they sent into all the countries of Samaria, and the villages, &c.

Nothing could have induced these two irreconcilable enemies, the Jews and the Samaritans, who were at enmity one to another, to make even a truce on Jerusalem. (I. 25, 26), to act jointly, and to be confederates, but the sense of the common danger which threatened them from the expedition of Holopherus."

Ver. 5. "And when Jerusalem was besieged beforehand of all the top of the high mountains, and fortified the villages that were in them.) As Jonathan the high priest did against Apollonius (1 Macc. x. 70), being by nature of their situation, the defence of the city was committed to him. He obtained, by his easy way of obtaining things, and by his security, to lay even be imagined in such a time of desolation and distress."

Ver. 6. "Joacim the high priest, which was in those days in Jerusalem,) He is sometimes called Eliakim; accordingly St. Jerome's version promiscuously uses both names for this high-priest. The Syriac also does the like: and in the St. Jerome of St. Chrysostom's comment upon Luke iii. 23. Some copies have Joakim instead of Hei, which, according to Chrysostom, is Eliakim contracted; and makes Joakim, Hei, and Eliakim, to mean the same person. (See ch. xxxii. 34). It has been objected against this history, that none of the name of Joakim or Eliakim is to be found either in the scriptures or any other writer, but in this passage of Josephus. As to that part of the objection from the scriptures, it may be answered, that the succession of the high-priests is so imperceptibly recorded there, that Joachim might easily be mistaken for Joakim, and the omission of the name made by the mistake of the scribes for the word of which, or Jewish high-priests, as we have them delivered to us in the first book of Chronicles, and in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, will find them so minutely and perplexed, so many Antipas and Antiperus, such a multitude of names and numbers, and such seeming contrariety in the several accounts, as will cost no small pains to reduce them to any tolerable regularity. The reason is, because the scripture no where professes to give an exact catalogue of all such as had been admitted to that office and dignity until the captivity. And in such catalogues as are delivered, several are high-priests that never were high-priests, and several that were not high-priests. It is very likely, as Frideaux observes, that from the time of Solomon to the captivity, and from the captivity to the time of the rise of the Jewish empire, of which this passage is a part, there were high-priests. It is very likely, as Frideaux observes, that from the time of Solomon to the captivity, and from the captivity to the rise of the Jewish empire, of which this passage is a part, there were more than one hundred and twenty high-priests, and several are in his catalogue who never were high-priests, and several are left out that were; particularly Amanasiah in the time of Jehoshaphat, Jehozia in the time of Joash, and Jehozia and Jehoiam in the time of Amazias, and Joachim xxiii., have very well agreed with that part which Joacim is said to have acted in this book (Connex. lib. i.). As to the catalogue of Josephus, that too is so imperfect and corrupt that several names of high-priests there may be names of those who were great seers, and that the names of the high-priests are taken from some other instance. But it is certain that Joacin or Eliakim is not named in scripture; for several learned men are inclined to think that these are names of the last high-priest, as they, in the account of the destruction of Jerusalem, are given in the 12th and 13th verses of the 31st chapter of the apocryphal history of this author; because these very persons are given as high-priests who are not in any other book of the Old Testament. It is certain that those persons of whom Josephus speaks were high-priests at the time, though there be no mention made of him as such, either in the scriptures or the history of Josephus. The reason is, because the scripture no where professes to give an exact catalogue of all such as had been admitted to that office and dignity until the captivity. And in such catalogues as are delivered, several are high-priests that never were high-priests, and several that were not high-priests. It is very likely, as Frideaux observes, that from the time of Solomon to the captivity, and from the captivity to the rise of the Jewish empire, of which this passage is a part, there were more than one hundred and twenty high-priests, and several are in his catalogue who never were high-priests, and several are left out that were; particularly Amanasiah in the time of Jehoshaphat, Jehozia in the time of Joash, and Jehozia and Jehoiam in the time of Amazias, and Joachim xxiii., have very well agreed with that part which Joacim is said to have acted in this book (Connex. lib. i.). As to the catalogue of Josephus, that too is so imperfect and corrupt that several names of high-priests there may be names of those who were great seers, and that the names of the high-priests are taken from some other instance.
to concern himself with public business, yet, in such a case, the name and authority of the king had not been drowned, nor is usually, though the act was the act of the minister. And as long as he lived, he stood out as an active and efficient centre of some other part of his kingdom, or in some foreign expedition, neither the concurrence of liberty, sacred or profane, nor the threatenings that might be thought to countenance such a supposition: and it had been doubtful, and might not it have been expected that the author of this very history should have dropped some notice of it, as the reverse of the course it was expected to take of taking one occasion with an absolute and independent power?

Ver. 9. Then every man of Israel cried to God with great fervency, and with great vehemency did they humble their souls. 14. And Joash the high-priest, Sicutio nunquam exudit Dominus precem vestram, si numerosa permeanturis in jejunis et oranbis in conspectum Domini. Memores esti Mosei servit Dei, qui Analeae confidemint in viritate et potentia sui, et in exercitio suo, et in clycis suis, et in equitibus suis, non ferro pugnae, sed per precantis sanitatem, dejeict. Si erunt universi hostae Israel, si perseveravit in hic opere quad corporis. One cannot but observe, how different the conduct and behaviour of the Israelites were in this case from what it was in the case of the Egyptians. Nor can it be doubted that thought the help of man was but vain, and therefore their trust was in the Lord of hosts. Instead of the sound of trumpets, and other warlike instruments, they poured forth their devout supplications to him who was able to save, accompanied with strong crying and tears. Instead of outward pomp and the pride of dress, they were distinguished by sackcloth and nakedness, and lowly prostrations. And who among the proud Assyrians, seeing such instances of devotion, would not have despised and laughed at these Israelites as a people half dealt with fear, and even almost bated. They were not weakened by the means whereby they had found humiliation that was alone available to oppose and subdue the haughtiness and pride of Holopherne. Other nations have had their heroes and famous persons, and name, but this people, providing better for their safety, humbled themselves under, and thereby obtained the help of, the mighty hand of God, and triumphed over him who threatened revenge upon the whole earth.

Ver. 14, 15. And Joash the high-priest, and all the priests that stood before the Lord, and they which ministered unto the Lord, had their loose gown with sackcloth, and offered the daily burnt offerings, with the vows and free gifts of the people. And had ashes on their mitres, and cried unto the Lord with all their power. The Vulgate is more emphatical in its version. Estimabilius, in apparent sacrifices Domini. Only it is observable, that it omits the mention of the high-priest. And indeed the occasion must be more pressing and exhausing than the high-priest himself, if not to put off his glorious apparel altogether, at least to appear in the time of the public ministration in the habit of a mourner, who might not mourn, according to the law, for the death of his master, and for that reason was not permitted to put on his glorious apparel altogether. Yet also such as affected the very being of the state, admitted of an exemption from the ordinary rules. Accordingly, the prophet Jeremiah recommends the same practice to the ministers of the altar, should gird themselves, lament, and howl, and lie all night in sackcloth (l. 15).

CHAP. V.

Ver. 1. And had laid impediments in the campaign creature;] The word "sacrament" here used has army significations; it sometimes signifies, in general, any obstacle or hinderance laid in a man's way, by which a passenger is detained or stopped; here it is peculiarly taken to signify the obstacles those sharp and violent parties which were threatened to our enemies, and by which our war men were wont to put in the fields, where the enemy was expected to follow, to wound their feet or legs with, and thereby retard their passage, and thereby make them properly called for impediments proper. And what accident, being so usual and ordinary in war, anciently they used greaves of brass to defend their feet or legs (see 1 Sam. xix. 6).

Ver. 2. Whereewith he was very angry, and called all the princes of Moab, and the captains of Ammon. He applied to these more particularly, says Calvin, as he presumed, that the Moabites and the Ammonites, as neighbors to the Jews, and as the most inveterate enemies of the Hebrews, could better inform him of the truth than any other persons.

Ver. 3. Take me now... who this people is that dwelleth in the hill country. It may seem strange, and scarce to be credited, that a general of the Assyrians, such a one as Holophernes was, should be ignorant of the people of the Jews, and ask the questions which are here mentioned concerning them; but it is probable that Holophernes was not of the number of those captains of the king of Assyria, whom the Lord sent to carry Manasseh into captivity, and therefore possibly he might not understand either their constitution and discipline, or the situation and extent of their country, much less the genius of the people, and the manner of their government; which he, who had con-" Achior, the chief of these people, it may be presumed, was an Idumean likewise, and, having a perfect knowledge of all that concerned the Jews, was the spokesman to Holofernes, and gave him all the light and intelligence concerning them. Hence we find, from what is here given of them, that he was very well understood their history. One cannot but take notice of the protection and encouragement which this Achior gave the people of the Jews, and of the God of Israel's imperial and just dealing with them, according as their conduct deserved; an observation tending greatly to his glory, and affecting the honor of his name in all ages: and this might rather have expected to have been evil entreated, or to have suffered death as a spy, or an enemy in disguise.

Ver. 5. These people are descended of the Chaldees.] We read, Gen. xi. 31. That 'Terra took Abraham in, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sara his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife, and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan. Hence the children of Israel are said here to be descended of the Chaldeans, as calling Abraham for their father, who was a Chaldean: and probably it was with design to express the false birth and origin of the Jews, that their ancestors are represented to him, in the beginning of his speech, that they were descended of the Chaldeans, as Holdernes himself was a subject of the Assyrian monarch, the prince of the Chaldeans.

Ver. 8. For they left the way of their ancestors, and worshipped the God of heaven, the God whom they knew: so that they might live in the face of him, and they fell into Mesopotamia, and sojourned there many days.] As these nations had been long infected with idolatry, and were under a government that established and supported idolatry, and these were the chosen nation of Abraham's family; they were expelled this land for worshipping the God of heaven, and leaving the way of their forefathers: a land so famous for superstition and idolatry, that Chaldeans and magicians were learned in it. From these they passed into Mesopotamia, i.e. into a province so called from its situation between the two rivers, Tigris and Euphrates; and on account of their reason to Abraham, the Jews are said to sojourn with them there. For this is the form of the form of the foregoing verse to be descended from the Chaldeans, because Abraham, from whom their stock was derived, was a Chaldean, so are they here represented on the same account, as accompanying him and setting with him in Mesopotamia. St. Stephen, Acts v. 2-4, greatly illustrates what Achior here adds: when speaking to the Jews, he says, 'The Jews, with the Chaldeans and the people of their common origin, were expelled this land for worshipping the God of heaven, and leaving the way of their forefathers: a land so famous for superstition and idolatry, that Chaldeans and magicians were learned in it. From these they passed into Mesopotamia, i.e. into a province so called from its situation between the two rivers, Tigris and Euphrates; and having been ordered by the most exact chronologists, to be about two years; but Achior's expression, 'He sojourned there many years,' may signify a much longer time, as appears from the same verse, v. 16.

Ver. 10. But when a famine covered all the land of Canaan, they went down into Egypt.] Calmest observes, that Achior, in his narration, seemed to confirm the going of Abraham into Egypt with that of Jacob's thither: but there is no such weight in this observation, as the account here of the Jewish people and their concerns collectively, rather than of Abraham personally. However this be, it reminds me to illustrate a like instance, Acts vii. 16, where St. Luke, in reciting St. Stephen's speech, either puts into the mouth of the Jewish historian, or himself, 23, or Abraham must be here patrimonially, for Jacob, his descendant; or possibly the name Abraham crept into the text, as Beza suspects, from a marginal annotation.

Ver. 16. And all the Gergesenes.] The Gergesenes, or Gergashites, were an ancient people of the land of Canaan; their habitation was beyond the sea of Tiberias, where we first hear of them, Genesis xiv. 3 and they and their name are mentioned of Gergash, upon the lake of Tiberias. The rabins inform us, that, when Joshua first came into the land of Canaan, the Gerge- senes, or Gergashites, (or rather to be more exact, the Gergasines) that came to the Jews, were the people here mentioned. The name of the Jews carried captive to Babylon by Nabuchodonosor, he would not have said, many of them, but all; nor that his captivity continued only the seven years; but for that grand captivity they were oppressed only by one nation, viz. the Chaldeans.

And the temple of their God was cast to the ground.] This was the condition more to this flight than possibly that inscription in Phenician characters, which Prosopius mentions, may refer: 'We are some of those people who fled before that robber, Joshua, the son of Nun. Though the tradition be very old, that the Gergesenes fled out of the land of Canaan when Joshua came there against them, and for a time were in the land of the Amorites, it seems to be something providential in it, and not merely chance, that he should find admittance and protection among this people, and even be made one of them by the right of the sword. The presence in all ages being a thing might rather have expected to have been evil entreated, or to have suffered death as a spy, or an enemy in disguise.'

of the original, nothing certain can be concluded for or against this reparation of the true text; and the particular parts of the speech of Achior (see note on iv. 3, and Du Fuy's Prelim. Dissert. p. 20). Perhaps by the words as they now stand in the Greek and English versions, nothing more is intended than a confirmation of the facts in the above verses, to give its dignity, thereby brought low. That the temple may be said to be in a manner destroyed by a pronunciation of it, see 2 Kings xxii, 2 Chron. xxxvi., that it was destroyed actually. Children in the time of Manasseh is not true, which happened in the reign of Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar, and so must be a great mistake if understood strictly, and besides it is not so understood in the 39th verse, which intimates the temple then to be standing (see 2 Kings, viii. 24); or these words may be considered as spoken by a stranger, an Ammonite, who might possibly without grounds allege the destruction of the temple, as Rabshakeh does, 2 Kings xvii. 22, with regard to Heczechin's taking away the altar of the Lord.

Ver. 19. Now they are returned to their God, and are come up from the places where they were scattered. [As what is said in the foregoing verse seems best understood of the Assyrian captivity in the time of Manasseh, when the Jews were dispersed into different parts, and left their cities desolate, so the return from their dispersion here mentioned seems better to be referred to the restoration of that prince, when Jerusalem, which had been for a time in the hands of the Assyrians, was recovered by him, and the city was desolate and in a manner destroyed, recovered its former lustre, being again frequented and purified, and its habitations enlarged, as is here mentioned; but what that restoration but what is agreeable to the history of Manasseh, so far as can be collected from the short account which we have in the book of Kings and Chronicles, and it is liable to be supposed, that S. Curtius (llib. i. cap. viii.) that part of the restoration of the Jews to their own land, after the Babylonish captivity, which happened later.

Ver. 20. He will be no error in this people. This is better expressed in the next sentence, which fixes and determines the sense of this passage. The Hellenists often express sins by errors or ignorances: see Num. xi. 11, 35. For all that which diatheses or faults others in the canonical and apocalypyal writings, where error and ignorance plainly mean sins and transgressions. Ver. 23. He will not be afraid of the face of the children of Israel, for, in it is a people that have no strength nor power for a strong battle. This boast of Holofernes' officers, and their contemptuous scorn of the Jews, as a people having no strength nor power for war, shows their ignorance of the true God, the God of Israel, who, though they display his own almighty power, and what little stress is to be laid on the arm of flesh, often interposes in behalf of his chosen in a manner most contrary to what they expected; and he would have his own enemies, and the victory be his, as sure as his favourite land he will enable five to chase a hundred, and a hundred to put ten thousand to flight (Lev. xxvi. 38, 39. Deut. xxxiii. 20. Job. xli. 30. Jer. xxxi. 36, 39. 38. 32. Jer. xxi. 9). The more unprovided the Israelites appear to be, the more remarkable is the almighty appearance of the invincible arm of the Almighty to appear with uncommon glory in their behalf; the less they knew of the art of war, the more glorious victory they were destined to obtain, and gain by them, the all-powerful hand of him who declared for them, and who supplied, in a manner so extraordinary, what was wanting either in strength or policy. Ver. 24. Now, therefore, lord Holofernes, we will go up, and they shall be a prey to be devoured of all thine army. Messengers of Port-Royal conclude this chapter with the following fine reflection upon the object of Holofernes' manoeuvres: "Such generally is the false wisdom and servile complaisance of those who think they cannot please their princes, or ingratiot themselves into their favour so well, as by telling them, not what is most agreeable to truth or right reason, but that which most sensibly flatters their pride, and soothes their vanity. For what in truth was more reasonable than Achior's whole harangue? he represented the case to come true, in any respect, the power and force of the Israelites with that of Nebuchadnezzar, but as it was insignificant in itself, and not of consequence enough to be mentioned, resolves their whole strength, and the success they were certain of, to consider them both with, into the favour and protection of their God. Could anything be conceived in less offensive terms, or even a Jewish language, less calculated to prove, in any respect, than the subject of presumption and wickedness, than to think an injury done to Nebuchadnezzar, by setting God above him, or preferring him only before him?" (Comm. de Fomin. vi. 5.)

CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 2. Hirshels of Ephraim. Calmet suspects from Achior being called, ver. 5, a "hiring of Ammon," that this reading is a mistake; and indeed this conjecture seems confirmed by the form of speech in ver. 6, in which Ammon, in both places. The expression implies great disrespect and contempt: but the sarcasm is much stronger upon the Jews, when Holofernes calls them, ver. 5, "The people that came out of Egypt," intending that they were a race of slaves. And who art thou, Achior, and the hirshels of Ephraim, that thou hast addressed a harangue against us, the people of Israel, that we should not make war with the people of Israel, because their God will defend them? Achior's speech in the foregoing chapter is much to be admired for the justice of its sentiments, and the strength and composure with which he supports the cause of the God of Israel: though himself was one of the unrecumenced, he baragues like Moses or Joshua on the state of the Jewish people, their good or evil success, according as they continued faithful, or otherwise, in the service of the true God. To hear him thus speak of and extoll the mighty power of the God of Israel, when he regarded, and would have all alike regard, Nebuchadnezzar as the most high God, and only invincible, graced the jealousy and ambition of the Assyrian general; and one would have expected from his conduct, and who would have thought he had resolved to reward a declaration, so much to his honour, from the mouth of this alien, and to reserve him to become one at length of his chosen, whose cause he had so signally and amicably vindicated: but his conduct in this passage was, he thought it years with, are not without precedent in history; the following extract bears a near resemblance and affinity to it:—Darius being on the point of giving battle to Alexander, demanded of Charesmus, an Athenian captain, what he thought of his army: the stranger answered, That it must strive to frighten some neighboring states, Darius, but it appeared as if he were composing himself to oppose the forces of Alexander, which he commended exceedingly, especially for their experience and discipline; "That to an army of Macedonians equal forces should be opposed, and the silver and gold which shone upon the arms of his soldiers, would be better disposed of to levy forces in Greece. Paro robre opus est. In illa terrâ, quae nos gaunit, nuxilla quaescundum sit; aurum et argentum ad conditionem nullam mittat." Darius, though naturally humane and good-natured, was vexed with so free an answer, and without any further consideration ordered him to be taken alive; but he was so sensibly the readiness of this step; he lost the battle and humbled the haughty sentence pronounced upon one who had given him so good advice (Q. Curt., lib. iii.). The hirshels of Ephraim, however, are the most remarkable of all, and were, and are, to this day, one of the most efficacious weapons that can be used against the crimes and insolencies of our enemies; and as such indeed may be used, if they are justly used, to all nations should worship him only, and that all tongues and tribes should call upon him as God. In like manner a successor of his, Nebuchadnezzar the Great, upon the contemplation of his magnificence and greatness, grew so arro-
To procure mercy and deliverance for his chosen by those very means which short-sighted wisdom had contrived most effectually to effect the contrary!" (Dan. iv. 20).

But they were both at length convinced, the former by the shamefaced death of his general and the defeat of all his forces; and the latter by being reduced to the condition of a beast, that "the most High alone ruleth in the kingdoms of the earth." It is surprising to observe from this instance, that of Nebuchadnezzar, and others, that such powerful impressions do exist, and may, and must, have acted even below the very character of men, have most affected divine honours, and are to be acknowledged and compensated in their God.

Far, therefore, from any idea, none of my words shall be in vain.

Or nonnulla profeciae ut profectum est, quod Nabhucadezzar, Domo. saepe dom or rob, saepe erat Abbas. As Nabuchadnezzar would pass for a god, so he affected to talk like one, his orders were absolute and uncontrollable, as he was possessed of all power both in earth and heaven. As the signs by which the Hebrews both a word and a thing, so these hath the same double meaning among the Hebrews; see particularly Deut. xvi. 1. Luke i. 37. Acts x. 37, accordingly profeciae ut profectum est, to affect modesty, to signify the things, matter or contents, of his speech.

Ver. 5. And thou, Achior, an hiring of Annon, which hast spoken these words in the day of 24, samaria (i.e. that has been hired by the Jews to prophesy falsely, to discourage my soldiers, and hast this day betrayed thy power and strategy. Josua accordingly has, Qui prolocutus ex sermone tuo, may be the margin, Quum perfidia taum, ut mercenarius improbns, retireat. It is a Hebraism, and means, that he had done his utmost, and, in a manner, businesse and falsehood, as would be proved by the event.

Ver. 6. And thou shalt fall among their slain, when I return. Opera tui profeceris, When I shall turn, or put my epigraph to flight, shall run, and die; and so the General version has it, Thou shalt fall among the slain when I shall put them to flight; or the meaning may be, which the words seem more naturally to suggest, When I return victorious, and in peace; and that cause which reminds me of what the king of Israel said to Micahiah the prophet, Put this fellow in the prison, and feed him with the bread of them that are put to death, and with the water of them that are slain. And the answer there given is equally applicable, I will return at all in peace, the Lord hath not spoken by me. And he said, Hearken, O people, every one of you, 1 Kings xii. 27, 28.

Ver. 9. And if thou persuade thyself in the mind that they shall not be taken, let not thy countenance fail: See Gen. iv. 5, where the like phrase is used to signify Cain's great and increasing dissatisfaction; and Job xxxii. 24, samaria (whom the General version expresses as a Samaritan). A strong mind is expressed by the falling of the light of the countenance, as that lifting up of the face on the contrary was a token of comfort, joy, and confidence (Job xi. 15). The mention of it in the psalm, 119. 46, if the thought be correct, of what thou saiest, do not betray any, or so much concern and fear, nor let signs of conscience guilt and confession appear on thy face, Lament. i. 1. if thou believest a true prophet, there is no occasion for fear; but if by the event thou art detected to be a false one, thy perfidiousness will draw on thee, thou must expect, a more severe punishment!

Ver. 10. Then Holofernes commanded his servants, that waited in his tent, to take Achior, and bring him to Bethulia, and deliver him into the hands of the children of Israel.) Holofernes, transported with fury at Achior's open and free manner of speaking, says to him, Since you have taken upon you to be a prophet, in telling us that the God of Israel will not befriend the children of his people, to show you that there is no other god but Nebuchadnezzar, I shall make your name as when we have put these people to the sword, we will de- stroy you likewise. And that you may yourself experience that you are right, Achior, and you that are believers unto Bethulia, there to run the same risk, and undergo the same fate, with them, whom you believe and pronounce to be invisible.

Propellit Aector (says Sulpicius, Sac. Hist. iii. 5, 3) for the probability that he was a man of correspon- dant vini non posse affirmare, The insinuating general hereby intended no favour to Achior; he spared his life only by a seeming concurrence with his manner that should most sensibly affect him; viz, after he had seen with his own eyes the entire ruin of a people, whose God he had so much extolled as their protector. But how un- satisfactory a manner of procuring mercy and deliverance, often most High, who knows how to confound the blindness and disappoint the ambition, of wicked enterprising spirits, and people of Israel, "ch. 11. dis, which makes it the more probable, that they were not under a cloud, though they were prisoners. ... 119. sanc. against the assault of Nejahodonosor's army, and was for that time at least one of the governors of the place. They are called the "dogilevi," of the book of Esther, and may have been aSemites ... the ilio, in this context, the noun significative of God at this melancholy juncture, in the following manner: "Look not upon our merit, which is as nothing, but upon the merits of thy faithful saints, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; and ..." (Ps. 106. 18). True and steadfast was that covenant; that we, who labour under the burden of our sins, and are justly punishable for them, may, on their account, and in regard to their righteous sufferings, remain in God's sight and receive his presence even we at present stand in need of." Or they may be understood of the Jews in general, urging before God their present relation to him, and their times of inheritance. And the entire correctness of the Vulgate, that of sober and well-disposed persons; for it was ... a great portion of righteousness (Antiq. liv. iv. cap. 8. Seld. de Syder, lib. ii. cap. 6); and this perhaps was the determinate number in time. But anxiously there seems to be more at issue; for the cause Boaz mentions ten elders, who were probably the same with the judges in the city of Bethel-chelum (Ruth iv. 2).

CHAPTER VII.

Ver. 1. To take of the land the increase of the field. The town of Bethulia is represented in the history as a place of prodigious strength, either by art or nature, or both, nor was it to be attempted by a small number of assailants: what remains then or marks do we hear from travelers of so wonderful a place? it time and wars have destroyed all traces of art, yet would not nature and situation still continue to defend it. And the ever-memorable deliverance wrought at it, must, one would think, have distinguished it to posterity, and that they may have more or less traditions of it among the inhabitants, or their neighbours, to lead us to it. The Pho- cian Thermopylae, the Forte Caspar, are known and distingu- ished now as heretofore; but has any man's curiosity been stirred up, or remarked by any writer who gave it the command of the country, and made it the gate or key of Judea, as represented in this history? The place has been visited, and yet nothing extraordinary this way is observed of it. Mr. Bayle, speaking of the circumstance of the city, says: "Its accuracy and fidelity may be depended on, says only of it, that it stands upon a very eminent and conspicuous moun- tain, and is seen far and near." (p. 115.) He does not the least notice of any grand defile or particular passes which commanded the entrance into Judea, which, if it had been so, could never have escaped his observation, who attended to every circumstance relative to the descriptions or allu- sions in scripture. On the other hand, his account rather supposes the country to have been a more plain, or flat all about it, than mountainous. To this it may be replied briefly.

1. That some have supposed, that the phrastic expressions of the de- scriptions and ruin of codices, are, according to Adrichomius and others, still visible; and if were none, this would no more conclude against the conjectural being of such a place, than the existence of Persepolis, Nineveh, and other famous cities, which have little or no traces now remaining.

2. That however the surface of the country was as Bethulia was presented in a different manner; yet, as Bethulia is acknowled- ged to have been situated upon a very high and conspicuous mountain, the very situation itself, still to be observed and admired, points out not merely the probability of its be- ing there placed, but the propriety and importance of such a choice, which, as it was more tenable by its natural strength; so, Jolly, That it had uncommon difficulty of ap- proach and access, either by one grand defile, or very great and dangerous passages, appears sufficiently from its foiling so great an army as one hundred and eighty thousand men upon a narrow ground, which, we see no necessity or oc- casion to transmit as particular, what a rocky and perpendicu- lar situation naturally suggests.

Ver. 2. The army of the men of war was upon hundred and seventy thousand (Ex. xiv. 14). The number of warriors varies considerably in the Greek and Latin editions. It is improbable that there is some mistake in the numbers in the different texts. The army of the Vulgate has been increased by some from divers provinces of Assyria, and by an addition of auxil- iary troops from the countries newly conquered, which might raise the number to that mentioned in the Greek, viz. one hundred and seventy thousand. There is also a differ-verse between the Greek and Latin copies with respect to the vallacy. The Vulgate unites them (v. 11) into two thousand, which probably is right; as Holofernes' vallacy at this time had been augmented by ten thousand Assyrian horse. The difference in both accounts seems, in sight, to have been occasioned by the many increasing and decreasing from many accidental causes.

Ver. 3. And they camped in the valley near unto Be-thulia; and there they encamped (p. 280. "over Dothain"). There is some difficulty with respect to the posts which are here assigned to Holofernes' troops; the village of Dothain, or Dothan, as it sometimes called, was, it is supposed, Old Bethulia in Judah, quieted in breadth, whether it is placed in the tribe of Zebulun or Simeon.

It was, that it was at least eight or ten leagues from the sea of Tiberias, and, by consequence, about a contemporary appearance, in the presence of Dothain, that more than thirty leagues from Bethulia, in the tribe of Simeon. It is, as so, and the distance of Dothain from the place of the siege was indeed so great, it is probable, that there are many villages in this history wrongly placed (for the geography of it, it must be confessed, is far from being exact), so that of Dothain is here erroneously inserted; or perhaps, by mistake, one name is put for another, and it is difficult, says Grotius, in Graeco corruptiss. at est hic liber, locorum nominum registri. But, on the other hand, there are authorities which give some reason to think, that the town of Dothain (old Bethulia mentioned above), is represented in this history. Advocatus makes Dothain to be, Oppidum quod a monte Bethulica milium et

The writing of the flux scutum, p. 321, places Dothain four miles from Bethulia, and at the like distance from the sea of Galilee (see also Wells' Geography of the Old Testament, vol. i. p. 197).

Ver. 4. Dothain is not mentioned, even against Edromon. Dr. Kilwardby, Grotius conjectures the text reading here to be, bez Xabias, which is confirmed by the Vulgate rendering. Edron was a town extending itself from the cities of Megiddo and Aphek, to the sea of Genesareth or Galilee. The camp of Holofernes was so great, that it took up all this plain, which contained six-tercia pagi. (Pss. 63. 2; 86. 12.)

Ver. 5. Now the children of Israel, when they saw the multitude of them, were greatly troubled, &c. It may very pertinently be asked, why the Bethulians durst venture to oppose Nauchabodene and his army? The truth is, that king was resolved, not only to subdue the several nations from the Empires to Ethiopia, but intended likewise to oblige them to acknowledge him only to be God (v. 2); and therefore the Bethulians, who could not without impiety and a renunciation of their religion, submit to the dominion of such a king, had good reason to hope for success against a prince who did declare himself an enemy to the God of heaven.

But what shall we think of the kind of siege, in which they were placed, when we consider that after their tower, they remained and watchet all that night? This signal was set up on the mountains, on the tops of which they made great fires; and therefore, who large they were, no part could be spread and display some eign colour, that they might be seen at a great distance. Sentinels also, or waunchins were generally placed in towers and on the tops of mountains, to sound the trumpet, or make some signal at the top of a pole at the approach of the enemy, to give notice to the people to run to their arms. See Isa. xviii. 3. xxx. 17.
Jer. vi. 1, where the prophet says, "How the trumpet in Tophet", and set up a sign of fire in Beth-haccerem, for clear appearance of the north."

Ver. 12. Let thy servants get into their hands the fountains of water, which issued forth of the foot of the mountain. (xv. 15. 16. "of Beth-haccerem, &c tenen."

The Idumeneans, or children of Esau, as they are called, ver. 8, may be considered as brethren of the Jews, being of the same people; and, indeed, they were so in the days of the Patriarchs, 2 Kings xxi. 18. But they may the more seem not only very surprising but unnatural, that they should, by giving such penurious counsel to Holofernes, betray the Israelites to the Assyrians, instead of protecting their countrymen, and, in the mean time, plundering, as they were wont to do in their behalf and favour. It should be seen by this instance, as if they inherited Esau's spleen against his brother: but however to guard against confusion, and to remain undistinguishable from the history of the Assyrians; yet they are, under the title of Ammonites (see note on v. 5). One may observe from hence, says Meeusen of Port-Royal, that false brothren, such as those of these, the Jews are more to the men than decline their enemies, and therefore, their endness is often more dangerous than force. As it does not seem probable that all the inhabitants of Bethulia should fetch their water at such a distance, or that this fountain at the foot of the mountain should be so pure, that it was free from all blemish, as neither the fountain mentioned ver. 7, could afford a competent supply, much less could their waters be conveyed up in any large quantity the steep sides of the hill, whose height is represented here to be very great; we must necessarily suppose, cisterns for rain water likewise within the city: or probably they might be assisted also by some leagues, as many high mountains are known to have, all of which, and the number of them, might have occasioned us to wonder at last failure through the length of the siege. The Vulgate supposes the city to have been supplied by an aqueduct, which is a fact, so certain, that it hardly needed to be stated that Bethulia, would have been a great convenience; but was it possible in so lofty a site to have received any advantage from thence, except water should have forgot its own nature, and move

Ver. 18. Then the children of Esau went up with the children of Ammon, and camped in the hill country. The Idumenus, being the posterity of Esau, bare an ancient grudge against the Jews, upon account of their ancestors losing their right of primogeniture, and the subduing of Edom by Davil afterward (2 Sam. xiv. 14). Upon both these accounts they took hold of all opportunities of venting their spite among the Jewish people, and to their habitation or possession of the land of Ammonites too, though related likewise in blood to the Jews, yet bore a constant hatred towards them, which they took an opportunity to show when the Jews were under any danger for which they were severely punished justly by the prophets, and threatened with judgments (see Ezek. xxvi. 28. xxx. 2. 6. Zeph. ii. 10. 11.).

Thus all the promises of Abraham remained about them. . . . four and thirty days.) The Vulgate has, Cuiusque ista custodia per diem viginti usque, delibarant ciceriterna; making the time only to be twenty days. Another more ancient Latin version has, duas viginti e quatuor.
The Syrinx makes the siege to last two months and four days.

Ver. 20. Now therefore call them unto you, and deliver the whole city for spoil to the people of Holofernes, and to all his army.) Polybius mentions many cities, otherwise well provided for a siege, that were obliged to surrender, by being deprived of a supply of water; and adds, that when these matters were brought to extremity, and when they were beaten to be stunned, and to have it delivered out in small quantity, the anxiety is the greater, as the appetite generally for which is not allowed, or cannot be come at (ib.

Ver. 27. For it is better for us to make a spoil unto them, than to die for thirst: for we will be their servants, that our souls may live, and not see the death of our infants before our eyes."

Josephus observes of the Arabinians, that being in a miserable distress for want of water, four thousand of them came out to Herod, and offered themselves to captivity and chains, to avoid the more inexpressible calamitv of a raging drought; and that the rest made a salty confess, and attacked the besiegers, in which encounter seven thousand fell, choosing rather a present certainty of death, than the necessity of life, and the distress of it, for want of water (Antiq. lib. xv. cap. 8). But how would have been the condition of Bethulia, and indeed all the country round about, if they had not been subdetermined to the clamour of the people, and through impatience of thirst had surrendered themselves! In what misery would they have been involved, and what an opportunity of victory and glory to the army and the city of Thrace? The city of Macedonia, was sensible of this too late, who, being choked with thirst in Thrace, surrendered with his whole army to the enemy, and when plentifully refreshed with water, and furnished with a full prospect, of the pleasure and satisfaction and pleasure have I, from the state of a king, reduced myself to be a slave."

The Book of Judith

Ver. 6. She fasted all the days of her widowhood.

A great instance of this of her pious disposition, and of the tender regard which she had for the memory of her deceased husband. "Fasten in strictness and severity of life and manners, customary among the Jewish women, passed afterward into the church. We read of Anna the prophetess, a widow of fourscore and four years old, that she " never did eat any thing, nor drink any wine, night and day" (Luke ii. 27, 38). St. Paul gives the like description of a truly devout widow, "She is that which is wise and prudent, married, and continueth in supplication and prayers night and day, that she may live in prosperity and long life" (1 Tim. v. 5, 6).

Save the eyes of the sabbath, and the sabbaths, and the even portions and sabbath days of the house of Israel. It is agreed on all hands, that it was the custom of all the Israelites who feared God, to observe the sabbaths and the new moons, among the families of the house of Israel; and they and carefully to have observed their sabbaths fasts in their pursuit as well as in their feast, from the earliest to their latest times (see 2 Chr. xxvii. 2; xxviii. 1 Chron. xiii. 31. 2 Chron. ii. 17. xiii. 32. 15. ii. 10. xvii.

Others imagine that the reason of this was, the almost impossibility of keeping a fast that day, being the day of the preparation, so called by the sabbath day, fasted on it, in order to make provision of victuals for the sabbath, and could not avoid tasting of what they were so preparing (Shickard de Punn). With respect to the new moons in particular, and the way they were observed, it is probable, that she appointed two fasts the beginning of each month, for fear of being wanting in any respect or particular which the law required; as to guard also against any incoency, from the want of food, which in those times was so seldom appeared. Calmet is inclined to think, that what is mentioned of the eyes of the sabbaths and of the new moons is an addition, as no notice is taken of them either in the Syriac or Jerome's version, and that the practice referred to is probably later than the days of Judith: that the Greek translator inserted the clause in that version, as being the custom of the Jews at that time when it was made, and in the parts where he lived, though it might not be the original from whence he translated.

Ver. 7. She was also of a good comeliness, and very beautiful. She was not only very beautiful, but very charming in her deportment, which she appears to have had over Holofernes, and his being captivated at first sight; a comest not to be wondered at, especially if she was not older at that time than twenty-five years of age. She was worthy to be yours, particularly, as well as her bearing rich, is added, least any should think that she embraced the strict manner of life here described rather out of necessity than choice. But in one so excellent and of such a high repute, there was no little to consider, and as naturally contributed to disfigure and lessen the agreeableness of her person, which the generality of the sex take such pains to improve by studied ornaments, shows her to have been devoid of affectation and vanity. For continual fasting, as the ancient practice was, must have made her corporeal fasts, and of several kinds of meats, and of several kinds of meats, and particularly of her wearing sackcloth, was very likely to have been very little considerate than they; such a carriage by no means agrees with one who, on many occasions, distinguished herself for her humility. It rather proceeded from her modesty and meekness, and the contempt she had of the outward appearance of beauty, which she had indubitably concealed, that she

Ver. 8. And there was none that gave her an ill word; for she feared God greatly. The character which the historian gives Judith here is very high commendation, says St. Jerome, considering how tender and delicate a thing the reputation of a young and beautiful widow is; who elegantly expresses his remark upon it in the following words: Tempere tas feminam pudicitiae, et, quasi pli poltichernus, desiderias, quas maximam facit, consulues. (Ad Solomon vii. 6.) The author of this history of his heroine's piety, there is the less reason to credit the objections raised by some against her religion and modesty, from particular passages in it, as that all the principles here mentioned are of the party that should reconcile with a just sense of both. The Abbot de Cambre, in a funeral oration on one of the queens of France, took these words for his text, and observes upon them, 'that it is the commonest precept of all religions, and of every party in it, to be always with a good wish to good women, if they were given to woman; for though there may be some women, who, notwithstanding the prodigious detraction that has prevailed so long in the world, have yet escaped the attacks of those who have had fortune and reputation, who have otherwise a shining reputation, and who are, as the text says, famosissimae. So that we may challenge all those, who are immoral or unacquainted with the books that in so few words gives us so great an idea as these do of the heroine Judith, who reached the highest pitch of glory and renown, and which is aptest to alarm and raise the envy of the world; yet her virtue and merits were so engaging and powerful, so guarded with discretion, and so incomparably amiable, as to silence and strike mute that restless and impalpable passion. And what is farther, that she, by the powerful and happy deliberation of her heart, so happily and justly pointed out the true cause of her matchless virtue, and the universal admiration it met with, says: 'She was secure from evil tongues, and only sensibly touched with the fear of the Lord' (see Bayle's Dict. in voc nurse, not the daughter of her widow, that had the government of all things that she had, to call Oーズ and Chabris and Chorus, the ancients of the city. And they came unto her.) By the "ancients of the city," we are not to understand the oldest people in it, nor yet the priests, though the Vulgate have here prepheritos, but certain officers or magistrates so called. And though Joachim the high-priest is joined, xxv. 8, with the ancients of the city, and is said in a later chapter to come to Bethulia, cum universis presbyteris suis et videtur Judith, yet the Greek expresses it by οτι καταθησαι τω σακραιτω, i.e. "the senate, or ruling body of the city," and the same words are used both the one place in all the books of the Old Testament, where the word prepheritos is taken in the sense of sacerdos, however it may be used in the New. And by the "two ancients of the city," here mentioned as having charge of the chastity, we are neither to understand priests nor persons stricken in years, but stated judges, as is plain from the text itself. It may seem perhaps assuming in Judith to send to the Hospites, to consult with them, and of going to them herself in person; but this ought not to be ascribed to any motive or principle of pride, as if from an office of state or public dignity, which is by no means considerable than they; such a carriage by no means agrees with one who, on many occasions, distinguished herself for her humility. It rather proceeded from her modesty and meekness, and the contempt she had of the outward appearance of beauty, which she had indubitably concealed, that she desired them to come to her, that she might impart to them a matter of great consequence.

In Groridn. 1. when the servant of God have tempted God this day, and stand instead of God among the children of God?" By limiting God to such a certain time as five days, or promising in his name within that space, as if he could impress the heart of the man, and make his sin fixed by you, and his power then was shortened; contrary to that fine and just sentiment, ver. 15. Judith's reproof on this occasion was very just: for the fixing thus a time to the workman's and the servant's doing, by solicitation or persuading a prigogue that did not belong to them, showed a great difference in them; it was declaring they would no longer depend upon him, if did not answer their expectation in the time limited. For, the Lord, in a most de, and humble trust in him, submitting entirely in all events and exigencies to his pleasure, leaving the time and manner of deliverance to God's own method and deter-nation; so to act otherwise is tempting God. To "tempt God," in scripture language, signifies to distrust his power, truth, or providence, after sufficient demonstrations and reasons given for encouragement to depend upon them (see Isa. viii. 12. ) Jer. x. 13. ) These people, therefore, who had received so many proofs of the divine protection upon different occasions, betrayed a great want of faith in Expressing immediate deliverance. The great interposition and evidence of his wisdom and providence ought not to choose when and in what manner he would favour and relieve them. But such is the state of mankind, they are desirous to fix the times and seasons which God has particularly reserved the disposal of to himself, and keeps in his own favour;

Ver. 7. And now try the Lord Almighty, but you shall never know any thing: i. e. Try if you can find in this, or in any other matter of consequence, what the mind of the Lord is; the result of the inquiry will be, that you cannot do it to any certainty or perfection. The Geneva version has,
"So now you seek the Lord Almighty, but you shall never know any thing;" i. e. you would penetrate in vain, as if nobody could ever fathom the depth. See Wisd. ix.
13—17, where the like sentiment is expressed more at large. Holy Job, describing the unsearchableness of God, says, "No one can fathom the depths of his wisdom;" and find not him out: he is excellent in power and in judgment, and in plenty of justice: he will not afflict. Men do therefore fear him; he respecteth not any that are wise of heart; 1 x. 24—25. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of the right knowledge; and the fear of the Lord preserves life; and the fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge; but the fear of the Lord is the beginning of understanding. See Prov.
xi. 27. Joshua 24. 15. And now, maie your conciousness be fully persuaded that you are to refer these matters to the to the context, "Let men therefore fear him, for he will not regard any that are wise in their own conceit;" and Coverdale's is much to the same effect: "It is not we that can fathom the depths of his wisdom;" for God is above righteousness, he is higher than can be expressed; let men, therefore fear him, for there shall no man see him, that is wise in his own conceit;"

Ver. 16. Do not bind the counsels of the Lord our God:
for God is not as man, that he may be threatened; i. e.
Think not to tie down God to terms and conditions, to assist you when or in the manner ye please, as one obliges a debtor in paying in a certain fixed time, or to give security to satisfaction; for God is not a weak creature like man, to suffer himself to be insulted or intimidated by menaces.
The Lord our God is a Ruler, and a Ruler among the Almighty, we can neither bind nor shake, especially if it be rightly translated, " God is not a man, that he should be; neither the son of man, that he should repent;" where our version is by no means accurate; the verbs be notshutup, the same that is here used, does not signify to repent, but to threaten. And in this sense the LXX. translate the Hebrew word, Gen. xxvii. 42, and so de-utro-vdov, of verse 8, which other verbs he does signify to repent. The verb deu'jUvov, verlot, indeed, has such a sense, but not the compound deu'jUvov. St. Cyril, who quotes this place of Judith, accordingly renders, Neque quod quisquis se minime posuerit (Testimonia cont. Judas, lib. ii. cap. 20).

Neither is he as the son of man, that he should be wargery, that he should be moved; not that he should be the subject of change, but that he should be moved by the copies seem corrupt: the true one probably is, deu'jUvov, which is followed by all the ancient fathers who quote this place; St. Cyril particularly has, Non quasi homo Deus suspenditur. We are justified in this alteration by the parallel passage, Numb. xxvii. 19, where the verb used is, "he shall not repent," i. e. to be shaken in his resolutions, or to be in doubt or suppress what to do. It no where signifies to lie, as our version in that place of Numbers has it (see Origen and Theodore in loc.) It is a very common word in the Bible, and may be derived from deu'jUvov, and the meaning be entreated; i. e., God is not a man that he may be threatened, neither as the son of man that he should be persuaded, entreated, won over by solicitation or teasing. The very word entreated, as coming from eivov, Vigiate, Ad incumdam imaginamt-urtes (Vers. Lat. ut judicatur). Syriac, Ut in ordinem regi cum non in ordinem hanc, or in the way of regulating, but in the way of disposing of, the respect of people, nor city, among us, which worship gods made with hands, as hath been aforetime. For which cause our fathers were given to the sword, and for a spoil, and had a great fall before our enemies. But we know none other God, therefore we trust that he will not despise us, nor any of our nation."

What Judith here urges, was an argument of real consolation to them in their present circumstances; viz., if the many calamities their nation at different times had laboured under, as desolation, captivity, and slavery, the sword, &c. were owing to the then corrupt and idolatrous state of the people, they had great reason now to hope, that being free from that crime and abomination which was the occasion of their forefathers' miseries (for it was a common observation in the Old Testament, that the sin of the golden calves had a share in all their punishments,) they might rely upon his favour and protection, and should not therefore, through despair of assistance, de-Lor themselves to their enemies.

Ver. 21. For if we be taken, all Judea shall be waste, and our sanctuary shall be spoiled; and he will require the prophecy thereof four months. It aggravates the fault that they which had committed, is so dispirited, and ready to deliver up their city, from a consideration of a more public nature; viz., that on the safety and preservation of Jerusalem, and the holy city Jerusalem, and consequently of their temple and altar, and the right and regular performance of their whole religious service; as it was not allowable to offer the sacrifices with a view to the safety of the temple and temple; for, she insinuates, he is an instance both of great weakness and rashness, to form a resolution to give up the city if not relieved in five days; as it would be exposing at the same time their whole nation to the common danger, to defend which, and their most holy rites from being discontinued or profaned, they ought rather courageously to shed the very last drop of their blood, and in the use of an undivided measure to the hazard of the common safety.

There is a great variety in the Greek copies here; some have, ἂν καὶ ὑμεῖς ἀχαίοι νῆσος, ὑπανθίνειτε νῆσον ὑπὸ Ἰωάννης, Others, ἄρον καὶ ἐποιέσθη ὑπὸ Ἰωάννης, which agrees the Geneva version, which has, " Neither when we shall be taken, will Judea be so famous, 23; and our sanctuary shall be spoiled, and our city Jerusalem,
"We shall have followed a copy different from the rest, which placed the
"As does Junius likewise, Neque verò a deprehendamur, ita, nonnullamur Judea amplius."

Ver. 23. For our scripture shall not be directed to favour, but the Lord our God shall turn it to dishonour. The Geneva version has, " Our servitude shall not be directed by favour;" i. e. The slavery we shall bring upon ourselves will not procure us the more favour; that we shall not have the better treatment for our tameness in yielding, we may be assured from the example of other nations who have submitted. Junius seems to take it in this sense, which when he renders, it is another but at the top of their heads, for to the nation, nationes.—Nous ne pourrions leur parer par nos sommes; nous ne trouverons point graces à leurs yeux, says Calmet, in loc.

Ver. 24. Now, therefore, brethren, let us shew an example to our brethren, because their hearts depend upon us.]" Πρὸς τῶν ἐμποτόμων καὶ ἐμποτόμων. Though Judith knew the great consternation that would arise among the Jews to their national disgrace, and their disposition to surrender; yet she would not address herself personally to the body of the people, notably standing she might with good reason to raise their courage, and made themselves ready to do.

She chooses to apply herself only to the chief men of the city, to let them know and persuade them of the absolute necessity of their life and soul, on whom they depended and placed all their hope, it was their duty, so important a correspondent, to animate them by their example, and to betray no signs of fear or despondency themselves, but bode well of the greater fear, which they were, "tombled on every side, but not in despair; persecuted, but not forsaken; cast down, but not destroyed." For it has not only a bad aspect, but is generally attended with evil events, the decisions of those whose head of affairs appear themselves dispirited; and they are so much the more blamable herem, as by their passility they cast a damp and panic upon others; so that the very thought of having contrived, through their discouragement, to any future miscarriage that may ensue. In like manner, as when generals, who have the command of an army, and every other article of their supplies, shall consult their military example and spirit and example, betray themselves signs of fear, and backwardness to engage: if afterward it happens that they are vanquished by the enemy, they are deservedly in disgrace, and suffer heavy reproaches, as being to all occasions, at least, of the great loss sustained. A learned writer thinking the rendering here would be more proper, "Their hearts agree, or conspire with us," according to the use of the verb in some parts of scripture, as Luke xix. 43. (see Hammond, in loc.) But the former sense I think more agreeable to the context, especially if we read & quia sepsis as some copies have it, and is confirmed by the Vulgate rendering.

Ver. 25. Let us give thanks to the Lord our God, which trieth us even as he did our fathers.] In this and the two following verses is an excellent, and, I think, an excellent advice, such as at any time labour under afflictions, and it consists of the following particulars: 1. That they are of such a nature, that instead of being uneasy under them, men should rather be thankful, as a fine and gracious design, and rather kind admonitions, than any real tokens of God's displeasure. 2. That God's most faithful servants, the best of his people, have had the same experience, in the same manner, for the examinations of their hearts, and the trial of their patience. To which the Vulgate adds a fourth reason, that inmuring provokes God to inflict heavier judgments, and he may be more strict in his judgments, or in them generally, if they are not taken to heart from that account. The words of that version that are most observable, "illia autem qui tentationes non supercavit can timore Domini, et impatientiis suum, et imprumum inmurrabant, hoc est, qui timor Domini proutialis, exterioram et se sibi, quae in strictis et serius adcrebriter et perennius, exacte agreebatur, sed non tamen in verbo; St. Paul, I Cor. x. 9, 10.

Ver. 26. Then said Ozias to her, All that thou hast spoken hast so much as spoken with a good heart, and there is none that may gainew thy words.] The inhabitants of Bethulia do not seem hitherto to have made the least effort to defend themselves, nor blood spilt, no remedy attempted. Thirst proceed them sore, and yet they had not the courage to attempt the Assyrian guard, that had seized upon the fountains and reservoirs of water. It was not without reason, therefore, that the prophet went to the women, who were the best judges of the condition they were reduced into, and reviewing and comparing the very different conduct and behaviour of her, and the persons she speaks to, one sees the observation, that God chooses the things that are weak to confound the strong. Ozius was very justly revered. Judith, a defenceless widow, whilst the men around her quaked for fear, and even the chiefs themselves give up all hope, she unhesitatingly and fearlessly makes up her mind with much coolness and constancy of mind, as well as strength of reasoning, as really to deserve the character Ozias here gives her. That one single woman should dare to venture on an act of such danger and boldness, and be so successful as to accomplish it, was owing at least to her great zeal for the safety of God's chosen people; or shall we ascribe it to a divine impulse? [Ver. 32. I will go forth with my walking-woman.] The word in the ancient translation is abra, which signifies a companion or maid of honour (such as ladies of the first condition are used to have); and it is applied to one of the women in the LXX. is supplied to the women who attended both Pharaoh's daughter, Exod. xi. 5, and queen Esther, iv. 4. Thus Calmet understands the word. In other writers it is considered as a servant or a seruirant housekeeper; and whether it is not to be taken in this latter acceptation, see ver. 10, compared with xvi. 23.

Within the days that you have promised to deliver the city of Bethulia, I will visit Josiphon.] Josiphon, ver. 11-17, blames Ozius and the rest of the governors, for presuming to limit the interposition of the Almighty in the affairs of five days. Josiphon seems to do the same here himself, engaging for his assistance within that precise time? Was this in compliance with their request, and that she might encourage their hopes; or shall we charge her with rashness and enthusiasm for assuring them that she should be the happy instrument to accomplish their deliverance within the fixed time? or, with the Romans, suppose that she had an assurance of the successful event of her intended enterprise, by some particular revelation? But the preceding passages, and this, to make due allowance for the many things that came to her. The Syriac makes her to tear her upper garment, Sciditi cunctam et apparut saenis quo inutra est. Accord to Calcutt the sense is, She resented her clothe, which she brought off to receive the governor of the city. Thus also Junius takes it, Imposuit ciliicum, positam, quam inductam, vestem; and Grotius, who restores the Greek text, which he thinks correct, says, she received this token, and makes the true reading to be, eon gyparginai, the Geneva version, which has, "She put off the cloak wherewith she was clothed," seems falsely here, and not to be reconciled with the context; for it must be granted, that she lost her head, and the like instances of humiliation, to commend and enforce her suit more effectually to God. [Ver. 20. Give me my father, and let me take a sword to vengeance of the strangers, who bowed the girdle of a maid to deathe her.] Judith here begs of God to inspire her with a zeal like that of Simeon, who engaged to lead a nation to perform a sacred ceremony, in the person of him whom he sparingly makes his sower to God. In the singular action of Simeon and Levi very much displeased Jacob their father, and that he condemned it as cruel and unjust (see Gen. xlix. 5, 6, compared with xxv. 30). How then can it be supposed, that we execute an action, as here, which Jacob cursed for the very barbarity of it? But in answer it may be said, that these words do not necessarily imply, that she appealed the fact, nor does the phrase of their giving a sword to take vengeance, mean any thing more than his permitting an action to be done. As he may be said to put the like means of destruction into the hands of ty-distinguished them from idolaters (see Thorndike, of the Laws of the Church, p. 213). Calvin observes, that the citation in these verses, of this holy act, and its consequences, are described poetically, and that it is probable, that this writer had read the poems, as appears from xvi. 7.

V. 6. "But God made him wise for the sake of those that are near the Greek."

V. 7. "For thou hast wrought the things above, and shall there be the things that shall be after?" i.e. as thou wast the author of all the miracles done in our fathers' days, so thou wilt prove thyself the author of these things hereafter. All events succeed one another by the ordering of thy wise providence, which has so disposed them according to thy eternal counsel. The last clause the Vulgate renders, "fist conexa, illa potest; ista etiam, et eorum, quae sunt, et eorum, quae sunt, et eorum, quae sunt," (i.e. he has brought all the things above, and all the things that shall be below, in his power; and this is one, and those, and those, and that is another.)

V. 8. Ver. 35. "God does not command the 'sword' to any one of the members of his Church, or to any private individual, to be used as a weapon of war, or for any other purpose than that which is mentioned in his Word; but he commandeth the sword to be "in the hands of men," "in the hand of a king," "in the hand of a captain," "in the hand of a magistrate," and "in the hand of a great officer." And that if, through misrepresentation or equivocation, he be led into any mistake prejudicial to his safety or interest, there is no just ground of complaint, according to that old proverb, "He that is the apple of his eye, does not therefore despise him." So then, if Darius, and even Jeho-}

V. 9. Ver. 16. "For the power standeth not in multitude, but in the Lord's people;" which was a firm persuasion of this truth, that induced Jonathan, and his armour-bearer only, to attempt the Philistines' garrison; "It may be that the Lord will work for us, for there is no restraints to the Lord, to save many or by few" (1 Sam. xiv. 6). By the same, Gi-et cicatriz isis. The Geneva version affords another, but much more probable, reading: "Genera innumerae, et ad orbem terrarum, et ad eorum, et ad omnis, et ad omnis, et ad omnis, and a wound, a stroke against them that enterprise crule things against thy covenant."

Ver. 14. And make every nation and tribe to acknowledge that thou art God, and make discovery of the nations of the eastern nations; the constitution of their bodies and the nature of their chins inclining them to a more abstemious diet than is used in colder countries. And she took in this sentence as far as the beginning of her answer, to partake of the parts of the gentiles, which the law made her to regard as polluted and defiled (xix. 3).

But to return to the point of what the women, the aged and free, gave instead of which the Vulgate has, panem et casseram; and the Syriac renders in like manner.

Ver. 12. I am a woman of the Hebrews, and I am fled from them into the land of the Egyptians, and I have been an end of my own. In the latter part of this verse, "I will show him a way whereby he shall go, and win all the hill country, without having the they shall be given to was consumed." (ver. 15). It is to be observed in general of the speeches of Judith, that many expressions therein are spoken ironically, and many equivocally, or with a double meaning, that she cunningly conceals the truth, when she says, "they shall be given to you to be consumed;" having some such mental reservation as this, "unless God extraordinarily interposes in their behalf," which she seems to be well assured of. Others consider these words as spoken prophetically, as presupposing some future captivity to the Jews, unless they repented. In this light the generality of expressions in Judith's council of war, and her endeavour to excuse her from any imputation of falsehood.

Ver. 13. I am coming before Holophernes . . . to declare words of truth. Which, indeed, she did with respect to the Jews, Jerusalem, the tribe of Judah, and David's child, rose up and washed, and adorned herself (2 Sam. xii. 20). The like is mentioned of Nausicaa, and her maids, Λίθῳ, ἤλογον, καὶ ξύλον τίνα δεσποτεύοντος, ένωνεν άρεστώς είδον. (Od. vi.) And adorned herself with precious ointment. This refers to the Jewish customs of anointing the head, more particularly on festivals and other sombre occasions. Many instances of this in profane story are almost innumerable, in the description of their festivities: and that it was usual among the Jews is shown by several passages.

Ver. 15. we have mention of oil, "to make a cheerful countenance." And in this sense learned men understand the "oil of gladness," Ps. xiv. 6, as referring to the oil used on festivals, when oil is mentioned, particularly at the fallow sacrifice, with brained hair, and with a rich mitre or bonnet tied round her head with ribbons finely embroidered, and with other decorations and ornaments, yet are these no certain signs of a woman's being engaged in any of worshipful inclinations; though Jezebel indeed is described with some of them. 2 Kings ix. 30, but her character is the very reverse of this heroine: they are such only as were worn by the women of that age of condition and distinction, and were now only occasionally used to set off her person, for the better accomplishment of the great design in hand. What the Vulgate here adds, that God himself at this time gave her uncommon and irrestible beauty, to make her admired and amiable in the eyes of all beholders, has no foundation in any of the other ancient versions.

And put on garments of gladness wherein she was glad during the life of Manasses her husband. It may seem surprising, that Judith, who was so cautious of exposing her person to public view, and was so singularly strict and chaste, should, on a festival occasion, put on such gay apparel, to allure the eyes of all men that should see her: but this she did to ingratiate herself more to Holophernes, to disarm his fury and resentment against her, as one clothed in the vestments of her master, and thereby fill her a more favourable audience and admittance. Her putting on the very garments she wore in her husband's lifetime was probably to draw back the attention from herself, and thereby, under a cloak, to carry on her to behave with as much reverence and service as in her conjugal state, to prevent her yielding to any criminal solicitation, by the very sight of them; to be cute and not repulsive, to be pleasing and attractive, to grace her presence and accomplish on her husband's memory, but to revere his ashes, by preserving her chastity as a widow. This seems to be St. Ambrose's meaning, when speaking of this particular, he says: "Anno, in which seemed, that, in order to his conjugal state, being married to the widow, and seeing the monument of the holy man, he would not lay aside her chastity, but would present it, not to Holophernes, but to his neighbour, who would despire his people, that have among them such women." This remark of Holophernes's soldiers very much re-seems, says Madame Dacier, that of the venerable old counsellors in the third book of the Iliad, who, though they had suffered all the calamities of a totious war, and worse, were not afraid to advise the king, upon seeing Helen, the true and only cause of it, approaching towards them, are struck with her charms, and cry out,

Or victat, Tenta, ἀνείπωτα Ἀργος

Τοῖς ἀνίμωσε τελεῖ χαμός ἐλπίζειν

Ἀριστομάχος δόθη: ὦ, τίνος ἤρμος.

Which Mr. Pope has thus beautifully rendered,

Ver. 21. Now Holofernes rested upon his bed under a canopy, woven with purple, and gold, and emeralds, and precious stones. This piece of state, more agreeable to the softness of an eastern monarch, however customary in times of peace, and suited to the indulgence of the tender and delicate, was an indulgence not so much to be affected by a soldier. The business and hurry of a camp acceot admits or requires state, and therefore we consider but mealy of Holofernes, and should of any other general, to see him at such a time extended on a sofa, or lying ingloriously under a magnificent pavilion, as if luxury and pleasure were chiefly required in that part of the service, which, considered otherwise as a reflection on Amony himself, or on the degeneracy of the old Roman spirit, by the introduction of effeminate softness, is very just and apposite.

Coquelin's performance was resumed with great applause. (Epod. Od. 9.)

Ver. 22. And he came out before his tent with silver lamps going before him. Either because it was yet scarce daylight (see x. 5), or because it was dark within the tent of Holofernes, for it consisted of two apartments, an ante-chamber, and a withdrawing or inner room. From the latter he came out to meet Judith, preceded by servants carrying lamps; which were continually, as Calmet supposes, a signal of his presence; and therefore may be thought to imitate the customs of the Persians, among whom it was usual to carry fire before their kings; as it was afterwards done before the Roman emperors, and is at present before the emperor of the Turks. Whether this was a Persian custom or not, herein however we know that all the oriental nations were unanimous, viz. in affecting pomp and grandeur.

Ver. 23. She fell down upon her face, and did reverence unto him: and his servants took her up. It was neither a sudden fit of fear at the sight of this great and formidable general, nor yet of the rage of a local, and individual enemy, that made her, as it were, to have defied the whole Assyrian army, by passing through them with a single waiting-woman only, would scarce fall down in a swoon at the sight of one man, however considerable; but, it seems, she was in some kind of a feigned submission of all that pomp and magnificence which surrounded Holofernes, that dazzled her senses so as to occasion her falling down; her prostration was rather an expression of duty and profound reverence, and a submissive token of her meanness and unworthiness to appear in his presence. The paying him a sort of worship and adoration was an artifice to work upon his vanity, to recommend her to his favour, and to draw him into her snare.

CHAP. XI.

Ver. 1. Woman, be of good comfort, fear not in this heart; for I utter not any that was willing to serve Nabal, and I am thy squire, Nabal, son of Arba, which is chief among the seven lords of the basal, και ἔχεις ὑπερήφανον, διογκόνος δοκίμων, τ. κ. ε. ἧς ζυγεῖ

I have never hurt any man that was willing to "submit" and to "serve" Naphe dorsonor, much less shall I injure a defenseless woman, whatever Nabal may say, and I am thy squire, Nabal, son of Arba, who is chief among the seven lords of the land, so far as I know, 8 mention is made of his casting down the frontiers and cutting down the groves of such as had sued for peace, and had surrendered themselves and their cities, and had been received into the country.

Ver. 2. Be of good comfort, thou shalt live this night and hereafter: 1 Now we are to understand night here and in ver. 51 Does it mean that Judith first came to Holofernes in the night, and had an audience in his tent, as our version, following the Greek, seems plainly to represent it? But how then shall we reconcile this with x. 10, where it is said, that she went up to the tent of the great lord, with Judith with her eyes still she had passed the valley, and then saw her no more? which intimates that it was not night, but rather, as the Vulgate has it, about daybreak or on rising, that Judith inquired of Nabulus about Holofernes. It is possible that she went to Holofernes who went no farther than his ante-chamber, and then lighted burning in his tent; or else it must mean the night ensuing the day; but it is certain, at least we may suppose, therefore, that the conversation which passed between them was managed by an interpreter.

Ver. 6. If thou wilt follow the words of thy hand-maid.

Jacob's behaviour to Esira was not unlike this, when she said to him, "Turn in, my lord, turn in to me; fear not" (Judg. iv. 18): and with the like design of treachery. Such also was Rachel's receiving, concealing, and conveying away the spies, which was all a crafty management, assisted and carried on by an unwise suggestion; for she said, "There came men unto me, but whence they were, I wist not; and whom they were, I wist not; but how they came I wist not, whither they went I wist not: pursue after them quickly, for ye shall overtake them;" and yet she knew they were not of Israel; and she cast her with a stone into the brook; (see Judg. x. 4, 5). It would be too bold to charge what she said and did under the occasion with the guilt of a lie, since the writer to the Hebrews, xi. 31, records her name with honour. In like manner, when the invention or the design of the words (whether for want of either success or sustenance, the causists allow) to abuse the enemy with forged reports, and false accounts of their state, and to make use of any crafty stratagem they can devise, they may be of service to relieve to themselves, though altogether inconsistent with the truth. Thus, and such-like practices, have been productive of all the results which it is said of them. They have obstructed the dealings of the wise to prevent the exigency of things in time of war. For when people are at open hostility with one another, whether matters be managed by mere force or cunning sleight, it makes no difference whether it be by a lie or truth, and outwardly, much more is it so to deceive him, though it be to his very great hurt. What some writers have observed to excuse evasive answers, or equivocating behaviour, in those instances, and other examples in sacred story, viz. that a mixed action may be commended for the good that is in it or it occasions, without any express notice or censure of the evil, seems applicable to the case of Judith.

God will bring the thing perfectly to pass by thee; i.e. God will execute what he has decreed and purposed, and will bring about the perfect victory. The expression is equivalent to do it, or make it. It is to be taken in the latter sense, and as spoken with such a reservation, as that x. 12. Holofernes understood her to speak of victory, by the surrender of the Israelites, or their gods' power: and the word is used in the same case as it should be obtained by the death of Holofernes himself. The next sentence also is equivocal; viz. "My lord shall not fail of his purposes;" which may either mean that Holofernes, to whom she was speaking, and whom she compliments with the title of "her lord," should gain his point, if he would follow her advice; or, that her lord God would infallibly execute his design, touching the deliverance of his people. Where Judith's speeches are capable of a double meaning, it is sufficient to free her from the imputation of impiety; and, as the two senses be true, viz. that which she herself had in view, though it was different from that which her lord God intended, his officers might understand her in a quite different sense; who, for their pride and repeated blasphemies, deserved to be blinded in such a manner as to interpret in his favour what was really against them.

Ver. 7. As Nebuchadnezzar king of all the earth liveth, and as his power liveth, i.e. As true as it is that Nebuchadnezzar is king of all the earth, and as his power is, so is this that he shall not fail in thy purposes. It was a common form of oath among the Persians, the East, and among the Jews, to say, "As, etc." when they affirmed, or promised, kings, and other persons of great merit and dignity; thus Hannah, the mother of Samuel, swore by the life of the high-priest Eli (1 Sam. i. 26); Elisha by that of Elijah his master (2 Kings ii. 14); and Aquilas, when he met him as he went to avenge himself on the family of Nabal (1 Sam. xix. 26); and her compliments and fair speeches to ingrate herself, and soothe his anger, somewhat resemble those of Judith. Abner swore by the life of Saul (1 Sam. xvii. 55), and Joseph by that of Phar-sa, that there was no such thing as another superstition nor idolatry; for neither of these, swearing by the life of holy men or prophets, nor the other, by that of kings, regarded them in so doing as gods; but being

Who hath sent thee for the upholding of every living thing? This does not suit the character either of Nabu-chadnusor or Holofernes, who destroyed all before him, in pursuit of his fierce orders, who had avowed himself on all the earth; except it be understood as spoken ironically. Our version here seems inaccurate; the Greek of Ἐν τοῖς ἐνθύμησις εἰς τὸν ἄνθρωπον; but tyrants, such as Nabuchadnusor, however complimented, seldom concern themselves about reformation in earnest; they always aim at the public good, or the good of their state; and the most approved and punished wicked nations, such as the Assyrians were to that of the Jews when they carried them away captive.

For not only men shall serve him by thee, but also the beasts of the field, the cattle, of the earth shall live by thy power, under Nabuchadnusor and all his house. This is a rhetorical exaggeration; and the mention of, and things without reason, submitting to his judgment, and the power of the king, is the thing reserved meaning was, that his head should be carried thither, and through all Judea, in triumph. And thou shalt drive them as sheep. This, too, is capable of a double meaning; as the secret sense in Judith's mind was, that he should be the occasion, by the surprise of his death, of the Assyrians' being driven in this manner, when the Jews should have no power to do it; and the other, that the head being provided for, and sent, with all the creatures in and belonging to them, Holofernes. Ver. 10. Our nation shall not be punished, neither can the sword prevail against them, except they sin against their God. The truth of this observation the Jews experienced in every stage of their state, from their first becoming a nation to their ceasing to be so, by the captivity of the twelve tribes; their obedience or disobedience respectively ruined or saved them. It was therefore Halaman's policy, says Tuilo, to make the daughters of Mosh to sell the use of their bodies to the Hebrews, upon condition that they would conceal the names of the women of Israel. They were not otherwise to be subdued than by their own sinfulness and breach of God's commandments, εἰπὼν ἐκ γῆς ἤτοι ἄνθρωπος (see Numb. xxvi. 18). And they are prisoner, which means there is no question of manner, but what is brought upon it by its own repeated pass which she had promised and engaged for, he himself would have avenged his own person and the destruction of his home. But he thought, says Calmet, 'That Holofernes spoke this seriously, and in good earnest, and his conversion would prejudice his fortune; or he must certainly be ignorant that the God of Israel had made use of the instrument of his destruction.' The question is, would this be the principal difficulty in the way of his passion? he declares, therefore, that a difference in religion ought to be a sufficient reason for forbearing from doing an evil, even to one's own person, as he was ready to become a Jew, as soon as he saw the accomplishment of what she had assured him of.

CHAP. XII.

Ver. 1. And bode that they should prepare for her of his own meat.] Συντεχνασαν ανερα και τον ανερα και τον ανερα συντεχνασαν. Calmet, from the authority of the Syriac, translates it, Et jussit sterni ipsi, darique ipsi de convivio suo, &c. thinks that the true reading of the Greek, συντεχνασαν ανερα και τον ανερα και τον ανερα συντεχνασαν, is συντεχνασαν ανερα και τον ανερα και τον ανερα ιτικα, v. l. ηρα, he order that her head or coach should be prepared for her, and that she should be driven down, and his own meat or provisions should be given her. Ver. 2. And Judith said, I will not eat thereof.] It was the custom of the Egyptians, as it is also of the Arabs, to bring their guests over and under cover, in order to break bread, &c. (S. Cusan. lib. Athen. lib. i. cap. 11) to consecrate all that they made to drink or to eat to their gods, by putting part of it on the altar, or casting into the fire; so that to eat of meats and drink of the wine of the Egyptians was an instance of great retirement from idols. Whereas, by the laws of Moses, nothing was to be eaten or drank by the children of Israel, but which had been offered to the Lord, either immediately in himself, or consecrated in his name. (Lev. xxvii. 31, 32. Deut. xvi. 21.) The Jews, therefore, as appears from the examples of Daniel and his associates at the court of the Chaldeans, and of the widow of Tekoa, and of Nehemiah at that of Artaxerxes, who, being cupbearer to that king, was dispensed with from drinking the wine of the gentiles; the Jews, I say, when they would not avoid the use of the gentiles, took great care to abstain, not only from things really sacrificed to idols, but from most things that came out of gentile hands, because there was some presumption, that a part of most kinds, by way of first-fruits, had been consecrated to idols, the rest being by such first-fruits degraded polluted, as dedicated to them. From the places above cited it appears, that the Jews forsook all meats and drinks that came from the gentiles, in like manner as the Egyptians would not eat with the Egyptians, whom they looked upon as impure and profane, and esteemed it an abomination so to do (Gen. xlii. 32). When the Egyptians had invited the Jews to eat, to drink, \\

Ver. 4. As thou livest, my lord, thine handmaid shall not send those things that I have, before the Lord, work by mine hand the things that he hath determined.] Messagers of Ptolemy to observe, that there is the less reason to be lieve that Judith is guilty of lying, as she occasionally con vinced; but it appears that no other was found, and that God, and assuringly solemnly, that she was sent from and commissioned by him; at other times, by the life of the Egyptians, and here by that of Holofernes, which, though it made use of an instrument of his destruction, was consistent with that character of her, v. 8, 'that she feared God greatly.' However this be, it is certain, that throughout almost her whole discourse with this general, she con tinued him in a continual and constant address, even here, when she says, that the Lord will work by her hands what he has determined, she speaks of his design to cut off all gentile pride, and that gentile pride is now understood of her delivering the Jews into his power.

Ver. 5. Then the servants of Holofernes brought her into the tent, and she slept till midnight, and she arose when it was touch of the evening-watch. Holo free nes saying, Let my Lord now command that hand maid may go forth to prayer.) According to the Val gate, Judith asks this favour of going forth to prayer at a distance from the camp, at her first entrance into the tent appointed her, which seems more probable than disturbing Holofernes unsuccessfully by such a message towards the morning-watch. And indeed Judith had prepared Holofernes to give her liberty of retiring in more secure day, 'thy servant will go out by night into the valley, and pray unto God,' (xv. 17.) Judith could as well have prayed within her chamber. In this case, Judith could go from her the most secret and retired part of it; but persisting out of policy in her first resolution, of going forth at a distance from the camp for that purpose, she thought it an affair of such importance, that it was not to be renounced. This conduct of Judith, though very artful, was regular, and of a piece, and left Holofernes no room to suspect her fidelity and integrity. For as it was necessary at first to appear to give in to his project, to make this proposal to go out and retire, which did in fact, induce her, of going forth for three days, in such a manner as to create no jealousy; that after having cut off Holofernes' head, he might be the more astonished at the deed done upon her, she might retire with more ease, safety, and confidence, to Bethulia again, without any stop or molestation. To retire apart for prayer, that it may be performed with more earnestness and sincerity, and that the hearing of the rude and profane, is certainly most hazardous; but the true reason of Judith's procedure at this time seems rather to be founded on artifice, than on any obligation either from the Jews, law or custom. By this act she induced Holofernes to think what was contrived for her to be most advantageous to his great designs, and under a notion of praying for victory and success in his undertakings, would induce her, of going for her safety, and doing her country the greatest service, to retire and to be absent as long as she could, and perhaps for ever. But it is most probable, that the dread of Holofernes' resentment, who was captivated with her person, and regarded her as one who would soon crown his most wished wishes, hindered the soldiers from attempting any rudeness or assault. There is no necessity to suppose, with the Roman expositors, that either an angel conducted her at first from Bethulia, or secured her each night from danger when she went out, as the Egyptians did, when they went out from their village. The Egyptians, Greeks, and Romans, all used these washings before their devotions; and from the heathens probably this custom was derived to the Jews (Spor. bid. p. 786. Tho. et al. Eccl. vi. 10. Ovid. Fast. lib. v. Virg. En. i. 35.) Thus xvi. 18. of this history we read, that as soon as the people were purified, they offered their burnt-offerings; and to this custom the

Ver. 12. Far, lo, it will be shame for our person, if we shall not stand in our right eye for her, if we draw her not unto us, we shall lose us to scorn. These words of Holophernes are capable of a double meaning, and contain either a harmless invitation to the banquet, or imply an intimation toajo to abuse and debauch her, in which sense edon is often taken by Lucian, Aristotle, and other ancient writers (see particularly Hist. of Susanna, ver. 54, 55). The Syriac any way denote that he should make her understand it in the former sense; the Vulgate and Septuagint Seavers (Sacr. Hist. lib. iii.) in the latter; which, the conclusion of the verse seems to imply. It is, however, exceedingly probable, and is better adapted to the absolute character of the person spoken of, to say nothing of the profession. But what a mean and detestable opinion does it give us of Holophernes to have such loose and wanton ideas of acting, to hear him declare, that it will be a reflection and dishonor to him not to have ruined a woman's virtue! As if it was a commendable triumph, or added to the insignificance of a general, to glory in the spoiling of her person, and in her situation, to hear him declare, that it will be a reflection and dishonor to him not to have ruined a woman's virtue! As if it was a commendable triumph, or added to the insignificance of a general, to glory in the spoiling of her person, and in her situation, being so near his tent, and so little otherwise guarded. And how degenerate must those or any times be, when rapes are accounted gallantry, and women would last an accomplishment! As virtue were not the attire of a harlot, no, neither was Judith like any of his Assyrian prostitutes; he needed not have been afraid, if he did not draw her, i.e. as the Geneva version has it, allure her to him, and make her provost of lasciviousness, for wickedness, or reproach him for coming away undeceived; for as she would not permit indecent freedoms, so neither would she take them, nor yet beneath the unbefitting character which had maintained, by any criminal levity of conversation.

Ver. 13. Then ... Baggesa ... said, Let not this fair damsel from me, my lord, and to be honoured in his presence, and drink wine and to eat with me this day as one of the daughters of the Assyrians, which serve in the house of Nabuchodonosor. The immoderate drinking to which Justin has not misconducted him by using the word custom, and therefore invites her freely to drink wine, the great incentive to last. The Persians were much more free and dissolute at their entertainments than the other nations of the East, where not only the persons who received the refreshments, but, nor to dine with them in public; they generally ate by themselves apart, and did not affect to be introduced on such occasions. One sees in the book of Esther how backward they were to go to the court, and with what a fierceness of spirit she received the message, and absolutely refused to go into the apartment, where she was to dine with his nobles (i. 12). In the history of the Hebrews, and that of the Egyptians, we read of no women at their public entertainments, nor among the ancient Greeks; but the Persians took much greater liberties. Nothing is more to be observed than, that the ancients were very indifferently, according to many writers, in their behaviour and conduct towards them (Herod. lib. v. cap. 18. Justin. lib. vii.). Even low and indolent women sometimes made the best of it, and were not only entertained, but afterward employed in scenes of wickedness. It is true, that the manners of the Persians and Assyrians were not altogether alike; but they generally resembled one another, says Calmet, and the liberties taken with women by the one were to be found and paralleled in the other. One need only read the life of Sardanapalus to be convinced of the insensibility of their kings not have a stronger proof to what abandoned and vile purposes the daughters of Assyria, who served in the house of Nabuchodonosor, were employed, than the proposal made to Judith by this insatiable lover.

Ver. 14. Then said Judith unto him, Who am I now, that I should gainsay my lord? Surely whatever pleaseth him I do will do speedily. It hath been objected against this history, that the princesses of Persia, according to the literature of the Curtius, and of the other historian (see Ceyr. iii. 2. iv. 2), but likewise the education of their children; it being a custom among them to put the heir-apparent to the crown, as he was born, into the hands of eunuchs, under whose care he was to be placed, until the thirteenth year of his age (Plato in Alcb.). Formerly they were entrusted likewise with the care of some favourite women, and to watch over their conduct. Thus Ovid.

And how degenerate must those or any times be, when rapes are accounted gallantry, and women would last an accomplishment! As virtue were not the attire of a harlot, no, neither was Judith like any of his Assyrian prostitutes; he needed not have been afraid, if he did not draw her, i.e. as the Geneva version has it, allure her to him, and make her provost of lasciviousness, for wickedness, or reproach him for coming away undeceived; for as she would not permit indecent freedoms, so neither would she take them, nor yet beneath the unbefitting character which had maintained, by any criminal levity of conversation.
proposed, when the thing is faulty, and will not bear an examination, is a point of modesty as well as prudence; as, when, after a great deal of pains, and much put upon the foot of a great favour and distinction done to her, she could do no less than return him a compliment. But then we all know that the offers of service, which are too often meant to make further advances, are only means of testing another, and those expressions of submission and respect, which so commonly pass among us, are not to be taken in a literal sense, because they always imply a tacit condition. And, the less a person is mentioned in the old Testament, the more is he likely to be a private man, as was the case in Judah's mouth, "Surely whatsoever pleaseth him, I will do speedily," will fairly admit of this construction:— whatever Holofernes shall desire of me, so far as is consistent with my duty, honour, and religion, I will not fail to do (see Calvin in loc. and Stackhouse's History of the Bible, vol. i.). There is also a further solution to be given of this seeming contradiction of Judah, that he might mean the Lord God, whom she had all along endeavoured to please by her prayers, fasting, and special acts of faith; and might with good reason say to the eunuch, when he had mentioned the reward which he would give him if he would perform what he required:—I will do it, and it shall be my joy unto the day of my death: and her meaning might only be, I am willing to do that which God commandeth me to do, with relation to my life, and it shall be the pleasure of my life to fulfil it: as the accomplishment of it I know will be my happiness in this life, and be the means of blessedness in the other. And so, says Dr. Arnold, this love in this manner, regarded his master as the person whom she called her Lord, and being blinded with this persuasion, and interpreting Judith's answer by the passion of Holofernes, he continued to make that general allusion, which is the subject of this last verse, as hisoverflow, without thinking of any evil consequence.

15. And her maid went and laid soft skins on the ground for her over against Holofernes, . . . that she might sit and eat upon them.) Ес υι οἰκή σαρκαζωνείς ευρίσκων. It appears from hence, that Judith did not eat at the same table with Holofernes, but apart by herself, and on her own meats; not sitting, as our version has it, but recumbent, καρπαζώντης, on soft skins spread on the ground, a custom among the ancients, which Homer mentions. II. i. and Strabo, lib. iv. The translator of the LXX. in our Polyglot, has, θυμανδράκην ακκυμονής σαβαχής, et ingress vocatur Judith. Junius renders in like manner. The Jews' ancient posture at table was sitting. Soul, when we say, sit down at table, is not excepted by them (Ex. xxi. 24). And they continued the posture of sitting, for the most part, in the reign of Solomon (Prov. xxviii. 1). At the feast of Achan mentioned in Num. xxi. 18, they are said to have laid their skins on the ground, as they did also at the banquet Esther made for the king and Haman (eh vii. viii.), which, though it relates to the Persians, yet shows the antiquity of this custom of lying at meals in the East and after the Jews had acquaintance and dealings with the Babylonians, Persians, and Syrians, little or no mention is made of sitting at meals. The posture of lying at them spring first from luxury and idleness, and as such it is mentioned by the prophets (Amos vi. 4. Ezek. xxii. 41), but after the captivity it became more general. In the gospel-times, beds lie on at their meals when we read the expression construe with δια την Μαγδαλαίαν ο ἑαυτός αὐς αὐτή κατατάσσεται κηθήμενος, and also when he ate the last supper with his disciples.

Ver. 18. I will drink, now, my lord, because my life is nigh the end. . . . the dead are born.] 'The glory of which Judith speaks, was that springing from the hopes of victory which she entertained over Holofernes, the person who aimed to triumph over her, and, as she imagines, was to destroy all the destructions of men.' The way of love was not far from the courage of Judith: a satisfaction not arising from love, but hatred. For a woman so religious, so attached to the love of her country, and of the peace and happiness of the people, she was not at all adverse to the addresses of this alien and barbarian, and very far from regarding it as an honour to serve and please him, whose design was, as she mentions in her prayer, to defile the name of the Lord God, and to destroy the glory and glorious Name rested, and to cast down the horn of the altar (is. 8). She could never have any thoughts or inclination to respect and honour one so wicked, with whom such

CHAPTER XIII.

Ver. 1. Now when the evening was come, his servants made haste to depart, and Bagazo shut his tent without. And Judith was left alone in the tent, and Holofernes lying asleep upon his bed. And then the Spirit of God moved the angel of the Lord to go down upon the city of Ojdalah. And his rendering here seems preferable, as it gives this interview in a much stronger light. Now when it was late in the night his servants made haste to go to his bed, and Bagazo shut the chamber-door, and went his way, for they were all overlaiden with wine: so was Judith alone in the chamber. As for Holofernes, he lay upon the bed all night, for he had drunk much wine, and which of many particulars was very observable:—1. That the tents of the great generals in the east were very spacious, having several apartments, and for their grandeur and magnificence not unlike civil governors. 2. It is probable that lamps were burning all night in Holofernes' chamber, without which Judith could not have seen to have managed and conducted her enterprises. 3. That there was no light in the doors of his tent without, it must be understood with this reserve, that Judith had liberty to go out; for to prevent suspicion, she had the cunning and precaution to acquaint Bagazo beforehand with her intentions of going forth that very night as on the preceding ones. 4. Judith's servant is ordered to wait without, not at the door of Holofernes' tent, as some expositors would have it, that she might be ready at call, and to give any notice or assistance that was necessary, but at least of her own bedchamber, which carried less suspicion with it. Nor does it appear that she had her chamber so occupied or sumptuous that she could not design in hand; there seems more probable, from her not communicating it to the elders of Bethulia, when she set out on this enterprise, that she kept it an impenetrable secret, wholly in her own hands, and on her own powers. 5. The following circumstances suggest this useful reflection, That the wisdom of God often makes even the vices and irregularities of men to serve, in a surprising manner, to the execution of his own great purposes. Judith would never have been able to have cut off Holofernes' head, if she had not been alone with him in his tent, and, even when alone, could not have accomplished so desperate a design, if an excess of wine had not quite stupefied and laid aside Holofernes and his officers, so as not to be capable of mistrusting anything, much less to hinder what she was about to effect. One sees from this, by the event, how brutal lust and passion are differently rewarded: Judith, inflamed with the love of her country and its afflicted people, is transported beyond herself at the thoughts she had conceived of their deliverance, and death and destruction were his own. The Spirit of God, with the assistance which she sought so much in need of at this time. Her prayer seems conceived in this or the like manner:— I know and experience, O Lord, that in myself I am nothing but weakness, and incapable to execute what I have undertaken; I therefore now, in thy presence, discontinue my pretensions of an attempt which is far above me to achieve; but I believe, at the same time, and have a firm faith and assurance, that what I cannot do by myself, they will do for me, and make thy power the more known and conspicuous, as the instrument thou art pleased to employ in proportionably weak and insufficient." Judith prayed thus, it is said "in her life, she left not a stone unturned, nor any thing being overheard by a vocal prayer, as Holophernes was so insensible and stupified by his excessive debauch; but the expression denotes, that God, being a spirit, hears not the audible prayers of vassals and vanquished, though figuratively to "enter into his ears," but has a particular regard to the language and manner of the heart.

She went to the pillar of the bed, which was at Holophernes' head, and took down his Lancaster from thence. Помещением или нанья, и следовательно ari d'aprò в е. It is very probable that so e 's true the reading here, as so properly signifies a pillar. The ancients was a short Persian dagger, according to Curtius, Herodotus, lib. vii. Horace, Cam. lib. i. manageable by a woman's hand. Hence likewise some have concluded Holofernes to be a Persian, in which case we cannot determine, whether Judith had any instruments of death with her, as poison or dagger, &c.; for it may seem probable, as she went with a settled resolution to kill Holophernes, she was provided with both. To this may be added a sufficient answer, that she depended upon finding something for her purpose in the Assyrian general's tent, a magazine usually of largeness and fullness, and was not surprised to find an sword at least would be ready at hand to complete her vengeance; in like manner as David, when unarmed in comparison, he went forth to engage the champion of the Philistines, with the uncertain hope of a sword to cut off his head; or, like Jael, she might hope to dispatch him, perhaps, with a milt of the tent; and that, as Sarc'a, she might smile on his head, "when she had pierced it in his temples, with her husband's milt," v. 20. Ver. 7, 8. And approached to his head, and took hold of the hair of his head, and said, Strengthen me, O Lord God of Israel, that David may smite me this day seventy with his head, and she took hold of his head, and said, Strengthen me. The effects of wine had made Holophernes not only sleepy and drowsy, but even insensible; by his not waking or stirring during the whole action, he seems to have lost all sense, even that of feeling, which gave Judith time, who was not able to take off his head at one blow, to strike a second, and to complete what she had begun. One hardly hear or read an instance where such a rough and marvellous assault, passed seemingly unfit and unexpected. When Sisera was smote by Jael, the text says, "At her feet, he bowed, she fell, he lay down," which seem to import, that at the sight of her, he, who (idiot and mad upon his head, being only occasioned by fatigue and weariness), and showed some sign of life and motion, but being very much smitten, lay down, feigned death; so did Judith. She did not so much as blink an eye for the very manner of the expression makes a repetition of the blow he fell down dead. Holophernes' death was not quite so immediate, nor, from the nature of the part wounded could, the dire business be so quickly despatched; but during the whole bloody process of his decollation, no struggle appears, no groan is uttered; he lay as it were, in a continued coma, or rather asleep, as it really proved, the sleep of death. Herein they both agree, that they fell ingloriously by the hand of a woman, and by a like instance of treachery. When Polyphemus had been drunk, he was so deranged and fabrizted and in a deep sleep with the copious draughts of Ulysses' wine, that this wise, chief, to whom some god, says Homer, imparted courage for the design, took the advantage of his drowsiness and deserted him, put on his helmet, and by means of his secret passage by a secret entrance, and touched out his eye, which alone occasioned such an shock in him, as the same poet says—

Συμπέπηναι βίος γὰρ εἰς τὸν ποντό καὶ τὰ λαβεῖν ῥυγίς. (Odys. ix.)

It is observable, that Virgil, mentioning the same story of the Cyclops, adds, that the persons who were engaged in the design, first prayed to the gods to assist them in the attempt.

Num simul, exspecto deploris. In quoque sepsitis, Cervicum inde exspecti, non, innumerum hostis, Numina, tormentique vicinus, una ineunte circuito.

Pulvinis, vestigium temerariorum acutis. (Lib. iii.)

The history of Judith is so far similar, that she had her revenge likewise upon a monster of cruelty, and prayed God to strengthen her hand for the execution of her design. With the same exceeding and marvellous energy, she does not justify it from the command of God, Deut. xix. 6 and following verses. In pursuance of this law, Judith, or any other of her sex, would have had the courage and magnanimity, might lawfully, they maintain, endeavour to counterplot the designs of any, even with the death of the person, who, in a hostile manner, should come, not to receive any advantage from, but to deliver and preserve their religion, and compel them by force of arms to receive an idolatrous form of worship, which neither they nor their fathers knew.

Ver. 7. And, seeing that God his body down from the bed.] One, cannot well guess at the reason which induced Judith to tumble the dead body from the bed upon the ground, unless it was, perhaps, a frightful spectacle might strike the greater terror and consternation in those that saw it, to feel that the fright and depletion of spirit, communicated from one to another upon the occasion, might at length affect the Assyrian army in general for the loss of their chief, as it really did some time after, and occasion their sudden flight and a successful pursuit after them. And pulled down the covering from the pillows. The ancients are not in all their texts, that they covered their beds of very fine net-work, which, coming round the whole beds, shut them in in such a manner as to have the benefit of the air without the trouble of flies, which could find no entrance. There is not general assent on this point, but the head of Holophernes, called here καμεωνον, and by the Vulgate, conoeum; which was a sort of veil made in the form of a fine net-work, and was so made by the Egyptians as to keep the time kept out of the flies. The Egyptians used this kind of net-work all round their beds, to guard against the incontinence of certain flies or gnats, which are called καμεωνον. The passage states this in the Grecian version. The end of Judith, is a great number of these insects. They who translated the history of Judith into Greek, probably Alexander Jews, seem to speak after their country manner, when they say, an Καμεωνον κατα τον εγκοφλον, of Holophernes' bed after she had cut off his head.

Ver. 11. Then said Judith after to the watchmen at the gate, Open, open now the gate; God, even our God, is with us, to deliver us from the enemy. The Egyptians used the καμεωνον, or conoeum of Holophernes' bed after she had cut off his head.

Ver. 15. The Lord hath smitten him by the hand of a woman, and the Lord hath smitten him in the sight of the elders of the city, in the most eminent and important manner, to praise God for his mercy (ver. 14). One cannot but observe here the great humility of Judith; she does not ascribe to herself the merit of such an enterprise to herself solely, but attributes all the success of the action to God, who had wrought so great a miracle by means of her. Yet she had a heart full of devout and humble acknowledgement of St. Paul, "Yet not I, but the grace of God that was with me" (1 Cor. xv. 10). St. Ambrose, among other instances of the merit of this

But as it might seem very difficult, and almost impossible, that a single unloosened woman should keep her chastity against the tumult of an army of lawless barbarians, and even alone, under the covert of night, in the tent of so powerful a ravisher, she calls upon God to attest her spotless innocence; that God who had accompanied her in the way, and brought her back in triumph and safety. Whence it appears, that the Jews had a real, if not high idea of her who wrought this deliverance at this time. It seems, says Mессиатса of Port-Royal, commenting on this remarkable event, that women, if they are only men in heart and will, and not upon the point of delivering them up to the fury of the Assyrians, when Judith, urged by a secret impulse, and herein not unlike Moës, presents herself before his throne, and interposes between him and the people of Israel, to disarm his fury, and hinder the ruin of her nation. She interposes with him in their behalf, not by urging any merit of theirs, but by her watchings, fasting, and other religious austerities; by her continued prayer, holy confidence, and faith in God, and above all her profound humility, which rendered her a worthy advocate to apply, and prevail with God to take pity of the Israelite nation. She, in the power of God, beamed with such strong light, which induced Judith to engage in an enterprise so hazardous; Honestatis fuit, prohibere ne populus Dei profanaret se dedeceret, ne ritus patriis et sacramenta pro defensione patriae periculorum prœerint, et barbariae sibi sercaptam imperaret; ne oblivione dedemini solveretur. Oxias; and when he was come, and saw the head of Holofernes, he fell down on his face, and his spirit failed. The sight of the severed and bleeding head of him who had threatened his life, the surprise of an event so great and unexpected, and the mind thus divinely delivered from the cruel death which awaited him, if Bethulia had been taken, these meeting together, occasioned within him such a disorder and confusion of spirit, as quite to intersect him. The sight of Holofernes' head, however, could not, I apprehend, have occasioned more correction in the Hellenist, who often allegorize part of this history, from, considering, that Jesus Christ, the seed of the woman, has bruised the serpent's heel, that it might please God to continue in his extremities, and wrought for them so wonderful a salvation. The thoughts of their deliverance fill them with holy triumphs; as St. Paul, they are, as it were, in an ecstasy, caught up in the heavenlies, lie and say, whether they are in or out of the body. (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 10. And when Achior had seen all that the God of Israel had done, he believed in God greatly, and circumcised the flesh of his foreskin; and was joined unto the house of Israel unto this day, i.e. he became a Jew, and his descendants continued so; for being circumcised, according as the Law required, he was made like unto one of them, and was able to take a part in their public welfare, and was admitted to the privileges and prerogatives of his nation. (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 18. These slaves have dealt treacherously, i.e. Holofernes; they had grown insolent, and thrown off the idea that they were possessed of an especial mission and authority, which was to be a check upon the Jews. They were not content with holding up their head, when any one directly opposed them, but they actually killed, in cold blood, the enemy whom they thought had wronged them. It is not to be supposed that they were to be put to death for this crime, by the Jews, for the same reason that the Jews were not punished for the death of Holofernes, as he had been an enemy to them. They were to be punished by the Gentiles, who would have to bear the responsibility of having killed them. (Com. in loc.)

CHAP. XV.

Ver. 2. And fear and trembling fell upon them, so that there was no man that durst abide in the sight of his neighbour, but running out all together, they fled into the wilderness and the plain, and of the hill country. One can hardly look upon the fright which seized the Assyrians as merely natural; for allowing it possible, that an army may on the report of the desert or the wilderness of Zin, be reduced to such a state of surprise and consternation, and that it may be increased by the reflection on the manner of it, and especially by the discouraging sight of his head hung out to public view, yet, as there was no place there for fear, there was nothing to excite such fear. (Com. in loc.) they looked upon with the utmost contempt. It is therefore remarkable that they, in such a manner, trusted God; God cast upon them a supernatural panic, as he once confounded with a sudden fear the host of the Syrians (2 Kings viii. 9); and that to humble their pride and presumption, he disposed of them to the very opposite. This is the reason for they seem not to have deliberated what to do, or what course to take but, like sheep scattered and despairing, they flew to destruction.

Ver. 5. Now when the children of Israel heard it, they all fell upon them with one consent, and slew them unto Chaldb; &c. This overthrow of the Assyrian host may seem the more peculiar, and was without order, in different and unknown ways, and through an enemy's county, who having nothing to offer, lay in wait for their coming, and slew such as fell into their hands. The overthrow of the Assyrian host is said to have been a hundred thousand of the Midianites by so small a company as three hundred only: and the description in the book of Judges, xix. 21—25, of their flight, the pursuit, the disbelief of the good sengers throughout all mount Ephraim to intercept them, and their final overthrow in consequence of it, very much resembles the account here. Messengers of Port-Royal have a fine and pertinent reflection upon this defeat of the Syririans: "Let none presumptuously assure himself of success, on account of the number of his forces, when he considers that the proud Heathen, who had the vanity to think that all the good things of this world were in their own hands, had perished in the like manner. God but lost them before he had them, and that he would destroy all the Jews as one man, fell himself by the hands of a woman and his great and very numerous army. It would be a fine affair to see how many times such stories as these, about Jews whom he so cruelly threatened. Nor let the leastent at any time be discouraged, or fall into despair, at the sight of insurmountable enemy, for such an event may appear to be a part of God's providence to deliver some by deliverance which the weak hand of Judith, strengthened by the all-powerful one of God, procured for the children of her people." (Com. in loc.)

Judith. Then Jaacl the high priest, and the ancients of the children of Israel that dwelt in Jerusalem, came to behold the good things that God had showed to Israel. Our version has added an obscure word, which Zachariah, ver. 9, the has, νίκηφορεῖν ταῦτα δικαίωσιν. The Complut. Add, and some others have, τὴν Συρίαν ἔχατον ταῦτα δικαίωσιν. Grotius prefers the latter; and his exposition of the place is, that the ancients of Jerusalem, came to certify of the truth of the good news; but were they not before assured of this by messengers despatched thither on purpose, or by the men that told them what things were done in the camp of their enemies, ver. 5? Nor is the sense of the Geneva version, that which so loves the same reading, sufficiently clear: viz. that the ancient children of Israel (that dwelt in Jerusalem) came to consider the good things which God had shown to Israel. Such a meaning seems rather to be, and the passage would thereby be more intelligible, that the ancients of the people, or judges at Jerusalem (for the Sanhedrin, of which some explicable, partakes of the meaning here, in the number, the institution is generally thought to be after the return from the captivity), sent a solemn deputation of the principal persons in authority, to compliment Judith upon the success of an enterprise undertaken, to triumph over the conquerors, to translate the grateful sense which they had of the extraordinary service done to Israel, and to Jerusalem in particular, by destroying the common enemy, and putting the Assyrian army to flight; and their public acknowledgment of God's loving-kindness and mercy to their whole nation, and to improve withal the advantage gained by Judith, and settle upon a sure and lasting foundation the quiet and safety she had produced for them. And from the account in the last verse of this history, "that there was none that made Israel any more afraid in the days of Judith, nor a long time after," it appears that the whole nation were filled with joy, and that the whole populace were full of praise of God and his work, in the great victory to be the return from the captivity (Ver. 10). Blessed be thou of the Almighty Lord for ever more."

In like manner Deborah the prophetess called Jael "blessed among women," for the like fact committed on Sisera, Judg. v. 21.

Ver. 11. And the people spilled the camp the space of thirty days. The Syrins has only three days instead of thirty. The Syrians are generally said to have been in defence of this reading, that the camp of the Assyrians was doubtless very large, of great circuit and extent, detachments of it being differently distributed on the mountains, and mountains, which the Syrins, in the manner of experience of subsisting so great an army, and therefore must require no little time to go through and plunder it. The camp itself indeed might be plundered in less time than a month, but it may be supposed that the people continued for the whole thirty days to ravage, and constantly to find spoil where they could. If some time has been lost in the first that went out in quest of the spoil did it in a hurry and with precipitation. On such occasions, where variety of people, are people, are people, and what strikes them most, and they do what things which recollected, they may ever more exactness and care when the plenty is not so great and the hurry not so pressing. Or the meaning perhaps may be, that after the spoil was divided, and distribution was made of the whole spoil; it might take up the greater part of that time before all the plunder could be brought into Bethulia, to be faithfully and equally distributed among all the people, according to the law, and, of the law, mentioned Num. xxvi. 27. 1 Sam. xxvi. 22.

Ver. 12. And the people unto Judith Halofersen her text, and all his plate, and beds, and vessels, and all his staff. The Syrins has, Talmaculum et lectum ejus, jumenta, et universum instrumentum ejus. In dividing the spoils taken an enemy, the person who chiefly conducted the exepried has always a more particular and larger share. Some rich present was also set apart to the Lord, and consecrated in his temple (see xvi. 19). What remained was usually divided among the soldiers, as well those that guarded the camp as those that were actually in battle. Judas Maccabens gave a portion to the minims, the widows, and orphans; that is, taken from Neconor, and the residue was divided (2 Mace. viii. 20).

Ver. 13. And they put a garland of olive upon her, and gave also to the women that were with her. Oppen. The thyr-rus was a crown made of gold by the Emperor Vespasian, the mysteries and triumphs of Bacchus. It is probable the Jews borrowed this, as they did many other customs, from the heathens, and applied it to their feasts of tabernacles and other solemn processions, as they had done the palm branch, and the crown of thorns, and the broom; and the leaving of them to adorn and set off the pomp of their solemn processions, and as public ensigns of triumph. When Judas Maccabenus had cleansed the temple from the pollution which Antiocbus Epphanes brought into it, all the people to do him honour, and to express their own joy, carried branches or boughs in procession (1 Mace. x. 7), and "sang psalms unto the Lord, and gave them good success in cleaning the holy place.

Ver. 14. And they put a garland of olive upon her and her said that was with her. Crowns, and particularly those made of olive twigs, were very rare, especially in women. This is the only instance one meets with, says Cal-net, among the Hebrews; but nothing was more proper to grace Judith's triumph than such a crown. The olive was a tree in much esteem among the ancients, and its boughs used on certain festival occasions; it was also made by them an emblem of peace, and as such very pertinently applied to her, for she was delivered from the hands of her enemies, and preserved them from the cruel yoke, to escape the evils of war. Piny mentions the honour paid to it by the Romans. Olear honorem Romanus munificentia magni tribuit, turmas equitum lilibus Julius ex cia coranom, item minorum, atque in terram, quae, cum fuerant, annorum, incipien-dum, in Romanis, secundum statutum, quod in terram, in forces of them that were exalted with horse and man, who glorified the strength of horses and mobile spears, and did walk, and spear, and bow, and slings..." This uses very expression, "Thou art the Lord that breakest the battle, the Lord is thy name." And very properly does she here, when her prayer was for more peace and safety, say, "When she had repeated it, and expatiated, with great pleasure and thankful-ness upon his almighty power and mercy, showed to her amongst the camps, in the midst of the people, who thought him no less than a corner stone. So they exalted his almighty power and majesty of their God, sometimes describe him as going forth like a mighty man of war, armed with a new and strong shield, that fights against their enemies; some times as the God of the armies of Israel in particular, and sometimes as the Lord of hosts in general. The Vulgate furnishes us with a new and not improper sense of the remarkable description of the Lord's action, namely, as a warrior, and the inhabitants and their cattle might perish with thirst. Or the meaning may rather be, that through the great number of their forces, they had drained and exhausted all the toasts of the enemy, and, as it were, had carried them over as the rivers of besieged places. (2 Kings xix. 24). The like is mentioned of Xerxes' army, Junct. Sat. x. Herod. lib. vii. cap. 109. Ver. 6. The Almighty Lord hath dispossessed them by the hand of a woman. He who had defied the God of Israel, and had threatened to destroy his people as one man, ignorant and unpractised, with a few spears, and by the help of the women of Libanus and Hermonae, which are north of Judea: the way through Arabia Deserta, which was the direct and shortest way, was impassable for an army, as having neither shade nor water in the last stage of their travel. The army of Nebuchadnezzar, as the margin rightly understands it, were astonished at a calaminity so sudden, and a defeat so unexpected. The former lifted up their voices in songs and acclamation; and the latter condemed them with the words, "such is their fate," being surprised for their impotency and weakness. There is a sort of contrast here which heightens the sense, and makes it preferable either to that of the Syriac or Vulgate, which unfit the context by the word, and destroy the sense, thus: may be, that the Assyrian army covered all the valley. The Greek seems to imply, that they maliciously stopped up the channels of water, by impeding the course of the water, which the inhabitans and their cattle might perish with thirst. Or the meaning may rather be, that through the great number of their forces, they had drained and exhausted all the toasts of the enemy, and, as it were, had carried them over as the rivers of besieged places. (2 Kings xix. 24). The like is mentioned of Xerxes' array, Junct. Sat. x. Herod. lib. vii. cap. 109. Ver. 6. The Almighty Lord hath dispossessed them by the hand of a woman. CHAPTER XVI.

Bell. Jud. lib. ii. Antig. lib. xviii., that the Pharisees maintained the souls of the wicked were to be punished, aparte carpe et decretum in loco. They were pointed for them, spiega spes, a perpetual prison. Philo says, the punishment of the wicked is, ex delubris terra ait, to live for ever dying, and for ever dying, and for ever dying, as the culturists tell us, or shall have an end (De Præm. et Pæn.).

Instead of elhotophía, the common reading of the place, a learned writer would have, elhotophía de ἑδονία (see Thirlby, note on Ver. 18).

Ver. 18. As soon as the people were purified, they offered their burnt-offerings. See note on xi. 7. Philo's testimony, with respect to the antitypy of this rise of purification, is particularly to be entitled: "Let this person," says he, who is about to offer sacrifice, after he has washed and purified his hands, lay them upon the head of the victim and so sacrific it, and then take it to the priest, according to the custom, Ps. xxvi. 6, *"I will wash mine hands in innocenc, and so will I go to thine altar."

The priests were more particularly and strictly obliged to this purification, when they were to attend the public service, and minister about holy things, Exod. xxx. 20, see Gen. xxxv. 2, where we read that Jacob's servants, before they performed their devotions in Beth-el, washed themselves and changed their garments.

The meaning of this passage is, that the people offered sacrifice as soon as they were purified from the uncleanness which they had contracted from the slaughter of the Assyrian army, and taking their dead bodies, and carrying away their spoils.

Ver. 19. Dedicated all the stuff. unto the Lord. The reason of this was, to acknowledge God is the giver of all in addition to the daily or the particular. For this day is a day of thankfulness and gratitude after some signal success, and called, as Virgil expresses it, in praedam parremcum Jovem. So the Philistines hung up the arms of Saul in the temple of Ashdod, and carried the ark into the temple of Dagon. The sword of Goliath, slain by David, mentioned 1 Sam. xx. 2, to be wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod, is thought by learned men to be dedicated unto God. But Josephus understands it, ἐν τῇ ἱερατίᾳ ἀνωτέρω τῆς Γαα, and Succoth Sa-verus, Gladium postes in templum posuit. Thus Abraham gave to Melchisedec, the priest of the most high God, as a recompence for the victory he had obtained over the kings of Sodom, of the spoils (Heb. vii. 4). And the Jews sometimes offered all the spoils taken in war, 2 Sam. viii. 13, or the first fruits, 1 Sam. xv. 21, according to the rendering of the LXX., or the tenths, Heb. vii. 4, or long up in the forefront of the temple some more remarkable part of the spoils, as shields, &c. in token of victory, and as an instance of gratitude for it, 1 Macc. iv. 81 (see Spencer, De Leg. Heb. De Solut. Decim. Ver. 20. So the people continued feasting in Jerusalem before the sanctuary for the space of three months. Such a festival was held by the whole army of the Assyrians, and rescuing the Jews, not only from the danger of the present siege, but from such further attacks as might have affected the place, and being in the presence of the king, was true, and objects one might well expect that some public notice, some standing memorial, besides the temporary rejoicings here mentioned, should have been recorded for many months, according to all the versions but the Syriac, which mentions only one, should have been instituted of so auspicious an event. Public blessings of an inferior nature to this were wont to be commemorated by anniversary feasts, and that no such should be appointed in memory of this may seem scarce credible. From the foundation of the Jewish state, and the first giving of the law, scarce a year has happened to that people which was of greater consequence than this, if it had been truly such as is here represented, and yet we find no such annual triumph and festivities, though the occasion may seem to demand it. Some later editions, indeed, as particularly the Vulgate, conclude this book with the following verse, Dies autem victoriae hujus festivitatis, ad Hebrenus in numero sanctorum dieium acci-pit, and the Jews, ex illo tempore acquiescentes, duravit dieum. But as there is no mention of this in the Greek and other versions, nor any festival taken notice of by the Jews, as they were wont to celebrate the victory of their nation in old times, and have been judged a corrupt addition to the text. Heusius thinks this is not a sufficient reason, because in time, such a feast might be abbreviated and laid aside (Dem. Evag. prop. 4). And the same thing might be said of the interpolation of Hymen being an essential part of human institution, and therefore it might drop by disease or other accidents. In like manner, as the anniversary festival of Judas Maccabees' victory over Nicanor, which in Josephus time was celebrated with great rejoicing (Antio-

time after her death.) There is not a greater difficulty in all this history, than to account for so long and continued peace as is here supposed to have occurred after the death of this writer," says Dr. Prideaux (Connes. vol. i.), "peace must have lasted at least eighty years. For allowing Judith to have been forty-five years old at the time of her killing Holofernes (and in a case of so much blood, she must be supposed to have beauty enough to charm such a man), there must be sixty years after to the time of her death. But the expression, a long time after, in this text cannot imply less than twenty years, and so carries the computation still farther," Calmet endeavours to explain and settle the difficulty thus: "From the death of Holofernes, A.M. 3319, to that of Manasses, A.M. 3354, we read of no war or considerable disturbance either in Israel or Judah. Amon, who succeeded him, reigned but two years, he was slain in his own house, but no account of any war in his time. Josias lived in like manner in peace and quiet during the one-and-thirty years of his reign, to A.M. 3394." According to this reckoning there are forty-six years of continued peace. He supposes further, as the text says nothing certain of the age of Judith at the time of this assassination, that she might be sixty-three or sixty-five years old, when they call as we give universal and oriental history. In this case, and if this be allowed, he maintains, that from the raising of the siege of Bethulia to the death of Judith, and even some time longer, there was no war, or considerable disturbance in Israel, for the space of six-and-forty years. APPENDIX TO THE COMMENTARY ON JUDITH.

The time in which the history of Judith is to be placed, is a point the most contested and most difficult of all others to be settled, and is indeed that on which depends the solution of most of the other difficulties usually urged against this book. If one could once fix a certain epoch of the great event recorded in this history, the adversaries of it would have little to object against its truth and reality. The opinion most followed, and which is countenanced by the best chronologers is, that the date of this history ought to be placed before the last Babylonian captivity. But they are not generally agreed whether it should be placed in the reign of Josiah, or in that of Jeconiah. Our learned Usher fixes it particularly in the time of Manasses, or A. M. 3348 (Per. Jul. 4058, sive Christ. 656). And the same opinion is expressed and followed by the author of the index and tables to the quarto bible, supposed with good reason, to be the work of the truly great and eminent Bishop Lloyd. But even those that place it under Manasses are divided among themselves; some think the event happened while that prince was prisoner at Babylon; and that the history itself connotes this notion by its silence with regard to the prince that then reigned. Others suppose that since his return from thence, he ascribes his absence from public business, partly to prudential and political views, which hindered him from declaring himself openly against the king of Assyria, and particularly that he was detained which engaged his thoughts and pleased himself in retirement. The last reason Calmet thinks most probable; his system with regard to the date of this history, Judith's age at the time of Holofernes' death, and the long peace that ensued upon it, as having been more conformable to the opinion of this writer," says Dr. Prideaux (Connes. vol. i.), "peace must have lasted at least eighty years. For allowing Judith to have been forty-five years old at the time of her killing Holofernes (and in a case of so much blood, she must be supposed to have beauty enough to charm such a man), there must be sixty years after to the time of her death. But the expression, a long time after, in this text cannot imply less than twenty years, and so carries the computation still farther," Calmet endeavours to explain and settle the difficulty thus: "From the death of Holofernes, A.M. 3319, to that of Manasses, A.M. 3354, we read of no war or considerable disturbance either in Israel or Judah. * Montauscan, La Verité de l'Histoire de Judith.
Indeed perhaps will not be brought to con¬ tact, that the peace should be allowed to continue after the death of Josiah, in a reign when the Jews were tributary to the Babylonians; but as the paying tribute, though an in¬ itiated part of the profane, and profanation of a rever¬ ence, as the Jews whose war, in the days of Josiah, the Johoakim are to be included in the long term of peace here mentioned, and their national calamity to be dated from their final transmigration, when there was an end made, which speak in general terms, and refer for others un¬ mentioned to books than extant, but long since lost (see 1 Kings xiv. 19, 29, 2 Kings xvi. 19, 1 Chron. xxix. 29, 2 Chron. iii. 1). If Josephus had believed them, real, it is surprising that, we profess to confine himself to such things and facts as were recorded in their ancient books, i.e., the Hebrew scriptures containing a copious and full history of this people. In the circumstances of this history, however known to or believed by him, as not being wrote in that language, nor admitted into the sacred code: and should it be allowed, that he has occasioned in supposing Josephus, and his letters to the Jews, to have been written in a separate portion of the Bible, whatever the difficulty, in some measure indeed replied to in its place, founded on the words of Achior, v. 15, &c., who, speak¬ ing of the Jews, says, "The temple of their God was cast to the ground, and its holy vessels were carried away, and the history of Judah ought to be placed after the captivity, and that the meaning is, that the temple was entirely taken and destroyed; but the kingdom was prolonged even from the places of their captivity," point out their return from the captivity of Babylon. But before I proceed to the defence itself, it may be pertinent to premise, that Josephus, who speaks in this place, being a stranger, an emi¬ note, too much stress ought not to be laid on his account of Jewish affairs; for possibly he might not be well informed of what passed in Judea, or related to it, and might have heard that the number of Jews returned from their captivity was much greater than it really was, as a report often ex¬ aggerates matters, and deceives persons at a distance. But it may be rest in the following words, which have recourse, with Bellarmine, to any supposed corrup¬ tion of the text; for the Greek, εἰς ἁγίασμα ἁγίασθαι θεόν, might fairly admit of another meaning, viz., that it was at its being dedicated and consecrated, or the idols of the idolaters, who entered into it, and dealt with it as a common place; "Temple Dei iisorum habuit et ut proflam collum," says Jonas, very closely and explicitly, and some such general passage, as Temple det piis et profanis, is in pavement." For though εἰς ἁγίασμα καθαρισθην in Plutarch, and εἰς ἁγίασμα καθαρισθην in Thucydides and Josephus, might signify to make εἰς ἁγίασμα καθαρισθην signify solo aqua. And even though one should find εἰς ἁγίασμα καθαρισθην in the sense of solo aqua, yet this passage will not admit of it here. It is ma¬ ifest it signifies, not only to make the εἰς ἁγίασμα καθαρισθην added to the dedication of the temple, but of God's general conduct with respect to them, that so long as they were obedient, so long God filled them with blessings; but when they profaned his worship, he delivered them to their enemies to be slain, and carried captive; and even permitted his own temple to be profaned and desec¬ rated, and in that sense trampled under foot; as happened in the time of Rechabson, when it was spoiled and abused by Shishak, king of Egypt; in that of Amaziah, by the king of Israel, who was himself an idolater; in that of Ahaz, by the king of Assyria, who was profane, and in the time of Manasses; and probably by the Assyrians, when they made him prisoner. It is not then of the actual destruction of the temple, but of its profanation on different occasions, that Josephus refers, or rather supposes, that this passage appears to the sense, by considering v. 3, where it is said, "that the people were newly returned from captivity, and the temple was not profaned or polluted by the profanation." Can this possibly relate to the return from the last captivity of Babylon, when there was neither altar nor temple remaining to be purified? Or can it be expounded better than of the profanation of them by Manasses, of the captivity of him and his people, of his and their repentance, and their return in consequence of it; and of the purifying of the holy place and utensils through his care, to commis¬ sary for his former great wickedness (see 2 Chron. xxiv. 15, 16). Strange have been the whims which even learned men have fallen into with respect to this history. Luther will have it to be no more than an artistic trifle, and even Gros's labours, in a forced manner, to make it wholly enga¬ matical, by fancied derivations, or allusions to the Hebrew. By joining to the names Bethulah and Holonernes what let¬ ters he has, is it possible to know what name is meant? And if he makes words to signify just what he would have them. Bethulah, or as the Greek has it, Beothula, must be Beth-sha-er; though El, which is the name of God, is rarely, if ever found prefixed, except in the names of prophetic names of God in one word. Nor could he certainly know, how these proper names were wrote in Chaldee, the origi¬ ally and language used by the Jews, or how, it is uncertain, of which is classified a Persian name, Halpar-naha, i.e. "binding the serpent," is not this stressing words beyond all reason, or explaining away their true meaning? Or, finally, even be expounded in another meaning, if possible, and in a fable, as he supposes, such as he would have this to be, to raise the spirits of the Jews at this time, when there were so many well-attested histories of God's gracious interposition in behalf of his chosen, and by the hands of those famous worthies, whom the writer to the Hebrews so justly celebrates? The allegorizing this history in the manner he has done, and violently extorting a recondite meaning, supposed to be concealed under every place and person, seems rather the sport of fancy than the result of judgment. To conclude, I conceive this to be a real history, and one which is so circumstantial cannot be suspected or objected to, without subjecting other histories to the like caprice or fancy. There is certainly the useful moral contained in it, viz. that God is never wanting to his faithful: but this faithfulness has an infinite variety of means, to bring about his secret purposes, so he is able, and often chooses to do it, by the most feasible and unassuming.

THE BOOK OF BARUCH.

CHAP. I.

Ver. 1. And these are the words of the book. It begins abruptly, as if it was a part or continuation of some former work; but the connective particle et, or et, is often to be observed in the beginning of books, particularly the historical ones of the Hebrews (see Exod. x. 1. Lev. i. 1. Num. i. 1. Josh. 1. 1. and 1 Macc. i. 1. Iudith i. 1. in the Vulgate). By book we are to understand the letter (see ver. 14), which Baruch wrote from those that were carried into Babylon to such as remained in Judæa, and begins at ver. 10 (the first part is a sort of preface) and contains that confession which the Jews were to use in their public worship, under solemn days, during their captivity. It begins, i. 15, and is continued to iii. 8.

Which Baruch the son of Nerias, &c. It is certain that the true Baruch, whom this writer seems to personate, was of an illustrious family; but father and grandfather were of great note in their times, and distinguished in their country. His brother, Seraiah, was sent on an important commission to Nebuchadnezzar, to request him to send back the holy vessels which he had carried to Babylon, when Jerusalem was taken in the time of Jehoiachin. Josephus confirms the account of his being of a very eminent family, and that he was well skilled in the language of his country (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11), which two characters, says a learned writer, seem to imply, that Josephus had read the genealogy of Baruch prefixed to this book, and that it was written in the language of the country itself, used by the Hebrews. For (see vol. i.) Grotius, on the other hand, maintains, that it was not written in Hebrew (which St. Jerome urges as the reason of its not being received into the Jewish canon), but the work of some Hellenistic Jews, who, well skill'd in their language in composition the letter contained herein, framing it as it was written from those who were carried to Babylon, and addressed to those of the brethren who still continued at Jerusalem.

Wrote to Babylon. Probably, says Calmet, in the fourth year of the reign of Zedekiah, when he accompanied his brother to Babylon; and whilst the latter was soliciting the return of the holy vessels belonging to the temple, Baruch repeated to the captive Jews residing there the prophecies of Jeremiah concerning the fall of Babylon (ii. 66. 64), and the encouragements of their future restoration. Ver. 2. In the fifth year, and in the seventh day of the month, what time as the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire. This writer neither mentions what the month was, i.e. by what name it is called, nor figures it out, whence one should compute the fifth year. It seems probable, that it means the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity (see ver. 9). But to make, as it should seem, the account more clear and explicit, is added, what time as the Chaldeans took Jerusalem, and burnt it with fire, which is attended with two difficulties:—I. That the temple is represented here as burnt by the Chaldeans in the fifth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, which was not till the eleventh of Zedekiah; and, secondly, that after the burning of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans, there remained notwithstanding a high priest, and numbers of people with them at Jerusalem (ver. 7), that the altar was still standing, and sacrifices offered on it; that the solemn days continued to be kept, and particularly that Zedekiah then reigned, and had made vessels of silver, for the use of the temple, &c. circumstances so promising and favourable, as but ill comport with the unhappy times which followed the destruction of the city and temple, and the unparalleled misery described in some of the following chapters.

Ver. 3. Baruch did read the words of this book in the hearing of Jehonias the son of Josias king of Judah, and to the ears of all the people. This fact is said to be false; Jehonias being in captivity, and Baruch himself not then at Babylon, but in Egypt, as appears from Jer. xxxli. 6, and chap. xxxii., from which chapters it seems plain that both Jehonias and his scribe Baruch died among their brethren of the two tribes, who had carried them along with them into Egypt in the twenty-third of Nebuchadnezzar; and the neither nor the body of the remainder of the two tribes who were then in Egypt ever returned thence, or saw Babylon, as is asserted in this passage. This, says a learned writer, is a strong objection according to the present copies of the prophecy of Jeremiah, chap. xlv. But from the authority of Josephus (Antiq. lib. x. cap. 11), who had an interest and better copies, he contends, that not only Jehonias and Baruch might, but that the body of those Jews that were in Egypt probably did, return from thence, and were directly carried into Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar himself, according to that prophecy, as it stood in the Hebrew canon, and not in Josephus's copy, as it was in Josephus's account, he refers to 2 Esd. xi. 10, as a prophecy (probably of Jeremiah) of this very fact of the Jews' return from Egypt before Josiahs's Authentic. Record, vol. i. p. 77.

Ver. 4. All them that dwelt at Babylon by the river Sord. Ad flumen Sodi, Vulgate. Babylon is mentioned here as situate on the river Sud; but one does not read of any river named Sod in Babylonia, nor near the place, and no such river in the fables of pride, and so, mystically, may be expressive of the swelling of the mighty river Euphrates, whose course was impetuous and overbearing. The commentators either take no notice at all, or give no sufficient account, of this river, Bochart conjectures, that Sudi, or Sor, is a fault of the copy, and that it should be Sorli, or Sorli, because there is on the banks of the Euphrates, a city called Sor, or Sorli. His words are, Me autore legendum est vos, Sur, Nam ex Hebræorum monumentum desumptum est, in quibus erat Sur, sed fideliter interpretum simuliduo literis in frag rebus adventit, quare elicitur, quia Babyloniam notissimam, ad hanc jussu Euphratis acie. Of the reality of such a city he gives ample testimony, and observes it was called by another name, Mahassa; but that the river Euphrates and the city of Mahassan, or Mahasa, are the same. However, it is not improbable that it was so, and that the city either took its name from that part of the river, or the river from the city. Pedley mentions a branch of the river Euphrates, called Maguras, which Bochart supposes, and not without some probability, to be a corruption from Magara, or Menara, (as it was called by another name, Mahassas: but that the river Euphrates and the city of Mahassan, or Mahasa, are the same. However, it is not improbable that it was so, and that the city either took its name from that part of the river, or the river from the city. Pedley mentions a branch of the river Euphrates, called Maguras, which Bochart supposes, and not without some probability, to be a corruption from Menara, or Mena, (as it was called by another name, Mahassan); and this name was possibly taken from this river, as was purchased again, CHAPTER II.

and sent back to Jerusalem. The other, of immense worth, were kept by Nebuchadnezzar, as appears from Dan. iv. 22. Grotius contends this sentence an interpolation (Com. in loc.).

Ver. 10. "Prepare ye matters." Nebuchadnezzar. It is generally supposed that the word is not "matters," but "heap together," and that it is a substitute for the word "faithfulness," as in the translation of the Old Testament, which is followed by the writers of the New. θερμάς is equivalent to θερμάς, or θερμάς (cf. Ex. x. 15). The church of the Hebrews was, in the institution of the eucharist, θερμάς, would be as well rendered, "Offer this in remembrance of me." It is likewise so used by the Jewish Hellenistic writers, and by the Church of the church, as ecclesia is also among the Laarin.

And offer upon the altar of the Lord our God [2] the oxen and the sheep are here supposed to send money to the priests to purchase the necessary offerings for the altar of the Lord. But how is this consistent with what is mentioned, ver. 2, that Jerusalem was taken and burnt? If the temple was indeed at this time burnt, we must either understand this that they were to bring their oblations to the place where the altar formerly stood, which they esteemed as consecrated ground, or that an altar was actually erected or placed there. The former is the true wisdom of the ancient, who were satisfied that at Maspeh in particular; which place continued to be a threshing, or place of worship (see 1 Macc. iii. 46). There is the like expression, and upon a parallel occasion, Jer. xii. 5. [3]

Ver. 11. And pray for the life of Nebuchadnezzar. We meet with the like, Ezra vi. 10, where Darius orders all the priests to offer sacrifices of sweet savour unto the God of heaven, and pray for the life of the king and his sons. Diodorus Siculus has a passage to the same purpose, and lists among victims, "men who confess the sovereignty, sacerdoti adstantem, magnâ voce in consciētµ[?] corum porrigere coenatūr, at di sanatam cum eorum bonis omnibus regi largiatur (Lib. I.). And from Tertullian, we learn, that this attendance, or consecration of the people to their king, was a necessary part of his spiritual or temporal service, in his time, to pray for the happiness and prosperity of the princes under whom they lived (I Apolpg). When the Jews came under the government of the kings of Egypt, Eliezer, their high priest, writes to Ptolemy thus: "We continually offer sacrifice for thee, thy children, and friends; and the people pray for thy happy success in all things, and for the peaceable state of thy kingdom" (Jos. Ant. lib. xii.). And so they did, when they were under the Seleucid.

And, lastly, when they came under the Roman government, this was their constant practice, till they began the rebellion against their masters, and the insurrection (see Joseph. lib. ii.). This being, says the same author, the cause of the war, that the seditious did reject the sacrifice offered for Caesar, though the priests and nobles earnestly entreated them to embrace the Roman government, and oblige themselves among them. And that the Christians, following their example, thus prayed continually, from the beginning, for the safety of the emperor, and the prosperity of their country. From the writings of Polycarp, Justin, Tertullian, Cyprian, Lactantius, and other ancient writers.

And for the life of Bathsheba his son. As the scripture mentions Evil-Merodach as son of Nebuchadnezzar, 2 Kings xxxvi. 27, some have thought that by Belshazzar, Evil-Merodach is here to be understood, and that one and the same person is meant by both names. Others say, that Evil-Merodach was the eldest son of that monarch, and Belshazzar the youngest; and that the eldest being at that time in disgrace with his father, the younger was looked upon as pre-eminent, and the younger was taken notice of here. Others understand by son, his grandson Belshazzar, as grandfathers are frequently called fathers in scripture; see 2 Sam. i. 7. 2 Kings viii. 26, compared with ver. 18, 19. Others say, that Belshazzar was governor of Babylon, Nebuchadnezzar was in truth his grandfather, though called his father, Dan. v. 2, for Belshazzar was son of Evil-Mero- dach, who deposed his queen, and therefore grandson to Nebuchadnezzar.

Ver. 13. And we shall serve them many days. As the Jews had the greatest reason to consider Nebuchadnezzar and his successors, and the family of the Chaldees, as some of their most cruel enemies, since they had overturned their state, burnt their holy city and temple, and either killed or taken prisoners their kings, nobles, and priests, and the far greater part of their people; and they were, besides, so received, that they should wish or pray, as the words seem to imply, that they might serve them many days. The meaning therefore must be, that if, according to their melancholy prospect, they should continue to serve them many years, they might find favour in their sight, and their servitude in the land of their captivity might be the case of a grateful misfortune to be tolerated to them. Ver. 14. And ye shall read this book which we have sent unto you, to make conscience in the house of the Lord upon the feasts and solemn days. And ye shall say, [4] by the book of the prophet Daniel, that we have a solemn writing of considerable length is styled among the Hebrews, which Barach wrote in the name of that which our Lord Jesus Christ, had performed in the Jerusalem of Judæa. It begins properly at the fifteenth verse (for the five foregoing ones are a sort of preface), and it contains that prayer or confession which the Jews used in their public worship upon solemn days, during the captivity, and sometimes may be divided into three parts; in the first, which ends at iii. 8, they acknowledge their great unworthiness, and the justice of God's dealings with them; they entreat his forgiveness of their sins past, and repeat the warning and threats of the prophets, whose words and reproofs they had notwithstanding rejected. The second part, which begins at ver. 9 of the third chapter to the beginning of the fourth, accounts the great privileges and advantages which the Jews enjoyed above other nations, in that they had the knowledge of the law of the most High, and, through the direction of the only wise King of heaven, knew how to keep the happy, life, and peace. From thence to the end of the fifth chapter, is an exhortation to a sincere repentance, and to leave their evil ways, by a speedy conversion, with a full purpose of heart, and in the certainty, or confidence under which they groaned, that the power of their enemies should be subdued, and their haughtiness turned into mourning. This pleasing prospect takes up the remainder of the letter, in which the author has many beautiful turnings and lively strokes, and is transported even to a degree of rapture at the thoughts of the agreeable change. In particular, the absolute submission of the wise and the ignorant, the assurance and clearness, as to give occasion to some to suspect interpolations in several places, which are indeed too glaring and explicit for the darkness of those times; espe- cially, iii. 16. "He was, in the beginning, a god," a prophetical part of this prayer, that much of it is borrowed from that of Daniel, and that in the description of the glorious state of the church, there is frequent allusion to many passages in Isaiah.

CHAP. II.

Ver. 3. That a man should eat the flesh of his own son, and the flesh of his own daughter.] This is to be understood of the first siege of Jerusalem, by the Babylonians, thebes, and the commonalty of the Jews. The language is "This is the manner of the king of Babyl[on] to do unto his servants who are left in the land of Judah; "They that be slain with the sword are better than they that be slain with hunger; the hands of the pitiful women have sodden their own children; they were their meat in the days of their distress, the fury of the daughter of my people." Lam. iv. 10; see also ii. 20. The like unnatural cruelty happened at the siege of Jerusalem by Titus, when the distress by famine was so great, that the Jews had occasion to "eat the flesh of their aged fathers, and the flesh of their children, and their fat persons, and their best bread... venturing to set to the sole of her foot upon the ground for delicacy, her eye shall be evil towards the husband of her bosom, and towards her son, and towards her daughter. [5] The words here are, and the rest, as they stood in the original, are all translated in the margin: [5D] I it may be pertinently asked, with what propriety it can be here said, that the destruction of Jerusalem, and the captivity of the people of Israel, exhorted the Jews to believe in the God of heaven and the great Messiah, who should come to deliver a people of whom he had proclaimed himself the saviour and protector? To this it may be replied, that what these solitudes looked upon as an instance of God's weakness, was designed to be a display of his power, and mercy, as it was the remarkable fulfilling of what he had so many hundred years before threatened by his servant Moses, Deut. xxv. 47—49. If the Chaldeans led his own people into captivity, it was because God was become their enemy, and at that time the nation flourished, was depressed into a manner so deplorable, it was to punish the ingratitude of a people quite insensible of his mercies. So that the greatest calamities of which he was subject to the Jews, was an sign of his pleasure, as in those of his loving-kindness; and he was as truly the God of Israel, when he delivered them into the power of a nation of "a fierce countenance," ver. 50, to subdue all the territories threatened, as when he brought them out of Egypt, with a mighty hand and stretched-out arm.

Ver. 12. We are but a few left among the heathen, where thou hast caused us to be scattered among the nations; ver. viz. the Jews, who were tossed like vagabonds from one country to another, without any certain settlement, the horrid misfortunes which the Jews underwent were insensible. The Jewish writers in describing them, cannot find expressions strong enough to represent them; twice as many, they tell us, perished by the Romans' cruelty only, as came actually out of Egypt, and thereby completed that melancholy, Deut. xxvi. 62. If one considers the miseries with which the Jews were afflicted from the reign of Josiah only, they are scarce to be paralleled in any other kingdom, in so short a time. Pharaoh Necho gained a victory over Josiah, conquered Judea, and deposed king Jehoash, and set up another, and brought away great part of the people, with their king Jehoash, into Egypt; four years after, the king, doomed by God, was people's grief, and taken; and another long after, Jehoash was put to death, and many captives brought to Babylon. Jehoiachin reigned but three months and ten days, and was also brought to Babylon, with a great number of his people; and their captivity ended with the death of their sons, which was no less than the captivity of their fathers, and brought them to a dead end. As misfortunes, changes, captivities, so many princes murdered, or deposed.

Ver. 13. The house of our kings, and the lanes of our fathers, should be taken out of their places.] It was a custom, both among Jews and gentiles, to bury with the deceased some of their most valuable effects and ornaments, and even a considerable quantity of money and treasure. On this account, says a learned writer, Chaldai omm regum Judae, ac principum, nec non sacerdotum et prophetarum,

"sacra rite funeraria effodiendos," ad effodiendo materia, in which the accounts of such ancient authors as Josephus, and many others, who record the same facts, is spoken of by Calinet, on Roman Subter. p. 39.

Ver. 35. I will make an everlasting covenant with them... and I will no more drive my people of Israel out of the land] The Jews at Babylon, where this author wrote, did not imagine that theprophecies were to be fulfilled at the first return of the Jews from the Persian kings: they, by virtue of the ancient and eternal covenant which God had made with his people, and which no more out of the land, hoped for another more perfect and glorious restoration, as foretold by the prophets, which should be the deliverance of God himself, even salvation by their Messiah (see Bishop Chandler's Defence, &c. p. 58).

CHAP. III.

Ver. 4. Hear ye the prayers of the dead Israelites.] This passage has been applied by the Romans, to countenance their notion, that the saints departed intercede and pray for the living, and has been quoted by Bellarmine, particularly, for that purpose. But the place seems capable of a fair and orthodox interpretation, if we consider the following reasons: 1. By the "dead Israelites," we are not to understand, such of them who are departed from this world, but those souls are separated from their bodies, but those who, being yet alive, are dead in trespasses and sins, as St. Paul speaks, Eph. ii. 1. By "prayers," in the same verse, we understand, where it is said of Israel, "How happeneth it that thou art defiled with the dead? that thou art counted with them that go down the grave?" i.e. as one of them that are near the grave, or that are greatly afflicted and suffering. And the reason for this their suffering follows the questions immediately; viz. "That thou hast forsaken the fountain of wisdom, for if thou hast walked in the way of God thou shouldest not, for in the days of thy prosperity and comfort, have been in captivity." It is no uncommon expression to compare persons under a great calamity to dead men, and to account of them as such. See Ezek. xxvii., where the Lord compares the Jews to ships which have left their homes and lands, ver. 11, and their return from their dispersion, as the opening of their graves; and their restoration is described as a resuscitation, or bringing them to life. In like manner, it follows; "And of the prayers of the dead Israelites," it follows; "and of their children, which have sinned before thee;" where the Vulgate and our version seem faulty; the Greek renders it by the participle of the present tense, ἐπειραμένοις, which shows that the Jews were continually suffering such calamities, as not of those which had sinned and were dead, for then it should have been ἐπειραμένοις, in the preter tense. Junius renders here, Ezekaudi ortamen moratum Israelitiam, e. hanc propriae sua rei causa, fuisse, for the special necessity for the Israelites to intercede for their intercessors, which according to the Romans' sense they do, by beseeching God to hear the prayers of the departed Israelites, as in favour of those that are alive (3 Macc. xxv. 13, 14). Mr. Warton says the sense is here,—the prayers of those Israelites who were then alive, and interceded with thee, but are since dead; as by the Chaldeans, who by the hand of God had made them ruler over them.
CHAPTER III

(Dan. ii. 38.) Ezekiel represents the king of Assyria as a great cedar, "in which all the fowls of heaven made their nests, and under whose branches all the beasts of the field brought their young, and all the nations dwelt under his shadow." (Ver. 7.)

Ver. 18. For they that were wroth in silver, and were secure, and whose works are unsearchable," Or of the οὐδόκησαν, and αὐτοπροσώπων, ou de εὐδόκησαν, and ἀυτοπροσώπων, etc, in the singular. The Vulgate and Syriac version, etc: i.e. which indeed perplexes the sense, eludes and disappoints the reader, and, after promising him a reason, he finds nothing that it relates to, or relates nothing to it. It is therefore improbable that the true reading may be, εἰς τό οὐδόκησαν, τ.λ. which gives a natural and clear connection to what follows. "Εξελίσσεται, which Malbonton and some other expositors understand as an aorist participle, to be translated, 'it comes to pass;' in place: it seems rather to mean the number and delicacy of the works here spoken of. The sentence Ἰνα καταφέρειν ἐς τὸν τόπον κατακριθῆναι, etc, correspondingly to the close of the former verse, etc. Ἄνεια τε τῶν αὐτοπροσών, etc, as will appear by laying the two corresponding passages together, "Both they that humped up riches so extravagantly, that there was no end of their getting, and they that wrought so accurately in sculpture and engravings, that there is no finding out," i.e. no counting their number, no equaling the excellences of their curious works, are all of them vanished, and gone down to destruction. It may refer to the curious artists before mentioned, who took such pains to bring their work to perfection, and to make it valuable and lasting, that they are vanished and destroyed, as the description of their work, the better character, the more endearing than these worldly advantages and attainments, that neither the wealth of these men, which was without end, nor their art, which is now immemorial, could enable them to escape the destruction that came to the man who walked in the way of God (ver. 13) should dwell in peace for ever.

Ver. 19. Then were these vanished. This, according to Grotius and Dr. Hammond, refers to the transitory and unstable state of kings, as well as other men, who die and are as quickly succeeded by others. "Ναῷ τούτῳ, in the following verse, does not mean merely young men, but fresh successors, or new kings. It may refer to the curious artists before mentioned, who took such pains to bring their work to perfection, and to make it valuable and lasting, that they are vanished and destroyed, as the description of their work, the better character, the more endearing than these worldly advantages and attainments, that neither the wealth of these men, which was without end, nor their art, which is now immemorial, could enable them to escape the destruction that came to the man who walked in the way of God (ver. 13) should dwell in peace for ever.

Ver. 20. The Aparchies that teach wisdom. Callicrates is also called Aparchies. Strabo and Ptolemy call them Aegarii. Not only Arabia and the adjacent countries, but the eastern part of the world in general, was famous for the study of wisdom, or the very learned, as it is commonly understood, that put in their claim to this character, "Is wisdom no more in 'Temen?'" (ver. xix. 7.) In the book of Job, Eliphaz, one of the three friends, if not the author himself, speaks of the "Temen" as being the place of wisdom (ver. 1); and Job was descended from Teman, Esaus grandson. Under the burden of Arabia, Isa. xxii. 14, the inhabitants of the land of Tema are mentioned, which Teman is reckoned Moses among the children of Lamech, and it is generally agreed by all true Christians, there is reason to think that the first is in Arabia, as well as the second.

The authors of fables, i.e. Ingrigious apologists. The margin has "expounders," probably of/Futile, or ridicule. Or it may mean persons skilled in the interpretation of dreams, or oraculocritics; a piece of science, but falsely so called, in great request among the Egyptians, Arbatians, Persians, Indians, and other eastern nations (see Micalis Comment. Apoclypt. lib. p. 451. 1 Kings x. 1).

Ver. 24. How great is the house of God! How large and how many were the persons that were numbered of the number of his creatures! The whole earth is his kingdom, all men are his subjects, and all times under his cognizance! but there are but few who enter into his secrets and partake of his wisdom, who are his holy and chosen. In the next verse, "the house of God;" because, great as it is, yet the infinite being is present everywhere in it, and governs it with as much ease as a father or master does his family.

Ver. 26. There were the giants famous from the beginning. These great giants, like all others, were under the empire of the sovereign Monarch of the universe; but they were of a singular sort of wisdom, and under the gift of God, God chose before them Noah and his family before the flood, and after that time he preferred the Israelites to the Reaplah. And, indeed, throughout both Testaments, the God of Israel is declared to have chosen the meek and the humble of the earth to possess his kingdom, to prefer the meek and lowly to the mighty and more powerful. Ver. 28. They were destroyed because they had no wisdom. Or wanted the fear of the Lord. The fear of God is the principal wisdom, whence, through the whole book of Proverbs, the wicked man who neglects the fear of the Lord, is often threatened (see ver. 14.) with this, "the man that wandereth out of the way, understanding, shall remain in the congregation of the dead," or, in the assembly of the giants, as it may be rendered. The date of this prophecy, is either to take long journeys, or to go to sea in search of virtue, seeing we have the root of it within ourselves; or, as Moses expresses it, "in our mouth, and in our heart." See 130. He that prepared the earth for commerce, both filled it with four-footed beasts; The Vulgate reads with a conjunction, Qui preparavat terram in aere tempore, et repulvam carnem, et quadrupedibus. The sense is, after this manner it was filled with the different kind of animals which give the least occasion to rise and fall, man die, and others succeed in their place, the seasons change, and are in continual vicissitude; but the earth, the central commerce of all, was from the same. According to that observation of Solomon, "One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh, but the earth abideth for ever." (Eccles. i. 4.)

Ver. 31. He that sendeth forth light, and it goeth, calleth it again, and it obeyeth him with fear. He commands the sun to stop, and it stands still, as it happened under Joshua, x. 12. He commands it to be retrograde, and the shadow returneth ten degrees, as it happened to Moses (2 Kings xx. 9); he forbids it to shine at all, and darkness is over all the land, as at our Saviour's crucifixion (Matt. xxvii. 53; Luke xxiv. 29). The work of God in the generation is equally sublime, and very much resembles Exod. xiii. 10. Ps. cxlvii. 4. Εφελαται ποτε παναγίαν αἰωνίων, is inaccurately rendered in the next verse following. 'They showed light unto him that made them;' it should rather be, 'they shined,' not for his use, but 'by his order and appointment, that made them.'

Ver. 36, 37. He hath found out the way of knowledge, and hath laid up the word of knowledge. He was the Word of God, beloved. Afterward did he show himself upon earth, and conversed with men. The author shows that the Jews were the repository of the knowledge of God, and that the knowledge even of Gentiles was unknown to idolatrous nations, he that founded the earth by wisdom had made known to his people by his prophecies (see Exclus. xxiv. 8); and intending to extort them to stick fast to God, he brought them into his city, (Jer. vii. 1.) and brought them into the captivity, as the prophets Isaiah and Jeremiah had warned them before, he puts them in mind, that it was none but God that could discover that way of wisdom which the law taught Israel; which wisdom, says he, was "afterward seen upon earth, and conversed among men," viz. in and by the prophets, who spoke by the word and wisdom of God. The expression in the thirty-seventh verse, it must be owned, is very like that of St. John, i. 14, that 'the Word was made flesh, and dwelt amongst us;' and is thought to be so close a resemblance of it, that some learned men have, as is well known, taken it to have been written by some Christian copyist. A learned writer, who contends for the canonicalness of this book, thinks that this clause, too much favouring the divinity and incarnation of the Messiah, induced the author to alter it, and to put in the verse, "the house of God;" because, great as it is, yet the infinite being is present everywhere in it, and governs it with as much ease as a father or master does his family. The author, however this be, it may be thought, with reason, that he meant the latter days, or the days of the Messiah (see Dan. ii. 29, 45); the time that all Israel shall be saved by the Deliverer's coming to Sion, and his manifesting the Jews to be the elect people, and of his manifestation to Gentiles, who think that the applying this passage to the incarnation and appearance of the Messiah, would hold out too light for the times of this writer, refer it either to that occurrence of his being present among men, to that period before Sion, Moses and Aaron, and the seventy elders, were permitted to see the God of Israel (Exod. xxiv. 9), and Moses himself to come up into the mount to him; or to the angel of covenant appearing amongst, and conducting his people in the wilderness forty years (Exodus, in loc.).

CHAPTER IV.

Ver. 1. This is the book of the commandments of God, and the law that endureth for ever: As the gospel comprises the law and the prophets in two commandments; viz., the love of God and of our neighbour; or, more briefly, in characters briefly, in words, is contained in the former, and the rest is described in the latter. The former, contained in the law, comprises the commandments, and of the law, here said to endure for ever; not will, in its character, as the moral and spiritual part, which is fixed and unchangeable. Wisdom therefore here described seems to be no other in effect than charity, so highly extolled, 1 Cor. xiii. 8, whose character it is, "never to fail, when every tongue shall cease, and knowledge itself shall vanish away."

Ver. 3. Give not thine honour to another, nor the things that are profane unto thee to a strange nation: It was the glory of the Israelites to know the only true God, to love, and serve him, who had chosen them above all other nations to be a holy people, consecrated to his service; this character distinguished his peculiar people from heathen and idolatrous nations. And in the Gospel, the character of God is that he makes and manages all things, and abandoning themselves to the idolatry of the strange nations, they gave the honour due to the living God only to images, as if they were the true God; and instead of children of God, a name and privilege which they enjoyed before, became slaves, and were rejected by him. And this God threatened to do by Moses, Deut. xxxii. 21, "wherefore will ye afraid of a wood, which is not God, and provoke him to anger with your vanities."

Ver. 5. My people, the memorial of Israel: i.e. Ye poor remains of the Jews, the surviving hopes of sinking Israel, who may preserve to continue the same and memory of once so famous a people, the only remaining monument of distressed Zion. Ver. 6. I reproved him that made you by sacrificing to devils. The psalmist, according to the version of the LXX., says, ἐπὶ πτερόν τοῦ θεου ἐπετυχον ἡμεῖς, "that all the gods of the heathen are devils" (Ps. xvi. 3). And of the Jews he had said, "Ye know the testimony, and are children of God, and not to God; but to evil, wasting, and destroying spirits. And so they styled, 2 Chron. xi. 15, Rev. ix. 20. The pulling down idolatrous worship, is, in our Swaven. Psalms, the "casing out of the pride of this world" (John xiii. 31-xxi. 11). The converting of the gentiles from idolatry to the worship of the true God, is called, "turning from the power of Satan unto God" (Acts xxviii. 28). Thus foreboding these things, the apostle of the Gentiles, of darkness (Col. i. 13), "who before walked according to the prince of the power of darkness" (Ephes. ii. 2), and were walking, Ephes. v. 8, in the lusts of their own heart, and mind (Rom. vi. 19). Ver. 12. Let no man rejoice over me, a widow, ... who for the sins of my children am left desolate: This prosopopeia of Sohn, bewailing her children gone into captivity, is expressive of the parent's grief, the assurance of the disconsolate widow, an idea often borrowed to represent deep distress, bemoaning the loss of the favourite of her bosom, with these two said but common aggravations of her sorrow, her children taking evil courses, and as such exasperately punished, stricken of God, and afflicted; and herself, instead of that compassion which her calamities called for from those around her, neglected, insulted, reproached, and injured. The venting her grief in broken accents (ver. 17), "But what can I help you?" is inimitably, says Grotius, affecting; "I am alone, not only of my former sub- stance, but of my former condition and convenience, and reduced to the lowest state, and wanting myself the necessaries of life, what am I able, what can I be expected to do for you?" At length, all appearance of human help being vanished, she raises motives of consolation from that never-failing treasury of delight and comfort to afflicted minds, the word of God; whose statutes had been her song in the house of her pilgrimage; and by his word, Psalms xxxvi. 7, 9, 10, the text, let your soul attend upon the words of his mouth, and meditate upon all his commandments. "Two things are therein, the captivity, and remarkable vengeance overtaking their persecutors. In this pleasing prospect she exults and triumphs, says a land mother overjoyed for the recovery of her children.

Ver. 15. Probably this refers to Deut. xxvii. 49, 50. and may be considered as a fulfilment of that prophecy, "The Lord shall save him out of all his afflictions;" or, what may properly be taken from the end of the earth, as swift as the eagle flieth, a nation whose tongue shall not be stilled. A nation of fierce countenance, which will not regard the person of the old, nor show favour to the young." This, if applied to the Chaldeans, the describ'd country and place will not suit, nor even the fact did not come from a country which was very far from Judah. It to the Romans, the time will not suit with the supposed purpose of this writer, Josephus, indeed, informs us, that upon the Rajasthan making them prisoners of war, they slaughtered all, both old and young indifferent, without any respect to age, having neither mercy nor modesty.

Ver. 16. And left her that was alone, desolate without daughters. The Geneva version I think clearer, "Leaving me alone, and destitute of my daughters; i.e. both sons and daughters." Ver. 20. I have put off the clothing of peace, and put upon me the sacheloth of my prayers: I will cry unto the Everlasting in my days: i.e. I have put off the garment of prosperity, as the margin has it, or do not wear, or take off the sackcloth of penance and supplication, Indul cium deprecatio mea, Arabic. And Janins renders in the same manner: or, as the Syriac has it, "Clothed me with sackcloth in the solemn time of my prayer and supplication." The last clause suggests a reason, "I will live and call upon the Everlasting. This sense is strongly confirmed by Ps. cxvii. 7, where the expression in the LXX., very much resembles the present, and says, οὐλοφέαντες· οἱ λόγοι διδασκάλου, the learned render rightly, "I will call upon him as long as I live." Ver. 22. Because of the mercy which shall soon come unto you from the Everlasting our Saviour: The like is repeated ver. 24, 25, but how can this mercy be properly said to come soon, as the captivity was to last seventy years? This, says Messrs. of Port-Royal, may be admitted, if considered either with respect to God, who inflicted this punishment, in whose sight a thousand years are but as a day; or with respect to the suffering Jews themselves, those three hundred years being considered as their captivity, and the end of their days, and their receiving another and greater punishment; "for a soul which is truly convinced of, and sensibly affected with the eternity of punishment due to its transgressions, counts not years, or months, but as a moment, the time of penance and suffering which God is mercifully pleased to inflict in this life" (ver. 22, 24). This writer, says Bishop Chandler, personages Barach, and his book is little else than an epitome of what we have at large in the prophets, concerning a more universal return than that was of the Jews under Cyrus, and in virtue of God's covenants, and his power and the greatness of his name, to this land. The Jews at Babylon, when this Barach wrote, did not conceive that the prophecies were exhausted in the first return of the Jews under the Assyrian kings; they hoped for a greater return of the Jews, and a greater manifestation to the Gentiles, and the dispersion of the countries of Judah, and the remnant of Israel. And this return, and the deliverance of God himself, as the Jews were wont still to call the salvation of the Messiah. In confidence of this so eminent a deliverance, he breaks forth with admiration of this "Emmanuel," or "God with us" (Deut. of Christ. p. 55).

Ver. 25. Shortly thou shalt see his destruction, and shalt tremble upon his neck. This, says Calmet, was literally fulfilled in the time of queen Esther and Mordecan, at Susa; and under Daniel, at Babylon; for they were excited to the height of detestation against the king, his governors, and his subjects, a conduct in a great part of the Jewish nation, and the government, the Chaldeans themselves were obliged to submit to their authority, and bow before them, as Isaiah had long before expressly foretold (lx. 14).

Ver. 28. For as it was your mind to go out from God; so being returned, seek him ten times more. It is not enough, says a pious writer, morally to revoke what is past, by living as if it had not been done; nay, choose a state to a habit to a habit; i.e. as sin before gave you law, so now must the Spirit of God. Habitual sin must be destroyed by a contrary habit, or state of holiness, and if we have become workers of ill, as apostles, "As ye have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity; even so now yield your members servants to righteousness unto holiness" (Rom. vi. 19). the Jews were more observant of the law of God than they were before, especially with respect to idolatry. But it will be best, if this reading is followed, to understand this of those devout Jews in particular who were converted by the preaching of our apostles, and who were the first-fruit of the Christian church.

Ver. 35. And she shall be inhabited of devils.] This expression is grounded on a vulgar notion, that devils do and forever inhabit evil spirits, and leave their haunts there. The canonical scriptures seem to countenance this opinion: thus the demoniac (Luke viii. 29) is said to abide in no house, but to be driven of the devil into the wilderness, and thither was our Saviour led, as being the devil's residence, to be tempted by him (Matt. iv. 1). And accordingly our Saviour, in the parable of the unclean spirit, illustrates this idea thus: 'When the unclean spirit is gone out of a man, he goeth through dry places, seeking rest, and findeth none. Then he saith, I will return unto my house whence I came out of this man; and when he is come, he findeth it not.' (Matt. xii. 43, see also Tobit viii. 3.)

Ver. 36. Look about thee toward the east.] This, no doubt, primarily relates to the restoration of the Jews under Cyrus, and the return from their long captivity by his appointment, or rather God's influencing his heart for that purpose; and though Babylon, properly speaking, was rather to the north with respect to Jerusalem, yet Persia, where Cyrus reigned, and from whence the orders were to come, was to the east. That 'אברוח here is the title of the Messiah likewise, there is no question, whether it be 'אברוח or 'אברוח; and being on the 'east' was bestowed upon him (Zech. vii. 12), or the rising of the sun, that Sun of righteousness mentioned Mal. iv. 2. However the case may be of the rising sun, or that 'east,' which is used in most places of scripture, the commentators and scholars have still applied it to Christ, meaning, by the 'east,' that orient or rising sun, and not the point from where the sun rises. And so it is more probable, because, ver. 22, he is called 'the Everlasting, our Saviour.'

CHAP. V.

Ver. 3. της ἐνθέσεως ὅπως ἔλαβεν. ὁ ψαλμι. The like ellipsis occurs Job xviii. 4. Luke xvii. 24, in LXX. Prov. viii. 29; 2 Mac. ii. 15, in Addit. Esth. xiii. 10. As from these places, and from several others, we find the people, or some of them, were left after, and were left away of their enemies; but God brought them unto that crafted with glory, as children of the kingdom, &c. As a royal race, or children of kings, rising in triumph, and in a most magnificent procession. Ξρισεῖς gives us the number and quality of the persons that returned, their horses, mules, camels, &c., employed on the occasion (ii. 66). And it appears, from 1 Esd. v. 2, that Durus himself sent a thou- sand horsemen to conduct them back safely to Jerusalem, with musical instruments. Isaiah describes their return from Babylon in the most pithy manner, and in terms so memorable, that the most celebrated authors of antiquity, Hecataeus, Timaeus, Herodotus, &c., 'Their transport of mirth and jollity on this occasion,' says Josephus, 'was as great, as if the day of their redemption and return had been the first day of a new life.' (Antiq. xvi. eng.)

Ver. 7. For God hath appointed that every high hill.] By ἄγας and ἄρειος, we are here to understand those who are lofty, proud, and supercilious, who exalt themselves from a conceit of worldly wisdom: the meek, on the contrary, are represented as proportion and humble, casting aside every high thought, and adoring, with holy reverence, mysteries that are above them. This refers to a known custom of great kings, who, when they travelled, had their οἰκοστάσις, or διαδραμένα, sent before them to make the way plain and commodious, by filling up deep places, and levelling those that were high, and smoothing those that were rough. And so Josephus says, that when Titus came to the war, there went before him all the royal aids, and all the king's body-guard, who played, &c. (Iead Jud. vi. cap. 6, 12) for the coming of the Roman army. The words here seem to refer to Isa. x. 4, where the prophet describes the return of the people from their captivity, as a thing of joy, and says, they brought that at last very happy Canaan.' Thus the Targum on Canticles speaks, the cloud went before the Israelites in the wilderness three days' journey, to take down their hills, and fill up their valleys, and to level the high places, and to correct this expression, of casting down every high hill, means also, the removing of all obstacles to one's happiness or destiny. This is more particularly evident in the verses of Sibyl. Erythraea, set down by St. Austin. De Civit. Dei, lib. viii., where, settling the coning of the King from heaven in the flesh, it follows: Dejiciet colles, vales estote ab hac, Non erit in rebus hominum sublimitate, vel albitum: Equestri campos montes.

Which is almost the same with the passage cited from Isaiah. Compare also Luke iii. 5. The same metaphor is used by Homer, I. O. ver. 269, where Apollo, promising to save Sisyphus and his companions, says: Αἰέρη τρέχει τραγουδών, εἰπόντα ἐλθέτων. "Now let us go." I will go before and make smooth all passages.

Ver. 8. Every sweet-smelling tree shall overshadow Israel.] I.e. God will furnish his people with all sorts of accommodating shadow and refreshing comforts. Thus the whole valley of Eden should not be incommoded with heat, a calamity very inci- dent to travellers in hot countries; God would plant woods, as it were on purpose to shelter his chosen, in their return, from the ascorching heat of the sun. This undoubtedly refers to Isa. xli. 19, where God says, 'I will plant in the wilderness the cedar, the shittah-tree, the myrtle, and the olive-tree.' K.e., conducting the people home almost in the same marvellous manner as he did his chosen in the wilderness, by the shadow of a cloud to defend them from the heat. Or, without having recourse to a miracle, this might be understood of the smoke arising from their numerous fires, which, in the later part of the season, when the trees afforded most shade; or that they marched through such places where there was a natural cover over them. Others think, and not without reason, that after the captivity, and in the period of their return, there was an exaggerating manner, the easiness and pleasure with which the Jews would return from Babylon. Our translators have followed the Authorized Version, of which John Gill says: "The Hebrew word בְּּרָעָה, subalternant; and thus Junius render, expressis, 'unique eiusmiente,' that all the trees of the wood re-joined on the occasion, like that of the psalmist, xlv. 12.'

CHAP. VI.

Ver. 3. Seven generations.] The word γενεά, or generation, has many senses. Sometimes it signifies twenty, or thirty years; the life of an age; but more generally, it signifies that period of time which is passed in one's life, from birth to death; and in this sense it is used by approved authors, and particularly in the genealogy recorded by S. Matthew. By this here is meant the seven, or rather seven decades of years; but this accretion is not very common: but as it was very well known to have been predicted by the prophets, that the captivity should last seventy, that is seven ten years, it cannot be doubted but that this author had that term in view here, and meant the precise period of ten years. The seventy years of the captivity of Babylon are usually reckoned from the first year of Nebuchadnezzer, the Great, and that is the year 3796, according to the Hebrew chronology, i.e. A.M. 3398, and ended 3368; or before Christ 606, and ended 536 before his appearance; at which time Cyrus gave leave to all the returning Jews, to bring their possessions to Jerusalem. This epistle, said to be Jeremiah's, is supposed to be wrote to the Jews when they were going into captivity with their king, to admonish them to beware of the idolatry which they would see in Babylon; and seems to be the letter referred to, 2 Mac. ii. 3, where the same caution is given as here, to guard against the idolatry they would observe in that place, and is an epistle of sundry other things in Moses, the Psalms, and the prophets, against idolatry, and the most efficacious against it, in one con- tinued tract or view, of any through the whole-volume of the Bible, good and handled in the most proper manner; and the banter and ridicule are often found more effectual to ex- pose and confute an error, than grave and serious reasoning.

Ver. 4. Gods of silver, and of gold, and of wood, borne upon shoulders.] Isaiah takes notice of and condemns this custom, 'He maketh it a god they fall down, yea, they worship. They bear him upon their shoulders, and set him in his place, and he standeth; from his place he shall not remove' (xvi. 6, 7). Jeremiah likewise mentions this idolatry, and their carrying images in great procession; and says, 'They make him to be borne,' says he, 'because they cannot go' (x. 5). And to this sense, Spencer and other learned interpreters explain those words of Amos, 'Ye have borne the tabernacle of Moloch and the chainer thereof' (chap. ii. 2); in which the phrase דַּעַל תַּבָּרָן, sueeul tabernacul. Numerous instances of this superstitious use among the heathen, are to be met with in sacred and profane writers. See ver. 20.

they designed to create fear by the manner in which they framed and represented the statues and images of their gods: hence altars, clubs, and thunderbolts, were appendages to their idols. The Lord, who was above the spirit, or understanding, in contradiction to senseless images, which take no notice of their votaries." And so St. Cyril in these passages, In sinnati debet adscripta, etc., seems to cook the idolatry of the Greeks: he reads without any comm. at all, probably intending this sense; but for clearness I would place it thus, "anno b. ni, l'omene or si, compass." The psalmist, in like manner, notes whereof he has been exposed to both his sufferings, and like the conclusion upon the Israelites, and exciteth them to glorify the God of the world, with the greater devotion (Psalm xxxv. 17—20).

Ver. 7. For mine angel is with you, and I myself care for your souls: i.e. Mine angel shall protect you, which these idols cannot. Our version and the Vulgate seem faulty in the rendering of the inner clause; in the Greek it is, αυτες τοις γεφυροι την ζωον δουλοι, which I would translate, "And he (the angel) will watch over you, and revenge my injury done to you." The Geneva version understands, in like manner, of the angel, "For mine angel shall be with you, and shall care for your souls." Junius is more explicit to the same purpose, Angelus mens vocibus est, "The angel is but a name." The Latin version, and the oriental versions also have it.

Ver. 8. As for their tongues, it is polished by the workmen, and adorned with crowns, and gilded, and so entered into their temples, and do not signify, "And though their faces are gilded with gold; yet are they but false, and cannot speak." The mimie representations of life are all deceit; they are mere insensible images of things, having mouths, and a tongue beautiful, but and which utter not those things which are necessary. They are of no more value than that of the rich materials of which they are made, and so the godly say or do, if they have not of themselves the handy work of those that worship them; every excellence that they have been derived from the ingenuity of the artificer, and shows rather his art than their divinity. But the sense I conceive, would be more perfect, if the pointing was thus, viz., "As for the tongues, which they love to paint gold, and adorn themselves, and when they are caught, come to them, that your dress, so for gold, and thus to make crowns for the heads of their gods." CHAPTER VI.

Ver. 27. If they fall to the ground at any time, they cannot rise up again of themselves:—This was the case of Dagon, who fell upon his face to the earth before the ark of the Lord, and was not altered, and fell upon his face again after he was once erect by the hands of his worshippers. They fell by their own fault — they fell by their own sin — they fell by iniquity, and were not of themselves straight again, but must continue in that posture and direction, in which accidant or design has placed them. The author of the book of Judges has been no less hard upon the Israelites, who, by their affronts and abuse of power, have been from the beginning of the world exposed to weakness and impotence of idols:—“When the workman,” says he, speaking of this particular defect, “had formed it by the skill of his hands, and it was not able, he set it at a looking out for a convenient room for it, set it in a wall, and made it fast with iron; for he provided for it that it might not fall, knowing that it was unable to help itself, as being an image that had need of help.” (ch. xiii. 19, 20).

Set gifts before them, as unto dead men:—In scripture, likewise, we are compared to dead things, to nothing, and vanity. The sense here is, that they are served with victualls, which are set before them in form, without their being able to avail themselves of them, to touch or use them, or to receive and feast on the viands and offerings which are brought them. They are like to those dead things which are placed before them, being so senseless and insensible things? And their votaries themselves must be equally so, that they think that they had such a power, or ever could make use of it; and yet we find, by this, that there was in them a great quantity of superstition. And the Chaldeans was such, that they thought that idol ate in reality the great store of provisions set before it. By “gifts placed before dead men,” the writer alludes to the parental or paternal customs, or rather usages, which are in vogue in the eastern or other countries, and particularly among some idolaters, whose notion was, that the souls of the dead, who are buried within their sepulchres, and want a proper sustenance; and that it was a pious office to place bread and wine over their graves, for their support and refreshment (see note on Ecles. xxx. 18).

Ver. 28. They are net cast unto them, their priests sell and abuse:—Instead of exercising acts of hospitality and charity to poor and helpless persons, widows, and orphans, and bestowing upon them the remains of the sacrifices, they make a trade of holy viands, or convert them to bad and evil uses. It is certain the ancient idolaters were wont to save some part of their sacrifices for magical and superstitious purposes. Herodotus testifies the same concerning the ancient Persians (ib. cap. 133). And therefore, God orders in the paschal sacrifice, that nothing of it should remain until the morning, lest it should be profaned, or sold for an unclean use.

Ver. 29. Women in childhood, &c., eat their sacrifices:—by these things ye may know that they are no gods:—It appears from their many false rites, and the shameless abuse of their sacrifices, that they are not such gods as they pretend to. And they neither would their priests dare to take such liberties in holy things, nor unclean and impure persons be permitted to appropriate them, unless they were not of a true sacrifice, nor in the service of the true God: For, according to the Levitical law, such persons were not to enter into the sanctuary, nor touch any hallowed things, but to continue in a state of separation for a certain time, as being defiled by their infirmity (Lev. xix. 4).

Ver. 30. For how can they be called gods? because women set meat before the gods of silver:—The sense is more determinate and clear in the Geneva version, “For whence cometh it then that they are called gods? because the women bring gifts to them;” i.e. their silly and superstitious notions refer to the like of human honours and regard to their idols, as if they were really gods.

Ver. 31. The priests sit in their temples, having their clothes rent, and their heads and hands shaven, and neither wash their bodies;—the same thing is said of several nations, particularly those of Issass and Scrupis, had their heads shaved and uncovered, in the manner here described. It was a standing order at Memphis—“Ud Izida sa saaciree mondes, sonuha saacine, sonuha saacina, dias, sonuha saacina.” (see Alex. ab. Alex. lib. vi. Jeuen. Sat. vi.) It is observable, that the rites here mentioned were funeral ceremonies, and that the priests referred to are those of the cohan, the world being most addicted to these heathen deities, who were no better than dead men. In the service of the true God, the Jewish priests were forbid to render their clothes, and shave their heads, thereby to disfigure themselves, or to shew their abhorrence of them to angers from the heathen priests (see Lev. xvi. 5-10). Calmet thinks the writer here refers to the lamentations of Adonis, customary not only in Egypt, Phæacia, and Syria, but also in Babylonia, and the provinces beyond the Euphrates.

Ver. 32. They roar and cry before their gods, as men do at the feast when one is dead:—This refers to a rite or custom among the Jews at their funerals, by the LXX. called ἡ προφυλακτικὴ στήλη, or the funeral-feast. For the Jews had no customs of mourning or interments, or touching themselves straight again, but must continue in that posture and direction, in which accidant or design has placed them. The author of the book of Judges has been no less hard upon the Israelites, who, by their affronts and abuse of power, have been from the beginning of the world exposed to weakness and impotence of idols:—“When the workman,” says he, speaking of this particular defect, “had formed it by the skill of his hands, and it was not able, he set it at a looking out for a convenient room for it, set it in a wall, and made it fast with iron; for he provided for it that it might not fall, knowing that it was unable to help itself, as being an image that had need of help.” (ch. xiii. 19, 20).

And their votaries themselves must be equally so, that they think that they had such a power, or ever could make use of it; and yet we find, by this, that there was in them a great quantity of superstition. And the Chaldeans was such, that they thought that idol ate in reality the great store of provisions set before it. By “gifts placed before dead men,” the writer alludes to the parental or paternal customs, or rather usages, which are in vogue in the eastern or other countries, and particularly among some idolaters, whose notion was, that the souls of the dead, who are buried within their sepulchres, and want a proper sustenance; and that it was a pious office to place bread and wine over their graves, for their support and refreshment (see note on Ecles. xxx. 18).

Ver. 33. If they see one dumb that cannot speak, they bring him, and entertain Bel that he may speak, as though he were able to understand:—Bel was the prince of the gods of the Babylonians (ib. xvi. 1); the same with Baal, as Senec. On this account, and some abuses attending these funeral entertainments, this custom was at length abolished. By their lamentations and cries before their gods, Calmet thinks those for Adonis probably are meant.

Ver. 40. When even the Chaldeans themselves dishonour them? They inwardly laugh at them, persuaded of their own weakness, and of the weakness of their vain sacrifices, and resolved, that they shall be of no avail to them, to meet with some sick person before the idol, it was rather to comply with the prevailing superstition, than from any hope that the cure would be effected. They were conscious of the falsehood of the change; and yet they were so overpowered by the practice. Haruspex ridet cum barbaricam videtur, was Tully’s sneer upon such impostors as these. St. Austin argues very strongly against the same superstition, and the universal practice of the worshippers themselves of these pagan deities. Junius, who joins this sentence to the following verse, makes the sense to be, That God has turned their religion into a mockery, a reproach, and an impotence of such gods, when, despairing of help from their Di minorum gentium, or inferior sort of gods, they carry the patient to their great god Bel, but to little purpose.

Ver. 41. If they see one dumb that cannot speak, they bring him, and entertain Bel that he may speak, as though he were able to understand:—Bel was the prince of the gods of the Babylonians (ib. xvi. 1); the same with Baal, as Senec. On this account, and some abuses attending these funeral entertainments, this custom was at length abolished. By their lamentations and cries before their gods, Calmet thinks those for Adonis probably are meant.

Ver. 42. If they see one dumb that cannot speak, they bring him, and entertain Bel that he may speak, as though he were able to understand:—Bel was the prince of the gods of the Babylonians (ib. xvi. 1); the same with Baal, as Senec. On this account, and some abuses attending these funeral entertainments, this custom was at length abolished. By their lamentations and cries before their gods, Calmet thinks those for Adonis probably are meant.

Ver. 43. The women also with cords about them:—This refers to the common practice of the Egyptians, who were solemnly prostituted to the honour of that false god, under the title of Mylitta, and Venus nubilis, the popular goddess of sensual pleasures, and those who were called her prophets or priests, whose parents or fathers were formerly all the images, as it were, of the daughters, or the pavilions of girls, on account of their residence. According to Selden, it means the chapels of Venus Mylitta. The men of Babylon (2 Kings xiv. 19), are said to make Such a cohan-benhed, wherein their daughters were prostituted to such as came to worship Venus, as the manner was in Babylon, from whence this filthiness had its original (see Sol. Raim. Anim. Dom. in Genesis, cap. xvi.). 20. In this delusive and odious custom, he thinks, Lev. xix. 29, particularly to refer. Every woman, it seems, throughout all the country, was bound once in her life to repair to the temple of Venus, and to throw down a piece of money, be it less or more, which money was applied to the temple, and to the honour of the goddess. Hero-other name for the Babylonian Venus, which was also called Venus Urania (Synag. 2, cap. 7). The same learned writer observes of θεοκρίτης, in the next sentence, which our translators render drawn, that it means a seeming unwillingness to use, without occasion, the reprobate means. For, as Junius says, the Fœniculum forsoque, θεοκρίτης ab amans foeto disruptus, velut remissinum pudendum multae simulacra simulacrum, are his antithetical sentences. Art. an article, as he observes, to make the per- sons so set off their favours the more eager and converged.

Ver. 44. Whatever is done amongst them is false; i.e. Whatever is done to or about them is vain, and the labour to no purpose: or whatever is done by them is false. The Alexandrian MS. has νομίζεται

Ver. 45. They are made of carpenters and goldsmiths; they can make them, and they can endue them with the most separate parts of the body. i.e. They are such as were cast out of a refuse piece of wood (Isa. xlv. 12—15. Wisd. xiii. 13), which the workman could have formed into any shape he pleased, to be a thing either of honour or dishonour; or else they came out of the smith's furnace, and were fashioned by the anvil and hammer, as Archilus expresses it, lib. i. Who in another place, speaking of himself when under a state of passions, and such as have been most devoted to the work, let them be rashly, which are easily broken. Selden understands cords, properly so called, to distinguish and guard the passages leading to the woman, and to keep them separate.

Sitting in the ways. i.e. In the public ways leading to the temple of Venus. This description, and particularity of the place, is very natural and well suited to the followers and attendants of Venus, whose custom it is to frequent the most public places, to enliven and allure passers-by (see Prov. ix. 14, 15). Thus Tanur, Gen. xxxvi. 14, is represented as the lying preserved, but shut a place where the river flows, which is by the way of Timnah, νατάλ καταφραζόμενον, at the gates of Ennom, according to the LXX. Such a place as this was most likely to meet passengers in, and which the Venus-worshipers, to prevent their being surprised by them to be rashly, which are easily broken. Selden understands cords, properly so called, to distinguish and guard the passages leading to the woman, and to keep them separate.

Barn burn for perfumes! Badwell takes it in the sense of our version, and the oriental ones translate accordingly. The word, however, is improperly rendered furtures. A poor incentive this! but good enough for such a deity, and so scandalous riles. Grothus understands the Greek, δεμματηματα, in the sense of the Hebrew דאֶבַכְתִּים פִּיטֶרֶת אוּפָרָה, which the Greeks express by καρκίνης, which is to answer to mower, mows, or cakes and lattices, called also δαβαντα; and in this sense we meet with דאֶבַכְתִּים פִּיטֶרֶת אוּפָרָה, in the Hebrew and LXX. in psalm lxvii. 1. other uses of human life, is both the effect and proof of a God and a providence. Videamus (says St. Cyril) Dei muta temporum obsequi, elementa famulati, spirare ventos, fontes lucre, grandissere copias missian, fructus missere vinearum, excelsarum pomis arustam. And therefore Maximus Tyrius expressly, and with great propriety, calls God the living and the dead, the living and the dead, the living and the dead. If false gods, or idols, have no power over the elements, nor at the request of any votary can they make any alteration in them, as the true God did, through the intercession of Elias (James v. 17). They can neither show signs (ver. 67) in the heavens above, nor produce any alteration on the earth beneath; but are themselves subject to, and often suffer by, the great insolvency of the weather; these were sometimes struck down by a thunderbolt, or melted by the power of lightning.

Ver. 54. Neither can they judge their own cause, nor redress a wrong, being unable: for they are as cross between heaven and earth. Our translators follow a copy which had τινωσει. The Alexandrian and others have τινωσει, i.e., They cannot interpose to right themselves by any miracle, nor to execute justice in their own behalf, as the true God did in the matter of Korah and his faction; see ver. 61, which respects the other reading. Nor can they relieve any city or country from distress. Neque regiones liberabunt ab incarnis (Valgate), as the God of Israel did Jerusalem from the power of Sennacherib. They as little know, and are as little able to alter things upon earth, as the meanest bird that flies. Possibly this writer might instance in the crow, as being a bird of omen, according to the superstitious notion of the ancients.

Ver. 56. They cannot withstand any king or enemies: how then can it be thought or said that they be gods? The prophet Isaiah (xlv. 1) takes occasion to insist over the Babylonish idols, who could neither preserve themselves nor their worshippers, but were carried about by their enemies in triumph, by way of contempt and derision. And when he says, "Bel boweth down, and Nebo stoopeth," he means to express, that the images of these deities were carried in triumph by the Persians, as part of the spoil; so that the very deities themselves, which were worshipped in the idols, must own that they were conquered likewise. We read, 2 Chron. xxv. 5, that the anger of the Lord was kindled against king Amaaziah, for seeking after the gods of the people, which could not deliver their own people out of his hand. And indeed it was a great instance of folly likewise in that prince, after he had subdued and slain the Edomites, to set up their gods, which he ought rather to have burned in the fire, than bow down to, and burn incense before them, without their impotence he had proved and detected. Ahaz was more justifiable in this respect, who sacrificed to the gods of those people who had overthrown him, hoping they might be induced to assist him also (2 Chron. xxvii. 23).

Ver. 60. For sun, moon, and stars, being bright, and sent to do their offices, are excellent: Απομονωθαυτω δε εστι γενος. The Geneva version here seems preferable, "when they are sent for necessary uses, obey." These great bodies follow the appointment of their Creator; if any creatures really deserved worship, it should seem that these were most worthy of it. Their beauty and splendour attract our admiration, and the advantages we receive from them claim our acknowledgment; but all their glory and power they derive from the Father of lights. The gods of the nations neither equal these in beauty, nor are alike beneficial by their influence: we ought therefore to confine all our worship and homage to the living God only, and to give no sort of adoration to false gods of any kind.

Ver. 61. In like manner the lightning when it breaketh forth is easy to be seen; and after the same manner the wind bloweth in every country.] Ανερκοι, ου κεινοι ου κοινοι, Junius. Grains conjectures the true reading to be ενερκοι, i.e., in their meeting, which indeed is more agreeable to the context and the reflection, as it now stands, seems but of little weight and consequence. The meaning of the latter clause, which is obscurely expressed, is, that under all climates,"the wind and storm fulfill his word" (Ps. cxlvii. 6). And in this sense we may expound Ps. civ. 4, "He maketh his angels spirits;" i.e., he maketh the winds occasionally his ministers to execute his pleasure; and so the ordinary understand πνευματα σωτηριου in that place (see De Mins, in loc.).

Ver. 76. For a scarecrow in a garden of cucumbers keepeth nothing: so are their gods.] The birds for a little while are afraid of a scarecrow, παράκτιον (a very uncommon word); Junius understands it of the statue of Priapus, which is probably enough, as Sueton renders it, pudenda statua,) but when once they begin to be accustomed to the sight of it, they give themselves no more pain or concern about it: when one comes near to inspect and examine it, it is found to be mere nothing, or something occasionally placed in terraeorum, and not a real man. The case is the same with idols; it is only the folly and mistake of those who adore them, which gives them their authority, they only impose upon the weak and superstitious, the more knowing and inquisitive soon find out the cheat.

Ver. 72. Ye shall know them to be no gods by the bright purple that rotteth upon them:] και τοις παρθενοις και της παρθηνιας. Not the marble itself, which is more durable, but the shewing varnish, or polish, like marble. Grattian reads, it seems, after the manner of the Jews, of the jewels of the jewels decays upon them. It is observable that this writer is very explicit, and descends to a detail of the varnishes, ornaments, and decorations of those idols, whom their priests set off and adorned with all possible care, to make them look more rich and glorious. And the reason of him being so particular as to be, that he might set their "delectable things," as the prophet calls them (Isa. xlix. 9), in a true light, and expose their unprofitableness and decay to a carnal and gross people, too apt to be affected with pomp and pageantry; and whose senses were likely to pervert their understanding, to as not to discern the cheat and falsity of such a worship. And they themselves afterward shall be eaten.] This may either refer to idols, worn-eaten through time, or to such living animals as, though they were the objects of the pagan worship, were eaten by others. The Christian fathers and apologists, continually expose the heathens for worshipping such deities, as might be sacrificed and eaten, and declare against the practice, as infinitely absurd and ridiculous. Minutius Felix is very pleasant on the occasion, particularly with respect to the Jews. "Altho' the heathen worshipped it as a strong instance of the folly of the heathen worship," that those fishes and calves which the Egyptians worshipped were made the food of others (Cont. Gent.) And the reason why Moses beat the golden calf to powder, and made the Jews to drink of it, was, according to St. Jerome, Ut discant contemnere, quod in sacellum proiecta viderant; i.e., that the people might learn to despise what they saw went down into the stomach, and out into the draught. But as the scope of this epistle seems directed to expose idols as mere dead things, the former sense seems preferable.
THE HISTORY OF SUSANNA.

Ver. 1.] In many editions this and the two other supplemental parts are inscribed Δυσης, and in some ηνομος Δυς.

In the preface to this story it is said to be set apart from the beginning of Daniel, where it stands in the Roman editions; others, as the Complut. and some Latin ones, make it to be the twentieth chapter of that book. But what is here related belongs to the prophet Daniel; it should seem that what is herein contained happened before some other remarkable particulars which are mentioned in his book; especially, if what Ignatius and Sulpicius Severus observe be well-grounded; viz. that the prophet Daniel was not above twelve years of age when this story happened. It has been concluded also from his established character, that it preceded Nebuchadnezzar's dream and its interpretation, both of which, he says, it is probable that he was looked upon as more wise and able than all the magicians, astrologers, and wise men of the Chaldeans, which great repute he could not, it is thought, have obtained, but by some such wonderful action or determination as this which is here related. But Origen discourses as belonging at all to the book of Daniel, and calls it καθορισμος κεκοιτηθης φυλους, a spurious part of it (Epist. ad Jul. Afric. see also Grabe, de Vitis LXX. Interp.).

Ver. 2. A very fair woman, and one that feared the Lord.] This is a great commendation of Susanna, that she was as virtuous and religious as she was fair and beautiful; qualities both very amiable, but yet do not always go together, as beauty often inclines the owners of it to vanity, exposes them to dangers, and is an inlet to temptations. To excel therefore in both respects was not only to the honour of Susanna, as what follows about the great care taken by her parents of her education is to their credit, and probably she was being very suitably disposed was the effect of it.

Ver. 4. Jocastus was a great rich man.] Africanus observes that it is not credible that Josias, the husband of Susanna, was so rich and powerful in the captivity, as he is here said to be. As for their being rich and wise men, this was not by any means carried away into captivity, because not so much esteemed by the rulers, and Luke xxii. 24, κεκοιτηθης φυλους είς τοι, i.e. "which of them should seem to be the greatest," as Geneva and Coverdale have it, means only, which of them should be so. And thus some interpreters, 1 Cor. xi. 40, would be more properly and consistently, I conceive, rendered, "I have the Spirit of God." There are other instances of this usage in this epistle: see Gal. xiv. 37.

Ver. 5. The same year were appointed two of the ancients of the people to judge.] The term "ancients" has not respect surely to their age, nor proves necessarily that they were far advanced in it: the sensual and impure love which inflamed them for Susanna, makes it more probable that they were in the vigour of their age. The government by ancients or elders was the regime of the city. We meet with them in several authors, and from their public sessions or meetings are styled σεπεσης, and γαρζεως; sometimes these elders are called, φανερηγης in general, sometimes φανερηγια ἡλω; these some think to be the judges here mentioned, Josephus says, that Moses appointed that every city should have a council of seven magistrates, men of exemplary virtue, and lovers of righteousness (Antiq. lib. iv. cap. 8, Seld, de Synod. lib. ii. cap. 6); and this perhaps was the determinate number in his time, but ancients there seems to have been more; for Boaz mentions ten elders, who were probably the same with judges, in this city of Bethlehem, Ruth iv. 2 (see note on Judith vi. 21). But in this history two only are mentioned, and those as annually chosen; a method and constitution, says Croesus, which obtained not among the Jews. He thinks them rather assessors to the αποστοληρω ακρω, the chief or president among the captives. Their business was to be assisting by their advice and opinion, and to give counsel or determination in such cases as were brought before them, chiefly in suits of law (ver. 6), or forensic matters. It is probable the Jews retained a sort of judicial power even in their captivity, and that they executed some of the penal laws of Moses, rather in the manner forms of government and customs, the Hebrews tell Asacuras, 1 Esd. iii. 2, that the Jews observed their own laws. The history of the accusation and trial of Susanna is a proof, says Calvin, that the Jews had their judges and methods of administering justice among the captivity; so that the reason that they had not the power of life and death, seems most probable (see note on ver. 62).

Ancient judges, who seemed to govern the people.] Of οδοιον εκτεινεσθαι. The Vulgate and Junius translate according to our version, with which that of Geneva and also Coverdale's agree. St. Jerome observes, that it is not without good reason that the text here says, that these elders "accused her to rage"—i.e. they who judge or govern with partiality and injustice, have only the honourable name of judges, and are rulers in appearance only, rather than true and valuable magistrates; Qui injuste praestat populare, tantum nomen habent judicium; regere videntur popularum, magis quam regnant. There may also a second and more literal sense be given from the then state and condition of the Jews; for being in captivity, and under the dominion and tyranny of the Chaldeans, they had rather a shadow of government among them than any real power and jurisdiction. But there is no necessity of understanding these words of seeming power, or the abuse of it, as eject and sedet are often used as mere explicatives. See Mark x. 42, where ἐποιεσαται δικαιον, an expression very much resembling, is rendered by St. Matthew, xx. 25, δικαιον, the rulers. And Luke xxii. 24, κεκοιτηθης φυλους εις τοι, i.e. "which of them should seem to be the greatest," as Geneva and Coverdale have it, means only, which of them should be so. And thus some interpreters, 1 Cor. xi. 40, would be more properly and consistently, I conceive, rendered, "I have the Spirit of God." There are other instances of this usage in this epistle: see Gal. xiv. 37.

Ver. 6. That these women being set away their eyes, that they might not look unto heaven, nor remember just judgments.] i.e. That they might not look unto nor reflect upon the God of heaven, nor remember his judgments, but judge of such matters-as protected from by a metonymy, means the Father of it (see ver. 35, and Luke xv. 18). The author of the book of Wisdom has the like observation, and makes the reason of men's going astray to be, "because their own wickedness hath blinded them" (ib. 21). The judicious Hooker has the following pertinent refutation upon the passage before us: "How should the brightness of wisdom shine where the windows of the son of very set purpose closed? True reason hath many things in it, the only mention whereof galleth, and freeth wicked minds. Being therefore lost in inquiry into such matters should breed a persuasion in the end, contrary unto which they embrace, it is their endeavour, as much as in them lieth, to banish quite and clean from their cogitation whatever leadeth or paineth that way. The fountain and well-spring of which impunity is a resolved purpose of mind, to reap in this world what sensual profit or pleasure soever the world yieldeth, and not to be barred from any whatsoever means available thereunto. And this is the very radical cause of their atheism." (Eccl. Pol. b. v. p. 291).

Ver. 14. When they were gone out, they parted the one from the other, and turning back again they came to the same place; and after that they had asked one another the cause, they acknowledged their fault: then appointed they a time both together, when they might meet and hear above.] The description here is very natural of the artifice used on the occasion; they pretend to go home as it were to dinner, and take a formal leave of each other, with hearts equally bent. on mischief, and meditating the same wicked design. But hypocrisy and dissimulation were the least blinishments in their character. Last, ever impatient to perpetrate its sense. I therefore sent them by a secret message back to the same haunt, and conscious guilt, urging to a confession, unless in a shameful confederacy against virtue, of which by their station they ought to have been the most loathed escapers.

Ver. 15. She was desirous to wash herself in the garden;
St. Chrysostom takes occasion, from her great circumspections, as aootoiaia aitav avtov, 8. r. a. Quasi brutus erat bractis, quem nemo poterat dejectus, etiam si non atque alter atque consilio, idem fide signata, ex quo nemo petulantud pudicitiae prolusionem petat haeret. (Serm. de Susanna, tom. vi. p. 141.)

Ver. 19. Now when the two were made for them, the Two elders rose up. (St. Chrysostom observes, that these elders were like two wolves or lions, that had seized on a tender lamb, &c. ibidem.)

"Susanna," says he, "was alone in the midst of two hungry lions;" nemo were near to help or succour her, nither maid, companion, neighbour, friend, nor relation; only God was inspector and witness, who indeed could have withdrew her from this fatal attempt, but not wishing that he might publish Susanna's virtue, and the others' incontinence; and, at the same time, by her exemplary conduct, gave occasion for the invention of a holy resolution and constan-tcy, in case of temptation" (ibid.).

Ver. 20. We are in love with thee. The tempter was not wanting to suggest reasons to them, such as they were,
that they might believe that the danger of their position was the opportunity of privacy, and the secret passion which they conceived for her; they would persuade her it was love occasioned their fondness, as if a name so tender become to their brutal design. Such carnal and sensual love differs as much from the real and virtuous passion so called, as good money from counterfeit coin, or truth from falsehood. This is the mode in which the arch tempters, in conjunction to siumus, is a particular idiom, it resembles that of St. Paul, cum ex quo dixit, Rom. viii. 9, and that mode of speech among the Latins, in voluptuatus case, in vita case, which we meet with in Senece, Epist.
59.

Ver. 21. If thou wilt not, we will bear witness against her. St. Chrysostom finely harangues upon these words, here and the Law is the same, 8. 7. 8. The radius seize upon Susanna, and first they attack her by discourse, and endeavour to intimate her by threats, hoping to prevail by that way. "We are the rulers of the people, the guardians of the laws, have the power of binding and loosening, of acquitting or condemning; you are in our hands, may comply safely, there is none present to make a discovery, unless it be done by the due course of the law.
"Hei mibi, quos pastores abripueris, lupus video; quos quibus quid in isto, sed in ilia spect bucket and exatant. And then he introduces Susanna thus nobly replying to these wicked tempters: "Ye shall not shall my honour, nor violate my chastity; I will not consent to disgrace my parents, nor bring a reflection on my family: I will not injure or grieve my husband, nor forfeit my conjugal faith to him, by an unlawful and sinful compliance; a violent and unjust death is more eligible than to consent to your insipre solicitations. My husband is always present, if not in person, yet in my thoughts and affections; nor can I so soon or easily forget my parents' valuable instructions, whose image and example are always before my eyes" (ibid.).

Ver. 22. I am straitened on every side: And well might she say so; for either way she was exposed to death. If she prostituted herself to their wicked desires, it was death by their laws; and if she refused to consent to their solicitations, she exposed herself thereby to the same peril of death, by an accusation which the authority by the notion could not excuse, and could not back and defend, though in itself false. Her resolution therefore to withstand the temptation was noble, and as such is commendated by all tiny. And she had already triumphed in other's speech of hers: Sancta Susanna, denuntiato falsi testimoni terrore, cum hinc se videret urgetur periculo, inde opprobrium, malit istem morte vitae opprobrium, quam studio salutis tur-pus est, adhibe. (Serm. de Susanna, tom. vi. p. 141.)

Ver. 23. It is better for me to fall into your hands, and do not it, than to sin in the night of the Lord. Alpognen love. Almost all the verses use the comparative degree, like that of the English "than," with the article, and to be eligible to fall into your hands, and not to commit the sin, and thereby displease God. A comparison, says St. Jerome, cannot be here properly formed; for to say con-misery, or to attempt murder is altogether inhuman, and in the very essence of sin itself. The Greek, therefore, says he, may be expected not to use it, Ne videretur comparationem peccati, quod erat bonum, hoc appallor melius (Hieron. in loc.). But this is not remarkable, inasmuch as there are many instances in approved authors, where the positive is used for the comparative, the comparison is not here implied, but the fact is instanced of the morality of the actions, not the one attending them; or, in other words, that it is better to suffer a temporal than an eternal punishment. Many of the authors, as St. Ambrose, Jerome, Chrysostom, Bernard, Austen, have written ser panoche upon Susanna's wise conduct and determination. The last of these draws a long parallel between her and the famed Lucrece, the heroine of Roman story, the boasted pattern of chastity for all ages:
"Who that will not, will do it not," says he. "What she would not consent to, that the elders would not consent to her, he said; but if she committed herself to the approval and testimony of her own conscience, and attested the facts of her torture by her own self, whether she was guilty or innocent, the action was the more noble, because it was done without her consent and concurrence, without revenging it for the sake of her life; not the study of revenge, to have hindered the base action of Tarquin at the expense of her own life, than throw it away afterward out of mere voxation. Herein Susanna exceeded her, that she was the more noble in bearing up to the brute passions, that she chose rather to expose herself to the manifest danger of death, than comply with their vile solicitations, Lucretia killed herself innocent, as she were, lest she should appear guilty: and it is the very consideration of her innocence that aggravates her fault. Why should she kill she if she was no ways culpable and if she was culpable any ways by cursing, she might then certainly be thought to have killed herself, merely to have it supposed that she was innocent. Si aliudere, cur fada; si padice, cur oc-china? Susanna was so less sensible of the rudeness offered, but so much more determined to do her duty, than to alter another's crime, and to add to the sin of others, that of voluntar of murder of herself: Nee in se ultra crimen ali-unc rem reinforcing a vehement alderet sun (August. lib. i. de Civit. Dei, cap. 16).

Ver. 24. With that Susanna cried with a loud voice: and the two elders cried out against her. One hears, says St.
Bernard, two cries very different, and for very different reasons. Susanna cries like an innocent lamb, in being of danger of being degraded, and the two elders roar like vicious wolves, for their prey, or because they were disapponted of it. St. Chrysostom has the very same comparison, Clamor ut luporum graviam, et balitici vacuam inter eos.
She cries to fetch in help, and to attest her innocence; they do not cry to save her, and to cover their own abuses by turning accusers, for they now quoted their office as judges, by appearing as witnesses and informers.

Ver. 32. These wicked men commanded to uncover her face, (for she was covered.) The word doth convey the idea, that when C. Sulpicius Gallus knew his wife had appeared abroad without it, he divorced her only on that account. And from this covering, as the entites observe, the Latin word ubihere, which at first signified no more than to cover with a veil, came to express marriage. Calmet thinks, that God intended her to be an exception to their office and quality, to continue veiled in their presence, especially when cited before them as a criminal: or, perhaps, she was particularly upbraided with the insinuation in worthy countenance, though doubtless the true reason was that given in the text, "that they might feed their eyes with her beauty."

Ver. 43. And laid their hands upon her head. A form used among the Jews, when one accused another of a capital crime (see Lev. xxiv. 14): by which ceremony these elders, or judges, told the accused, that they had given the true testimony against her, and thought her worthy of death; and it was customary, according to the Jewish writers, to say, "Let thy blood be upon thine own head, which by thy guilt thou hast brought on thyself!"

And to this alludes probably that other ceremony among them, of laying the hands upon the head of the victim intended for the sacrifice (Lev. i. iv. 4. 24. xvi. 21).

Ver. 45. Therefore when she was led to be put to death, the Lord raised up the holy spirit of a young youth, whose name was Daniel. It hath been objected against this history, that what is here related could not happen when Daniel was a youth, less when he was but eleven years of age, tauros, as the Greek expresses it; for it appears from ver. 65, or the last verse of this story, according to some ancient versions, that he was twelve years old, and Christ had not yet reigned in his seat. Now Daniel, say some writers, was then well advanced in years. To this it is answered, that this history happened a long time before, and that the very account of the youth here alludes to that part of this narration, but that of Bel and the Dragon, which immediately follows; and accordingly in many editions, both Greek and Latin, it is made the very beginning of it (see Dut. Fren. Glic. p. 24. As Daniel's age, several writers expressly say, that he was only twelve years old at this time (see Sulp. Revet. Sac. Hist. lib. ii. cap. 2. Tert. Advers. c. iv.). Ignatius says it seems as if God by the mouth as it were of an infant, meant to confound the majesty and cunning of these elders, and to detect their hypocrisy and iniquity. *One sees in this story, as in every part of the scripture, a reproach on the world, that he permits the malice and wickedness of men to proceed, and how far he seems to abandon his servants: he permitsSusanna to be condemned to death, and even to be led forth to public punishment, to prove her faith and constancy unto the end; in like manner as he tried the faith of Abraham, by letting Isaac come to the very spot where he was to be offered as a sacrifice, and not interposing till his father had bound him, actually had taken the knife, and stretched out his hand to kill him. But as he sent his angel in the very instant to hinder him from laying his hand on his son, so now he sent this angel to assure him that he was pleased with this signal instance of his obedience, so, to prevent the evil intended against Susanna, the Lord raised up the holy spirit of young Daniel, to understand, to bear wit, and to oppose the evil designs of this young Bel and his false and treacherous witnesses, (Serm. de Susana, tom. vii.). "It should seem," says St. Jerome, from the text, "that the spirit did not then first enter into Daniel, but that it was already in him, only except on account of his tender age; but an occasion now offering to rescue thereby oppressed innocence, it appeared and acted with power and clearness in favour of justice; God exemplifying in this instance, that his spirit, when he pleases, acts independently, or without regard to the weakness or minority of age, which serves rather to make his divine power the more illustrious."

Ver. 47. Truth and voice, I am innocent from the blood of this woman. God opposed to the two elders a child in comparison, and made innocent Daniel the judge of these corrupt ones; "I am clear," says he, "from the blood of you or of this young youth;" the Hebrew meaning "the same expression with regard to Susanna, as Pilate did with respect to the holy Jesus, but does it much better, and more utilely, for it argues it from the genuine presence of innocent blood, whereas Pilate bore testimony to his being a just man, whom he delivered up soon after a criminal, which greatly aggravated his fault, Gravis est peccatum non ordinanderi damnum... videtur ignorantiam et criminosam. Daniel, by his declaration, freed the people from the mistake they lay under and the sin they were about to commit, whereas Pilate by his conduct confirmed the evil opinion which was, already entertained of the Jews, as of such means as he sees most proper to confound wickedness and injustice; if he had not in some measure blinded the mind of some, or hardened it; in short, acted like the prophet, who, "by the understanding of his words, were cut off from the mouth of the righteous." (Psalm cxxii. 10.) the reason of these wicked elders, it would have been easy for them to have prevented the consequence drawn from his answers, by saying only, that they did not trouble themselves to be so particular as to mind the sort of tree they were crucified on, and how that was done would have been sufficiently accounted for by them, and they had they been willing, had it been otherwise, could have ingeniously acted together in such a part of the garden, and under the covert of some shady tree. As the allusion in these verses is founded upon the Greek names, some have therefore inferred that this was not a Greek speaker; but it is much more probable that it was written by Daniel, but was wrote originally in the Greek tongue by some Hellenistic Jew: to which Origen replies, in that the Greek interpreter, it is probable, in writing the words of our Lord, took care not to use any of the names of the trees, and sought out such other names instead of them, as had the same allusions as the original ones had who went lost. Notwithstanding this figure of speech, so called phonomassias, are to be found in the sacred writings: in the Hebrew of the fifth chapter of Isaiah, ver. 7, it is "he looked for צַּוְּתָמִּסְכָּת, but behold צַּוְּתָמִּסְכָּת; for righteousness גָּזִּיוֹ, but beheld גָּזִּיוֹ a cry" (see also Isa. xxiv. 18, and Vitringa in Is. p. 120). The allusion is observable in the Hebrew text of Ecclesiastes, ver. 11, but Dan. v. 28, is nearest to the passage, ver. xi. 14 (see Luke xxi. 42). The following extracts from the ancient testimonies: see Jer. i. 11, 12. Exek. vii. 6. Hos. ix. 15. Amos v. 5, vi. 2. John xv. 2. Rom. i. 29—31, xii. 3. 2 Thess. ii. 11. The passion was both dangerous and frequent, they are said to have been so common, that they were a cry (see Gellius lib. ii. 37, ed. Reiske). This is thought to be the punishment inflicted by Samuel on Agag, the enemy of God's people, 1 Sam. xv. 33, and by David on the Amorites, 2 Sam. viii. 31, it was by גָּזִּיוֹת, or such loud cries addressed to the blushing ones of the true God, Dan. iii. 29. In general it is observed, that all those places of scripture, where the word גָּזִּיוֹ (a loud voice, voice of a cry) occurs, have an Hebrew text for putting to death, probably allude to this punishment. In St. Matthew the wicked servant is threatened to be cut asunder, and to have his portion with the hedges, sheep, and oxen, verses 51, 52 of the Old Testament, the apostle mentions their beingrawn asunder, 'יְהוָה יִכְרְאֵם, Heb. xi. 27, which the Jews and Christians by tradition understand of the Jews being put to death in this manner by Manasses king of Judah, for boasting he had seen the Lord sitting on his throne (Isa. vii. 1).

Ver. 36. O then seed of Canaan, and not of Judea. This is spoken by way of the greatest reproach; for the Canaantites were a cursed generation from an accursed father, so overgrown with wickedness, that God devoted them to destruction, and to be cut off from that good land which they possessed, that he might place Israel therein, the seed of blessed parents, whom for their father's sake he had delivered of Egypt, and declared him to be a land he would give to his seed for ever; and this is the same with that of Ezek. xvi. 3, "Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan, thy father was a Hittite, and thy mother an Amorite;" so of the elder it is observed here, that he resembled the remnant of the Canaanites more than those of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, his ancestors, and is therefore said to be of the seed of Canaan, because those, in scripture dialect, whose manners we resem- ble, are put into the class of Canaanites. This phrase, Iesu οξιόν ἐπιθυμήθην, in the Greek ἐν τῷ ἐξερέσι, or contemplation or agitation, alludes probably to that disorderly ferment in his blood which betrayed him, that he could not shake off the curse upon his posterity, so one thus wantonly and viciously disposed is properly said to derive his descent from him. There is also an expression resembling this, Hos. vii. 12, where Ephraim, on account of his apostasy, and the guilt of his concubinage, is called, by way of inclination Canaan, according to the rendering of the LXX., Vulgate, and oriental versions. That Ephraim has it in the Hebrew, and annotation on it, "Ephraim is more like the wicked Canaanite, than godly Abraham, or Jacob;" intimating, that they were so unlike Jacob their father before mentioned, that they were to be deprived of their name, if at their birth and nativity were of the land of Canaan, had forfeited their right to the privileges and blessings belonging to Israel, and were become heirs of the curse annexed to the Canaanite, which was a land of heathens, and where Ephraim is reproached as Canaan, Judah is before commended (see xi. 12). For the tribe of Judah, for the genealogical table, containing a proper account of the kings, as far as the truth of worship, and was comparatively fruitful, and that kingdom was the lawful succession of David's lineage. The Jews have a tradition, according to St. Jerome, that when Israel was divided into two parts, of which the one was placed on one side by a mountain, on the other by the Red sea, on another by the army of Pharaoh, and even quite shut in, the other tribes despairs and desists to return into Egypt, only Judah, with confidence in God, entered into the sea, and so deserved the kingdom. With respect to this fact, Judah is said in the place last referred to, and which ought indeed to begin the next chapter, to be a witness of God's word, and, as a faithful assessor thereof, descended with God into the sea, and was most faithful among the holy ones, so as to believe the words of God commanding him (see Pseudepigrapha, II. 160).

Ver. 61. And they arose against the two elders,] See Apost, Constit. lib. ii. 49, 51. The Jewish writers, though they do not here say that they did not know what was the traditional account of the same story, differing only in the relation of it. They make the two elders to be punished by Nebuchadnezzar, by being roasted, or cast into the fire of Babylon, or of the Chaldeans being burnt and devoured (adultery); and not by their own people, as mentioned in the following verse. They will have these elders to have been Ahab and Zedekiah, mentioned Jer. xx. 24: and this is there said, that they committed such things in Israel, by adultery with their neighbours' wives (see Orig, Epist, ad African. Jerom. Epist. 10, and Comm. in loc. and on Dan. xiii.). The last portion of this verse, in his opinion, is some to continuance of this opinion; but this is a mere fancy and conceit, the meaning of that sentence being only, that these elders resembled those corrupt ones which the prophet speaks of (Dan. vii. 23), and it seems not improbable from the following verse, that these elders were stoned, as they suffered according to the law of Moses, or in the manner appointed by it for such a crime, and in such sort as they intended to have done unto Susanna.

Ver. 62. And they put them to death.] Though the Jews, as Origen and others maintain, might have the power of the sword among themselves, yet it was not customary among them how far they had the power of life and death during their captivity under the Chaldeans. It seems more probable that they had not such a power, and therefore the Jews and Christians by tradition do not believe that these elders were stoned to death by Nebuchadnezzar. Under the Romans, who gave the Jews as much liberty as the Babylonians, it is certain they had not this power of life and death among themselves; as Strabo, lib. xv. 31, "It is not lawful for us to put any man to death." It is more likely that they had only magistrates, judges, and courts of justice of their own to decide differences in cases of property, in a way peculiar to themselves; as Strabo, quoted by Josephus (Antiq. lib. xiv. cap. 13), says they had at Alexandria in the like state. However this be, it is certain these elders deserved a very exemplary punishment; as their crime was greatly enhanced from their public character as judges, and their sway and authority as such among the people, and yet made use of all the respect and esteem which their office commanded, to conceal their detestable crimes.

Ver. 63. Therefore Chelacia and his wife praised God for their daughter Susanna, . . . because there was no dishon- or in the face of their father, and his mother, and their children and all her kindred wept (ver. 33) at the unexpected charge against her, so their joy, no doubt, was proportionably great for her deliverance. They therefore gave thanks to God, "not only for the preservation of her life, which she would have lost very happily as being innocent, but because he had afforded her grace and strength enough not only to bear the trial, but to come out reproach and glorified his name by so miraculous a protection of innocence." The fathers greatly extol the constancy of Susanna, and call her the glory of her sex, which in these times they style them the shadow of the old precept and reproach of theirs.

Ver. 64. From that day Daniel was had in great reputa-
Ver. 1. King Astyages was gathered to his fathers, and Cyrus of Persia received his kingdom. Herodotus confirms this, telling us in express words, that Astyages was succeeded by his grandson Cyrus. This immediate succession of Cy-rus to his grandfather is noticed by Diodorus, Justin, Strabo, Clemens Alexandrinus, Lactantius, Eusebius, Je-rome, Austin, and others: but these, as they have copied after Herodotus, add no weight to the scale. But though the above writers give Astyages no other successor than Cyrus, nor is any notice at all taken of any other in the Canon of Polymy, yet Xenophon (Cyropod. lib. i. cap. 19), and, I think, also Ephorus (Antiq. lib. i. cap. 12), the former calls the successor of Astyages Cyaxares; and the latter gives him the name of Damus, adding, that he over-turned the kingdom of Babylon, being assisted in that enter-prise by his nephew Cyrus, which is consonant both to scripture and chronology. For if we suppose that Astyages had no other successor but Cyrus, we must allow him to have lived a hundred years and upwards. Could we believe that Astyages lived to so great an age, we should not scruple to follow Herodotus. But it is certain from Dan. v. 31, that Darius the Mede, or Cyaxares, the second (for they mean the same person), succeeded immediately. Perhaps the reason that Cyaxares is not mentioned as succeeding, may be his reigning only two years at Babylon after he took it, and at his death Cyrus became master of the whole empire; and because the other had no more than the name and shadow of the sovereignty, excepting only in Media, which was his own proper dominion. Our transla-tors follow the Greek, Arabic, and Syriac copies, but the Vulgate places this verse at the end of the history of Susanna.

Ver. 2. And Daniel conversed with the king, and was hounoured above all his friends. It is not agreed what king is here spoken of. Some (as some of the ancient Jews, Benjamin, Daniel, and Cyaxares, or Cyrus, and his grandson. Calmet declares for the last; Messieurs de Port-Royal think the account of Bel suits with neither of the three, as it is well known they worshipped the sun, and not such an idol. Besides, what is mentioned, ver. 28, 29, that the Babylonians were angry with and threatened to destroy the king and his house on account of the destruc-tion of the dragon, is an instance of outrageous behaviour not at all consistent with their being lately subdued by Da-rus and Cyrus. They suppose therefore this to have hap-pened under Evil-Merodach, the son of Nebuchadnezzar, with whom Daniel was as high placed as he had been under Nebuchadnezzar. And they place this history about A. M. 3445, the beginning of Evil-Merodach's reign, Da-niel being then, as is supposed, about fifty-six years of age. As to the called Bel, this god was of great and national idol of the Babylonians, who had erected a most magnificent and sumptuous temple for it. As Baal is said to be the proper name of Belus, the king of Babyl and Babylon, next after Nimrod, and as he is said to be the first man that was deified, or reputed a god after his death, so the said name is supposed by learned men more peculiarly and pri-marly to belong to him. And accordingly the Hebrew Boole answeriing to the Chaldee Bel, is it this successor of Nimrod that we are to understand by the god that is called by the name of Bel in this history. Nimus his son erected a statue of Belus, the god Belus, to the worship of him, and thereby gave the first hint to idolatry, or image-worship, as many learned maintain. This image or idol of Belus is, they say, what is here called Bel, or Baal contracted; and continued until Daniel's time, when it was destroyed by Darius the Mede, or Cyrus, upon the discovery of the imposture of Bel's priests.

And there was spent upon him every day twelve great measures of fine flour, and forty sheep, and six vessels of wine. [There are but two ancient writers that make any mention of the history of Bel; viz. this apocryphal one, and Josephus Ben-Gorion; and their accounts differ in several particulars. The learned Selden hath extracted from the latter the daily allowances made to Bel, and makes it be, Judas, Macc. ivs. 100, which he supposes, et ceterae, etc. 10 amphore viini. Though they vary in the stated quantity of provisions, yet they had some warrant, says he, from sacred history, viz. Jer. xi. 44, to represent Bel so voracious, and to counterbalance his being served in so plentiful a manner by the idolatrous priests (Seld. Synag. 2 de Belo et Dracono).]

Ver. 4. And the king said unto him, Whence dost thou not worship Bel? It should seem that the king did not know but that Daniel worshipped Bel, but by his not accompli-shing him with the rest when he went daily to worship him. But as Daniel hated all hypocrisy and dissimulation, he was too good to seem to countenance by his presence what he inwardly abhorred. But that he might not appear to stay away through a supercilious pride or obstinacy, he assigns the reason in the following verse, for not joining in this idolatrous worship, and the reason is both natural and co-gent; viz. that idols are inanimate senseless things, and both unworthy and innoxious of the honour paid them: That God alone, who made all things by his power, even those very persons whose skill and ingenuity contrived and fashioned these idols, was the true object of worship, the ever-living God, subsisting in and from himself; the sove-reignty, and that wisdom and power, under which we and upon whom they depend for their preservation and continuance.

Ver. 6. Thinkest thou not that Bel is a living god? seest thou not how much he eateth and drinketh every day? One may easily judge what sort of god this Bel, the god of the Babylonians, was, and how imperfect and insufficient to his own existence and happiness, who was beheld by his so-verains for his daily sustenance and refreshment in the opinion of his very worshippers. But though the idol had no use of or occasion for this prodigious quantity of provisions, as be-ing unprofitable of what was before it, yet the devil, who inhabited and acted therein, greatly availed himself of the cheat and imposition put upon the credulous people, and though he ate none of the good things prepared, but left them to feed the luxury of the priests, yet in the false reli-gion maintained and propagated by them, he found means in return to satisfy a more enervating appetite, viz. his insatia-ble appetite to ruin and destroy souls (see Port-Royal Com. loc.). What a strange blindness must possess this idolatrous king, to fall down before such a despicable object of worship! and how mean and grovelling must his concep-tions be, when it became necessary to convince, that his god did not eat at all, to prove him to be no god! as if a ne-cesity of eating was any proof of divinity, and not rather an argument of decay and mortality; and as if all-suf-ficient power was not a discrediting and an essential attribute of the Deity! How much juster was the conclusion of a much wiser king, who, because of God's absolute perfection and in the temple of Belus, Didorus Scylus informs us. We may observe, that the serpent has all along been the companion of the abominable and horrid goddess Etna, who was an elephant with the head of a woman; and that it was represented on the coins of Etna, and on the seal of the god, and on the coin of the town of the same name, with the head of a woman and the body of an elephant, and was worshipped with her in the same temple.

Ver. 11. Bel's priests said, Lo, we go out: but thou, O king, set on the meat, and make ready the wine, and that the door fast, and seal it with thine own signet. The vaulted ordination of Bel, which is over a greenness of gaining the offerings themselves, made the people believe that their god ate up all that was offered in his temple, and therefore were held by them and priests of a false religion. "They are an image of such if any such there be of the sacred order," say Messengers of Port-Royal, "who, through a selfish principle, are tempted to cull from the collective bodies themselves of the gods of the church, which, being a solemn tribute and homage paid by some among the faithful to God, and an instance of their pious acknowledgement for the many blessings received from him, and devoted by them to holy purposes, are sealed with the seal of the Most High, as things sacred and forbidden to be touched, and cannot be appropriated to private uses, without some penalty of injustice, and even of sacrilege itself. If there be any such, who, after the example of these idolatrous priests, convert holy offerings to their own personal enjoyment, and appropriates them, given only for the relief of his poor members, they are not the true pastors, who enter into the sheepfold by the right door, but come in by some private entrance, some unwarrantable way, and are not true shepherds." (Comp. vi. 15.)

Ver. 19. Then laughed Daniel, and held the king that he should not go in, and said, Behold now the pavement, and mark how the king's feet toucheth not the pavement. This was a received rule that persons knowing not power says Terrullian, adv. Valentin. cap. 6, "whether to laugh at the folly and lamenously the blindness of this prince, who suffered himself thus to be imposed upon by his self-intoxicated compliance, as if he knew not that some errors are best exposed by ridicule and contempt.

"Let us laugh," say Messengers of Port-Royal, "when we look upon the ashes strewn through the temple of this false god, and when we consider the delusion of those who ridiculously attempted to establish the divinity of Bel upon their own lying and gluttony: but let us lament with tears of blood, if there be any in the church who thus play the hypocrite, and fall upon the piety of the faithful. It is by men's footsteps and goings, i. e. by their conduct and manner of behaviour in the temple of the Lord, that one only judges whether they be rulers or not: and if the traces of their steps be not there, and if they do not show the hidden work they have been about. Happy for them who are there, the symbol and token of their penitence." (Com. in loc.)

Ver. 20. 22. Then the king was angry, and took the priests with their wives and children . . . and slew them. A conduct so blameworthy in the priests, and so scandalous an imposition in persons dedicated to holy offices and the care of religious affairs, carries it in something so shocking and unworthy of their character, that one is not at all surprised at the rigour with which this king punished a cheat so detestable; for nothing is more criminal than fraud in matters of religion, or to impose upon the simplicity of persons who rest their belief in religion only upon the testimony of those infidelity they entertain a good opinion of, and think they can safely depend upon. But these crafty priests of Bel had too much interest in this imposture not to carry on the ridiculous imposture, and so did not fall off from their course of corruption with all their artifice and power. It reminds one of what Aristophanes mentions of a like fraud practised by the priests of Plautus, and thus described by him:—

"Etena substraxit, hodie hoc terrae, Vestibulo deae, mihi qui suae deae fuisse dicatur.

"Aeacis terrae, aeacis terrae, Mihi quisque terrae, mihi quisque terrae, Prodeat humana sermonum in soura, Etena 昇eum, quatenus recte."

(Παρ. act. iii. secv. 2).

Ver. 23. There was a great dragon, which they of Babylon worshipped. By the "dragon" we understand a serpent, which unaccountable sort of worship prevailed much in the early times. That the Babylonians had images of serpents

BEL AND THE DRAGON.

1155
THE HISTORY OF BEL AND THE DRAGON.

1156

Daniel assumes the supreme power, he acts as absolutely as the king, his power and sway over him are so great as to permit him to be a captive; he has destroyed Bel, and slain the dragon, &c.

Ver. 21. Who cast him into the lions' den? Some, from that which is before mentioned, conclude that the prophet here speaks of Alexander in the time of the third year of Belshazzar; because Alexander, as is related in Dan. viii. 9, was victorious over artists, and was the king of Persia and Media, and of those parts of the empire that he inherited from Cyaxares, the Persian king. But this seeming solution of the passage is not so easy as many suppose. It is not to be supposed that this story is related of Alexander, because there was no such king: for he was king of Persia at the time of the destruction of Tyre. It is to be supposed that this story is related of the Persian king, who was the successor of his father, and who was the first of the Persian kings that came to the knowledge of Daniel.

Ver. 22. And it was said six days in the lions' den, but in the sacred one he remained there but one night. And another solution of the passage is, that Daniel was cast into the lions' den, once under Darius, because he prayed to his God, contrary to the king's express command, and agreed with the king in the same day; because Darius was the son of Dario the great, and had the title of great; he had a son of the same name, and he was at the time of the beginning of the story, the king of Persia. The story of Daniel was cast into the lions' den, and Daniel there remained; or that a different Daniel from the prophet so called is here spoken of.

Ver. 23. If it be true that they had given them every day two cubic cases, and two sheep. The margin very properly renders "two slaves," i.e. two prisoners condemned to death. As it is an ordinary mode of speech to use body for the whole, the passage may be rendered as follows: they cast the single circumstance of Daniel being here said to be cast into the lions' den, once under Darius, because he prayed to his God, contrary to the king's express command, and agreed with the king in the same day, the day of his prayer, and by which he remained there but one night, and not six days, as some suppose, as the sacred one to the God three times a-day, the other for destroying Bel and the dragon. It seems, therefore, most probable to suppose, that different facts and times are here meant, and that either the prophet Daniel was twice cast into the lions' den, once under Darius, because he prayed to his God, contrary to the king's express command, and agreed with the king in the same day, the day of his prayer, and by which he remained there but one night; or that a different Daniel from the prophet so called is here spoken of.

Ver. 24. Wherefore they had given them every day two cubic cases, and two sheep. The margin very properly renders "two slaves," i.e. two prisoners condemned to death. As it is an ordinary mode of speech to use body for the whole, the passage may be rendered as follows: they cast the single circumstance of Daniel being here said to be cast into the lions' den, once under Darius, because he prayed to his God, contrary to the king's express command, and agreed with the king in the same day, the day of his prayer, and by which he remained there but one night, and not six days, as some suppose, as the sacred one to the God three times a-day, the other for destroying Bel and the dragon. It seems, therefore, most probable to suppose, that different facts and times are here meant, and that either the prophet Daniel was twice cast into the lions' den, once under Darius, because he prayed to his God, contrary to the king's express command, and agreed with the king in the same day, the day of his prayer, and by which he remained there but one night; or that a different Daniel from the prophet so called is here spoken of.

A DISSERTATION

UPON

THE TWO BOOKS OF THE MACCABEES.

There are often reckoned four books of Maccabees; the two first I shall only have occasion to speak of. The third contains a miraculous deliverance of the Jews who were exposed, in the amphitheatre at Alexandria, to the fury of elephants. This book, which is to be found in all the Greek editions, is, without reason, called the third book of Maccabees, since it does not speak of them in the least. If this history be true, it ought to have been placed the first of all, as what is mentioned there happened about forty years before the passages that are related in the other two books (see Dr. Pin's Bel. Dissert. Eccl. hist. vol. i.). The fourth, containing the history of John Hyrcanus, is rejected as still more apocryphal, and probably was taken from the book or memoirs of his actions mentioned, 1 Macc. xvi. 23, 24. The two books of the Maccabees, known and distinguished by that name, were not written by the same person, as the learned conclude from the style, and a different manner of counting the years; the one follows the Jewish account, the other that of Alexander, which begins six months later. The fourth book is thought to have been written by a Hebraeo originally in that language, as the phrase of it is plainly Jewish, or rather in Syriac, which was the vulgar tongue in Palestine in the time of the Maccabees, and afterward translated into Greek, and is by some attributed to Josaphus or Philo, by others to the synagogue, or the Maccabees themselves. The other is supposed to be wrote originally in Greek, begins its history a great deal higher than the first, and is an abridgment or epitome, by what author it is uncertain, of a work written by Jason, a Jew of Cyrene, as appears from the preface of that book, which begins ch. ii. 23. The book itself is opened by two letters of the Jews at Jerusalem to their brethren in Egypt, and added by the author of this abridgment. The two books together contain the history of the Jews, or the state of the church under the third monarchy, which was that of the Greeks, comprising about forty years, from the death of Alexander the Great to that of Seleucus, and they conclude it: the one in the eighth and thirty years and upwards before the coming of our Saviour. There is a great chasm in the Jewish history, occasioned by the loss of their books; for scarce one book written in the Hebrew tongue, since prophecy ceased, escaped the general calamity that befell the Jewish writings. Those that were retrieved by Judas Maccabeus (2 Macc. b. 13, 14) from the ravage of Antiochus, or were written afterward, which were not a few (see Prov. to Eccles.), all perished under Titus' dispersion, or Adrian's persecution; on this account, and the obscurity occasioned by this calamity, Eusebius says he can go no further than Zerubbabel in his catalogue with any certainty, as there was no sacred volume to be depended upon, from the return to the captivity to our Saviour's time (Demonst. lib. vii.). During their captivity, indeed, the prophets Ezekiel and Daniel give us an account of many particulars relating to their history, as does Tobit likewise at Ninereh, Esther and Mordecai at Shushan. After the captivity we have the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, whose present work probably is but an abridgment of those writings or commentaries of his mentioned 2 Macc. b. 13, since the passage quoted in the Maccabees is not to be found there. With Nehemiah ended the history of the Jews contained in the canonical books of the Old Testament. As Nehemiah died after the year of the world 2553, and the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes began A. M. 3299, from the one to the other there was a distance of two hundred and sixty-six years, which interval between Nehemiah and the Maccabees, far want of records, annals, and other proper helps from sacred or profane history, may well be expected to be dark and obscure. In the time of the Maccabees, care seems to have been taken to record all remarkable events which happened in that country; the author of the first book quotes at the end of that work the memoirs of the pontificate of John Hyrcanus (1 Macc. xvi. ult.), which makes it probable that he wrote from the annals of that time. The author of the second says (v. 11), that Judas made a collection of the historical accounts of his nation which had been dispersed during the war. And in fact great use is to be made and much light is afforded from the apocryphal part of the Maccabees, chiefly the books of the Maccabees, for carrying on the thread of the Jewish history. Next to the books of Maccabees, we are beholden to Josephus, Philo Judaeus, and such Greek and Latin writers as would counsel to take notice of them, for further insight into their history. This then is the first use I shall mention of the books of the Maccabees, viz. in some measure to fill up the chasm of the Jewish history from the census of prophecy. Secondly, no history is of like use to explain the book of Daniel, and what is contained therein relating to the Jews and their great enemy, Antiochus Epiphanes, on which account the fathers have always set a great value on these books. In them most of the particulara of the great revolutions mentioned by that prophet are so unfolded and explained, that even the very time and number of days which are there set down accord most strictly to truth and the evidence of fact. The first book in particular is a key to the mysteries in the eighth and eleventh chapters of that prophecy, respecting the horn by which the sanctuary was profaned. From thence it appears that that horn was Antiochus, whose great wickedness and wantonness in shedding blood, and the abomination introduced by him into the holy place, fully answer that character. The like use may be made of these books for explaining other parts of the holy scripture, as particularly 1 Macc. x. 65, 69, which, with other passages in this grave writer, "will compare with the ninth of the prophet Zechariah, will perceive there may be good use of books not canonical for the right understanding of sacred writings most canonical, and that these books, though apocryphal, do not deserve to be left out in any new impressions of our bible;" (Tom. ii. p. 844). To which I must add what another judicious writer says on the occasion, "That without all doubt all the world could not encompass the loss of the books of the Maccabees, and the use of them for understanding the prophets; so inestimable is the benefit of them to that purpose" (Chorndaele's Epiologe, p. 210). Thirdly, God having withdrawn his prophets, many and great revolutions happened to the Jewish state, and the church of God underwent very severe and heavy persecutions both from the Greeks and Romans, in which the Maccabees in particular signalized themselves; the account of which times, and of their conduct on the occasion, we must take from these books; and therefore they are to be valued, and of the church not unprofitably used. says St. Austin, for those glorious instances recorded in them of persons suffering such horrible persecutions with a remarkable patience for the testimony of God's religion, and thereby encouraging others to undergo cheerfully the like trial of sufferings. Fourthly, there are some scattered remains in these books as well as the other apocryphal ones, which have preserved many notions of the ancient Jews in the interval between the days of Christ and the last prophets; and in particular their belief of a future resurrection, and the hope which the Jews conceived and entertained of the Messiah that was to
A DISCUSSION UPON THE MACCABEES.

I come, whom they speak of sometimes as a prophet or priest, sometimes as a king, sometimes under the character of two of these offices joined together (see 1 Mac. iv. 46, xiv. 41). But notwithstanding the usefulness of the book of the prophet Maccabaeus, it must be acknowledged, and is very apparent, that there are great errors, and often accous different and even contradictory to be found in them, especially with respect to many particulars of the history of the Greek and Roman history, or national prejudices, and an immoderate partiality in favour of the Jewish nation. A learned writer has been at the pains (see Ray- th's Peri. vol. 2) to select such passages as are in their consistent wish, and contrary to, the account given by approved authors and historians of particular facts and occurrences, and sets down among others, as instances of carelessness at least, the following passages. 1 Macc. i. 6, where it is said, that Alexander, before his death, divided his kingdom among his honourable servants; but the writers of this history say otherwise; the account generally received is, that after the death of Alexander, his dominions were parted among divers of his princes and captains, and after a short time fell into the hands of four, as is also intimated, Dan. viii. 8. Ch. xxv. 16, it is said of the Romans, that they com- mitted their government to one man, or magistrate, every year; whereas it is well known, that at that time there were annually two consuls chosen at Rome, and for three hundred years before. Lib. ii. ii. 3, 4, the ark is said to be hid and concealed by the prophet Jeremiah, which could neither happen before the taking of the city, for Jeremiah was then in prison; nor after its being taken, for the Chal- maccabees would not have done so. These words have so far spread a valuable part of the stories in the tabernacle, the ark, and the altar to be taken away, and secreted from them. And what follows after, that God would avenge the profanation of that temple, which he had delivered it, once so familiar to the temple, is no less false, as it is certain the material furniture of that super temple was all destroyed with it. 2 Macc. x. 16, it is said that Antiochus perished through great grief in a strange land, which is thought by some to be confirmed from Dan. v. 25; but, Lib. ii. ii. 16, he is said to have been slain in the temple of Nenciee, by throwing stones like thunderbolts upon him and his company; and, iv. 32, to have ended his days miserably in the mountains, by an miserable and in- visible plague in his bowels. Judas Maccabaeus is said, lib. i. i. 3. 18, to have been slain in battle, anno 152, but, Lib. ii. 10, he is represented as writing a letter or epistle, anno 188, thirty-six years after his death. Again, lib. i. iv. 30, he is said to have purified the temple before Antiochus' death; but, Lib. ii. ii. 2, 3, it is mentioned as done two years after his death. Nor will it be sufficient to say that these two years are to be reckoned from the proclamations of the temple, and not from Antiochus' death, for even thus it will not be consistent with the first book; for it appears from thence, that the purifying the sanctuary was three years after its proclamations; for the proclamation was on the fifteenth day of the month Chaslev, anno 145, lib. i. i. 54, and the purifying was on the twenty-fifth day of the same month, anno 145, lib. i. iv. 52. There are also some instances, particularly in the second book, which are contrary to the canonical scriptures, and of dangerous consequence to be recommended as precedents, or to stand upon record un-contradicted in history; as lib. ii. xii. 44, 45, Judas Macca- beus is commended for praying for the dead, and making an offering of reconciliation in their behalf, that they might be delivered from sin; Bellarmin from hence takes occa- sion to confirm the doctrines of purgatory and prayers for the dead; De Purgat. lib. ii. cap. 3), but it appears plainly from the context, that Judas' prayer was not for the relief and deliverance of those who had displeased God, and perished in their sins, might not be imputed to, or transferred upon, the living. The rendering of the Vulgate, the rendering of the Vulgate, or rather of the original text, which I believe is correct, is 'ut, à peccavit sanctu- var. The Greek has nothing like it, nor can any such docu- trine be founded upon it. Hereat lies the falsity of that ver- sion; it fulfills the words, "it was a good and noble thought," which manifestly is spoken of what went before, to the sentence that follows after, though the Greek, by a full stop, quite distinguishes it from this, in such a condition that will the Greeks of the present Greek text ever allow it to belong to it. There is a like mistake, and the same purpose, two verses above (ver. 43, where the Vulgate reads, Diodorin millia, that should be done, without any notice or mention of the dead; nor is that version less faulty by rendering the Greek advort hic, by religiosis. It is most probable, that Judas thought of nothing less than purgatory in this action, for the money sent to Jerusalem was for a sin-offering, to expiate, or take away, the guilt from the rest of the people. And it is observable, that this verse was a text to purify the guilt and profanation of the novus, Lev. iv. 13. So that upon the whole, what was here done by Judas, was not for the sake of the deceased sol- diers, but for the safety and preservation of the remainder that were living, grace for judgment, God may not suffer them to take the rest. Lib. ii. xiv. 41, 42, Razzia is commended for laying violent hands on himself, and is said to die manu- ally. But this whole account seems a fiction. That a man should fall into the midst of his enemies, that they should make way for him, where he fell amongst the thickest of them; that he should rise again in anger, but in such a condition that while his blood was gushed out like sprouts of water, that he should run through the midst of the throng notwithstanding; and standing upon a steep rock, when his blood was now quite gone, should pluck out his bowels, and throw to them with both hands, and cast them among the crowd! and even at his last gasp should have the use of his understanding so perfect, as to call upon God to restore him those bowels again; these are circumstances so odd and romantic, to gain any credit to this story. It would be almost endless to instance in the several faulty particulars of the second book; but of all others, i. 18 to the end of that chapter, ex- cepting the prayer itself, is the most unanswerable, which the learned reader may see exposed with great strength and reasoning, by consulting Raynold. de Libr. Apocryph. tom. ii. Prenel. 123, 134. But notwithstanding this mixture of dross, there is a fund of valuable treasure still remain- ing. Lastly, It cannot but be observed, that the series of these books is very much disturbed, that not only the same facts are frequently related in both, but the order of time is not truly preserved; it may not be unis, therefore, that these books may be perused with more pleasure and profit, as the reader may read thus or the Old Testament, vol. ii., where he will find the several chapters in each set down according to the true series of the Jew- ish history.
A DISSERTATION
THE TWO BOOKS OF ESDRAS.

That which is called the first, or, according to other accounts, the third book of Esdras, the author of which is not known, but supposed to be a Hellenistic Jew, inserts an odd narration, in the third and fourth chapters, of three young men that were of Darius' guard, contending for the reward of a problem or sentence, propounded by every one of them. The arguments, it must be confessed, are weighty, and very proper on the occasion; but it is obvious that the writer makes those candidates to his description, as it were, to the king, what gifts and rewards he shall bestow on them in token of victory: and besides, the rewards themselves are too magnificent for such a contest, and more proper to be bestowed on a general, who had gained a signal victory, or conquered divers provinces. His design in this narrative seems to have been, to embellish the account of Zerubbabel, by a circumstance so honourable to him as the prize, and, at the same time, entertaining enough to the reader. I conceive it to be a tradiactionary story, as the true Ezra takes no notice of it, founded probably upon truth, but mixed with some fabulous circumstances. In different parts of the book there is a summary repetition of the two last chapters of the second book of Chronicles, and of the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. But one cannot excuse the author for audaciously inserting several particulars from them, to give an air of truth to his relation, and to make it more credible. But against its authority there are the following material objections: 1. When the Jews, by the permission of Cyrus, returned to Judea, this writer makes their governor, or conductor, to be Sanballas, whereas, according to the true Ezra, Zerubbabel was their conductor. 2. He places the reconsecration of the altar, and the renewing the sacerdotal office, in the second year of Darius; whereas the canonical book of that name fixes it in the reign of Cyrus (ii. 1), and in the seventh month. 3. If Darius, when he permitted the Jews to return with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem, to rebuild their temple, wrote to his officers beyond the Euphrates in their favour, as this writer represents it, would they have had the assurance to demand of them by what authority they engaged in the work? Did not they, in the time of David, and Solomon, not enter into the temple, when no man was there, with the instruments that were therein, and not hinder the priests in their ministration? 4. He makes Zerubbabel to be one of the guard about the king's (Darius') person at Babylon, when he confesses it to be at that time, at Jerusalem (Ezra ii. 2). 5. He represents Darius (iv. 40), as engaged by a solemn vow, before his advancement to the kingdom, to rebuild their temple; if it was the case, what need was there to search the archives with such diligence for Cyrus' decree for that purpose? 6. He distinguishes Nehemiah from the Tishatha, making two separate persons of them; whereas the latter is only a name of office (Neh. viii. 9). 7. He consults the book of Esther and Haggai, when for the first time, iv. 41, 57, that Zerubbabel encountered Darius, he went to Jerusalem, and resumes the holy vessels, which Cyrus had intended to have sent, as if Cyrus had not executed that design, contrary to what the true Ezra, and even himself says, vi. 13, 19, 8. He charges the Edomites with burning of the temple, at the same time that he mentions Jerusalem being taken by the Chaldeans. 9. He says, that when Darius gave leave to the Jews to return, he engaged them to be exacted a great sum of money, a thousand talents, and the greater safety by a thousand horse, as if a number so inconconsiderable, could be a safe guard for fifty thousand persons. Lastly, Where he does agree with the canonical books, he quite confounds the order of time and events; and, after all his pains to adjust his account to that of the true Ezra, he betrays his inability for so nice an undertaking, and has fallen into faults so gross, that the church has deservedly rejected this book as uncanonical, and unworthy to be read in its service. I have the rather taken notice of these, as well as those respecting the books of Maccabees, to acquit myself of a promise (see Pref. to Comm. on Esdras.), to make some strictures and observations upon particular passages in them. As to the second book of this writer, it must be confessed there are in it lovely sentiments, beautiful similes, ancient traditions, the appearance at least of a prophetic spirit, and a surprising close resemblance of many passages in the New Testament; but the following objections are made against it: 1. The genealogy of this pseudo-Esdra, placed at the entrance, differs from that in Esdras vii. 12, and from that in the true Ezra, vi. 1, 2; which has induced the learned to conclude that they are different persons. 2. It is said (6, 11), that God scattered the people of two provinces, even of Tyre and Sidon, in favour of his people returning from Egypt, of which there is no confirmation in Scripture. And a little after (ver. 22, 23), two very different facts are confounded: Moses is made to work the miracle of sweetening the water at the brook Arnon (Num. xxi. 10), which was brought only on the waters of Marah (Exod. xv. 25. 39, 40). The author enumerates the twelve minor prophets, though, Haggai, Zachary, and Malachi, whom, according to a rabbinical conceit he calls an angel of the Lord, prophesied after the captivity, and their times agree not with that of this writer. It is moreover observable, that he places them not according to the order in the Hebrew canon, but follows that of the LXX. or Greek bibles. Chap. ii. 33, he introduces his having received a charge from the Lord upon mount Horeb, abruptly, without any authority, or any addition to the undertaking, and countenance a notion of his inspiration. Chap. iv. 35, 41, mention is made of souls departed in a state of grace being kept in chambers or secret storehouses, till the day of judgment, agreeably enough to Apoc. vi. 10, which has been objected to, as seemingly countenancing the doctrine of purgatory; and it must be confessed the holding scriptures have so applied it, but without reason, as nothing is therein said or intimated of their being detained there by way of punishment, or to be purified by it. Chap. iii. 6, we have another rabbinical conceit of Eden, or the earthly paradise, being planted even before the earth itself came forward, or was made. Chap. vi. 49 is said to God, on the fifth day, created two animals of an enormous bigness, one called Enoch, the other Leviathan, and as the seventh part would not contain them both, he separated them, and put the former into a dry place, wherein there were a thousand mountains, and the Leviathan he reserved in the sea, to furnish an entertainment for his people at the coming of their Messiah. This is also another rabbinical whim, which the author borrowed from the Talmudists, who have likewise abused Gen. i. 20, 21, and Ps. viii. 26, to the same purpose, and for a cruel and bloody purpose (see Reynold's Preface, xxvii. vol. i.). What he mentions, xiii. 40, 41, about the ten tribes being carried by God beyond the Euphrates, which divided itself for their passage, into a further country, we are nowhere informed of; but it is evident that they might there keep their statutes without danger or disturbance, from thence to return at the latter time by a like miraculous stopping of the waters. I think these facts are allowed to be in being, in what country it is uncertain, yet their passage both ways in the manner described is scarcely credible. It seems a fond persuasion, arising from national prejudice, that God will never cease to do miracles in behalf of his chosen. Chap. xiv. 11, he makes ten parts and a half of the world, dividing it into twelve, to be in his time already past, and therefore, according to his account, the world should have been at an end above one thousand seven hundred years ago. It is computed, that from the creation of the world (for I see no reason to begin he account at the deluge) to the time of Esdras were about three thousand four hundred and seventy years, and therefore after five hundred years more, or the time of our Saviour's birth, or at least of his death, the period should have been completed, and this world have had an end. Chap. iv. 42, mention is made of a young man of high stature, taller than all the rest, crowning those that have confessed the name of God, called also, ver. 47, the son of God: to confirm the same legend, and to give the more credit to this fable, are these words inserted, vi. 23, 29. "My Son Jesus shall be revealed with those that be with him, and they that remain shall rejoice within four hundred years; after these years shall my son Christ die, and all men that have life." This and many other passages speak so plainly of Jesus Christ, his coming, office, death, &c., that if this book had been known and received as authentic among the Jews, it seems almost impossible that any Jew should remain unconvinced. From a number of parallel passages to those in the New Testament, which a learned hand has digested columnwise (see Lee's Dissert. on 2 Esdras), it seems necessary to conclude, either that Jesus Christ and his apostles copied from hence, or that this writer transcribed largely from the other. It seems most probable, that the author was a Jew converted to Christianity, who, in hopes of converting others, composed this work under the name of a writer for whom the Jews had the highest esteem. And there seems good reason to conclude, that the author lived in the times of the first heathen persecutions, from many passages encouraging faith, and a spirit of constancy under persecution; as may, I think, be inferred also from some circumstances in the visions themselves (see chap. xiii.), some of which have been thought to have been taken from Ezekiel's versions, Daniel's prophecies (see Dan. vii. 71, who as from the mouth of God, is called his brother, (xii. 11), or St. John's Revelation. But I forbear to enter or remark upon these, as acknowledging my ignorance of their true design, which the learned themselves are so much divided about. What a great critic (Scaliger) observed of Calvin, that he was wise in not writing on the Apocalypse, admonishes me not rashly to attempt the visionary part of this book, who have neither sufficient reading or judgment to discern the scope and intendment of mystical and prophetic writings.

I cannot conclude without blessing the goodness of God for enabling me to put the finishing hand at length to these sheets, and am glad likewise to embrace this opportunity of acknowledging my obligation to those right reverend and reverend persons, who have occasionally favoured me with their learned assistance in the course of this work.
